"Delightful a fiddle-stick!" rejoined the gentleman. "It's such stuff that fills young ladies' heads with poets and nonsense, when they should be learning to make puddings. What good does it do? that's the question. What does it prove? What have you gained by it? How are you better, or wiser, or richer?"

"I do not know that you are richer in money or wiser in the arts to win it," replied the calm, sweet voice, a little tremulous with feeling, (her tone went to my very heart.) "Nor do I believe that either poetry or prose is useful to man or woman, when it interferes with any duty of life; but, enjoyed temperately, I believe nothing adds more to the only real wisdom—that of being happy."

An old gentleman, of mild demeanor, who had hitherto remained silent, now took up the debate. It was her father.

"Mary is right," he said, "quite right, and I must take part against you, sir. Providence has gifted us with sources of enjoyment above all other creatures, and whatever tends to develop them raises us above all others. They are like springs in a meadow, which, when kept open, flow through banks of verdure which they have enriched. Good poetry and useful reading of any kind keep the heart thus fresh. Ideas of merely sensual comfort, of money-making, and the drudgery of life, should not be allowed to occupy the mind exclusively; even wisdom, in its more serious forms, should not be too perpetually the object of attention. Whatever calls up an innocent smile, or a generous feeling, although but the conceit of an essayist, or the reverie of a poet, has its value, which cannot be estimated like merchandise. I do not demand of a periodical which I take into my family, that it should be a catalogue of duties, or a lesson in science. It is enough for me that it brings merriment, free from immorality, and innocent topics of debate and meditation: and, if it ever discusses subjects in which I myself do not feel interested, I reflect that there are hundreds of others whose tastes are different from mine. Its object must be difficult of accomplishment, inasmuch as it involves the necessity of satisfying a vast variety of understandings and opinions; and, when these differ so widely, I am not so unreasonable as to expect that it will be adapted to mine alone. I read it as I sit down to the table of a hotel, where, while I am dining on one dish, I perceive my neighbor is appeasing his appetite on another. Indeed the beneficial effects of this species of publication is, I am convinced, much more important than is generally imagined. Many a one has been induced to read great authors, from being struck with a quotation in a review. A stroke of easy satire has startled many a young person from a bad habit, or furnished him with a useful resolution. You have here the results of several persons' experience and thought. You are made acquainted with numerous shades in human characters, which might be otherwise overlooked. I remember I myself one evening, in a fit of weariness and perhaps ill-nature, to which all men sometimes yield, was checked in an impulse to speak harshly before my family, by hearing my daughter read an essay upon the "Tyranny of Fathers," which came from her innocent lips with a double force. I am inclined to think we all receive instruction most freely when not put on our guard by any avowed determination to teach us; and, if I wish to convey a lesson to the mind of my daughter here, I should choose that state of mind into which she has been thrown by the perusal of Mr. Bryant's poems. She is then softened into a readiness to receive a noble impression, and all her feelings are favorable to the growth of virtue."

This was a long speech of the old gentleman's, Messrs. Editors, but I thought it very much to the purpose; and, as his sentiments are of a kind which I believe you would cordially acquiesce in, but which your modesty might prevent your advancing in your own persons, I send them to you as nearly as I am able to recollect them, and should be glad to see them in print. DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE INTERSTATE, OR JERRY SMITH'S WIDOW.

A WESTERN SKETCH.

I LEFT my residence in Kentucky, a few years ago, and proceeded to Baltimore for the purpose of transacting some business with a mercantile house, with which I had been extensively concerned. No one knew the object of my journey; because, being a bachelor, in easy circumstances, I was under no obligation to disclose to any person more than I thought proper. I left my farm under the direction of a manager, with the expectation of returning in a few weeks. On my arrival in Baltimore, I found that it would be necessary to proceed to New-Orleans. The vessel in which I embarked, after being baffled and detained by head winds, at length sprung a leak, and we were obliged to put into the Hayana. Here various delays occurred, and as I could neither talk Spanish, play billiards, nor smoke cigars, the time hung so heavy upon my hands, that I soon fretted myself into a bilious fever. In this condition my captain left me, without so much as saying good-by; and when at last I reached New-Orleans, by another vessel, I found that the person with whom my affairs had been entrusted, was absent, and not expected to return for several weeks. There was now no alternative left me, but either to abandon the object of my voyage, and risk the entire loss of a large sum, or by remaining, expose my constitution, already debilitated and predisposed to disease, to the dangers of a sickly climate. Unfortunately I adopted the latter course.

I found the weather as hot here as in Cuba, the language as incomprehensible, and the billiard-tables quite as devoid of interest. The sickly season was fast approaching, and as I had determined not to escape disease by flight, I endeavored to avoid it by precaution. It is amusing enough, to those who can look on from a distance, to see the various expedients by which men endeavor to contend with death; as if the great destroyer was a foe who could be eluded by cunning, or baffled by force. The yellow fever assailed the inhabitants; I felt the malady, or thought I felt it, creeping slowly into my system, and resorted to every preventive which my own reason, or the experience of others suggested. I first tried the Sangrado plan; drank water, ate vegetables, and suffered phlebotomy. But I soon found that I could not endure starvation, nor carry on the functions of life without a due supply of the circulating medium. I resorted to stimulants and tonics—a mint-julep in the morning, bitters at noon, and wine after dinner; but alas! with no better success; for every time that I looked in the glass, I discovered, by my sallow visage, that the enemy was silently making his approaches. My eyes became jaundiced—my pulse heavy—my skin dry—and my complexion received a new coat of yellow every day, deepening at first into a delicate orange, then to a saffron, and lastly to a copper color, until I began to fear that I was actually degenerating into a Spaniard, a Quarteron, or a Cherokee.

and on this occasion the shadows that tinged my face were but too prophetic. The dreaded fever came at last, and I sunk into a state of helpless and hopeless misery, which none can truly estimate but those who have felt its poignancy. I was a stranger, far from home; in a climate tainted with disease; and attacked by a disorder supposed to be fatal. That malady, among other distressing characteristics, has one which is peculiarly aggravating. I know not whether others are similarly affected, but to me a fever brings a state of excitement and sensitiveness which produces the most exquisite torture. My whole nature is subtilized—every feeling is quickened—and every sense sharpened into a painful acuteness of perception. The judgment is weakened, but the imagination acquires a supernatural activity; the body sinks, but the spirit is feelingly alive. Such was my state. In the early stages of my disease, a thousand wild visions were in my brain. I made rhymes; repeated pages of Latin, although in a moment of sanity I could not have connected a sentence; I saw people whose faces had been forgotten for years; I called up events which had transpired in my childhood; I planned novels, composed essays, and devised theories; I fought battles; I recalled the joys, and repeated the sins of my whole life. I was a madman, a philosopher, a devotee, and a wag, in the same hour. At one moment I prayed fervently; at another I dropped the doctor's nostrums in my sleeve, and amused myself with inventing ingenious answers to deceive him, and feigning symptoms which did not exist. I jested, moralized, groaned, wept, and laughed; and found in each new mood that came over me, a pang as agonizing as that which I had suffered in the one that had passed. Such is fever! excruciating bodily pain, with a brilliancy and strength of intellectual vision, which looks back to infancy, and forward to eternity, and around upon the whole scene of life, while the mental eye is crowded with images, whose number and vividness weary and distract the brain. Loss of strength, stupor, and melancholy succeeded. I thought of home, of myself, and of death; and my visions assumed every day a deeper and more death-like hue.

There was one object which intruded into all my dreams. I need only name its character, in order to enlist the sympathy of every tender-hearted reader. It was a young widow, for whom I felt a particular regard, and to whom—if I must speak out, I was engaged to be married, on my return home. She was my first love. I had paid my addresses to her before her marriage, but was too bashful to declare myself explicitly; and while I balanced matters in my own mind, and sought by the gentlest hints to disclose my passion, she, by some fatality—by mere accident, as I have since understood, married a certain Jeremiah Smith, a fellow for whom, and for whose name, I had always entertained a sovereign and spiteful contempt. I did not blame her for marrying, for that was her privilege; but to wed a fellow named Jerry! and of all the Jerries in the world to pitch upon Jerry Smith, a dissipated silly profligate, not worth a single brass farthing, was too bad! It was flying in the face of propriety, and treating her other lovers, who were numerous, with indignity. Poor girl! she had a sad time of it, for Jerry treated her worse than a brute; but at the end of two years he had the grace to pop off, leaving her penniless and as pretty as ever. It was a long time after her widowhood before we met; I would not call on her, and as to courting Jerry Smith's widow, that seemed out of the question. But when we did meet, she looked so sad and so beautiful, and smiled so pensively, and talked so sweetly of old times, that all her power of fascination over me revived. I began to visit her, thinking of nothing more at first, than to show her my superiority over Jerry Smith, and to convince her how great a slight she had shown to my merits in selecting him. But in trying to make myself agreeable to the widow, she became so very agreeable to me, that in spite of all my former resolutions, I offered her my hand, which was accepted with the most charming grace imaginable. This was just before my journey, and as that could not be postponed, we agreed to put off the wedding until my return.

Such was the beautiful vision that had smiled upon me through all my wanderings; but which now was presented to my distempered fancy, arrayed in the brightest colors. In vain did I sometimes try to banish it; I thought of business, my farm, my negroes, my tobacco—but anon came the graceful widow, with that same smile and blush that she wore when she faintly murmured "no," and expressively looked "yes"—there she was, hanging fondly over me, and chiding my delay.

This could not last forever; and just when every body thought that I was about to die, I grew better; and to my great joy was put on board a steam-boat bound for Louisville. For a day or two I continued to recruit; change of air, scene, and food did wonders: but the happiness of a speedy recovery was not fated to be mine. I had embarked in a steam-boat of the largest class, on board of which were four hundred passengers. The weather was excessively hot, there were many sick among us, and the atmosphere between the decks soon became impure. The yellow fever was said to be on board; and our comfortless situation was rendered dreadful by the panic that ensued. I relapsed, and was soon pronounced past recovery. I had the yellow fever, and was considered a fatal bearer of contagion. It was thought proper to remove me from the boat, and to abandon me to my fate, rather than endanger the lives of others.

I was accordingly put on shore; but when or how it happened I know not. I have a faint recollection of being lowered into the yawl, and seeing people gazing at me; I heard one say "he'll die in an hour;" another inquired my name; one voice pitied me; and another said I had made a happy escape from pain. I thought they were about to bury me, and became senseless in an agonizing effort to speak.

When I recovered my consciousness, I found myself in a cabin on the shore of the Mississippi. A kind family had received and nursed me, and had brought me back to life after I had been long insensible. They were poor people, who made their living by cutting fire-wood to supply the steam-boats; a lean and sallow family, whose bilious complexions, and attenuated forms, attested the withering influence of a corrupted atmosphere. They had the languid southern eye, the heavy gait, and slow speech of persons enervated by burning sun-beams and humid breezes.

For two weeks I was unable to rise from the miserable pallet with which their kindness had supplied me. I counted every log in the wretched cabin; my eye became familiar with all the coats, gowns, and leathern hunting shirts, that hung from the rafters. I noted each crevice, and set down in my memory all the furniture and cooking utensils. For fourteen long summer days my eyes had no other employment but to wander over these few objects again and again, until at last nothing was left to be discovered, and I closed them in the disgust occasioned by the sameness of the scene, or strained them in search of something new, until my eye-balls ached. But I had no more feverish dreams, and when I thought of the widow Smith, it was with the delight of newly-awakened hope; and with the confidence that better days and brighter scenes awaited me at home.

At last I was able to crawl to the door, and to see the sun, the green trees, and the water. It was a most refreshing sight, although the landscape itself was any thing but attractive. The cabin stood on the bank of the river, in a low alluvion bottom. It was surrounded and overhung by a forest of immense trees, whose tall dark trunks rose to the height of sixty or seventy feet, without a branch, and then threw out their vast lateral boughs, and heavy foliage, so luxuriantly as entirely to exclude the sun. Beneath that dense canopy of shade, were long, dark, and gloomy vistas, where the Indian might well fancy himself surrounded by the spirits of his departed friends. The soil itself had a dismal aspect; the whole surface had been inundated but a few weeks past; the fallen leaves of last year, saturated and blackened by long immersion, were covered with a thick deposit of mud, and the reeking mass sent up volumes of noxious vapor. Before the house was a naked sand-bar, sparkling and glowing with heat. In the middle of the river was a large sawyer, an immense log, the entire trunk of a majestic oak, whose roots clung to the bottom, while the other end, extending down the stream, rose to the surface, the current giving it a heavy and eternal motion; now appearing some twenty feet of the huge black mass above the surface, and then sinking again in the water with the regular swing of a pendulum. I gazed for hours at that perpetual see-saw, wondering what law of nature governed its exact vibrations. Here the hideous alligator might be seen rocking through half a day, as if in the enjoyment of an agreeable recreation; while droves of those animals, sporting in the stream, or crawling on the beach, roared like so many bulls, filling the whole forest with their howlings. Added to those sounds, were the braying of the wolf, the croaking of innumerable frogs, and the buzz of myriads of mosquitoes. Under any other circumstances, I should have thought myself in Pandemonium; but I had in the last few weeks endured so much pain, passed through so many horrors, and trembled so often, and so long, upon the brink of the grave, that I enjoyed the sun, the breeze, and the verdure, even with these dismal accompaniments. I was even agreeably situated; for so great and so pleasing was the change, in having my mind relieved from its abstraction, that I could gaze placidly for hours upon natural objects of the most common description, and converse with interest on the most trivial subjects. Of all forms, none are so hideous or so terrifying, as the horrible creations of a distempered imagination.

For another fortnight I remained contented, gradually gaining strength; and then finding myself again able to travel, I took my passage in a steam-boat for Louisville. The river was now extremely low, and we advanced slowly, sometimes running aground upon the sand-bars, and always getting forward with difficulty. At length we reached our port, and I sprang with delight upon the soil of Kentucky. Among the steam-boats lying along the shore, dismantled and laid up for the season, was the vessel in which I had embarked at New-Orleans, a feeble invalid, and which had left me almost a corpse.

My baggage consisted of several well filled trunks; one of which, a common black leather travelling trunk, I had purchased at New-Orleans, and packed with articles of finery, for my intended bride. On setting me ashore at the wood-cutter's, the captain of the boat had been careful to land my several chattels, and I now proceeded with them to a hotel in Louisville. My baggage was carried into a bar-room crowded with gentlemen, and I had scarcely time to turn round, when a lank, agile Frenchman, with tremendous whiskers, darted forward, and seizing my black trunk, seemed to be about to appropriate to his own use all my nuptial presents.

"That is my trunk, sir," said I.

"Aha! sair! you say dat your tronk! Sair, dat is not your tronk!"

"Excuse me, sir, it is undoubtedly mine."

"Ah! ma foi! I shall not excuse you, sair! Sair, if you say dis your tronk, you no gentleman."

As he said this he jerked a key from his pocket, thrust it into the lock, threw open the disputed trunk, and to my utter consternation, and the infinite amusement of all others present, displayed a magazine of "sundries" as undoubtedly French as his own accent.

"Dare! vat you say now, sair?" he exclaimed, triumphantly, as he threw out the contents, "you say dat your coat? dat your waist-coat? your fiddle-string? your musique note? your every ting? Sair, you are no gentleman, if you say dat your tronk!"

"I ask your pardon," said I, "the trunk is not mine; but there is a strange mystery in this affair, which I cannot pretend to unravel."

"Ah, very much mystery, for some oder gentleman get my tronk, and make me wear my linen in dis hot country for five six week!"

"The fault is not mine; I purchased a trunk at New-Orleans so nearly resembling that one, that if I was not convinced by the contents, I would still think it mine. I am sorry to have been the innocent cause of any inconvenience to you."

"Very well; I buy my tronk at New-Orleans too—dat how he look so much alike; very sorry for you, sair; but I cannot let you have my tronk, indeed, sair."

I stood mortified and confounded; cutting a very awkward figure in the presence of a large company, who viewed this odd adventure with astonishment. I began almost to doubt my own identity, and to fancy myself transformed by magic into somebody else. It seemed as if my ill-luck was never to cease. I dreaded lest this incident should prove prophetic, and as I had seen my trunk transformed under my very nose, into the trunk of another gentleman, I feared that I might find my widow changed into another man's wife. I was somewhat relieved by the captain of the steam-boat, who had witnessed this scene, and who now stepped forward, and informed me, that my trunk, which had been exchanged by mistake, was on board his boat.

Feeling in no mood to visit any of my acquaintances, I directed my course to the counting-house of a merchant, upon whom I held a draft. On handing it to his clerk, he returned it, observing,

"The drawee of this bill is dead, sir; and we have instructions not to pay it."

"I am the drawee," returned I.

"There must be some mistake," replied the clerk, very coldly;

"Mr. M., in whose favor it is drawn, is certainly dead. We have it from his heir."

"Heir! don't you suppose, sir, that I am the best judge whether I am dead or alive?"

"Can't say, sir—sorry to dispute any gentleman's word—but my orders—"

"Sir, you don't only dispute my word, you deny my existence—don't you see me, and hear me, and can't you feel me?" said I, laying my long cold hand upon his soft white palm.

"Very sorry," repeated the book-keeper, withdrawing his hand as if a viper had touched it, "but my principal is absent—I act under instructions—and Mr. M.'s account is closed on our books."

"This is the strangest turn of all," said I to myself, as I stepped into the street. "I am dead—my heir has entered upon the estate—the widow mourns over my grave! Very pretty truly! I shall next be told that this is not Kentucky, and that I am not, and never was Edward M."

Angry and dispirited, I turned into a public reading-room, and sought for a file of the newspaper published in my own neighborhood. I looked for an old date, and soon found—my own obituary! and learned that in my untimely death society had been deprived of a useful member; my kindred of an affectionate relative; and my servants of a kind master! Upon further research, I stumbled upon a notice from my administrator—the next of kin—inviting all my debtors to settle their accounts. I saw no announcement of the widow's death—and concluding that her strength of mind had enabled her to survive my "untimely death," I determined to set out for home instantly, as well to relieve the burthen of her sorrow, as to reassume the privilege of collecting my own debts.

After a tiresome journey, I arrived on the night of the third day in my own neighborhood. Concealed by the darkness, I reached my own door without being recognized. My servants fled when they perceived me, screaming with surprise and terror. I followed them into the house. In the hall stood a gentleman and lady, who had been drawn thither by the uproar. They were the "next of kin" and—the widow Smith! The former, being a man of spirit, stood his ground, but the lady screamed and fled.

"Will you be good enough to tell me, sir," said I, "whether I am dead or alive?"

"We have mourned your death," said my nephew, with an embarrassed air, "but I am happy to find that you are alive, and most sincerely welcome you home."

"Supposing the fact to be that I am alive," said I, "will you do me the kindness to tell me whether I am master of this house?"

"Surely you are, and"—

"Do not interrupt me; you are my administrator, I find; do you claim also to be my guardian? These characters are not usually doubled."

"I claim nothing, sir, but an opportunity to explain these matters which seem to have offended you so deeply."

"Then, sir, being master here, and having neither administrator nor guardian, I desire to be alone."

The young man looked offended, and then smiled superciliously, as if he thought me insane, and turning on his heel, walked off.

I retired to a chamber, and having with some difficulty drawn my servants about me, and convinced them of my identity, took supper, and went to bed. About the widow I made no inquiry; circumstances looked so suspicious that I dreaded to hear the truth.

In the morning I rose late. I sallied forth, and gazed with delight upon my fields, my trees, and the thousand familiar objects that are comprised within that one endearing word—home. My negroes crowded about me, to welcome me, inquire after my health, and tell me all that had happened to them. Passing over these matters as briefly as possible, I proceeded to probe the subject nearest my heart, and—what think you, gentle reader, was the result?—the widow Smith was married to the "next of kin"! They had left my house at the dawn, that morning.

I have only to add that I have entirely recovered my health and spirits; and that as Jerry Smith's widow has twice slipped through my fingers, undervalued my character, and slighted my affection, and at last married that wild scamp, my nephew, whom I had before thought of disinheriting, I am determined that neither of them shall ever touch a dollar of my money; and to effect this laudable object, I am resolved not to live single, nor die intestate.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE P. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1832.

Editor's study.—There is, in one corner of the office where this journal is published, a recess, only large enough to hold three or four persons at a time, and so situated as to be nearly overlooked by the stranger. It is filled with a confused medley of matters—a table just of a size to hold ink, paper, and our elbow—a couple of chairs, dictionaries, gazetteers, pamphlets, and other heterogeneous materials. Here, for a change, we sometimes come and do our scribbling; or sit, peradventure, chatting with a friend in the secret of our hiding-place. The number of these is by no means limited. We are occasionally closeted in this little nook with intellects that have been felt far and wide. Poetry, prose, and the drama occasionally peep in upon us, with a cheerful "good morning." We are te-te-te with the representatives of all the arts and sciences; and—don't charge us with vanity, dear reader—somehow or other, half the wits about town know our little den, and give us a call when they have a work to publish, or a friend's book to be praised, or a new play to be brought forward, or a picture to be exhibited, or a fresh pun to let off, or any bit of scandal, literary or theatrical, that they want to know the truth of.

It is something to be an editor after all. Notwithstanding the drudgery, the wear and tear and straining of the mind and the imagination, the unkind things that are published of us away off in distant places by strangers, whom we have unconsciously offended; and the face of that everlasting printer's boy, with his quiet call for "copy;" notwithstanding all these, and other dark touches in the picture, there are little bright gleams shining in now and then, that half compensate us for past perplexities. If we make enemies, do we not also conjure up friends, who would have lived and died, and never suspected our existence, but that the waves of chance had flung us into our present vocation? It was but this very morning (our old feelings of boyhood even now as we write send a glow of childish delight through our bosom) that an elderly gentleman, a plain-looking man, (we should never have distinguished him in an ordinary crowd,) came in and handed us a letter. It was a note of introduction from an old subscriber in a neighboring city, and making us acquainted with —; one whose name has been familiar to our lips from our earliest years, and is intertwined with a throng of our happiest associations. Why, we have recited his pieces at school, and felt our boy's heart melt and take fire and tremble at his impulses, when we no more dreamed of ever meeting him this side the Elysian fields than we did of gazing on the superb broad forehead of Shakespeare himself.

We remember a similar occurrence which equally gratified us, for there can be no shame in confessing that there is a fine pleasure in coming into the presence of a man of genius. If he is one with whose works you are acquainted, over whose thoughts and actions you have pondered in your hours of quiet meditation, whose creations have beguiled you in solitude or in sickness, and shed in upon your mind streams of light, which but for him never would have been there; there is an agreeable excitement in casting your eyes, for the first time, on such a one, which we are never at pains to suppress. We have seen cold city-men, who sneer at this simple feeling. At all events, it is a welcome one, and why should we sit down deliberately and explain it away? Several months ago a friend came round into our corner with a stranger, of small stature and ordinary appearance. He pronounced his name, and we found ourselves in the presence of one with whose elegant and accomplished mind we were nearly as familiar as with our own. But oh! the difference between mind and matter. His spirit was gigantic. It had led us over earth and sea with the bold hand of a master; it had spoken arguments strong enough to shake a whole senate; its creations will go down to other generations, when the present has passed away. We had insensibly in our fancy drawn for the individual himself a corresponding appearance—a majestic form, a proud and lofty bearing, an expanded brow, eyes large, dark, and deeply expressive, and a mouth sternly characteristic of resolution and power. Who would have dreamed of looking for the author of — beneath that mild and cheerful face, which did not stand out our own inquiring glance of curiosity without being slightly suffused with color? Well! these are some of our casual gratifications.

One of the peculiarities, we will not say advantages, of the secluded retreat we have mentioned, is that we overhear much of what passes without; and while our pen is running on, and quietly dispatching paragraph after paragraph, we cannot avoid becoming acquainted with people's opinions on some subjects, which we might as well remain ignorant of. We warn casual visitors to take care. One came in the other day. He seemed really in a passion. He said our negligence in reading the proofs was positively inexcusable, we did not know how to spell. Launched was lunched, Saviour was given Savior, and traveller with only one l. In these, however, we have only followed Mr. Webster's orthography, as his dictionary is used by the printer; and we take this occasion to repeat a hope, which we have already expressed in a previous number, that the reader will have the kindness to look into Webster's Dictionary before he condemns us for any similar misdemeanor.

There is another subject on which we feel the greatest delicacy in touching, and do so with the most friendly sentiments to those concerned—we mean the frequent necessity we are under of reading and correcting manuscript productions, and recommending them to publishers. A person may be such a valued friend, such an excellent fellow, and yet no author; and we are not sufficiently master of the niceties and little fashionable arts of language to explain, without embarrassment, why we are not satisfied with a composition. What can be more difficult? Here is a gentleman whom you esteem; you are familiar with his family; he is ever ready to overload you with favors; he is perfectly convinced that he has written a novel, which will make his fame and fortune. He has had favorable opinions from "the best judges," and declares, if you will only say the word, the publisher will come to terms. There is the manuscript; you read half of it last night; you tried to like it, but in vain; and finally fell asleep over it as the clock struck twelve. In the perspective stands the publisher. He depends upon your judgment; but if the book does not sell he loses his money, and your reputation. You can shuffle off a play with half the trouble. It is too long, or too short; the poetry is delightful, but it is not precisely calculated for stage effect. It is deficient in mere dramatic management, in mechanical execution, and should be kept for the closet. In this case, if you disappoint an author, you do not wound him. Our reveries were broken not long since by the clerk's suddenly introducing a lady before us. Scribbling always unfits us for female society; we get stiff and moody; we have not the faculty of unbending in a moment, which we have so much admired and envied in others, and besides (we like to be particular) we often write with our hat on. Upon raising our eyes, we found ourself face to face with a young creature, of a most prepossessing appearance, and attired with great neatness and taste, but very plainly. There is something extremely odd in meeting thus a pretty female in the haunts of business. We looked at her as at a flower bursting up between the pavements of a thronged street. Our hat almost came off of itself, and we bowed her to a seat, in a state of peculiar suspense. She apologized—we told her "not at all." "Oh yes, she had taken a great liberty, but under the peculiar circumstances—" "We were (as in duty bound,) grateful for any circumstances which had favored us with an opportunity of serving her." "She knew," she added, "Mr. B. had told her—every body had told her—there could be no impropriety in her taking the liberty," &c. &c. &c. She drew from under her cloak a small parcel. No—it could not be—yes, it was a manuscript! We looked it over, to afford her time to recover from a slight embarrassment. It was a novel, entitled the "Three Spectres of St. Dennis." Scraps of the chapters caught our notice—"The youth knelt and kissed her hand"—"Lady Amelia sat gazing at the moon"—"Traitor! cried the knight," &c. We complimented the penmanship. She blushed, and curtsied almost imperceptibly. "Indeed!" asked we, "have we the pleasure of a production from your own hand?" And a right pretty hand it was; ungloved, and graceful, with no other decoration than a plain gold ring.

"Oh! no! no! sir," she replied.

"And may we inquire whose it is, then?"

"It is written by my husband, sir."

"And where is he, and why does he not come himself?"

"Do not ask me, I beg of you; it is quite immaterial."—She appeared greatly distressed.

No dew ever came more gently to the evening flowers than rose the moisture in the blue eyes that looked up at us a moment, as if reproachfully, that we had rudely probed a painful wound, and then closed, ashamed of having betrayed so much feeling before a stranger. Although we are an editor, and talk wisdom, we are (why should we conceal it?) a mere simpleton on such occasions, and as easily melted as any gentle shepherd of them all. Our situation was growing uncommonly interesting, when a fellow (broken bones be his lot!) thrust his huge head in suddenly, and inquired for the stereotype foundry of Mr. James Conner. We heartily wished Mr. Conner and his stereotype foundry in Egypt; while the fair incognito, hastily gathering up her cloak, and letting the hood fall over her face, withdrew, leaving the manuscript on the table. An hour afterwards a boy brought a note. We recognized the hand instantly. The messenger could answer no questions; a lady had requested him to leave it, but he did not know who she was. It was brief, and merely stated that if we would either purchase the story for the Mirror, and publish it by chapters, or read and correct it, and recommend it to the brothers Harper or Carey and Lea, or indeed to any one from whom the author could derive a reasonable pecuniary recompense, we should confer a favor, a deep and lasting obligation, on one who would never forget." She could not have said more had we been the hero of a romance. There was something in the whole affair that awakened curiosity, and fanned the little dim spark of romantic sensibility that lay, far beneath the thoughts and feelings of later years, half buried among the relics of our boyish dreams. Who could she be? Her address was entirely that of a lady. Her soft white hand betrayed a life enjoyed without labor; and a glance at her modest face satisfied us that she was a timid, artless, and innocent being, unused to misery, but by some rough chance destitute, and overcoming the natural sensitiveness of her character and sex for the sake of a husband evidently in great distress. By her accent she seemed a foreigner. Perhaps some enthusiastic girl, fled from her home to marry a youth "of low family," who was now sick, or in jail, yet toiling to support her by his pen. If this piece, now, should prove a good one, what a lot would be ours! To follow with unceasing interest the events of a spirit-stirring romance; to usher it into fame. No obsequious courtier ever exerted himself more anxiously to laugh at the jokes of his patron than we strove to weep over the astounding facts related in the "Three Spectres of St. Dennis." We followed the heroine through dungeons and sepulchres, and the hero into scenes which might have quailed the heart of a lion. We trudged on through massacres and misery. We saw people plunged into despair by the dozen. Provoking spirit of criticism! unjustifiable hardness of heart! Not a tear sprang, not a nerve thrilled. It was bad—it was trash; we could not deny it; we laid it by; it was totally out of the question. It would be dishonest in us to recommend it to another, and mere folly to purchase it ourself; and to offer charity to the mysterious bearer of it, we durst not. After a few days she came again. The same clear, girlish countenance, the same beseeching yet timid look, yet not so fearful as before, for a kind of hope shone in her face, and a—sort of—confidence—we may say. She was no longer coming to visit, she knew not whom; to meet perchance superciliousness and neglect, but one who, she had undoubtedly already seen, sympathized with her, whether or not he admired her husband's novel. Her embarrassment, too, had disappeared, and her first salutation betrayed that the manuscript was the sole object of her thoughts, and had probably been since our last interview.

"Have you read it?"

"I have, madam."

There was a situation. We were silent—she was silent. We wished for the man after Conner's type foundry, but no one came.

"I perceive sir," she at length said, with something of an air, "that either you have not formed any opinion of the work, or else an unfavorable one."

"I confess"—(there's a cold beginning for you!) "I confess madam, that although several passages are fine, really fine; indeed, I may say beautiful, yet the plot is —"

She turned absolutely pale. We began to fear more tears. Criticism could not stand it. The volume began to rise in our estimation. Here was the loveliest little creature in the world in an agony of distress, from which we could rescue her with a word. No, the days of chivalry are not gone for ever. We commenced praising the "Three Spectres," and at every breath the shadows fled away from her face until we were fairly bewitched into writing a note to a certain publisher, who, she said, had promised a tolerable sum for the MS. if it came recommended by our approbation. She extended her hand. A youth of the olden times would have knelt down and kissed it. What we did is nobody's business. The lady departed, and, as we soon after heard, received the money. Now mark the result: the book was published, and fell dead from the press. The publisher called on us to puff it—we refused. That we had deceived him was no reason why we should cheat our readers. The consequence was, a serious difference between us, which, we trust, may be adjusted by our narrating the above circumstances frankly, and by way of apology.

For the future, we shall come to an agreement, that when we are reduced to a similar dilemma, we will furnish him with a private mark by which he is to know whether our approbation is to be ascribed to the author's book, or his wife. We shall therefore hereafter yield to the importunity of literary aspirants, or their friends, and favor them with as many flaming commendatory epistles as they please, and be sure of their doing no more harm than theatrical thunder!

I'M FAR AWAY FRAE THEE, MARY.

COMPOSED FOR THE LONDON HARMONICON BY MRS. ORME, OF EDINBURGH—THE WORDS BY CHARLES DOYNE SILLERY, ESQ.

Andante affetuoso.

The crys-tal tear-drop fills my ee, When e'er I think, my love, o' thee; Oh! what are a' life's joys to me, Since now I'm far frae thee, Ma-ry! Since now I'm far frae thee!

I pon-der o'er the hap-py hours I spent a-mong my na-tive bow'rs, When wan-d'ring wi' thee o'er the flow'rs; But now I'm far frae thee, Ma-ry! But now I'm far frae thee!

thee, Ma-ry! But now I'm far frae thee!

SECOND VERSE.

I dare nae think upon thee now,
For ah! I ken you're still sae true—
'Twould break my heart,—my life! adieu!
I'll die for love o' thee, Mary!—
But leaves the wretch to weep?"

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

READING ALOUD.

THE oft quoted lines of Shakspeare—

"How many things by season seasoned are,
To their right praise, and true perfection,"

are very often exemplified in the trifling occurrences of social life, and in few more than in the habit of reading aloud to another person. In a proper place, and at a proper time, it is an accomplishment that may be put in requisition to the delight of all parties; but many forget that while they are in a mood to turn their attention to a choice passage, and be struck with admiration, another may have his mind monopolized by very opposite reflections; and I am not sure that there is any one so far above the petty realities around him, as to be always in the humor even for the finest authors. I know an enthusiastic young man, whose determination to compel every one near him to participate in his own pleasure at a good sentence is so strong, that I should be very loath to trust myself alone with him in a room where there were books. His passion for declaiming to you his favorite pieces, conquers all his usual sense of decorum; and I have been several times indebted to my physical superiority for an escape from a sublime Greek simile, or a musical Latin phrase, when I was in haste to keep an appointment elsewhere. He will even adroitly interest his companion in a conversation directed to a certain point, till he has deluded him to a remark which compels him to listen to a page or two that he has noted for the purpose of inflicting it upon the first rash unfortunate who falls in his power. Sometimes he will arrest the social communion of a whole circle of his friends till he has drenched them with something which he conceives irresistible, but which, thus taken, is often disgusting. He once almost drove to distraction a very modest and polite gentleman with the tooth-ache, by a drinking piece out of Anacreon.

To me, reading a noble composition to one who fully appreciates it, is a most pleasurable excitement, perhaps double what I should enjoy from a mere solitary perusal; but I am so impressed with the certainty that few are capable of entering into its spirit at all times, that I usually do my admiration in secret. I always avoid directing the notice of any one to a graceful sentiment, unless I know him intimately, and then I should stop the moment I perceived the slightest signs of weariness, or even of inattention. No matter how splendid may be the ideas your author expresses, they will be, to such, of no more value than a dainty feast to one whose appetite is already sated.

SLANDERS AGAINST HUMAN NATURE.

Poetry abounds in errors. It is generally the language of feeling; and who feels as he reasons? Even our received system of morality frequently wanders from the truth. History is often turned into fiction by the discovery of a coin, or a half defaced inscription on a monument. The theory of the philosopher, however ingeniously contrived, is overthrown by some simple experiment, or accidental phenomenon of nature; and I am convinced that biographers oftentimes give faithful narratives of the adventures of their heroes, yet, by applying erroneous motives to their actions, metamorphose the whole into mere romance. One of the most eloquent men I ever heard address a public assembly, exercised the most extraordinary, and, indeed, magical influence over his hearers, while engaged in confuting the ordinary calumnies against human nature, and in delineating its affections, its genius, and its virtues. It was impossible to listen to his exalted and generous descriptions without feeling the bosom beat high with noble and pure emotions. If I was ever capable of a Roman virtue, it was while thrilling and glowing in the state of calm excitement produced by one of these discourses, with the tones of that inspired speaker yet dwelling in my ear, and in my heart. Poetry is often made the vehicle for conveying false opinions of human nature.

"Ah, what is friendship but a name,
A charm that lulls to sleep;
A shade that follows wealth or fame,
But leaves the wretch to weep?"

This is a pretty sentimental slander, which, although not expressing the real sentiments of the poet, is much quoted as authority.

THE RECOLLECTIONS OF THE PEOPLE.

BY JAMES NACK.

He and his glory shall be long
The theme of fireside tale and song;
In fifty years there shall be known
No history but his alone
Within the humble cottage, where
At eve the peasants shall repair,
And to some reverend dame shall say,
"By stories of a former day,
Good mother, help us pass the time—
Oh speak of him, that man sublime.
Though some, his fame to dim,
Pretend that he has wrought us ill;
The people all revere him still,
Revere him still—revere him still—
Good mother, speak of him!"

"My children, in my early life,
When I had scarce become a wife,
He passed this village with a train
Of kings. A better view to gain,
I stood upon a hill—he came
Anon, and climbed the very same.
He was not marked by proud array,
But well his riding-hood of gray
And little hat we knew.
I trembled when I saw him near—
He spoke to me—"Good day, my dear,
Good day, my dear—good day, my dear!"
"Ah! did he speak to you?"

"I saw him the succeeding year,
At Paris with his court appear,
Upon his way to Notre-Dame.
All eyes admired his splendor's flame;
But when he smiled, so very sweet,
It made all hearts with rapture beat—
'Behold!' were our exulting cries,
'Behold the favorite of the skies!'
Still to his fortune true,
They crown his wishes every one—
They bless him with a lovely son—
A lovely son—a lovely son!"
"What happy times for you!"

"But when our country fell at last,
A prey to hireling strangers cast,
He braved the dangers round her thrown,
And seemed to keep the field alone!
One eve I heard a knock—to me—
It seems but yesterday to be—
The door I opened, and—good God!
'Twas he! With weary step he trod—
He sunk into this chair—
Behind him came an escort slight—
He sighed, and said—"Oh fatal fight!"
Oh fatal fight!—oh fatal fight!"
"Ah! was he seated there?"

"He said, 'I'm hungry'—and in haste
I bread and wine before him placed;
And at the fireside here he slept—
Awaking he perceived I wept—
He said to me, 'Bonne espérance!
I hasten to avenge my France,
And shield you from all ill!"
He went—his glass I've treasured well—
Its worth to me—ill could I tell—
Ill could I tell—ill could I tell."

"Ah! have you got it still?"
"See, here it is—but he was borne
To ruin—we shall ever mourn.
He whom the holy father crowned
And consecrated—he has found
Upon a desert isle his grave!
We to his death no credit gave
At first—"He comes to set us free—
The stranger shall his master see
Again," we fondly said—
But when at last his real fate
We knew too well, my grief was great—
My grief was great—my grief was great."
"God's blessings on your head!"

A N-ICE VOICE.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH.

THREE strapping clowns were seen one day (strange case!)
Holding poor Hodge up to his knees in ice;
'Twas terrible to see the fellow's face;
Yet there he sat, stuck fast as in a vice.
With wond'ring ire a passenger was seized:
"Forbear!" cried he, "what! have ye no remorse?
Hands off! give over!"—"Sir, be not displeased,"
A beadle said, "we're making the man hoarse."
"Hoarse!"—"Yes, sir, manly in his tones, like gruff:
To-morrow's the saint's day in this here place;
And this here lad, who winces sure enough,
We're putting in a state to sing the bass."

ANNALS OF NEW-YORK.

REMINISCENCES OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

BY A SOLDIER OF SEVENTY-SIX.

IN the beginning of the autumn of 1776, a few days after General Washington had conducted his army to the heights of Harlem, and to the vicinity of Kingsbridge, and the British troops commanded by General Howe had taken possession of New-York, several of their soldiers' wives were observed to collect together in a large frame building, near Whitehall-dock, previously designated the "Livingston storehouse." These women, for the purpose of dressing their provisions, procured from an adjacent yard a number of pine boards, the ends of which they placed in the chimney, while their opposite points rested upon the cedar floor of the apartment; to this the fire rapidly communicated, when the careless gypsies had made an end of their feast, and had withdrawn from the heated and smoky atmosphere within, to enjoy the fresh sea-breeze without. The cry of fire was heard soon after, and fearfully reiterated from every quarter of the city; and the day being hot and dry, the flames ran through the building with the rapidity of lightning, enveloping in a few moments the whole of the structure, through the top of which the fire was at first seen to arise in a single splendid column, with its immense summit curling in fantastic wreaths, amid the clouds of smoke; but, instantaneously changing its appearance, and spreading into a vast sheet of flame, it presented an object at the same time of terror and admiration. The firemen, ever alert, were readily summoned by the ringing of bells and other signs of alarm, as anxious as were their haughty invaders to subdue the destructive element before them, which moved in the sun's rays with the subtlety of a serpent, whose sudden evolutions can be perceived only by the vividness of its colors.

The king's officers, uncertain in whom to confide, or rather regarding in each individual citizen a rebel at heart, became suspicious of the firemen, and seemed to dread a counteracting exertion on their part; under which persuasion they frantically hurried them from place to place, and urged them with oaths and imprecations to do their duty, which the poor fellows had not then even thought of abandoning; and while they were making the greatest exertions in their power at one post, and ere they had time to quench the fire there, they were driven to another by their impetuous commanders, who retarded their endeavors by ruthlessly beating them with their swords; and, in some instances, it has been said, pushed them into the flames. Others of the citizens, perceiving the danger of their comrades, fled in alarm from the scene of terror and confusion, and sought refuge from their enraged pursuers. While the discordant cry of "Punish the rebels!" mingled with the shrieks of the affrighted women and children, and with the deep and reiterated call of fire! the gathering flames, wafted by a strong southerly breeze, and unchecked by a proper course, had rapidly advanced up the whole extent of Broadway, communicating with the buildings on both sides, even to the very heart of the city, and threatening its total destruction.

An idea that the liberty party had determined on destroying the town had taken such possession of the minds of the British troops, that in the height of their irritation they threatened death to every man who should be found abroad in the streets, upon whom a shadow of doubt could fall touching his loyalty to the king.

In the course of this tumultuous scene a noted and active tory, by the name of —, to make an open display of his true and sworn allegiance, sallied forth into the streets, with his drawn sabre in his hand, muttering "downfall and death to all rebellious subjects." In his gallant career he happened to encounter a company of rude and exasperated soldiers, who knew nothing of his political virtue, and disbelieving his earnest asseverations of fidelity and attachment to their cause, they charged him with an intention of destroying the fire buckets. "Down with the rebel and incendiary!" they cried, and in an instant the poor wretch was smitten to the earth, where he rolled, writhing at their feet, and expired, covered with wounds and bruises. They then dragged his lifeless body to the upper end of the city, i. e. in Pearl, near Cherry-street, and suspended it by the feet from the sign-post of the Hand and Hammer, where it remained for the space of a day, a fearful example to the timid well-wishers, as well as to the secret enemies of the king.

Meanwhile the fire, threatening its worst, had gained an alarming height. Of the western part of the city the church of St. Paul and one dwelling only stood uninjured; all else were burned to the open fields; presenting a scene of noise and devastation, amid clouds of smoke and dust. But to attempt the giving a just description of the dismay of the citizens, and the exasperation of the British soldiery, would task the powers of a Paulding or a Cooper.

As soon as the fire was extinguished, and the tumult and the noise had abated, all was restored to order in the city, under a government of a severe military discipline and civil regulation. The old fortifications and the breastworks of the city, at which the Americans had so recently toiled, with strongly excited feelings and with severe industry, were now regularly and well manned, and were soon rendered strong and complete, and placed in the best possible state of defence, while the banner of St. George floated proudly over the most advantageous post of the country. The enemy, thus situated, had little to fear from the disheartened army under General Washington, to which the horrors and fatigues of war were new and dispiriting, many having fled in terror to their families and homes, totally unused to, and therefore holding in disregard, all military discipline.

General Howe occupied the finest house in the city, adjacent to the Battery, and fronting the Bowling-green; this was also the head-quarters of Sir Henry Clinton, at a later period of the war.

Many changes were made in the public buildings as well as in the private dwellings of New-York, which were both disagreeable and torturing, as it regarded the feelings of the citizens.

The places of public worship, that were not of the episcopal order, were converted into hospitals, prisons, or guard-houses, which caused great offence and bitter heart-burnings among the Calvinists, Lutherans, and Quakers. But this was a pill which they were all obliged to swallow, although it caused many a wry face and suppressed murmur; and when a crest-fallen disenter happened to pass the sacred portal, at which he had been accustomed to enter to unburden himself before his Creator, it was ever and anon with raised hands and eyes, or with a shrug and a suddenly averted face! To have breathed a word indicative of his regrets or resentments would have been highly impolitic, for if overheard by a jealous adversary it might have exposed him to severe punishment, or to imminent danger.

The old jail, as it is now called, was under the conduct of Marshal Cunningham, who was then the provost, and into it he was wont to crowd the unfortunate rebels who fell into his iron grasp.

Cunningham was a man strong and athletic in his make, and upwards of six feet in height; his complexion was florid, but his countenance was harsh, and its expression at times odious in the extreme; yet he could smile with his boon companions over a bottle, and be jocose, pass his jokes, though coarse and vulgar, and be merry, more particularly when he had made up his mind to the accomplishment of some dreadful enormity, which he had meditated against his half-starved prisoners. Oh! could the old walls of that prison-house but speak the secrets of the past, what horrid deeds would they not reveal! What scenes of mortal agonies! Death from pestilence, famine, and poison. But I must turn from this, the reflection is too dreadful, and continue my recital.

General Howe had regulated and arranged all things in the city according to his own pleasure, had attended with humane care to the comforts of his soldiers, and had provided his officers with good quarters, where, indeed, they were often received too well, and with too studious a care, by the fairer inmates, and greeted by them with too kind a welcome. The campaign being closed a few weeks after, and the winter setting in, these gentlemen had much leisure to reflect on the measures of the war, its future battles, and, moreover, on the certain success of their arms; for among them were the noble, the haughty, the proud, and the brave, who had never been taught the lessons of submission. Nor did the war or its fortunes alone occupy their minds; they had other and more agreeable avocations, their pleasures and their pastimes.

Their favorite amusement seems to have been the drama, which they studied with taste and care, and which they brought at length to great perfection. Its various characters were personated by the most elegant and refined gentlemen of the army, among whom the unfortunate Andre used frequently to bear a part, and receive distinguished applause.

Such being the pursuits of the officers of the British army, who were caressed by the fair, admired wherever they moved, boldly presuming that victory over our land would be an easy task, a thing at any time within their reach; is it to be wondered that the time and opportunity should have been allowed to pass away, wherein a consummation such as that might have been effected? That months should have rolled on, unheeded by men who were made too happy to seek or wish a change?

The conquest of General Gates over Burgoyne, that brave soldier and accomplished scholar, may well be considered as the dawn of American glory; for until that period of the war, the English, accustomed to triumph wherever they carried their arms, had never for a moment doubted their own invincibility; and their daily papers, the "Royal Gazette," the "New-York Mercury," &c. had hitherto been the constant vehicles through which misrepresentations and slurs were cast against the continental leader, and the army under his command. Hence the British soldiers, all, from the highest to the lowest grade, looked with contempt upon the foe which they had come to conquer.

For some weeks previous to the battle of Saratoga, all regular communication between that place and New-York was prevented by the vigilance of that part of the American army which lay encamped in the Highlands; therefore, notwithstanding that the English in the city were quite certain of the final result of the undertaking, which was to annihilate the continental army, still they were anxious to learn the particulars of the action, and the time moved with heavy step that brought no messenger. Crowds each day collected round those fountains of intelligence, the printing-offices, in pleasing expectation of the good tidings, but nothing could be obtained; and though they were confident of victory, yet hope, long suspended, had become almost painful. One morning, at an early hour, an old Scotchwoman, in simple attire, appeared at the office of the Royal Gazette, and requested to see Mr. Rivington, the editor, who was by no means so tardy in obeying the summons as modern gentlemen often are when they have learnt the degree and condition of those who wait upon them. It was sufficient that an aged person and a female waited his coming.

"Good morrow, madam," said the polite editor, pleasantly; "how do you find yourself? I trust your early rising will do you no harm."

"I am verra weel, an' I thank ye for speering. A quiet morrow to ye, sir. An I wad na hae disturbed ye noo, but that I am auld, an weary too, for I hae travelled a lang way, wi naither conveyance than these twa feet, ye see, and which hae dune me muckle service these fourscore gude years, but na sae sure noo for stumblin a bit."

"Pray sit down and rest yourself, while you relate your errand," said Mr. Rivington, as he reached her a chair.

"Na, I thank ye kindly; I am stiff to rise when ance I'm doon; but wull ye assist, sir, to get a permit, that I may gang my ways in quietness; forbye, 'tis a lang journey fra Albany hither, and a' in sae short a time."

"From Albany, say you? Oh! and what of Burgoyne, dear madam?"

"He is safe there, he is safe there, hinny; an these twa een saw him verra weel, an I thank ye."

"Are you sure of it? Are you quite certain that you saw the general there? In Albany?"

"Oh just as sure as any thing. I saw him ance before; an I suld ken him weel amang a thousand, for his is na the look that ane wad forget in a while, he is sae braw and bonny."

"Burgoyne in Albany! that's news, indeed." And the delighted editor ran about the room in ecstasy, clapped his hands joyfully together, and at last caught the old woman in his arms, and kissed her with as much fervency as if she were a Hebe; then, without waiting for his hat, he hastened to head-quarters with the news, that the noble officer there might participate in his feelings.

The old woman stood for a moment aghast, looking after Mr. Rivington, for whose senses she began to entertain strong doubts; and she had just seated herself, to ruminate at her leisure upon the violence of the malady under which she supposed him to labor, when the identical madman, suddenly re-entered the room, half out of breath, and snatching his hat and cane, he drew the old woman's arm within his own, and said,

"You must accompany me to head-quarters, my dear madam, for such are the orders of the commander-in-chief, who is desirous of hearing from your own lips the glorious news."

An entire conviction of the truth now, for the first time, darted into the mind of the aged traveler; and she saw clearly that she had occasioned some terrible mistake, by not being more explicit in her relation, yet she feared to undeceive her gallant attendant, and wisely determined, after a little reflection, that she would simply answer the questions which might be put to her by the officers; but that, as she did not mean to withhold the truth, so, on the other hand, she would not manifest it unnecessarily.

They soon reached head-quarters, which were thronged with officers; and seldom before had there assembled so many delighted countenances. The old woman was greeted kindly, as she was conducted through the crowd to the commander-in-chief, who shook her hand most cordially, and said,

"Then, my good woman, you saw General Burgoyne in Albany, did you?"

"Ay, sir, that did I."

"You saw him yourself, you say?"

"Yes, sir, yes I did."

"A thousand thanks for the information, and here are three guineas, to purchase you a tartan plaidie for the coming winter."

"I maun e'en tak it, then," said she, pressing the pieces in her palm; "but I am na sae sure that I suld neither, for it is waur than taking charity;" and she offered to return them, but General Howe prevented her doing so, by quietly closing her fingers upon the gold, to which they seemed to adhere naturally enough, and with a friendly squeeze he dismissed her.

Mr. Rivington followed her out of the house, and kindly directed her to where she might get a permit to move through the city at her pleasure. Having obtained this she left the police-office,* and made the best of her way to her friend's house, in the upper part of the city. To them she related her recent adventure, and the mistake she had occasioned. The story was too good to be smothered; and, in less than ten minutes, it was repeated, with the usual exaggerations, to at least thirty persons, from whose mouths it spread like a whirlwind.

It was not long, as may well be supposed, ere the report had reached head-quarters; and the officers, vexed to the heart at being so deceived by an old woman's tale, and irritated beyond measure at the news of the capture of Burgoyne and his army, sent a file of soldiers to bring the aged culprit before them, and when she appeared, they put several questions to her rather harshly, and demanded why she had not told them that Burgoyne was a prisoner!

"Ye didna ask me that," she replied, simply, courtesying the while; upon which they indignantly ordered her away.

Among the various recreations which were chosen by the British officers at that day to wile away their leisure hours, or to beguile the tedium of thought, the game of fives became a favorite amusement, in consequence of the example of Sir Henry Clinton, who, at one period, devoted half his time to that exercise. Indeed, so completely was he engaged in the laudable employment, that at length the older, or more thinking of the soldiers under his command, tired and disgusted with the idle life they were obliged to lead, began to murmur seriously, and to throw out hints which, though indirect, might by rebounding strike the ear for which they were intended. This went on for a while, but met with little or no attention—for when the plebeian counsels, the patrician but closes his ear more obstinately.

An enclosure at the corner of Broadway and John-street was dedicated to this game, and here the commander-in-chief, in company with a select party of officers, was accustomed to come and amuse himself for some hours on every fine day. One afternoon, when he had extended his sports to an unusually late hour, and, animated by his success and the plaudits of his companions, had forgotten all other engagements, an arrow, with a billet-doux attached to it, alighted amid the gay group, and was suddenly snatched up by one of the younger officers, who, having glanced his eye over it, handed it respectfully to the adjutant-general. André laughed as he perused the paper. This drew the attention of Sir Henry Clinton, who approached with a smile, and leaning familiarly over the shoulder of André, discovered the cause of his merriment by reading the following queries and replies:

"What is General Washington about? Strengthening his fastnesses in the Highlands; and vigilant of time, he devotes each moment to the furtherance of the cause which he has espoused.—What has the Marquis de Lafayette gone after? To procure succor and resources from France for his rebellious brethren here.—What is De Esteign engaged in? Carrying his conquests from island to island in the British West Indies.—What is Paul Jones after? He is with his squadron, cruising off Scarborough-head for the Baltic fleet.—Well—and what is Sir Henry Clinton doing? Playing at fives!"

The commander-in-chief colored with vexation, while he attempted to make a jest of the pointed rebuke; and drawing the arm of André within his own, he left the inclosure and walked away towards head-quarters; leaving the rest of the party to make themselves merry at his expense.

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE POLISH CHIEFS; AN HISTORICAL ROMANCE.

(Now in press, and shortly to be published in this city.)

THIS work was commenced while the Poles were struggling for independence: the writer has given a history of the two great Polish chiefs—Pulaski and Kosciusko, who came to assist in our revolutionary conflict. Their lives abounded in romance. With these he has commingled many of the heroes of our country, who lived in their day, and has struck them off with great faithfulness. Sometimes he treats the men he describes with good-natured satire—for instance, take the following account of the author of the Magnalia and his works:

COTTON MATHER.

"One of the most amusing novels I ever read, is a work I found here, and purchased, which is called the 'Magnalia.' The author, whose name was Cotton Mather, was a clergyman, who died little more than half a century since. This, and his other works, show him to have been deeply learned in the humanities, and in mathematics. With a great command of language, he gives his readers most amusing tales. Sometimes his characters are struck out with felicity, and are prominent in the business of his dramatic pieces. No orientalist among the numerous nations who have dealt largely in fiction, for instruction and amusement, ever had a more vivid fancy than this American novelist. He made his genii of angels and the devil; the latter having in his train certain mortals to whom he imparted a limited share of supernatural power, and then sent them out on errands of petty mischief; and at times, these minor agents were very much engaged in their work, and really frightened the people from their propriety. If the machinery in Mather's novels wanted something of the taste of the Arabian fabulists, it had as much supernatural energy in it. There is, however, this difference in the construction of their machinery: the orientalist take it for granted that all true Mussulmans should fully believe in the agency of genii, and they have taste and judgment, and see the reasonableness of such agents; but the great American story-teller found that he had readers who would not credit all he said or wrote, and he was under the necessity of stopping, at times, the beautiful current of his narrative, to trounce his hearers or readers into a belief of the truth of part of his assertions. This was vexing to the novelist, and is so to the reader. It must be confessed that he showed great tact in his methods of bringing all to his faith, for he denounced all who did not swear that all he said or wrote was most solemnly true, and he threatened them not only with his own wrath, but with the vengeance of heaven, if they did not think so. Some ill-natured critics have intimated that he must have taken a hint of this from Mahomet; but in my opinion this was not the case, for every thing in his plan of bringing the mind to become impressed and controlled by the fascinations of his pen, is so natural, that envy alone could have the heart to rob him of his honors. There was some admirable touches of art in his works, for he knew how to make them sell,—a much greater art than writing cleverly. He would add some new judgment of heaven to his works, and by a little management of a new title-page, the bookseller's shelves were at once cleared off; and the novelist, who was never tired of using his pen, sat down to write another book.

"The mind of this great dealer in fiction was never exhausted, for when the devil had become too familiar in his plots, he most boldly and adroitly changed his agent, and took the Almighty—sometimes through his works, but not unfrequently directly in person, to assist in his fictions. If a harmless comet passed rapidly along through the sky, in a zealous haste, on some errand of its Maker, he instantly pressed him into his service, and all fit for the fight, he mounted his racer and spurred him onward, showing him, as he passed, to the poor, trembling inhabitants of the earth. They were astonished to see him mounted on heaven's war-horse, making him neigh for blood, and set worlds on fire with his tail. If he did not possess more vanity than other novelists, he certainly did more boldness, for he always made himself a principal character in his fictions, and this the poor novelist seldom dares to do. But he was right; for, does not the modest man put his own picture or bust in his parlor? and why should he not have the liberty of placing himself in his own novel?"

"Ages may pass away before this or any other country will behold such another novelist as Cotton Mather, for copiousness and variety of language, for invention, for boldness in expression, and for that daring spirit of genius that seizes on heaven, earth and hell, and makes them vassals in his power, subservient to his will. Astonishing as it may appear to all, his works of fiction amount to nearly three hundred, abounding in some of the most delightful specimens of horrid transactions and awful wonders that ever were written. His works are ten times more bulky than those of the Princess Scheherazade, and are much more surprising; but it must be confessed that hers are the most natural, and more distinctly confined to her vernacular language. She was brave, but delicate; cautious, yet warm and affectionate, but never bordering on voluptuousness. He was dogmatical, opinionated, and severe, and everywhere the iron sceptre of the tyrant was visible in all the kingdoms he created; but he sometimes wielded that sceptre with great majesty and courtesy, and was lavish of his bounties to his favorites. The greatest of all wonders in and about him was, that he thought he was dealing in truth, when he was laboring in fiction. The knight of La Mancha was not more deceived than this sober, studious, hard-working man; and such was the power of his genius, that he made many others believe that he was dealing out solemn, veritable things, when he was deeply engaged in romance. Here he had the advantage of the knight of the woful countenance; for all his neighbours knew he was stark mad, while Mather's thought him an inspired prophet. How true it is, that men are small or great, wise or foolish, by the uncertain and strange opinions in which they live; for no one thought in the golden days of this mighty magician that these works of his would be ranked with the Arabian Nights, those beautiful tales of the days of Aroun al Raschid.

"I visited the tomb of Mather: there was nothing there to remind me of his magic powers—there was not even a Latin quotation on his tombstone. How degenerate was his race!—for they might have known, or should have known, that such a spirit as his could only be appeased, and kept within his prison bounds in the dark mansions of the dead, by good, distinct Latin lines, made or borrowed for the occasion. The very tombstones of the common dead around his resting-place, when I saw it, seemed to be sinking into the earth at the neglect which they felt was shown to their most illustrious neighbor. It is strange, when it is common for man to die, that we should still go on so unceremoniously respecting the manes of the dead. In this the ancients had all the advantage over us. They, good souls, never suffered a corpse to remain unburied when they could help it, nor ever disturbed the mighty dead by any such profanity as we now see in the best feeling community."

EUGENE ARAM.

This new novel, by Mr. Bulwer, may soon be expected from the press of the brothers Harper, of this city. The London Literary Gazette praises the work highly, and pronounces the hero a fine and most original conception.

THE RUINS OF ATHENS, AND OTHER POEMS.

SECOND NOTICE.

We have seen but few and brief notices of these productions, and those were in the daily papers. If they have undergone commentary in any of the literary journals, it has escaped our attention. Yet they richly deserve and will well repay perusal by all the lovers of poetry. A few inaccuracies in some of his pieces betray the marks of haste; and in some instances the resemblance to other poets is so strong that the inference is plain that their melodies dwelt upon the ear of his memory. But his pieces have been written under the influence of the places and circumstances to which he alludes. It is no imaginary voyager, though entirely an imaginative one; and none of the sights or sounds of the ocean or the land have been lost upon him. We like his descriptive pieces best, though the volume contains several graceful and spirited lyrics. We would urge him to cultivate his faculty carefully, because it is evident that he will indulge in it, and fame, at least, if not profit, should be his reward. The state of the poetical market in England is at present most unpromising, and the best productions of our bards meet with but a slow sale at home. Still we have observed with pleasure that within a few years past several of the best of them have received encouragement to collect some of their sybilline leaves, and present them to the world on fair paper and type. As the stock increases, perhaps, the demand will become greater, and a true poet will have some chance of being substantially compensated for the pleasure he can communicate to others. This, however, is but a doubtful matter. In the mean time, the least we can do is to bestow the meed of discriminating praise where it is deserved. We regret that want of space prevents our quoting the "Ruins of Athens," (which we commend to the reader's attention) and also several fine, and what is unusual here, regularly constructed sonnets, which possess great poetical merit, not the less on the latter account. Half of our metre-mongers seem to think that three quotations and a distich make a sonnet, in which they are grievously in error. We make a single extract:

MOORISH RUINS IN SPAIN.

What dost thou here, thou lovely flower?
The beautiful and brave
Are silent now in this lone tower;
Go! wither o'er their grave.
Wall-ruins and moss-grown turrets moan,
And weed-clad arches sigh;
For thee too sadly deep the tone
That speaks of times gone by.
Go! twine thee with the ivy-plant
That decks the brow of mirth;
The lonely images that haunt
These halls, are not of earth.
The voice of song hath with the wind
Of other times pass'd on;
And thou art left to bloom behind
In loneliness alone.
The spider and the weed attire
Thy place of revelry;
The broken battlement thy lyre,
Woke by the night-wind's sigh;
All, all but thee, the spring in thy
Gay dress to joy awakes,
All, all of life and loveliness,
The ruin'd tower forsakes.

ROBERT OF PARIS—WALTER SCOTT'S LAST NOVEL.

CAREY AND LEA, PHILADELPHIA.

If ever there were melancholy words to the lover of English literature, these are they—not only to the lover of English literature, but to all the civilized nations of the world, for the writings of this extraordinary man are limited within the range of no single language. Who that on the first appearance of Waverley followed the hero through its enchanted pages, and acknowledged the sway of a master mind in those gorgeous and wonderful creations which have since emanated from the same source, can peruse the announcement which accompanies the present volumes without a mournful feeling? What novels were ever before composed which addressed themselves so strongly and so universally to human beings? They are confined to no circle of fashion, nor do they seek to illustrate any particular event or passion. They are Shakspearian pictures of mankind, and all mankind may read them with profitable delight. The servant maid pores over them in her kitchen smoke, while the mistress enjoys them by her astral lamp. The school-boy yields to the magic, and traces the winding plot with wondering eyes and a dilated bosom; and the statesman, the philosopher, the debtor in his prison, and the languid invalid, forget the world and themselves, till the story is ended; and while the name of the author is spoken with reverence in the royal circles of England, the portrait of Valter Skote is swinging in the breeze among the remote hills of Hungary. What a crowd of living, glowing characters throng on the memory as we take up the "last volumes" of this illustrious writer! Poor Amy Robsart and the princely Leicester—the black-browed giant Front de Bœuf—the fierce, yet generous Rob Roy—honest Old Bailey Nichol Jarvie—the wretched and lovely queen of Scotland—Effie Dean and Jennie—the haughty Elizabeth—the banished Charles—the proud master of Ravenswood, and Lucy, and Rebecca, and Lady Ashton, and a world of others, palpable as if we had seen them, and spoken with them: we have trembled in their battles, and rejoiced in their rejoicings, and hated, and feared, and loved, and laughed, and lived through a hundred lives, while sitting, peradventure, in the silent chamber, while the world without went darkly with us, and when we should have been brooding, unless thus rescued by the spell of this conjurer; and now bringing up the rear of the long and brilliant train, awakened from the realms of fancy—comes this, the last!—a mournful gift, handed out, as it were, from the very shadows of the grave, with an aged and a tremulous hand, the last of fering to his world of friends and admirers of a giant intellect—passing away to dust! It is like the breaking of an instrument that has charmed the world with music, or the drying up of a river, that has clothed it with verdure; or the extinguishing of a sun, whose beams have tinged vale and field and mountain with golden light.

We shall not review this work for several reasons. In the first place we are not in a mood to criticize it coldly. It may be folly, but it is not affectation in us to say that we have a reverence for the man and for his book, put forth under such circumstances which would exempt it from animadversion, although ever so much exposed to it. Then the most violent eulogies will add nothing to the fame of its author, and it will be read with interest and indulgence by every one who pretends to read at all. Few have ever attained—will ever attain such enviable distinction as Walter Scott. Many a prayer from many a remote corner of the globe has called down blessings on his white head. Many an eye has ached to behold it in its simple majesty. Many a manly heart has loved it. Dark will be the moment, with the sorrow of many nations, when it is laid in the grave.

THE LAST NIGHT OF POMPEII.

We suspect the author of this work has laid out his strength upon it. It bears marks of study and talent, and merits a favorable notice. The subject is highly poetic. The reader need not be reminded particularly of the almost supernatural horrors which must have attended the convulsion of Mount Vesuvius, that, nearly twenty centuries ago, buried beneath an ocean of lava and ashes the cities of Pompeii, Herculaneum, and many villages, with their wretched inhabitants. The objects disinterred at the present day possess a singular and most vivid interest. The scenes which occurred immediately preceding the awful crisis, must be in a great degree left to conjecture alone, and Mr. Fairfield has here a fine field for the display of a bold and rather wild imagination. The plot of the poem is composed of the slightest possible materials. A Roman, converted to the christian faith, becomes hateful to the Prætor Diomede, chief ruler of Pompeii. The Roman christian flies to the mountains with his lover, Mariamne—is there arrested and borne into the city to combat with a lion in the public games, during which the eruption takes place. There is a slight under-plot which, like the first, is instrumental in developing the state of society prevailing in those luxurious and doomed towns. We cannot compliment the author upon a striking dramatic effect to his story, although the lion, just unloosed for the fight, cowering down overawed by the earthquake, at the foot of his intended victim, and then springing away to the hills, is a fine incident.

"Nature's quick instinct, in most savage beasts,
Prophecies danger ere man's thought awakes,
And shrinks in fear from common savageness,
Made gentle by its terror; thus, o'erawed
E'en in his famine's fury by a power
Brute beings more than human oft adore,
The lion lay, his quivering paws outspread,
His white teeth quashing, till the crushing throngs
Had passed the corridors; then glaring up,
His eyes imbued with samiel light, he saw
The crags and forests of the Appenines
Gleaming far off, and with the exulting sense
Of home and lone dominion, at a bound
He leapt the lofty palleades, and sprung
Along the spiral passages, with howls
Of horror through the flying multitudes,
Flying to seek his lonely mountain lair."

There is a similarity between the leading features of the whole narrative and Mr. Milman's "Belshazzar" and "Fall of Jerusalem." Benina, in the former, bears a close resemblance to

"Pompeii's loveliest virgin, in the bud
And perfume of her sinless being, doomed
To perish in the vault of mysteries."

The author, however, frankly acknowledges, in a note, that the ground has been trodden before. The crouching of the lion we have mentioned as finely introduced, but its effect is injured by the previous command of Pansa to the beast; and indeed we may here express a regret that the poet has ventured too far in the use of supernatural machinery, and thus weakened his hold upon the human sympathies of the reader.

There are scattered through these pages, however, several descriptions of a high order. Bold, vivid, and gloomy, and (which is not the usual character of the author's composition) clear and simple. In general he is verbose to a fault, and we do not sympathize with his compound adjectives. The first four or five pages impressed us unfavorably. We do not know what heart-smiles are, nor can we conceive how a building can be "overwhelmed by grandeur." "Love-filled melodies," "dial-dews," "dew-beams," "soul-peopled heaven," "thought-winged thunder clouds," "virgin-light," "interested ecstasies," "moon-beam hues," "virgin dew," "sun-beam lips," "rose-light lips," "morning's gem-light;" these and similar ineffectual combinations, are the symptoms of a meretricious style, which should have been carefully avoided. Milton's Paradise Lost appears to have been several times in the mind of the writer, and has perhaps led him occasionally to illustrate simple ideas by means of complex and obscure images. That is one of Milton's faults. Poetry addresses itself to the world at large, and should be easily understood, and in this age of light reading, abstruseness is a sin not lightly forgiven.

But a truce to fault-finding. The work, whatever may be its demerits, has elevated Mr. Fairfield in our estimation, and we turn with pleasure from his deficiencies to afford several examples extremely creditable to his ability.

After a little moralizing upon life, (rather misanthropic, by the way) we have the following pretty passage:

"Yet some preserve the vivid thoughts—the charms
Of household sanctities; and one such now

Rose from affection's spotless couch and bent
O'er the angel face of virgin infancy;
And thus her gentle and blest thoughts found words.
'Thou sleepest in love's own heaven, my child! that brow
No guilt hath darkened and no sorrow treasured:
Those lips, which from thy fragrant breath receive
The incense hues of thy sweet heart, no gust
Of uttered passion hath defiled; thy cheek
Glow with elysian health and holiness:
And all thy little frame seems thrilling now
In the pure visions of a soul sky born.
The Læres be around thee, oh, my child!
For never yearned Cybele over Jove
With transport deeper than is mine o'er thee!"
Then o'er her babe she spread the drapery,
Kissing the shut lids and unsullied brow,
Where the mind dreamed, perchance, of bliss forgone,
And shading with her byssus robe and flowers
The sunbeams from the sleeper, with a step
Soft as the antelope's she stole and knelt
In prayer for that loved one at Vesta's shrine.
Breathing their bliss in melodies of love,
Their pictured wings fanning the ether, flew
The song birds, and the groves were full of mirth
Too pure for any voice but music's, when,
Lifting their dim eyes to the blaze of day,
Campania's proud patricians deemed the hour
So far removed from common time of rest,
Without dishonor, they might breathe the breeze,
That o'er the dimpled waters and the flowers,
Since the first tints of dawn, had played like thought
Over the face of childhood."

We can afford room for but one more extract, of such unequivocal merit, as by the contrast to give certain other censurable passages an increased prominence. We select the well painted, and, comparatively speaking, faultless picture of the Roman games.

"They open and the gladiators move
Round the thronged circle to display their forms
Athlete and strong, and with the voice of death
Salute the ruthless genius of the games.
From many a kingdom thrall they come—from realms
Spoiled by the locust hordes of Rome; the Gaul,
The Briton and the Thracian and the Frank,
The Wehrmanne and the Hebrew and the Celt,
Every clime's vanquished—every age's wreck:
All codes and creeds, strangers or friends, contend
Here in assassin strife to please their lords.
One deep wild shout like breaking billows swells,
Hailing the victims of the carnage fiend,
And on the sands two stalwart forms alone
Remain; and now Sigalion, voiceless god
Of Memphian mysteries, of all the host
Seems sovereign, such a quivering stillness hangs
Over the thousands, who await the fray
With eyes electric as the ether fires,
Lips sealed by passion, hearts like lava, still
In their intensest rapture! Bickering swords
Clash quickly, yet, with matchless skill, each blow
Or thrust falls on the flashing steel; and long
With fixed eyes dropping not their folded lids,
And marble lips, and brows whereon the veins
Burn like the storm-bolt o'er ice pinnacles,
And heaving bosoms, naked in their strength,
And limbs in every attitude of grace
And power—they struggle, not in hope of fame,
To win dominion, or achieve revenge;
But by their toil and agony and blood
To amuse the languid masters of the world."

We cannot take leave of Mr. Fairfield without regretting the gloomy and extravagant style in which he frequently indulges. The popularity of that feature of the Byron school is, we sincerely trust, long since terminated. We love happiness and happy associations. We love to be told of the bright and beautiful things around. We are wearied of groans and tears: true, these must exist, and grateful should we be, could we hush and check them; but we do not wish them in the attractive garb of poetry, where they too often are but murmurs against the wisdom of heaven, which spread shadows, discontent and doubt. It should be the business of a true poet to dispel misery. He should come with streams of light, and irradiate the path of life. All the ruggedness of it—all the clouds that lower around it should catch a glow from his elevating influence, as the flinty road, the desolate heath, or the gray mountain peaks smile in the mellow light of the setting sun: and most especially it should be his care to advocate the character of human nature, and the wisdom of the Creator. He should never dwell upon and exaggerate debasing subjects, nor grovel and brood among gloomy images, but walk with a confiding and pure spirit to soothe and refine, to elevate, and to etherealize earthly things; and surely we are not destitute of fitting subjects. The spirit of life, and love, and beauty is over us, and around us, where ever we tread; we are neither so wretched nor so depraved a race of beings as we are often painted; and they deserve best who succeed most in making us think so. It is for this that we admire the verses of our friend Woodworth. There is no sublimity about him—no striking effect. We do not believe he ever wondered why he was placed in so wretched a world, or wished to be struck with lightning, even on quarter-day. There are in his poetry few attempts at the lofty or the terrible. No heaving midnight oceans—no cloud-wrapped cliffs. His effusions are not of that out-of-the-way kind: they are flowers—mere simple fresh flowers, such as you may see every June on the hill-side, or in the field, if you will take the trouble to look; and, like flowers, they are sweet and pretty, and unassuming, and always bright. We think Woodworth under-rated; and we should have preferred Mr. Fairfield's book if he had flung in a few lighter and tenderer touches; something to please and soften, as well as to terrify and astonish. In this respect, he might have turned his admiration of Milton to more advantage: for that poet, although his greatest work involves events and characters absolutely the most sublime and awful that could address themselves to a human imagination, has taken care to enliven and adorn it with pictures of perfect loveliness and natural joy, than which, nothing more rich and beautiful can ever be composed.

The bodies of persons, apparently dead of cholera, have been in some instances observed to move. Mr. Lende, president of the late Warsaw commission, has expressed his belief that many have been buried alive.

LETTERS FROM THE ABSENT EDITOR.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF EUROPE.

NUMBER FIVE.

The Louvre—American artists in Paris—Politics, &c.

THE salient object in my idea of Paris has always been the Louvre. I have spent some hours in its vast gallery to-day, and I am sure it will retain the same prominence in my recollections. The whole palace is one of the oldest, and said to be one of the finest in Europe; and, if I may judge by its impressiveness, the vast inner court (the façades of which were restored to their original simplicity by Napoleon) is a specimen of high architectural perfection. One could hardly pass through it without being better fitted to see the master-pieces of art within; and it requires this, and all the expansiveness of which the mind is capable besides, to walk through the Musée Royale without the painful sense of a magnificence beyond the grasp of the faculties.

I delivered my passport at the door of the palace, and, as is customary, recorded my name, country, and profession in the book, and proceeded to the gallery. The grand double staircase, one part leading to the private apartments of the royal household, is described voluminously in the authorities; and, truly, for one who has been accustomed to convenient dimensions only, its breadth, its lofty ceilings, its pillars and statuary, its mosaic pavements and splendid windows, are enough to unsettle for ever the standards of size and grandeur. The strongest feeling one has as he stops half way up to look about him, is the ludicrous disproportion between it and the size of the inhabiting animals. I should smile to see any man ascend such a staircase except, perhaps, Napoleon.

Passing through a kind of entrance-hall, I came to a spacious salle ronde, lighted from the ceiling, and hung principally with pictures of a large size; one of the most conspicuous of which, "The Wreck," has been copied by an American artist, Mr. Cooke, and is now exhibiting in New-York. It is one of the best of the French school, and very powerfully conceived. I regret, however, that he did not prefer the wonderfully fine piece opposite, which is worth all the pictures ever painted in France, "The Marriage Supper at Cana." The left wing of the table, projected towards the spectator, with the seven or eight guests who occupy it, absolutely stands out into the hall. It seems impossible that color and drawing upon a flat surface can so cheat the eye.

From the salle ronde on the right opens the grand gallery, which, after the lesson I had just received in perspective, I took, at the first glance, to be a painting. You will realize the facility of the deception when you consider that, with a breadth of but forty-two feet, this gallery is one thousand three hundred and thirty-two feet (more than a quarter of a mile) in length. The floor is of tessellated woods, polished with wax like a table; and along its glassy surface were scattered perhaps a hundred visitors, gazing at the pictures in varied attitudes, and with sizes reduced in proportion to their distance, the farthest off looking in the long perspective like pigmies of the most diminutive description. It is like a matchless painting to the eye after all. The ceiling is divided by nine or ten arches, standing each on four corinthian columns, projecting into the area, and the natural perspective of these, and the artists scattered from one end to the other, copying silently at their easels; and a soldier at every division, standing upon his guard, quite as silent and motionless; would make it difficult to convince a spectator, who was led blindfold and unprepared to the entrance, that it was not some superb diorama, figures and all.

I found our distinguished countryman, Morse, copying a beautiful Murillo at the end of the gallery. He is also engaged upon a Raffaele for Cooper, the novelist. Among the French artists I noticed several soldiers, and some twenty or thirty females, the latter with every mark in their countenances of absorbed and extreme application. There was a striking difference in this respect between them and the artists of the other sex. With the single exception of a lovely girl, drawing from a Madonna, by Guido, and protected by the presence of an elderly companion, these lady-painters were any thing but interesting in their appearance.

Greenough, the sculptor, is in Paris, and engaged just now in taking the bust of an Italian lady. His reputation is very enviable; and his passion for his art, together with his untiring industry and his fine natural powers, will work him up to something that will, before long, be an honor to our country. If the wealthy men of taste in America would give Greenough liberal orders for his time and talents, and send out Augur of New-Haven, to Italy, they would do more to advance this glorious art in our country, than by expending ten times the sum in any other way. They are both men of rare genius, and both ardent and diligent, and they are both cramped by the universal curse of genius—necessity. The Americans in Paris are deliberating at present on some means for expressing unitedly to our government their interest in Greenough, and their appreciation of his merit of public and private patronage. For the love of true taste, do every thing in your power to second such an appeal when it comes.

It is a queer feeling to find oneself a foreigner. One cannot realize long at a time how his face or his manners should have become peculiar; and after looking at a print for five minutes in a shop-window, or dipping into an English book, or in any manner throwing off the mental habit of the instant, the curious gaze of the passer by, or the accent of a strange language, strikes one very singularly. Paris is full of foreigners of all nations, and of course physiognomies of all characters may be met every where; but, differing as the European nations do decidedly from each other, they differ still more from the American. Our countrymen, as a class, are distinguishable wherever they are met; not as Americans however, for of the habits and manners of our country, people know nothing this side the water. But there is something in an American face, of which I never was aware till I met them in Europe, that is altogether peculiar. The French take the Americans to be English; but an Englishman, while he presumes him his countryman, shows a curiosity to know who he is, which is very foreign to his usual indifference. As far as I can analyze it, it is the independent, self-possessed bearing of a man unused to look up to any one as his superior in rank, united to the inquisitive, sensitive, communicative expression which is the index to our national character. The first is seldom possessed in England but by a man of decided rank, and the latter is never possessed by an Englishman at all. The two are united in no other nation. Nothing is easier than to tell the rank of an Englishman, and nothing puzzles a European more than to know how to rate the pretensions of an American. I feel very proud of my countrymen here.

On my way home from the Boulevards this evening, I was fortunate enough to pass through the grand court of the Louvre, at the moment when the moon broke through the clouds that have concealed her own light and the sun's ever since I have been in France. I had often stopped, in passing the sentinels at the entrance, to admire the grandeur of the interior to this oldest of the royal palaces; but to-night, my dead halt within the shadow of the arch, as the view broke upon my eye, and my sudden exclamation in English, startled the grenadier, and he had half presented his musket, when I apologized, and passed on. It was magically beautiful indeed! and with the moonlight pouring obliquely into the sombre area, lying full upon the taller of the three façades, and drawing its soft line across the rich windows and massive pilasters and arches of the eastern and western, while the remaining front lay in the heavy black shadow of relief, it seemed to me more like an accidental regularity in some rocky glen of America, than a pile of human design and proportion. It is strange how such high walls shut out the world. The court of the Louvre is in the very centre of the busiest quarter of Paris, thousands of people passing and repassing constantly at the extremity of the long arched entrances, and yet, standing on the pavement of that lonely court, no living creature in sight but the motionless grenadiers at either gate, the noises without, coming to your ear in a subdued murmur, like the wind on the sea, and nothing visible above but the sky, resting like a ceiling on the lofty walls, the impression of utter solitude is irresistible. I passed out by the archway for which Napoleon constructed his bronze gates, said to be the most magnificent of modern times, and which are now lying in some obscure corner unused, no succeeding power having had the spirit or the will to complete, even by the slight labor that remained, his imperial design. All over Paris you may see similar instances; they meet you at every step: glorious plans defeated; works, that with a mere moiety of what has been already expended in their progress, might be finished with an effect that none but a mind like Napoleon's could have originally projected.

Paris, of course, is rife with politics. There is but one opinion on the subject of another pending revolution. The "people's king" is about as unpopular as he need be for the purposes of his enemies; and he has aggravated the feeling against him very unnecessarily by his late project in the Tuileries. The whole thing is very characteristic of the French people. He might have deprived them of half their civil rights without immediate resistance; but to cut off a strip of the public garden to make a play-ground for his children—to encroach a hundred feet on the pride of Paris, the daily promenade of the idlers, who do all the discussion of his measures, it was a little too venturesome. Unfortunately, too, the offence is in the very eye of curiosity, and the workmen are surrounded, from morning till night, by thousands of people, of all classes, gesticulating, and looking at the palace windows, and winding themselves gradually up to the revolutionary pitch.

In the event of an explosion, the liberal party will not want partisans, for France is crowded with refugees from tyranny of every nation. The Poles are flocking hither every day, and the streets are full of their melancholy faces. Poor fellows! they suffer dreadfully from want. The public charity for refugees has been wrung dry long ago, and the most heroic hearts of Poland, after having lost every thing but life in their unavailing struggle, are starving absolutely in the streets. Accident has thrown me into the confidence of a well-known liberal—one of those men of whom the proud may ask assistance without humiliation, and circumstances have thus come to my knowledge which would move a heart of stone. The fictitious sufferings of "Thaddeus of Warsaw," are transcended in real-life misery every day, and by nature quite as noble. Lafayette, I am credibly assured, has anticipated several years of his income in relieving them; and no possible charity could be so well bestowed as contributions for the Poles, starving in these heartless cities.

I have just heard that Chodsko, a Pole, of distinguished talent and learning, who threw his whole fortune and energy into the late attempted revolution, was arrested here last night, with eight others of his countrymen, under suspicions by the government. The late serious insurrection at Lyons has alarmed the king, and the police is exceedingly strict. The Spanish and Italian refugees, who receive pensions from France, have been ordered off to the provincial towns, by the minister of the interior, and there is every indication of extreme and apprehensive caution.

The papers, meantime, are raving against the ministry in the most violent terms, and the king is abused, without qualification, everywhere. It is the genius of the French to make a noise; but without hazarding my single opinion, I quote the most intelligent men I have met, in saying, that there is every appearance of determination and resentment working at the heart of the whole people, and a change must come somewhere. Heaven send it soon, if the distress and wretchedness that meet the eye at every step, depend upon political change for alleviation! We apprehend oppressive measures in our country with sufficient indignation and outcry; but to see the result upon those who bear their burdens till they are galled into the bone, is enough to fire the most unwilling blood to resentment. The irresistible enthusiasm to which one is kindled by contact with an oppressed people, loses here all the pleasure of a fine excitement, by the painfulness of the sympathies it causes with it. Thank God! our own country is yet free from the scourges of Europe!

I went, a night or two since, to one of the minor theatres to see the representation of a play, which has been performed for the hundredth and second time—"Napoleon at Schoenbrunn and St. Helena." My object was to study the feelings of the people toward Napoleon II, as the exile's love for his son is one of the leading features of the piece. It was beautifully played—most beautifully! and I never saw more enthusiasm manifested by an audience. Every allusion of Napoleon to his child, was received with that under-toned, guttural acclamation, that expresses such deep feeling in a crowd; and the piece is so written, that its natural pathos alone is irresistible. No one could doubt, for an instant, it seems to me, that the entrance of young Napoleon into France, at any critical moment, would be universally and completely triumphant. The great cry at Lyons was "Vive Napoleon III!"

I have altered my arrangements a little, in consequence of the state of feeling here. My design was to go to Italy immediately, but affairs promise such an interesting and early change, that I shall pass the winter in Paris.

LETTERS FROM WASHINGTON.

Intercepted for the New-York Mirror.

A fashionable party—society, etc.

I have been at a Washington squeeze, or cram; got nothing to eat, (they don't eat here) and am at this present moment so marvelously out of humor, that I write to you out of pure spite. But come I won't slander myself; I will be benevolent: I know you like to hear of things, (you have no taste for abstractions) and I will try to give you a notion of a Washington party.

Recollect, however, this is not to be a precedent, as they say in congress. I promised to write you letters from Washington, but not about Washington. I can't, Tom; I can't write about things before my eyes; they are seldom those which occupy my mind. I must scrawl in my own way, or not scrawl at all.

I was once, I will confess it to you, and the rather that you know it already, I was once a—dandy! At two and twenty my supercilious chin rested on (then fashionable) a cravat, whose tie Brummel might have envied; and my eye thrown carelessly around, reposed with most satisfaction on the mirror that reflected—myself. The bite of that puppy Coxcombry is not soon or easily cured: a fit will now and then, to this day, come over me.

This evening I was visited with a transient weakness; it was my birthday. I was nine and twenty. Nine and twenty wasted years! How little of youth remained.

The foolish profligate will throw away his last guinea because it is his last; and I suppose it was the same sort of reasoning that determined me to dedicate this night to vanity.

As the ghost of a miser might be supposed to gaze on the board that is daily diminishing in the hands of his spendthrift son or nephew, so did I scrutinize the face over which more slowly and surely Time was drawing his fingers.

The bloom had withered beneath his touch. He had drawn lines, faint yet, but with a certain rigidity which art could not conquer or quite conceal. But there was much left. The fire of the eye was unquenched. Unthinned and in their full rich color, the dark brown curls clustered over the broad, high forehead that slightly and gracefully frowned beneath them. I smiled—I thought there might yet be fascination in that smile!

Carefully, and with a half-abstracted air, I unfolded what might indeed be called a coat! Thrice I had worn it. Upon two occasions it had graced a Parisian saloon—once it had been the envy of Almack's.

It was done—I was a perfect man. No one has ever witnessed my toilet—let the world admire the effect; the means are my secret.

When Brummel fled, he hid not from the world that wonderful discovery—starch! How simple; yet it could only have occurred to a genius. When I die—I have no wealth to found a college or dig a canal—yet will I leave a legacy to my countrymen. Secrets there still are in dress, as well as in science. Est modus in rebus; sunt certi denique fines. There is a way of doing things; there are certain last touches. Enough. The rising generation shall remember me. Non omnes moriar!

I appeared. The diplomatists stared. The natives were struck dumb with astonishment.

My graceful bows accomplished, I crossed the room with stately arrogance, and leaned carelessly against a pillar. I assumed an air of ineffable nonchalance. It might be read in my face that men and women, and all created beings, but one, were to me objects of the most sublime indifference. Then I fell into a fit of absence. I was trying hard to think of something.

"Do you recollect," and I laid my hand on the collar of a gentleman next to me, as one might handle any inanimate object near him; "do you recollect what was the name of Lord Holland's famous pointer?"

The person addressed was a portly, middle-aged man; a major-general from Pennsylvania, who had improved the breed of cattle. There was on his face at that moment a smile of peculiar self-satisfaction, for he had been declaiming, and, as he thought, very eloquently, on the subject of a home market.

A little disconcerted at being thus unceremoniously accosted, the general stared at me for a moment, and then mustering his dignity, looked grand, and answered very pompously,

"Sir, really, I believe I have not the honor of your acquaintance, sir; and, sir, if you should look at me for a moment, you would see, I presume, sir, that I am not a person likely to have made pointer dogs my particular study, sir. And, sir, I don't know who you are, sir, nor whether you meant to give offence, sir; but I must take the liberty to say that I consider your behavior improper and incorrect and impolite, sir."

When this speech was commenced, I listened for a moment as if I expected to hear the name of the dog in question; but my curiosity not being satisfied, my fit of absence returned, to the evident amusement of those around.

The sound of the general's voice at length ceasing, seemed, however, to awaken some recollection in my mind; and reading apparently in his face that he had been saying something to me, I answered hastily, "Certainly, certainly, sir; I agree with you perfectly."

The discomfited general retreated. He thought it was real!—During all this time, many bright eyes had shot at me inquisitive glances; and sweet smiles and encouraging nods and inviting looks had visited me in my retreat—but it was in vain—I was not to be diverted. I played my part like a hero.

Waltzing commenced. Music melts my soul; but I stood insensible—then some began to despise me. Now for an effect.

I stepped forward with sudden animation; my face illuminated with an eloquent smile. She was a fair creature, rather tall, of melting loveliness. "Might I presume to request—for one round?" Could I sue in vain? She smiled consent, and she blushed delight.

Lightly beating time, we waited for the measure. Slow at first, like creatures of the air, with languid grace we floated round. A livelier tune! As if receiving impulse from the music, darting suddenly, like an arrow from Apollo's quiver, with vigorous grace I whirled the yielding beauty in rapid circles, till the quick motion stole the crimson from her cheek.—The others soon paused to admire. We were left alone. How beautiful. We scarce seemed two, nor yet one. What or why they admired so much they could not tell. There was a mystery, a strange accord between the music, the dance, and the beings in it. We seemed born of music, and the dance our natural state of existence. When we ceased there was a murmur of applause.

Music followed. The human voice was put to torture; the piano was beaten like a bag-pipe. At length there was a cessation. The hour was late, and but a small circle remained. I turned the conversation ingeniously to Scotch, Irish, Italian, Spanish music. I had heard an air in Spain—the words too were pretty—I half hummed it to myself as if endeavoring to recall the tune. I was beset with entreaties—"to try, only to try!"—"they were sure I could sing!"—"no matter for the words!"—"no matter for the tune!"—"I must!"—"there—there was the guitar, I must!" I yielded. With a smile, careless of success, I yielded as if only for quiet.

When I was in Italy, Tom, I determined to see if I could not do something as a singer. I took counsel (and paid for it) of some of the first musicians. I received very little encouragement. My voice was a bass, sweet, but not flexible, and of very little compass. Still I was assured that with cultivation and a good natural taste something might be made of any voice. I stipulated for three songs, but in them I was to be perfect. The celebrated P., unable to resist my persuasions, enforced by an argument to which neither singers nor Italians are often inaccessible, undertook the task. After infinite pains, both on my part and on his, the songs having been selected with special reference to my powers, I succeeded. We were both satisfied. Certainly I should be, for with these three songs, no one of which I have sung three times, never twice in the same country, and only in small and select circles—what a reputation have I acquired! Not only as a singer, but as a man careless about his talents and accomplishments—as a man who might do what he pleased. The difficult point was to conceal my poverty—to avoid singing again, after having once been heard. Few, I believe, could have navigated this channel. But I have a look, a manner—when I please—which puts an end to solicitation. "I sang once—it was a whim, but I was no singer—it was taking a liberty to treat me as one—it was offensive to me." People shrugged their shoulders—I was odd! So much the better.

Upon the present occasion, sing as I might, I was certain of success. But I had taken care that there should be one person present who had taste and reputation. This was to fix and give permanency to my fame. I sang; far better than was at all necessary. It was an old simple thing; a serenade. A young noble about to depart for the wars takes leave of his mistress. First, a stanza for battle and for fame—then one for love and tenderness.

I was overwhelmed. The words, the air, the singing—all were perfect, and beyond perfection. I received their praise carelessly; as just, but of no sort of consequence to me. Then I talked familiarly for five or ten minutes of camps, and courts, and foreign climes, and withdrew hastily after a brilliant anecdote, without wit, truth, or point, but which had this merit, that I had contrived to introduce into it a wicked old cardinal, a dissolute actress, Talleyrand, an English horse-jockey, and myself; and I was the hero.

So much for puppyism! Here I am now the best singer, the best dancer, the handsomest man, and so agreeable! When you know me—only a little eccentric! In short, I am the fashion! And to be the fashion is something, any where! Otherwise why will men of sense and information envy fellows without head, heart, honesty, or grammar?

You will not recognize me in this sketch, Tom. You do not believe it—I am not such an insufferable coxcomb! I should not be if others were not, but what is a man to do? Who the deuce, I should like to know, would think of me if I did not show that I thought so much about myself? But there is another and more dangerous cure; I mean for a man of any sense or feeling.

That shrewd observer of human nature, my old friend King Corny, says all women in their hearts love a bit of a coxcomb. Now if this be not true, there is at least such a portion of truth in it, that it is very generally believed, and not unfrequently acted upon.

But if you choose, Tom, you may suppose that I have entered the soul of a dandy, and have given you an accurate account of what passes there. In truth, I do not think I could long support the character myself. There is such a constant restraint; one has to refrain from saying and doing so many things. It must be a great assistance to be a blockhead.

But I have promised to describe to you a Washington party, and I have not yet advanced a step. To begin then; as in these matters we get the clearest ideas by comparison, and as your own observation, Tom, does not extend very far, I think beyond the precincts of your native city, suffer me to compare a ball in Washington with a ball in New-York.

For style and general effect there, you must be allowed a decided preference. Your rooms are larger, better furnished, and better lighted; the music is better; the women have more fashion and elegance, and there is a much larger proportion of gay, young, handsome, and well dressed people. Then you have a lion here and there; you can always tell him, and it is easy to find out who he is, and every thing about him; and out of the way, where the women cannot see you, is a snug card-room, where you may retire, if you don't wish to dance, and there is no one that you care particularly about talking to; and there is a constantly replenished bowl of ne plus ultra punch in the hall; and champagne and a splendid supper to conclude. It is a defect in New-York that there are too many young people; here there are too few. There you want lions; you are sometimes in truth confoundedly pushed—here the lions are too numerous—they interfere with each other, and no one obtains his due share of admiration. As to the supper, which is not the fashion here, something may be said on both sides. There is, in truth, little pleasure in eating in a crowd; but then it breaks people up into little sets, and gives a capital opportunity for a little à l'élite. Most tender speeches in New-York are made in the supper-room. Upon the whole, however, I should be willing to give up the supper and compound for champagne.

Certainly, however, to those whose object is rational conversation, or who wish to see the great men of the country, the society in Washington (during the session of congress) is superior to any elsewhere in America. There are the members of the cabinet, the foreign ministers, the judges of the supreme court, and the distinguished lawyers attending the session of that high tribunal, with many others, whom, at this session, business or curiosity draws to the metropolis.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

A LITERARY GEM.

ALL the higher literary circles are ringing with the praises of the following forthcoming work, by a gentleman of distinguished reputation. When we hint that the author is none other than Mistletoe Mushroom, Esq., we are certain of ensuring the new production a favorable reception. Mushroom, though possessing neither the individuality of Scott, nor the narrative minuteness of Cooper; the misty witicism of Bulwer, nor the copiousness of Galt, still, we think, he unites a spice of the characteristics of each to the tumid nothingness and inflated grandiloquence of Johnson. We have been favored with a perusal of the manuscript, and are happy in being enabled to present our readers with a selection from its pages. We take at random the second chapter, which, however, we think far inferior to other parts of the work.

THE FLY-MARKET LOAFER.

CHAPTER TWO.

"An ancient and fish-like smell."

The shades of evening, or, as our hero, in reference to the mackerel sky overhead, at the time wittily designated them, the shades of evening, had already fallen on the metropolis. It is true they were somewhat broken in their fall by those ligneous perpendicularities which the municipal fathers of the city have carefully erected for the purpose of sustaining those artificial luminaries, vulgarly cognominated lamps, but nevertheless broken and distorted as they were, they had fallen. The streets, squares, and lanes of this wide charnel-house of the living were being deserted by those who for the purposes of traffic, pleasure, or duty had perambulated and trotted them transitively and adventitiously during that portion of the common division of time, a day, denominated, daylight. The collector of the port and the collector of ashes had severally wended their ways home. Old Pot Pie Palmer had an hour since ceased his tintinnabulatory exertions, and was now feasting his eyes with the accumulated treasures of his unctuous bags.

The musical and plaintive cries so peculiar to the American sweep had long since ceased their resonances, while the singularly rich intonations of the compensated distributor of charcoal had died away among the constricted intricacies of Catharine-lane. An hour passed on, and this urban crepuscular silence had given place to those vespertine peculiarities which nocturnally enliven the interstices and interstices of our great domiciliary network. The ottery peripatetics were already at their perambulatory labors—the snoring of the constituted guardians of our property told that they were faithful to their posts; and from the cupola of the hall, like muezzin from the minaret, its stationary herald, owing to the eccentric exigency of an approximate sentinel of time, obliviously forgot to bawl out that pecuniary death-tick to our Æsculapian professors of "all's well."

The chronological period we now allude to was eight P. M., and the local point to which we would induct our readers, is the head of the old Fly-market, at the foot of Maiden-lane. Not a solitary foot-step was heard, and nought usurped the stillness save the guttural sound of a little stream of muddy water, which, in perfect indifference to all else, was emptying itself into the sewer below the market. Presently a man, who had been concealed beneath the frowning portico of the building, gently stepped forward. His pace was stealthy, and ever and anon he glanced furtively around. He was enveloped in an old pea-jacket, he wore a chip hat on his head, the remnants of his trousers were of fustian, and his feet were covered, the right by the canopy of heaven alone, and the left by an old razed boot. There was an expression in his countenance, but what it was it would have puzzled a physiognomist to determine. If he did not appear like one who had seen better days, it were but a charitable sentiment to wish that he had. His complexion showed an utter disregard on his part to all aqueous elements and saponaceous compounds. But slovenliness is ever the accompaniment of genius, so that the market price of soap will always be in the inverse ratio of the march of mind; and in a literary republic washerwomen will have no place, as poets were excluded from Plato's. But to return. The lineaments of the countenance of the Fly-market loafer (for he, we may as well at once confess it was) were not of an extremely prepossessing cast, but he was the bantling of antithesis and the brat of coincidence. The Venusadamean beauty and symmetry of his intellect were in direct contradistinction to the Laocoonicanguinal contortions of his body; but on the other hand, and as in compensation, his nose, like his logic, was Socratic; his forehead, like his propensities, low; his visual organs, like his ideas, single; and his shoulders, like his talents, unequal.

He approached the iron railing which ran along the platform in front of the market, and looking down upon the stream of water before mentioned, he exclaimed, "Alas! the insignificance of man! He labors for a few brief hours, and then his exhausted frame requires rest; but thou, thou little kennel, holdest thy course unchanging through the live-long hours of the day and the tedious watches of the night. Since the corporation graduated and paved the vicinity, thou hast been invariable. True, at times, showers have swelled thy volume, and at others hod-carrying Hibernians have robbed thee of thy complementary stream; but when the rains have passed away, and thy channel has been undammed, thou hast still flowed on to thy old depot. Immutable mudgutter, unchangeable kennel. In comparison how little is man!" Then the Fly-market loafer started from his reverie. Some sudden thought had flashed across his mind. He thrust his hand hastily into the right pocket of his jacket, and his naked fingers finding no impediment, protruded below the skirt. Quick as a wink, or as the poet expresses it, he rummaged the corresponding habilitmentary profundity, and drawing forth a knife, sharpened it convulsively on a broad stone at his feet, until having bestowed on it the keenness he considered requisite for his diabolical purposes, he cut a hunk of pig-tail from the chunk he held in his hand, and again relapsed into his sombre mood. After a brief silence again he suddenly started, and cut stick down the long vista of the market, amid the deserted stalls and the desolate chopping boards, until he reached the longitudinal centre of the second division of this noble edifice, when he emerged from its right opening into the narrow precincts of Fly-market street. He stopped in front of a low, wooden building, through the shutters of the second story of which a tallow-ignited light fell greasily to the pavement. Over the door was legibly painted "Fly-Market Porter-house, by Patrick Huggins," to the right of it the faint and wayworn-traveller-cheering words, "Boarding and Lodging," while to the left glistened the cabalistic paragraph, "Sausages and tripe halways ot." By this time the intelligent reader has probably surmised that Mr. Huggins was perhaps a pabulary and cubicular proveditor for the gastronomic and clinical necessities of a portion of our transient population. Need we declare also that this was the domicile of the maiden bright that claimed our hero's admiration? Preluding by a tune on a jews harp to attract the attention of the fair one, the Fly-market loafer, (so he delighted to be called, for it was his patronymic, his father having been a loafer before him) then sung with that peculiar melody which distinguishes the psalmody of Connecticut from the harmony of all the civilized world, a beautiful ditty, redolent with the romance of the Fly-market region, and he accompanied the chorusses with a singularly wild and picturesque dance.

"As meditation or the thoughts of love,"

The conscious maiden blushed as she listened to the entrancing strain; the blood mounted hastily from her heart to her cheeks, like the aroused garrison of an attacked citadel. Gladly would she have thrown herself from the casement into the arms of her expectant lover, but prudence, and the fear of her cruel father forbade. She merely ventured on gently opening the shutter to gaze for a moment on the dim form of our hero, when startled by an impatient call for hot tripe from the public room below, with a fearful foreboding of the future, she bade the loafer a good night, and withdrew from his ardent eye.

LETTER FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

It would be affectation in us to deny the force of argument contained in the following chaste and well written letter. The logic displayed, especially in the postscript, leaves us very little to urge in defence.—EDS.

To the Editors of the New-York Mirror.

MOST POTENT, GRAVE, AND REVEREND SIGNIORS—Your paper has lately contained many ironical allusions to the prevailing faults among writers, and you have taken it upon yourselves to be particularly witty on the practice of using quotations. My object in addressing you is to express my dissatisfaction with your remarks. I myself occasionally "scrawl strange words with a barbarous pen," and am therefore more emboldened to "commend the ingredients of the poisoned chalice to your own lips." I dissent from you in toto and, more meo, I shall be frank in uttering my sentiments, which are, that the rule you have so arrogantly laid down upon this subject, belongs to those "customs more honored in the breach than in the observance." What! sirs, shall we, in a land "consecrated to the genius of universal emancipation,"

"With freedom's soil beneath our feet,
And freedom's banner streaming o'er us," submit to two or three editors, who, one might imagine from their actions, are "lords of the creation?" No!

"Come one, come all, this rock shall fly
From its firm base as soon as I."

In my future compositions I shall no more consider your instructions than "as the idle wind." The best writers, those who have reached "the round and top of greatness," the "master spirits of the age," men "with thoughts that breathe and words that burn," all of them are in the habit of quoting; and so will those of the present generation be, by which you may see that you have "scotched the snake, not killed it." If quotations are "done when they are done, it were well they were done quickly;" and you, in your late presumptuous attempts to steer "from grave to gay, from lively to severe," have let the wind out of your sails, and thereby "shot your arrow o'er the house, and hurt your brother." What! shall "the poet's eye in a fine frenzy rolling," be told that all the gems which unfold their leaves in the pages of others, are fruits of that forbidden tree "which must not be touched lest it turn to ashes on its lips?"

"Oh! colder than the wind that freezes Founts, that but now in sunshine played,"

are such hypercritical observations.

I regret that necessity, which at least in this instance, is not the "tyrant's plea," has compelled me to be so severe on you, for I am a "constant reader" of your columns, and often discover there

"Truth severe, by fairy fiction dressed;"

but "coming events cast their shadows before," and if you go on in this style you will very soon be forced to "hide your diminished heads," although you may think yourselves now like the sun, sitting "high in his meridian tower." I am not prepared to deny that the Mirror is an excellent paper; for it not only "teaches the young idea how to shoot," but "wakes laughter's peal," and by the aid of pathetic tales "bids the tear-drop roll," and thus "sends its readers weeping to their beds;" but that is no apology for your endeavors to laugh other people out of countenance, because they happen not to think as you do. If you are offended, I can only say, "None but the brave deserve the fair;" and (I name no names) my maxim has always been,

"Hated by fools and fools to hate,
Be this my motto and my fate."

I fear nothing—"Not fate itself can awe the soul of Richard." I should dwell much longer on this subject, but the "iron tongue of time is tolling ten," and I am really overcome with "tired nature's sweet restorer;" so (as Falstaff says) yours by yea and no, which means as you use him,

RICHARD WIGGINS,
Editor of the Commonwealth United States Champion.

P. S. I fear the above is very ill-natured, but you remember the words of the poet,

"And understood not that a grateful mind
By owing, owes not, but still pays at once,
Indebted and discharged."

THE FINE ARTS.

DUNLAP'S HISTORICAL PAINTINGS.

The gallery of the National Academy at Clinton-hall, is now opened with an exhibition of the historical paintings of Mr. Dunlap. They consist of a series of pictures from the New Testament, viz. "The Christ Rejected," "The bearing of the Cross," "The Calvary," and "The Death on the Pale Horse, or opening of the Seals."

"The Christ Rejected" is a fine and very celebrated piece. Mr. West executed a magnificent painting on the same subject, but the two are different in their composition. Mr. Dunlap gives an admirable representation of a crowd. The effect of the thronged galleries in the shadowy distance is fine. The Savior is a calm figure, with a countenance of perfect quiet amid the surrounding discord and confusion, and turned away from the high priest, who is exclaiming, "Crucify him! crucify him!" This production will amply repay a long and close examination.

"The bearing of the Cross" discovers the Savior bent down beneath the load, and nearly overcome by physical suffering. It exhibits a great number of spirited figures in a variety of admirable attitudes.

"The Calvary" contains several groups of unusual grace and merit. One in particular, which the artist has re-painted, by itself, and which may be seen in the opposite side of the room. Perhaps the annals of time do not afford a moment of more striking moral sublimity than that chosen in the present piece. The expiation of human sins is almost consummated, and the Redeemer, amid the scoffings and cruelty of his enemies, is uttering those sacred words, "Father, forgive them, they know not what they do."

"The Death on the Pale Horse," is founded on the outline of West's picture, which is all that Mr. Dunlap has ever seen of that work. It is a fearful representation, calculated to awaken the imagination, and very creditable to the artist's abilities. The head and shoulders of the young man on the left, in front, are extremely well executed, and the face of the dead mother, with her child, merit the highest praise.

In addition to the series exhibited in the gallery is "The attack on the Louvre," affording a very happy idea of the scene every where presented throughout the streets of Paris during the late revolution in that city. The spectator will be gratified with the vividness and reality pervading this picture. The two admirable female figures on the right, and the one on the left, will not fail to arrest his attention. The general idea of confusion which it so happily conveys—the volumes of smoke floating in the air, through which glimpses of troops and armed citizens are caught—the dying youth on the left—the musket lying on the ground—the drum, and the attitude of the cadet, are prominent testimonials of the artist's skill.

The doors of the gallery will be opened from ten till three, and on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays from seven till ten in the evening. Lectures on painting will be delivered on Tuesday and Saturday evenings, illustrative of the pictures and the art.

We sincerely trust that Mr. Dunlap's great worth and indefatigable exertion as an artist, will render this appeal to the public taste entirely successful.

THE LATE ORATORIOS AT ST. PAUL'S.

The oratorio of the Messiah has been repeated twice within the last fortnight; and, to the credit of the inhabitants of the city be it stated, to numerous and respectable assemblies. Unfortunately the indisposition of Mrs. Austin deprived the society of their principal soprano singer; but Madame Brichta supplied the deficiency to the best of her ability. This lady is an excellent musician, and a correct vocalist, without being a finished singer. Her intonation is always perfect, consequently she never offends, and in music of the Italian school we hear her always with satisfaction, sometimes with delight; but Handel's music requires not only fine vocal abilities, both natural and artificial, but it likewise demands an education in that particular school which, although it is progressing rapidly, is not yet to be here met with in perfection.—This all the great Italian vocalists, and among the number Catalani, Pasta, and Malibran have admitted, and previous to their attempting ancient and sacred music, have taken the precaution to be well drilled by English professors who had arrived at eminence in that peculiar branch of the art. The principal failure of foreign singers in Handel's music is the mistaken use of the appoggiatura, and embellishment in general; and this was remarkable in the song "I know that my Redeemer liveth," as sung by Madame Brichta. Her best effort was "Rejoice greatly," although she sang it much slower than it is executed by the received authorities of the present day. Mr. Jones has improved wonderfully since the first oratorio. His opening recitative was beautiful, as was the aria following—and "Thy rebuke" had lost nothing of that pathos which we have previously eulogized. We would ask why he sang the song, "But thou didst not leave?" it being written for, and always sung by a soprano voice. Mr. Pearson got through all he had to do with his accustomed fidelity to the written notes, and with his usual want of style and taste. A Mrs. Toy absented herself the second night very properly; and Miss Moran manifested much sweetness of voice, and only wants a good master to become an efficient and pleasing concert singer. Mr. Kyle acquitted himself with his wonted ability; and the splendid manner in which Norton accompanied the song, "The trumpet shall sound," could not be excelled. We never heard him to greater advantage. We have already given it as our humble opinion that the choruses of the Messiah were admirably executed. There was an absence of that drawing, sleepy style which is so apt to creep over those who are in the habit of singing nothing but psalmody, and Mr. Hill led the oratorio very creditably. Mr. Blondel has a fine firm grasp of the organ, but we agree with a commentator in the American, under the signature "Oratorio," that he would improve his style of accompaniment by merely playing the harmony, as from a figured bass. We cannot, however, assent to the over-rating of Mr. Hermann's abilities, by the same writer, as manifested in the Messiah, although we certainly consider him an excellent violoncello player; but no violoncello player in his senses would attempt to stem the torrent of a full band, which numbered four double basses and as many violoncelli, besides bassoons and trombones. He would be about as audible as a lady's sigh in a gale of wind: added to which, as, right or wrong, the leader is answerable for the time, he would know very little of his duty if he attempted to dictate in such a manner, and it is very doubtful to us if the Messrs. Hermann, although clever musicians, know more about the time of the Messiah than many musicians of this city. In conclusion, the Sacred Music Society of New-York have done all for the production of this great work which zeal and industry could accomplish. They presented the public with an excellent and well instructed chorus, the best band they could procure; the best soprano and tenor within their reach were engaged to lead the business, an accomplished singer took charge of the alto, and the bass was recruited from the best choice within a hundred miles.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

FROM WHITTAKER'S LONDON MAGAZINE.

MY FIRST DUEL.

THERE are some events in the life of a man that make an indelible impression on the mind; events that, amid the varied scenes of love, or war, or ambition, are, to the last hour of existence, as forcibly impressed upon the tablet of memory, as at the moment when they were first inscribed there by the hand of fate. Of this nature is our first duel—the recollection of the first time that we stood on the boundary line that separates the civilization of the ancient and modern worlds. There are several kinds of courage, it has been a thousand times remarked, all of which, if we take the trouble of metaphysically analyzing them, we shall find are but the consciousness of our own force or skill. The squadron of steel-clad cuirassiers rides gallantly at the square of infantry, heedless of the bristling bayonets, of the kneeling front rank, or the murderous volley of the rear. The sailor, lashed to the helm, looks calmly on the raging tempest. The huntsman, in pursuit of game, springs fearlessly across the yawning chasm, or boldly attacks the lion in his lair. Habit, and a familiarity with danger, deaden the instinctive dread of death implanted in us by nature; yet the bravest man may blanch, and the life's blood curdle in the veins, when he finds himself opposed to an adversary, who, without exaggeration, at twelve paces, could wing a hum-bird. Such was my case when quite a raw and inexperienced youngster, exposed, at the age of sixteen, to one of the most slippery tricks that dame Fortune, in her most wayward humor, can play a man. Every one must recollect the rancorous animosity that subsisted between the British and Americans for several years after the termination of the war between the two countries. Time has now, in some degree, softened down this hostile feeling; but, in 1818 it blazed fiercely forth at Gibraltar, where a slight misunderstanding at one of the guard-houses, led to a succession of bloody, and, in some instances, fatal rencounters between the garrison and the officers of the American squadron, at that time in the bay. Similar scenes were enacted at Madeira, though with less fatal results; and, only a few months afterwards, when the United States corvette Ontario, and the British frigate Hyperion, were lying in the bay of Callao de Lima, to so fierce a pitch had this feeling risen, that the commanders of the two ships came to an understanding to allow their officers to go on shore only on alternate days; and by this timely precaution they prevented a hostile collision, which would in all probability have deprived the services of both countries of some valuable and gallant officers. It was during the noontide heat of this rancorous feeling between the two nations, that I one evening entered a café, in one of the Brazilian outposts, to meet, by appointment, a friend, from whom I was to receive some letters of introduction for the interior of the country, for which I was on the eve of my departure. The streets were silent and deserted; the only sound to be heard was the vesper hymn sweetly floating on the evening breeze. On entering the café, I found a group of savage-looking Minheiros, who were drinking and listening to a love-lay, sung with great sweetness to a guitar accompaniment, by a mulatto youth; and a party of four American officers who were going home, inviolated from their squadron, round the Horn. Forcibly as my attention was arrested by the picturesque costume of the Brazilian mountaineers—one of those dark satanic groups that the spirit of Sal-vator so revelled in delineating—it did not escape me that the subject of discourse with the American party was England, against whose institution and people violent abuse and unmeasured invective were levelled, in that drawing, nasal tone that so particularly distinguishes our transatlantic brethren. No man, even of the most cosmopolitan composition, can digest violent strictures on the country of his birth; the language of the Americans jarred violently on my ear, but though it stirred up the ill blood of my nature, I did not exactly think myself called upon to play the Don Quixote, and to run a tilt against all those who should choose to asperse the majesty of England. By the young and ardent this feeling, I am aware, may be stigmatized as ignoble; but those whose passions have been mellowed by time and experience will, I think, own the prudence of the line of conduct I pursued.

I therefore took my seat, lighted a cigar, and listened attentively to the beautiful modinha sung by the mulatto; there was a plaintive softness in the air, and an exquisite simplicity in the words of the ditty, telling of the pangs of unrequited love, that had well nigh allayed the angry feelings that were struggling for mastery in my bosom; when the strictures of the Americans which had hitherto been levelled at Old England in general, were directed to me personally, and left me but one—honorable alternative. "When a man openly insults you," says my Lord Chesterfield, "knock him down." If I did not on this occasion follow his lordship's advice a la lettre, I did something which, among honorable men, is deemed tantamount to it, and which produced a challenge from one of the party; a demand for immediate satisfaction on the following morning, on the plea that their departure was fixed for the succeeding day. "Gentlemen," said I, "willing as I shall be to give you the satisfaction you require, I doubt my ability to do so at the early hour you have named; for I am a stranger here, and may experience some difficulty in finding a second among my countrymen who are quite strangers to me; and are, moreover, established in a country where the laws against duelling are severe—banishment to the shores of Africa—I must, therefore, defer the rencontre till the evening, not doubting, in the mean time, to find some one to do me the office I stand in need of."

A provoking sneer played round the lips of three of the party, and an exclamation of withering contempt was on the point of escaping them, when the fourth, who had hitherto been quietly sipping his sangaree, rose from his chair and addressed me with great politeness of manner: "I cannot conceal from myself," were his words, "that this quarrel has been forced upon you, and I regret, from the turn it has taken, that there remains nothing but the last appeal; but if, as you say, you are a stranger here, and are likely to experience any difficulty in finding a second, I will myself most willingly do you that office; for I can conceive no situation so forlorn, so desolate as that of a man, in the solitary loneliness of a foreign land, without a friend to stand by him in an honorable quarrel."

The hearty pressure of my outstretched hand must have told him better than words could do, how deeply sensible I was of the service he was about to render me. We separated. The sun had scarcely gilded the balconies of the east when I arose, hurried on my clothes, and having given a few directions to my servant, hastened towards the spot where, on the preceding evening, I had parted from my new friend. It was a beautiful morning—the sun had risen in all the splendor of a tropical clime, and as I moved on through the silent trees, methought the fair face of nature had never looked so beautiful; not a sound was heard, save the solemn peal of the matin bell, or the rustling of the silk mantilla of some fair beata, as she glided past me to pour forth her morning orisons at the shrine of her patron saint. I at length reached the palace square, and observed my American friend slowly pacing the esplanade of the church of St. Maria. He was tall and bony; his blue frock and ample white trousers hung about him with republican negligence of manner; he wore his shirt collar open; and his long matted dark hair was shadowed by a broad-brimmed hat of Chilian straw, white, in comparison to the sallow hue of his complexion; his countenance I can never forget; it wore not the open frankness and gallant bearing of the soldier, but there was an expression of enthusiasm, of a cool, determined cast, a stern intrepidity; and, as he stretched out his hand to welcome me, and fixed his large black eyes on me with a concerned gaze that seemed to read my thoughts, it struck me that I beheld the very beau ideal of a duelist.

We moved on, each of us wrapped up in his own meditations, when, on clearing the city, he at length broke the silence that had prevailed, by asking me if I had ever been out before? On my answering the question in a negative, "I supposed as much," he continued. "At your age one has seldom drawn a trigger, but on a hare or partridge; remember, therefore, to follow implicitly the instructions I shall give you in placing you on the ground; and take this cigar," he added, handing me one from his case: "it is a powerful stimulant, and quickens the circulation of the blood."

We had by this time reached the field of action, and discovered my adversary, his second, and a medical attendant, smoking their cigars beneath the shade of a cluster of cocoa-nut trees, that stood in loneliness in the middle of the valley. They arose on our approach, saluted me sternly, and interchanged friendly greetings with my companion. "You will, of course," observed my adversary's friend, "have no objection to sixteen paces?" "As the challenged party, we have the right of choosing our own distance," rejoined my second; "say, therefore, twelve paces, instead of sixteen, and the firing down." "Twelve paces," I repeated to myself; "can he be playing me false?" But I did him injustice, for to this arrangement I owe, to all human certainty, my life.

The ground was measured. My second placed me with my back to the sun—a disposition that brought his rays right on my opponent's line of sight. The seconds retired to load. The ramming down of the balls grated with portentous effect upon my ear. All being ready, my second, taking a handkerchief from his pocket, bound one end of it tightly round my right hand, and measuring the length of my arm, which he marked by a knot, brought it across the back over the left shoulder, where the knot was tightly grasped by the left hand. "Now, then," he said, on putting the pistol into my hand, "be cool! When the signal is given, let your arm steadily fall, till you find it brought up by the handkerchief, and then fire!" The appointed signal was given; both fired at as nearly the same moment as possible, but with unequal success. My adversary's bullet passed through my hat; mine was more unerring in its aim—he reeled and fell. My first impulse was to rush towards him, but I was arrested in my course by my second, who stood close beside me. "Remain where you are, sir," said he; "he may yet stand another shot." This was not the case; the ball had entered the shoulder; and as the wounded man lay weltering in his blood, he said, with a look of reproach to my companion, "B—n, this is all your doing." We conveyed him to a neighboring hut, till the shade of evening allowed us to take him on board ship. As he walked off the ground, my companion said to me, "You doubtless wondered why I rather placed you at twelve than sixteen paces. Know, then, that at the latter distance your adversary was a dead shot. At twelve, it occurred to me, that he might by chance fire over you; that, unaccustomed to that distance, he might not correctly allow for the parabola described by the ball on leaving the pistol; the result," he added with a smile, "has proved that my calculation was correct. Had you too," he added, "allowed your arm to have fallen with great force, the shot would taken effect lower, and might (this was said very coolly) have proved fatal. But I must not find fault with you, as it was your first essay."

On the following morning my generous friend, my preserver, in fact, my wounded adversary, and his friends, sailed for the states. I have never seen them since, or even heard of them, save a few short lines sent me by a vessel they spoke at sea, to inform me that the wounded man was doing well.

I have often reflected since on the high-toned, generous feeling that entered so deeply into the peculiarity of my situation; the high resolve that, once pledged, sternly devoted itself to carry me through, indifferent to the ties of country or friendship. That my friend was a duelist, his conduct on the ground warrants me in supposing. I am ignorant if he yet walks this earth. But this I know, had I gone into the field with any one else, I should now be sleeping beneath the white walls of the English cemetery at R—.

The Cholera.—This awful calamity is becoming a subject of alarm in America. At the first faint intelligence of its ravages among the population of the most distant part of the globe, we could not but shudder. We have been accustomed, however, to consider ourselves so completely separated from Asia and its dangers, that we regard accounts of the transactions occurring there, almost as the history of past ages, if not the incidents of a romance; but as this pestilence rolled from those remote nations, with a broad and steady course over Europe, the subject began to assume a new and more fearful interest, which the late advices from England are by no means calculated to diminish. The question on every one's lips now is, can this extraordinary plague cross the Atlantic? We are inclined to hope it will not. Several private letters state that the disease is not generally so terrible as it is represented, and that its consequences, as it progresses, are of a less fatal character. We must allow something for the confusion and alarm excited in England, and for the exaggerations and errors which on such occasions usually prevail. That the reports differ materially, is certain, and one communication from Gateshead, the town on the river Tyne, opposite Newcastle, states, that every malady, of every description, and every death, from whatever cause, are ascribed to the cholera. Although this is not entirely credible, we suspect it is not wholly destitute of truth. Neither is the question of its contagiousness settled. The very doubt, however, has a sufficient bearing on the subject of its reaching the American continent, to render necessary the quarantine regulations, which have been recently adopted in this city, and sometime since in Boston, in all our ports. The victims of the disorder would perish or recover long before their arrival here; but the infection is supposed to remain with all the objects with which the sick had any communication. If the disease is merely contagious, and not a state of the atmosphere destined, as some suppose, to circumvent the globe, every thing is to be hoped from the enforcement of the quarantine rules; and the temporary inconvenience which they may occasion to commerce, is but trivial compared with the incalculable evils against which they would be the barrier. If, on the other hand, the pestilence is but a poisoned air, is it likely to retain its nature upon the Atlantic, and will not the western coast of Europe and Africa be the limit of its career? Some learned person or other has published his opinion, that it is undoubtedly a venom in the atmosphere, and estimates its velocity at a few inches a day. But the wind, that is the air itself, travels many miles a day, and would, consequently, convey such a venom with it. Besides, if the air itself is poisoned, why do not beasts die of it?—yet we have not heard of either horses or dogs sick with the cholera in England. But whatever the origin of it may be, it is certainly striking terror through all classes. It is not only the actual contagion that they fear, but the confusion and distress it will everywhere occasion. We notice, with pleasure, that the translation of a treatise on the subject is on the eve of publication; but we think yet more should be done, and, if only to impart a feeling of confidence to the public, one or more competent physicians should be dispatched to England to study the precise nature of the disease, and the correct method of treatment, the course of diet, &c. most proper to be pursued, and such facts as would be valuable to the profession in this country. If symptoms of the pestilence should break out here, the opinion that we are prepared for it will, in some measure, allay the public anxiety, and prevent our yielding to sudden and groundless alarm. At present, should a case transpire, or even one of another malady be mistaken for it, the mind of the whole community is prepared by a thousand floating, and, perhaps, exaggerated rumors, to yield to the most frightful apprehensions.

Bachelor's Ball.—Moralists declare that the greatest homage guilt can pay to virtue is to assume its garb; so the most unequivocal confession of their dissatisfaction with their lot is afforded by this elegant entertainment, which the bachelors offer to the ladies. It takes place on St. Valentine's day, the fourteenth instant, at the City-hotel. The balls managed by this society have always presented a fine display of fashion, and it is almost superfluous to commend them to the attention of our fair readers. Rumor is already busy touching the throngs of the young and the beautiful briskly preparing for the occasion. Many a rash advocate for single blessedness will rue the hour. Hymen is weaving chains that must be worn, and the blind boy is sharpening his arrows. Go, dear reader—be sure to go. It will be a thing to be remembered. Go witness the discomfiture of bachelorism, its annihilation by its own rashness. Go see the lion beaten in his den. What fatal folly possesses these impetuous swains to rush on their fate? Deem they their flimsy armor of philosophy and resolution sufficient shield against the brilliant dangers they must encounter? If they knew what we know, would they persist? Presumptuous scoffers! their plumes shall be torn! The annexed rhapsody from a correspondent comes very apropos, and cuts short further observation.

"Descend, oh muse! we invoke thy aid. Spirit of Ossian inspire our pen. Lift the veil of the future. Alas! what do we see? The radiant scene bursts upon us in a blaze of light! A crowd of the lovely and youthful mingle in the dance. Music, richer than fills a summer grove, inspires every bosom. The bending floor springs to the touch of slender feet. Graceful the groups as flowers by the running stream. The prismatic chandeliers flash with rainbow beams, such as shine on the spray at the foot of Niagara, when the heavens are blue, and spring blossoms in the valley. Venus, from a cloud of floating incense, bends her radiant face. Cruel Cupid draws his fatal bow.

"The white-armed Laura pauses from the dance. Pure her thoughts as clouds that hang in heaven. The prosperous Jenkins calls her daughter. She comes from her beautiful home, where the circling Bowling-green shines with waving trees, amid the city walls. Her father is great among the people; snowy winged ships bear his wealth from distant climes; many aspiring youths seek her hand, though cold her bosom to love. Tremble, blue-eyed Laura; tremble, daughter of Jenkins of the stately ships. Whisker-cheeked Augustus arrests thy heavenly orbs. Persuasion flows from his lips; his looks are soft and full of love; they sink into thy soul. Tremble, lovely dweller by the Bowling-green; blue-eyed daughter of Jenkins, thy time has come. Relentless Cupid loosens his winged shaft; deep to thy heart it flies like the arrow of the hunter to the wild deer's panting and snowy bosom. They will miss thee in thy father's costly halls; they will miss thy tones of music. The aged man will lean his ear for thy light step; only the evening breeze will answer. Shadows will be on his wintry forehead, when thou art away with thy husband. Peace be ever with thee and thine, silver-voiced enemy of bachelors. Who rises like a soft star? Dearer her tones than the dash of blue waves, that break on thy sandy beach, far flowing Hudson. Fly from her glance, Frederick, mightiest of bachelors, danger is abroad. Fly, snuff-taking Henry, antiquated studier of Coke. William, doctor of renown; Thomas, writer of jingling rhymes—fly.

"Beautiful she comes as a summer night, when no cloud reflects the moonbeams. In a distant street is her dwelling. Her once David wedded. A green mound swells by the river side. There his name is written. The rolling years went on; nature healed her wounded heart, and overspread it with other thoughts and other hopes. So when the dreadful earthquake rends the hill the gentle summers wash its torn bosom with showers, and overspread it with peaceful grass. She moves with a slow step; her eyes are soft with dark beauty, like the antelope's when it leaves the playful herd and mourns. She was lovely, and many loved her. The high-hearted Arthur bowed before her.

"Hear me," he said. "Julia of the mournful eyes, wealth is mine; my palace is proud and beautiful: I am high among the highest. The world is bleak around thee; they thou lovedst are laid low; their names are found on the cold marble; they can never protect thee. Let me protect thee. Dearest thy melancholy than the mirth of others. It soothes my soul like summer's twilight hours. I love thee in thy sorrow. There is no love like my love."

"She spoke; her voice was like the dove that mourns her mate.

"I cannot love thee, youth with the lofty brow; other's eyes are brighter than mine. Their bosoms will beat when thou speakest to them thus. Mine is cold and still. I can never love thee."

"Tears hung on her lashes like drops on the vine-leaves after the shower. Cover from our view, oh spirit! his dark thoughts. Hide the treacherous scene. Many will be the hearts reft by the arrow of the laughing boy at your ball, oh bachelors! A."

Washington's birthday.—On the centennial birthday of Washington, Major-general Morgan Lewis will deliver an oration. The consistory of the Middle Dutch church have unanimously offered their building for the occasion. A general parade will take place in the day, a military fete will be given in the evening, and other demonstrations of public feeling will celebrate this interesting era.

Madame Malibran.—This female has obtained a divorce from Mr. Malibran, on the grounds that in France no marriage is valid occurring out of the kingdom unless sanctioned by a French consul. She has formed a new alliance with a famous fiddler—De Berneot!

Commissary-general.—Alexander M. Muir has been re-appointed commissary-general of this state. In common with our fellow-citizens we are gratified with the intelligence. This gentleman is deservedly popular from the fidelity and courtesy with which he has discharged his official duties.

A critic's grammar.—A critic in the New-England Galaxy of the fourth instant, in an article criticizing Mr. Willis, has the following finished decision, which we presume is final: "He writes to please neither you nor I." We regret the letters do not please he, but it cannot be helped.

Cinderella.—Mrs. Austin appeared in this opera to a fashionable audience on Monday evening. She was received with acclamations.

The young grandson of Sir Walter Scott, to whom the Tales of a Grandfather were dedicated, died lately, aged eleven years.

EUROPE.

THE moral and physical aspect presented by this portion of the globe may be termed awful: the people everywhere rising against the government, or the fires of revolution smouldering beneath the surface, like the force of approaching earthquakes. The higher classes are appalled with fear for the tenure of all they value in life, and the lower orders, often oppressed with the most wretched poverty, and goaded to desperation by hunger or cold. The power of nature is combating with the energy of old tyrannical laws, and Europe resembles a boiling stream, agitated by the conflict of violent and opposing tides. In addition, and rolling over the whole, like a pestilential ocean, the cholera comes onward with a march which nothing can oppose or elude, and adds its victims to those of war, despotism and famine. The historian who shall write several centuries hence, will thus describe the present age, as it transpired in the land of France, Greece, and Poland. Yet go there, and, perhaps, you will travel weeks, and suspect nothing of these evils. You will see peaceful cottages with green swards, and merry peasants dancing beneath a clear bright heaven, and the country will delight, and the splendor of the city dazzle: so difficult a thing is it to keep down the human mind, and by even the most stupendous public calamities to check the growth of private joys. This elastic character of man, for which we cannot be too grateful to Providence, is like the vital principle of vegetation in the earth, where vines, trees, and bright flowers will spring up between the crevices of rocks, or from out of the fragments of mouldering ruins.

PETTY SUPERSTITIONS.

The guardians of youth have often been told that they cannot be too careful to exclude from their imaginations these marks of ignorance, which render them ridiculous as well as unhappy. But all rules have exceptions. During my early childhood I was sent to reside for several years in a distant country place, nearly as remote from city scenes and associations as the island of Robinson Crusoe. In this humble abode my infant mind soon yielded to the simple fancies of those around, and I learned to regard numerous ordinary occurrences as fraught with a mysterious meaning. Some of these, I confess, were dark and withering. A winding-sheet in the candle—a death-tick in the ear—the howling of a dog at night—I acknowledge my soul has shrunk from these dreadful omens, but then, what exquisite pleasure I have derived from others of a contrary description! How my heart has brightened up on finding a horse-shoe, for that was always a sign of "good-luck;" and many a time when my eyes caught the clear iron, half buried in the road, I have seized it with almost a religious veneration, and placed it on the old rail fence, where the poor laborer, on his return, might see it. Then the shooting stars!—when they flashed their fiery trains across the sky, it was our belief that he who during their progress could express his wish three times, would certainly have that wish gratified.

There is a small and beautiful winged insect, shaped in the back like a tortoise, of a golden color, spotted with black. With what gravity, when one of these gorgeous little creatures encountered me in my walks through the corn-fields, I have caught it, and repeated the old traditional lines:

"Lady-bug, lady-bug, fly away home,
Your house is on fire, your children will burn," &c.

I realized a joy in the vague idea, that by means of this warning I had saved it from some impending evil, and enlisted in my favor the good graces of superior beings. Crickets, too, were considered as a kind of charm. I remember having once fought a severe battle with a young urchin, just from the city, who wished to crush one on the grass. I thought him rash as Belshazzar, when he stole "those golden vessels richly carved," for his fatal feast. That simple superstition cannot be totally destitute of beauty, which could soothe me by the low chirp of this insect, hidden in the kitchen hearth, and now that these errors have passed away, I am almost fain to regret them. They are connected with a world of peaceful and pleasant images, with that ancient low house, and its moss-covered roof; with the tall, straight locusts by the door, and their silky leaves; with the green lane, and well-remembered orchard, where we used to feast on the early apples; and with so many friends now scattered and dead, and so many delights which I can never know again, that I yet pause at the voice of a cricket, and smile when I find a horse-shoe; and, when, in a midnight perambulation, the "fallen star" streams across the still bright heavens, I am scarcely recovered from the impulse to wish many and many a vain dream, to which even the spell of the flashing meteor cannot now lend the tinge of reality.

EXTRACTS FROM A MODERN DICTIONARY.

Tragedian—A fellow with a tin pot on his head, who stalks about the stage, and gets into a violent passion for so much a night.

Critic—A large dog, that goes unchained, and barks at every thing he does not comprehend.

Impossibility—Breakfast on board a steam-boat without sausages.

Patron of American periodical literature—A person who subscribes to a journal, and stops it in a few months without paying his subscription.

"Your humble servant"—A term applied by the writer of a letter to himself, which would be the greatest insult if applied by another.

Esquire—Everybody, yet nobody; equal to General.

Jury—Twelve prisoners in a box to try one or more at a bar.

Young attorney—A useless member of society, who often goes where he has no business to be, because he has no business where he ought to be.

State's evidence—A wretch who is pardoned for being baser than his comrades.

TO HER WHO CAN UNDERSTAND THEM.

AIR—"To ladies eyes a round, boy!"

THE song that o'er me hovered
In summer's hour, in summer's hour,
To day with joy has covered
My winter bower, my winter bower.
Blest be the lips that breathe it,
As mine have been, as mine have been,
When pressed, in dreams, beneath it,
To hers unseen, to hers unseen.
And may her heart, wherever
Its hope may be, its hope may be,
Beat happily, though never
To beat for me, to beat for me.

Is she a Spirit, given
One hour to earth, one hour to earth,
To bring me dreams from heaven,
Her place of birth, her place of birth?
Or minstrel maiden, hidden
Like cloistered nun, like cloistered nun,
A bud, a flower, forbidden
To air and sun, to air and sun?
For had I power to summon
With harp divine, with harp divine,
The Angel, or the Woman,
The last were mine, the last were mine.

If earth-born Beauty's fingers
Awaked the lay, awaked the lay,
Whose echoed music lingers
Around my way, around my way;
Where smiles the hearth she blesses
With voice and eye, with voice and eye?
Where binds the Night her tresses,
When sleep is nigh, when sleep is nigh?
Is fashion's bleak cold mountain
Her bosom's throne, her bosom's throne?
Or love's green vale and fountain,
With One alone, with One alone?

Why ask? why seek a treasure,
Like her I sing, like her I sing?
Her name nor pain nor pleasure
To me should bring, to me should bring.
Love must not grieve or gladden
My thoughts of snow, my thoughts of snow,
Nor woman soothe or sadden
My path below, my path below.
Before a worldlier altar
I've knelt too long, I've knelt too long,
And if my footsteps falter,
'Tis but in song, 'tis but in song.

Nor would I break the vision
Young fancies frame, young fancies frame,
That lights with stars elysian,
A poet's name, a poet's name;
For she, whose gentle spirit
Such dreams sublime, such dreams sublime,
Gives hues they do not merit
To sons of rhyme, to sons of rhyme.
But place the proudest near her,
Whate'er his pen, whate'er his pen,
She'll say, (be mute who hear her,)
"Mere mortal men, mere mortal men!"

Yet though unseen, unseeing,
We meet and part, we meet and part,
Be still my worshipped Being,
In mind and heart, in mind and heart.
And bid thy song that found me—
My minstrel maid, my minstrel maid!
Be winter's sunbeam round me,
And summer's shade, and summer's shade.
I could not gaze upon thee,
And dare thy spell, and dare thy spell,
And, when a happier won thee,
Thus bid farewell, thus bid farewell. F. G. H.

THE LOVES OF THE SHELL-FISHES.

Extract from a manuscript Poem.

In my young days—I'm old and hoary now—
In my young days, when life was in its spring,
Ere yet the hand of care had seamed my brow,
While life's fresh buds of hope were blossoming—
I was a wanderer then—the vessel's prow
Bore me away, with high and wind-kissed wing,
To new and distant lands, beyond the clime
Where I had fondly hoped to pass my prime.

I travelled through strange lands, and in strange eyes
And stranger voices found a welcoming,
And learned the language spoke 'neath milder skies,
Soft as the rivulet's mild murmuring:
And in that land of gentle melodies,
Of incense-breathing airs and changeless spring,
I met a fisher once by the sea-shore,
A man of humble life, though varied lore.

For he had learned the language of the sea
From a young mermaid, taken by his art;
The fairest of the ocean-born was she,
And quite she won the simple fisher's heart.
There was a life of joy and loving glee;
And 'twas her whole enjoyment to impart
To him the heaven of promise to his sight,
Her latest found and ever new delight.

The unwearying burden of those ocean lays,
The storied legends of her own loved clime;
Where the glad light of never-dying days
Knows not the lapse of years, the change of time;
With words as soft as is the voice of praise
From childhood's cherub lips; my lowly rhyme
Fears to repeat the soft words from a mouth
Sweet as the perfumed breezes of the south.

His thirsty ear drank deeply of her song,
And his full heart retained its witchery;
And many a time as we have strolled along
The yellow sands that skirt the foamy sea,
I've listened to his strange and varied throng
Of words of wild and thrilling mystery,
Of tales of love, and stories of old lore,
That earthly being never heard before.

Peace to thee, humble fisher, and to her
Thy gentle and thy cherished ocean bride:
Ye hear no more the billow's busy stir,
That bore ye onward on their foaming tide.
Ye shall not all decay, if song confer
A place in hearts where ye may yet abide;
Though nameless as my lay, to be forgot
From human memories, shall not be your lot.

Thus did I learn this plain and simple lay.
Rude though it be, its beauties all are thine,
Sweet daughter of the deep; though never may
It reach the hearts of others as of mine;
Though but the record of an idle day,
It breathes not thoughts that poets call divine.
I do confess it wakes and warms my cold
And worn out heart, and makes me feel less old.

Such is my plain unvarnished tale; if true
Or false, it is not every part mine own,
Except the episodes which I clearly do
Claim most exclusively as mine alone.
These I submit to the impartial view
Of thee, sweet public. Now my preface done,
I shall commence, as has become the fashion,
My poem with a splendid burst of passion.

She was the fairest of the race of pearls,
Gentle as fair, and graceful in her mien
As is the form of earth's most queenly girls,
And to be loved had only to be seen.
As when a cloud of darkness vainly furls
The star that peeps its feathery skirts between;
So did she look, when the half-opened shell
Gave glimpses of her beauty in its cell.

She was, I must confess, a little pale;
But hers was not the paleness which on earth
Speaks of the gnawing tortures that assail
The heart, and rob the bosom of its mirth;
She had not felt misfortune's wintry gale,
For pleasure smiled upon her at her birth;
And she was nursed in joy as in their bowers,
The sea-born goddess by the laughing hours.

Hers was, as I have said, a lineage
Stainless, and traced back to the deep's dark ages;
(So proved by reference to the herald's page;)
Her sires were minstrels, warriors, saints and sages,
And acted well their parts on life's wide stage;
Pure patriots all, unbought by place or wages;
While on her mother's side the best of blood
Was traced to several years before the flood.

With birth and beauty such, the education
Of this fair daughter of a princely race,
Was such as well became her rank and station;
And every budding year put forth new grace,
And added to the glorious coruscation
Of charms that beamed from mien, and form, and face,
While her deportment showed that strict propriety
Which gives a charm to ocean's good society.

ORIGINAL TALES.

ALICE.

SHE arrived at the school on a holiday afternoon, towards the close of spring, when all the scholars were out in the neighboring fields, except Frank and myself. We were seated under the great elm in the dooryard, engaged in our favorite game, in which each alternately endeavored to surpass the other by reading a greater number of lines in Virgil without breaking the measure, when the carriage drove up, and Alice Prior alighted. We spent the remainder of the day in introducing the new-comer to all the objects of interest within and around the seminary; and from that time forth, for two years, we three were inseparable companions whenever school regulations did not preclude our intercourse. It was the happiest period of my life. I loved the gentle orphan as a brother may love a favorite sister; but farther than this, I dared not give way to my feelings, being aware of the previous attachment of the cousins. At length I was recalled to the city to superintend my father's mercantile affairs, as his partner. Frank and I corresponded for many months, until at length becoming more and more engrossed in the business of the busy world, I neglected to answer his letters altogether. In his last he informed me of the death of his parents, that Alice had been adopted by a natural uncle, a Mr. Morton, who was childless, and reported to be among the wealthiest of the metropolis, and that his collegiate course was almost completed. I made inquiries for Alice soon after, but not being able to ascertain her place of residence, her remembrance gradually passed from my mind, and I thought no more of the country belle for three whole years, till one night I met her at a large party. I knew her at the first glance, but the artless school-girl had grown into the accomplished woman. She had just been led to the piano by her adopted father as I recognized her. Scarcely had she struck a dozen notes, before the numerous groups throughout the spacious and thronged saloon became still, and ere the first stanza was ended, I fancied myself in some vast hall where music and statuary had united their fascination, so motionless were the listeners, so charming the strain. There was more of melody than power in her voice, which, with the touching expression she gave to the sentiment, made its way directly to the heart. She sang a few more popular airs, and then resigned her seat.

"Can this be Alice Prior?" whispered I, audibly, as she passed me, arm-in-arm with a gentleman, who was conducting her to a little knot of friends.

"It is even so," returned a familiar voice, at my elbow.

I looked round and beheld a tall figure leaning against a pilaster just on my right. I recognized the features of Frank Warner. I grasped his hand, and in a moment we were boys again. We retired to a distant corner of the room, and there ran over the prominent events in the history of our lives since we parted at boarding-school. Among other particulars, he acquainted me with an engagement between himself and cousin, previous to her removal to the metropolis; of their subsequent correspondence while he was yet at college; "which lasted but a few months," continued he, with emotion, "before she became remiss in answering my letters, till at length I heard from her no longer. By and by I came to the city to pursue my professional studies; but my feelings had been too deeply wounded by her silence to seek an interview. We met, however, occasionally, as the sphere of my acquaintance enlarged, but she had forgotten me, and she was no longer the unsophisticated being for whom we contrived so many gratifications in our school-boy days. Adopted, nay, idolized by a man of large fortune, transplanted into the fascinating scenes of metropolitan gaiety and splendor, and enchanted by all the pleasures which wealth and beauty can summon, she has learned to forget, or to look back with disdain on those simple delights amid which she was nurtured. She has breathed the malaria of flattery, till her young heart has been tainted with its poison. She has learned that she is an object of admiration. She has learned that she is heir to a splendid inheritance, and the consciousness of independence is but another name for pride. No expense has been spared to perfect her in the fashionable accomplishments of the day, and these with her elegant person and prospective dowry, have drawn around her a crowd of admirers. I too still observe her, but it is at a distance; I stand aloof and gaze at her as at some glorious and unapproachable being, from the mastery of whose presence it is impossible to break away. We meet comparatively often, for I cannot bring myself to shun the opportunity of seeing her, though she passes me unnoticed, or notices me but with indifference."

"Assuredly, my friend," said I, "there is a fortune in love, and therefore to repine at the awards of the blind goddess is of no avail. In the disappointments of affection, as in all others of the heart, stoicism is the true philosophy. Come, come, Frank, away with this boyish melancholy—cheer up, and remember that though this passage in your life be gloomy and desolate, it may be the highway to scenes of light and beauty which await your future progress."

"It is useless to philosophize," replied Werner. "Reason, I own, shows us true beacons by which we might safely direct our course; but, Love sits at the helm of the heart, and—"

"Should be thrown overboard for a blind pilot," interrupted I, "whenever he trifles with his trust, amid breakers and quicksands."

Before he had time to reply, a friend beckoned me to her from a distant part of the room. The lady who had summoned me was one of the gay circle in which Alice was seated, and after a little time I was introduced to the latter. She had not forgotten me; but whenever, in the course of conversation, I reverted to past scenes, she became silent, and even apparently disconcerted. At first I did not notice her embarrassment, so pleasing was it to speak of the associations awakened by her presence; but I soon discovered my error, and remarked to myself that there is no surer way of forfeiting the good graces of those who have risen to consequence from the humble walks of life, than to remind them of their first estate. Pride, like the eagle, looks upward, and finds no gratification in surveying the low perch from which it plumed its wing for eminence.

"Who is that student-looking unknown, whom you left in the corner yonder?" asked one of the group. "He looks as pale and melancholy as a discarded lover."

All eyes were directed towards Frank, whose face was partly turned towards the window, through which the full-moon was beaming.

"That's my friend, Dr. Werner," I returned. "I believe you formerly knew him, Miss Prior."

"Indifferently," she replied, with nonchalance.

"He affected to be your beau at school, I have been informed," observed another of the party. "His country gallantry must have been really amusing."

"He my beau," cried Alice, extending her fore-finger with a scornful smile; "that tall mountaineer my beau, indeed!" and she laughed outright.

The gesture and the contemptuous smile did not escape the notice of their object. I looked at the haughty girl, and our eyes met. A blush passed over her features, but it was instantly followed by an expression of careless gaiety; and tossing a billet to me, she said,

"Here, Mr. Morgan, this is for you: you used to be an admirer of sonnets, and of course you will be greatly obliged to me for so valuable a present. Your friend handed it to me this evening, by mistake, I presume."

"Read it, do, do," cried half-a-dozen voices at once.

"No, no, indeed," interrupted Alice; "you must spare me—I am positive I should not survive such an infliction."

Werner turned away in confusion, and withdrew from the apartment, stung to the quick.

The group was soon after dispersed in a cotillion, and as my feelings were warmly excited in my friend's behalf, I took the opportunity of being alone to see what he had written as a valedictory to his cousin. The following were the lines:

Farewell—the spell is broken
That held me in its thrall;
Farewell—the word is spoken
My lips shall ne'er recall!
And though we oft may meet, perchance,
And mingle in the stirring dance
With pleasure's idle-hearted;
We shall not meet as we have met,
Ere hope's first morning star had set,
Nor part as we have parted.
I loved thee, and must love thee still
In memory of the past,
Amid what'er of earthly ill
My future lot be cast!
For in my boyhood's sunny prime,
When brightly from the urn of time
Life's golden moments fell,
Thou wert a peri to my eyes,
Sent from Love's own sweet paradise
In my young heart to dwell.
Ay, curl that cherub lip in scorn,
And give to wit the rein,
And barb that tongue with sarcasm born
From thy proud heart's disdain,
In mockery of one who erst
Was ever foremost of the first
To guard thy maiden fame—
One who, with quick adventurous hand,
Had braved the proudest of the land,
That lightly named thy name.
And yet if thou canst borrow,
In beauty's mirthful pride,
Delight from friendship's sorrow,
Smile on, I will not chide:
Yet ah, methinks it were more kind,
More fraught with woman's feeling mind
To hide derision's fang,
From one who even now would dare
More than life's brittle thread could bear,
Ere thou shouldst feel a pang.
Farewell, may nought of sadness
Thy coming hours befall:
But thine to meet with gladness
And gentle looks from all—
And mine to wend my way alone,
Whether with thorns or roses strewn,
I care not—fate shall tell—
Soul-nerved with stoic pride to bear
Calmly the cold world's wintriest air,
And ev'n thine own—farewell.

I was suddenly roused from the reverie into which the perusal of the stanzas had thrown me, by a shriek which broke from near the centre of the apartment, and hurrying towards the spot, I beheld Alice, pale and insensible, in the arms of the gentleman with whom she had been dancing. One of the large chandeliers had broken from its fastenings by the jar of the cotillions, and the whole weight of the massy ornament had fallen obliquely upon the neck and shoulder of the beautiful girl. The external injury was scarcely perceptible, and after a little time she was so far recovered as to be enabled to ride home. An experienced surgeon was summoned, and when I called, a few days after, to learn the state of her health, her father informed me that her case had been pronounced hopeless! A large and deep-seated aneurism had made its appearance in such a situation that an operation was deemed impracticable. As I left the house, my promise to Frank occurred to me, and I took my way to his office. I found him in rather a melancholy mood, surrounded with books and anatomical drawings, and deeply engaged in study. After a little conversation on topics connected with past scenes, I asked him if he had seen his cousin since her late accident.

"No," he replied, "has anything of consequence befallen her?"

I gave him the particulars of her misfortune. At first he would not believe me, but when convinced that I was in earnest, he dropped his head upon his hand and remained silent for several minutes. At length he asked,

"Did you say that Dr. — despaired of her recovery?"

"So her father assured me."

"Then I will see her," resumed he, after a little pause. "I have had no inconsiderable experience in the treatment of such injuries."

He took from a drawer a case of instruments; and having satisfied himself that they were in perfect order, we set off together for Mr. Morton's.

We found the old gentleman walking the room in an agony of grief. As soon as he became a little calm, I introduced my companion as a young surgeon of eminence, whom I had taken the liberty to call in, thinking that possibly his experience might prove of some benefit to the sufferer.

"Thank you," returned Mr. Morton; "but I fear that all our efforts will end in disappointment."

"While there is life there is hope," observed Frank, encouragingly, as they entered the apartment of the invalid.

After a short absence they returned.

"And what think you, doctor?" whispered the old gentleman, as soon as he had closed the door.

"I think—nay, I know that she can be saved," was the firm reply.

"Saved! How?"

"By a painful and most perilous operation."

"And who will perform it," asked I, "since Dr. — has refused?"

"There is one," replied Werner, "who will attempt it, if his seniors lack courage."

At this moment the door opened, and Dr. —, the surgeon in attendance, entered.

"Ah, Dr. Werner, I am very glad to meet you—I have just driven round to your office to bring you here; but some one has anticipated me."

"He has seen her, Dr.," said the father, "and bids me take comfort in the prospect of her recovery."

"What!" exclaimed Dr. —, addressing Werner, "will you attempt to take up that artery, seated as it is in the very neighborhood of the heart?"

"With your approval and assistance, sir," was the reply.

The fact was, Werner had been the favorite pupil of Dr. —, who had formed so high an opinion of his professional abilities from the science and skill he had displayed on several occasions while yet a student, that he almost looked upon him as his superior, even at that period, and always consulted him in all dangerous emergencies.

"But," continued Dr. —, "how can you expect my approval in this case, when I remind you that the operation you have in view has never been attempted but once, and then by the first surgeon in Europe, in whose hands it completely failed. I stood by him at the time, and witnessed the painful reluctance with which he abandoned it, after a long-continued and most anxious effort."

"Sir," replied the young surgeon, respectfully, "I have twice successfully reduced a similar aneurism, and with your support can do it again."

"Then will I stand by you," said Dr. —, and retired to make the necessary preparations. Before he withdrew, however, Frank said to him,

"Be kind enough, doctor, not to mention my name to the patient, if you please: I have a special reason for the request: and, pray, throw a handkerchief over her face, for the countenance of a suffering female unmans me."

The arrangements were soon completed, and we were admitted to the apartment of the invalid. The patient had on a white undress, and was seated in a low easy-chair, with her head reclining on Dr. —'s shoulder. Her neck and the upper margin of her bosom were uncovered, exposing a large pulsating tumor which seemed on the very point of yielding to the vital current that circled beneath. Her father stood by, holding her hand, with a countenance in which hope, fear, and sorrow were most touchingly depicted. I glanced instinctively and with an absorbing feeling of apprehension towards the young surgeon, as he prepared himself for the fearful operation with a composure so marked, that it seemed to border on apathy. He was paler than usual, but then I could not detect the slightest quivering of a muscle—he was perfectly firm and self-collected. Every lineament of his face showed the mastery of mind over the strong passions which must be subjected during the performance of his dangerous task, and accordingly there was no more emotion to be detected in the bearing of that manly frame, than if it had been chiselled from the insensible marble. As he bent down, however, and with one stroke of the knife made a deep and free incision along that beautiful bust, which was followed by a convulsive tremor and a suppressed groan of the sufferer, I thought I heard him catch his breath for once, spasmodically; but no other sign of discomposure escaped him.

"Father, dear father," cried the poor girl, "clasp my hand closer—closer still—I can't feel you—so—so—that will do."

Tears stood in the old man's eyes, and he turned away his face from the scene. Even Dr. —, veteran as he was, respired with difficulty. But the adventurous operator kept steadily on, dexterously winding deeper and deeper amidst nerves, veins, and arteries, with a skill, on the perfect integrity of which depended the life of the lovely being in whose fate he was so warmly interested—his progress rendered doubly obscure by the effusion of blood, and doubly dangerous from the unnatural situation of the surrounding parts—until at length, by a masterly effort, he succeeded in securing the deep-laid and ruptured vessel. The dressings were soon adjusted, and leaving Dr. — and the father to replace the patient in bed, we retired to the drawing-room. Frank threw himself on the sofa, exhausted by the smothered and almost insupportable excitement of the scene through which he had just passed.

"Some air," said he, faintly; "I feel ill—very ill. There is a strange sense of dizziness in my head, and of suffocation here," he continued, laying his hand on his breast, "which almost overcomes me."

I threw up the window, and the cool air, with a glass of wine, partially restored him. Dr. — now entered, his benevolent countenance beaming with such an expression of admiration as a fond parent exhibits on the triumph of a favorite child.

"Well, well, my son," he exclaimed, "I will no longer be proud of my surgical abilities. Hitherto I have thought there was nothing practicable within the compass of my art which I could not perform; but you have taught me a new lesson, and I own my mistake."

I will not attempt to describe the mingled expressions of gratitude and respect with which the father greeted the savior of his child. He took him affectionately by the hand, he solicited the favor of his friendship, and amid thanks and benedictions, begged him to mention any sum—even to the extent of half his fortune—as a remuneration for the obligation he had conferred.

"The consciousness of having performed my duty, and secured the regard of such men as yourself and Dr. —," returned the young surgeon, "were an ample reward for my services. But of this we will speak at some future day. In the mean time, as I am obliged to leave town to-morrow, you will be kind enough to dispense with any further assistance on my part—the welfare of your daughter could not be entrusted to safer hands than those of Dr. —."

Before the expiration of a month, Alice was restored to perfect health. About this time, one afternoon, the servant brought in a note from Mr. Morton to Werner, requesting him to call at his house as early as he could make it convenient. He did so. The old gentleman met him with all the kindness of their last interview.

"I have sent for you, doctor, partly because I had a selfish wish to see you myself, and partly because my daughter desires to thank you personally for the continuance of that life for whose preservation, under Providence, she is indebted to yourself alone. Walk into the parlor, and she will be with you presently."

The door opened soon after, and Alice entered. Her cheeks had not yet recovered their usual color, yet never, perhaps, before had she appeared so beautiful as at that moment. During her convalescence she had been made acquainted with the danger from which she had just escaped, and the name of the injured individual whose skill had conducted her safely through that fearful crisis. There is no better moralist than sickness. The spirit of pride, mirth, and ambition are rebuked and exorcised from the bed-side of disease. This was the case with the poor girl during her recent illness. The fascinating illusions of the gay world, which had for years dazzled her too credulous imagination, had given place to the sober realities of the sick chamber. Removed from the excitement of that thoughtless world, she had an opportunity for reflection. Memory had been busy with the images the endearments of the past. The friends of her early orphanage—the kindnesses she had experienced at their hands—the vows and the visions of her first attachment, had all passed again and again before her mind, mingled with the consciousness of ingratitude and broken faith, and she now presented herself before her slighted lover, humiliated and self-condemned. Frank rose to receive her. The poor girl hid her face with her hands, while the tears gushed out from her jewelled fingers.

He led her to the sofa and seated himself beside her. After a momentary silence, he said,

"Spare me, cousin Alice, I entreat you. Though there have been times when I have prayed to see you shed such tears, yet now that those prayers are answered, I cannot see you weep."

"Ah, Werner, forbid not the sacrifice of sincere contrition—it is the fittest requital I can make for the wrongs you have suffered from my unkindness, and the one which remorse would wring from my heart, though it should struggle to resist the impulse of its better nature."

"There is no longer need of such a sacrifice. Fortune has already more than requited me for the trials of which you speak, by affording me the opportunity and the willing power to serve you when you had ceased to remember me."

"Ample has been your revenge," sighed the disconsolate girl. Yet, can you forgive me?"

"I can—I do," exclaimed Frank. "Your temptations to err were such as might have shaken a stronger mind. I was poor, friendless, unknown; you were rich, accomplished, and admired. Let us deem this a sufficient palliation for the neglect which perhaps I have merited."

He took her hand and pressed it to his lips—it was wet with the dew of repentant love.

"These tears," said he, tenderly, "shall be the lethe in which I will drown every unpleasant remembrance. Come, dear Alice, let us to your father. He professes to be greatly obliged to me. With your permission, I will teach him how he may cancel the obligation."

"I have told him all—your brotherly solicitude in my behalf—our plighted affection—together with my bitter ingratitude and estrangement—all this I have told him."

"And my answer was," said the old gentleman, who, having entered a moment previous, had caught the last few words of Alice, "my answer was, doctor, that though you have a perfect claim on her heart and hand, you have no right to remove her from her present home, and thereby leave me childless and solitary. I cannot live without her; and as you, doubtless, like all true lovers, are in the same unfortunate predicament, I see no other way than for you to consent—and the sooner the better—to become one of my own little family!"

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE HISTORY OF A MAN OF LIBERAL NOTIONS.

WRITTEN BY HIMSELF.

FROM the earliest of my recollection, I have always entertained liberal notions of men and things. I have such a thorough and hearty contempt for meanness of spirit, and for people of narrow ideas, that I can scarcely regard them with common patience. My father and mother, and my old scamp of a schoolmaster, endeavored to chain down my aspiring spirit, and to degrade my soul, by instilling into my youthful mind narrow and confined ideas; but I was incapable of receiving them, and I spurned them as a duck, when she shakes her feathers, scatters the water from her back. I do really think that common arithmetic has a tendency to fill the mind with mean and pettifogging notions. There is something so ridiculously contemptible in that silly accuracy of adding, subtracting, multiplying, and dividing, even to the niceness of a single farthing. I never in my life could make a sum in arithmetic precisely right; and what in the name of common sense can a trifling half dozen or so, one way or other, signify? That exceeding accuracy of calculation shows a narrow mind. My old fool of a schoolmaster told me, that if I did not do my sums right, I should never be able to keep a set of books. Contemptible fellow! Did he imagine that I was ever going to let myself down to the meanness and sordidness of book-keeping? Look at those fellows who keep books? What a mean, dull, clodpated race of mortals they are—no wit, no fire, no imagination, no spirit, no humor among them. Look at them lumbering up to the city by coach-loads every morning from Islington, Pentonville, Somers Town, Paddington, Chelsea, Highgate, Hampstead, Camberwell, Peckham, and from ten thousand other places; and then lumbering back again in the evening, so stupefied with book-keeping, that they can hardly tell the difference between beef and pudding. They spend their whole lives among figures, and so they never make a figure themselves. But if I was disgusted with common arithmetic, how much greater was my contempt of fractions—bits, pieces, odds and ends, cheese-parings, hair-splittings! People may well call them vulgar fractions. Why, if I was too liberal to care for ten or a dozen, one way or other, was I likely to care two straws for fractions—for halves, quarters, eighths, and sixteenths? Nonsense! I told the man so to his face. "Sir," said I, "give me leave to tell you, that I shall not chain myself down to your trumpery fractions; I have had plague enough to learn your common rules, and I will not stoop my aspiring spirit to calculate sums less than a farthing. Give me the generosity and nobleness of spirit that is above the meanness of calculation."

I believe the man was struck for a moment with the grandeur and sublimity of my ideas, for he looked upon me with emotion and astonishment, while a smile of admiration was playing upon his features; but presently, summoning up the whole schoolmaster within him, he replied: "All this is pretty talk—very pretty talk, indeed; but how am I to show my face to your father, if I neglect to teach you what you are sent here to learn? I am absolutely robbing your father."

"Well, sir," said I, "rob my father if you like, I am not so narrow-minded as to concern myself about that."

"The boy is mad," said the fellow. Ah, that is the way I have always found it through life. Whenever any individual at all superior to the common run of mortals dares to act and speak from the generous impulses of a noble nature, forthwith all the low-minded sordid sons of calculation exclaim, "He is mad!" Poor narrow-souled wretches! They have no notion of any thing that is free and generous; they are made to draw in harness—to follow a leader—never to act from the impulses of a towering spirit!

A few months after I had left school, my father said to me, "Bob," and I said, "Yes, sir." "It does not appear to me, Bob," said my father, "that you are much the better for school." "No, sir," replied I, "nor to me neither. I think it a great mercy that I am none the worse. That mean-spirited fellow was always endeavoring to instill into me his own narrow notions, and making such a ridiculous fuss if a sum was not right to a farthing! Oh, sir, I could not bear such beggarly notions. What is a farthing, more or less, to a gentleman, and a man of liberal ideas?"

My father shook his head, and said, "Now, my dear Bob, let me talk seriously to you." Then I shook my head in return, and said, "Now, my dear father, pray don't."

"But, my dear Bob," said my father, "how do you expect to get through the world, without a little prudence and consideration?" "Why, as to the matter of that, sir," replied I, "I may get through the world sooner without prudence than with." "But," said my father, "it becomes a matter of importance that you should now choose a profession." "On that point," I said, "I am perfectly indifferent; but whatever profession I adopt, I hope, and trust I shall carry into it the liberal ideas of a man of high spirit. 'What think you of the church?' 'The church! Why, there are some men of liberal notions in it, but yet they are under some kind of restraint, and it would not suit my liberal notions to undergo an examination by a bishop's chaplain: those fellows are sometimes apt to ask a variety of impertinent questions, which no man of liberal notions would care to answer. Then the style of dress—very bad—always black—no, sir, that would never do. Besides, sir, there are many pleasant amusements which a clergyman is debarred from, which no man of liberal notions would choose to surrender. No, sir, the church will not do.' 'The law?' 'As far as my observation has gone, I have fancied the law contracts the mind; besides, sir, law depends so much upon precedents and antiquated notions, and ridiculous out-of-the-way old fashioned acts of parliament, that ought to be buried out of sight and forgotten. Then, you know, there is no getting on at the bar without a great deal of labor and study, and poring over disgusting and wearisome books, which by no means meet the views of a man of liberal notions. Really, sir, with all due respect to you and my grandfather, I must take the liberty to say, that I have no such very high opinions of the wisdom of my ancestors. Old people, sir, are much addicted to entertain narrow views of things; and law has so much to do with antiquity and by-gone notions, that I must decline it as a profession.' 'Well, Bob, as you please; but you must do something—what think you of physic?' 'Don't like it, sir; can't bear the smell of drugs. Then to have a gilt Galen's head, or pebble and mortar, over one's door, a transparency in the shop-window, advice gratis to the poor—to be called out of one's bed, or away from one's dinner—especially if I was dining out, as gentlemen are very apt to do—or to be called out of church, and suddenly woke in the midst of a sermon. To be accountable for all the crotchets and caprices of jalap—bah! No, sir, physic will never do.' 'But, Bob, you positively must do something.' 'Must I, sir, I am sorry for it; that word must is very annoying.' 'What do you think of keeping a shop?' 'Can't think of it at all, sir; bowing behind the counter to whimsical customers, whom I am longing to kick—What's the next article?—Oh, no, no, no! shopkeeping will never do for me.'

So I could never make choice of a profession from that day to this. What a pity it is that the state does not make provision for gentlemen of liberal notions! so that they need not be under the galling and degrading necessity of stooping to some trumpery profession or peddling employment to avoid starvation. I am really quite disgusted when I look round upon my old school-fellows, and see some of them riding in carriages, and others established in lucrative professions, who were once not half so well off as myself. They are rich, to be sure, but they are not to be envied, for they have exceedingly contracted notions of things. Once they were hearty, generous, high-spirited fellows, singing loud songs, and drinking deep cups; but now they are as grave as judges, as sordid as Jews, and as starched as old maids. They turn their backs on their old friends, and all their souls are absorbed in making money. Sometimes, indeed, when I find my coat out at elbows, and my finances scarcely equal to a dinner at an "ordinary," I am tempted to wish that I had adopted some profession, and had given a little attention to the meanness of money-getting. But, however, I must not complain; I do now and then feel a little inconvenience for want of a dinner, and a little mortification for want of a clean cravat and a whole coat. Still I have retained my independence and my liberal notions of men and things. And what is life without liberality of sentiment? Oh, I despise the vulgar, every-day, common-place people, that pass you by shoals in public streets, elbowing their way along, and looking so greedily and avariciously, as if they were born merely to gather together sordid pelf and filthy lucre. They despise my threadbare coat and greasy hat, they look contemptibly on my old brown-black trowsers, and think foul scorn of my gaping shoes; but they do not see my mind—they know nothing of the towering genius that dwells within. They do not know that the man whom they despise is a man who despises them. I have often thought of illuminating the world on the subject of things in general, and of giving them new views of religion, politics, and society; but those mean and sordid booksellers, one and all, set their faces against every thing that is liberal. They talk about the march of intellect, but they do not care a fig for intellect. They merely print and publish for what they can get. They have no sympathy with the towering aspirations of mind. I had a most excellent design for a work, that should convince all mankind that they were a pack of fools, and that should produce such a glorious change in the constitution of society, that talent and liberality should reign triumphant; I communicated my design to a publisher, and what was his answer? Blush, Britain, blush for the meanness of thy intellectual tradesmen! "I don't think it will sell," said the fellow. "Why, then," said I, "give it away." The man stared at me, and said, "What shall I get by that?" There, gentle reader, there is a specimen of the sordidness of booksellers. "What shall I do?" When I see such narrowness of soul, and such degradation of mind, my heart bleeds for humanity, and I almost blush to call such wretches my fellow-creatures. I must confess that this interview had such an effect upon my nerves—I do not know what my nerves are, but I know that they were shocked—it had such an effect, I say, that for a long while I could not apply to another publisher; but at length I did, and to another, and another. They were all in the same story, just as if they had conspired together to thwart my views for the welfare of the human race. I will not mention names, for I do not wish to hold them up to the contempt and derision of mankind. I am sorry to say that their meanness has compelled me to have recourse to a mode of instructing the public which I should not have adopted by choice, but to which I am driven by necessity—I allude to inscriptions on walls and stable-doors, by means of a simple instrument, called a piece of chalk. But the worst of this mode of public instruction is, that there is not room enough for an elaborate argument, or even a well-turned period. One is compelled to confine oneself to a certain sententious brevity, which convinces none but those who were convinced before. When I write on a stable-door, "Hang the Bishops," nobody hangs them on my recommendation. By the way, I cannot help remarking here on the illiberality of a torified stable-boy, who, reading one of my inscriptions, found fault with the spelling. Fool! I have forgot more spelling than he ever learnt. How exceedingly captious and illiberal is it, when no other fault is to be found with a literary production, to find fault with the spelling. Besides, what man that loves his country would not for its salvation tolerate a little bad spelling? It would be a rare thing for the country, if the books which are swarming every day from the press contained nothing more objectionable than a little bad spelling.

Now it is very mortifying to a man who is capable of governing an empire, not to have sixpence in his pocket, and to have no opportunity of convincing the world how much he is their superior. I have conversed with men of all sentiments, but I have found in them all a certain narrowness of mind, and limitation of idea.—There have been few, very few, that have come quite up to my notion of liberality. Some people are liberal in one thing, and some in another, but none, except myself, have I yet met with, perfectly liberal in every point of view, and upon every topic of human interest. I have endeavored, and I think successfully, to keep my mind free from all narrow prejudices, and it is often a consolation to me, when my clothes want mending, that I have no prejudices. No, I scorn them—I don't mean clothes, but prejudices. The man that is prejudiced, is blind to beauty and deaf to truth. I am guided only and always by pure reason. There is not, I will venture to say, one person in a thousand, who is in all his actions and sentiments guided by pure reason. People are slaves to prejudices, confined and limited in their views. Indeed, how can people take liberal views, who do not take comprehensive views of things? Men of business are confined to their shops or counting-houses, men in the law are like horses in the mill, moving in a dull round of precedents, medical men see none but the sick and the sad, the hypochondriac and the diseased, and what should they know of the world? As for parsons, all the world knows that they must be fools and idiots by virtue of their office; they absolutely know nothing, ten times less than nothing; they walk through the streets blindfold, they go to Cambridge and Oxford expressly for the purpose of learning ignorance; all that they know is, which side their bread is buttered on, and all that they desire is to have it buttered on both sides. As for statesmen, ministers, members of parliament, commons, and lords, they all have their prejudices, they are confined to narrow views of things—they do not know the world, they do not see it, they have no time to look at it, they have no time to attend to it. They must take things merely by report and at second hand. There is, in a word, no man who can thoroughly understand human life and human nature so well as a man of liberal notions, altogether without prejudices, who has nothing else to do than to walk about the streets from morning to night. LETTER FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

We have received a few lines from a hand equally well known to us and the public, and from whom we should be pleased to hear more frequently. We must be permitted to add, however, that the last verse, although it sounds pretty enough to the poet, is heresy to the father.—EDS. N. Y. MIR.

DEAR —. Do you recollect meeting me on the first day of the election in Broadway? It came near being our last interview. I took to my bed a few hours afterwards, and have been dangerously ill ever since. Being convalescent now, I send you a few lines as a consolation for your disappointment in "anecdotes of the late —!"

I would a little child I were,
And ever might be so;
That guilt of youth, or manhood's care,
My mind should never know:
Nor I in wintry age should bare,
And bow a head of snow—
I would a little child I were,
And ever might be so.

I often wish that I had died
In childhood, pure and blest;
I often think if death should glide,
And sever from my breast
A child, although my joy and pride,
And bear it to its rest,
I should not sorrow that it died
In childhood, pure and blest.

A number of communications from our obliging correspondents are unavoidably postponed.

LETTERS FROM PARIS.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF EUROPE.

NUMBER SIX.

Taglioni—French stage, etc.

I WENT last night to the French opera, to see the first dancer of the world. The prodigious enthusiasm about her all over Europe had, of course, raised my expectations to the highest possible pitch. "Have you seen Taglioni?" is the first question addressed to a stranger in Paris; and you hear her name constantly over all the hum of the cafés, and in the crowded resorts of fashion. The house was overflowed. The king and his numerous family were present; and my companion pointed out to me many of the nobility, whose names and titles have been made familiar to our ears by the innumerable private memoirs and autobiographies of the day. After a little introductory piece, the king arrived, and, as soon as the cheering was over, the curtain drew up for "Le Dieu et le Bayadère." This is the piece in which Taglioni is most famous. She takes the part of a dancing girl, of whom the Bramah and an Indian prince are both enamored; the former in the disguise of a man of low rank at the court of the latter, in search of some one whose love for him shall be disinterested. The disguised god succeeds in winning her affection, and after testing her devotion by submitting for a while to the resentment of his rival, and by a pretended caprice in favor of a singing girl, who accompanies her, he marries her, and then saves her from the flames as she is about to be burned for marrying beneath her caste. Taglioni's part is all pantomime. She does not speak during the play, but her motion is more than articulate. Her first appearance was in a troop of Indian dancing girls, who perform before the prince in the public square. At a signal from the vizier a side pavilion opened, and thirty or forty bayaderes, glided out together, and commenced an intricate dance. They were received with a tremendous round of applause from the audience; but, with the exception of a little more elegance in the four who led the dance, they were dressed nearly alike; and, as I saw no particularly conspicuous figure, I presumed that Taglioni had not yet appeared. The splendor of the spectacle bewildered me for the first moment or two, but I presently found my eyes riveted to a childish creature floating about among the rest, and, taking her for some beautiful young élève making her first essays in the chorus, I interpreted her extraordinary fascination as a triumph of nature over my unsophisticated taste; and wondered to myself whether, after all, I should be half so much captivated with the show of skill I expected presently to witness. This was Taglioni! She came forward directly, in a pas seul, and I then observed that her dress was distinguished from that of her companions by its extreme modesty both of fashion and ornament, and the unconstrained ease with which it adapted itself to her shape and motion. She looks not more than fifteen. Her figure is small, but rounded to the very last degree of perfection; not a muscle swelled beyond the exquisite outline; not an angle, not a fault. Her back and neck, those points so rarely beautiful in women, are faultlessly formed; her feet and hands are in full proportion to her size, and the former play as freely and with as natural a yieldingness in her fairy slippers, as if they were accustomed only to the dainty uses of a drawing-room. Her face is most strangely interesting; not quite beautiful, but of that half-appealing, half-retiring sweetness that you sometimes see blended with the secluded reserve and unconscious refinement of a young girl just "out" in a circle of high fashion. In her greatest exertions her features retain the same timid half-smile, and she returns to the alternate by-play of her part without the slightest change of color, or the slightest perceptible difference in her breathing, or the ease of her look and posture. No language can describe her motion. She swims in your eye like a curl of smoke, or a flake of down. Her difficulty seems to be to keep to the floor. You have that feeling while you gaze upon her, that if she were to rise and float away like Ariel, you would scarce be surprised. And yet all is done with such a childish unconsciousness of admiration, such a total absence of exertion or fatigue, that the delight with which she fills you is unmingled, and, assured as you are by the perfect purity of every look and attitude, that her hitherto spotless reputation is deserved beyond a breath of suspicion, you leave her with as much respect as admiration; and find with surprise that a dancing-girl, who is exposed night after night to the profaning gaze of the world, has crept into one of the most sacred niches of your memory.

I have attended several of the best theatres in Paris, and find one striking trait in all their first actors—nature. They do not look like actors, and their playing is not like acting. They are men, generally, of the most earnest, unstudied simplicity of countenance; and when they come upon the stage it is singularly without affectation, and as the character they represent would appear. Unlike most of the actors I have seen, too, they seem altogether unaware of the presence of the audience. Nothing disturbs the fixed attention they give to each other in the dialogue, and no private interview between simple and sincere men could be more unconscious and natural. I have formed consequently a high opinion of the French drama, degenerate as it is said to be since the loss of Talma; and it is easy to see that the root of its excellence is in the taste and judgment of the people. They applaud judiciously. When Taglioni danced her wonderful pas seul, for instance, the applause was general and sufficient. It was a triumph of art, and she was applauded as an artist. But when, as the neglected bayadere, she stole from the corner of the cottage, and with her indescribable grace, hovered about the couch of the disguised Bramah, watching and fanning him while he slept, she expressed so powerfully by the saddened tenderness of her manner, the devotion of a love that even neglect could not estrange, that a murmur of delight ran through the whole house; and when her silent pantomime was interrupted by the waking of the god, there was an overwhelming tumult of acclamation that came from the hearts of the audience, and as such, must have been both a lesson and the highest compliment to Taglioni. An actor's taste is of course very much regulated by that of his audience. He will cultivate that for which he is most praised. We shall never have a high-toned drama in America, while, as at present, applause is won only by physical exertion, and the nice touches of genius and nature pass undetected and unfelt.

Of the French actresses I have been most pleased with Leontine Fay. She is not much talked of here, and perhaps, as a mere artist in her profession, is inferior to those who are more popular; but she has that indescribable something in her face that has interested me through life—that strange talisman which is linked wisely to every heart, confining its interest to some nice difference invisible to other eyes, and, by a happy consequence, undisputed by other admiration. She, too, has that retired sweetness of look that seems to come only from secluded habits, and in the highly-wrought passages of tragedy, when her fine dark eyes are filled with tears, and her tones, which have never the out-of-doors key of the stage, are clouded and imperfect, she seems less an actress than a refined and lovely woman, breaking through the habitual reserve of society in some agonizing crisis of real life. There are prints of Leontine Fay in the shops, and I have seen them in America, but they resemble her very little.

LETTERS FROM WASHINGTON.

Intercepted for the New-York Mirror.

The Capitol—Rotunda—Senate, etc.

The capitol is one of the most puzzling buildings in the world; I should know it now, and yet I scarcely ever fail to lose myself in it. This is not owing to its size, but to the manner in which it is constructed; I have very soon comprehended the plan of much larger buildings.

I passed some hours this morning in the Rotunda, looking at the paintings and pieces of sculpture with which the walls are adorned. It has a strange effect—the hollow reverberation by which, in a large room, every sound is followed. This, in the Rotunda, from its height, size, and shape, is very striking. There is a constant moaning; the noise of opening and shutting doors, the human voice, every footstep, is swallowed up in one deep inarticulate sound, that seems to proceed from the place itself. The solitude is disturbed, but not removed; you feel not alone, but lonely.

On the panels of the walls are four pieces of sculpture, representing respectively the preservation of Captain Smith by Pocahontas, the Landing of the Pilgrims, a conflict between the celebrated Daniel Boone and two Indians, and Penn's treaty with the Indians. The first of these is by Capellano, the last by Gévelot, and the other two by Causici.

Sculpture and statuary, I confess, have always seemed to me very inferior arts; nor can I conceive of their producing by their intrinsic power, a very strong effect. That artists, or persons familiar with these arts, and who know the difficulties to be struggled with, may be affected with enthusiasm in contemplating their masterpieces, I can readily imagine; but it is not rather the triumph of genius that they admire? Art is more successful when we forget the artist. I mean at first, while its effect is fresh. I can well remember when I was a boy, and read for the first time that impetuous boast of Nisus, "Me, me: adsum qui feci: in me convertite ferrum;" it brought tears to my eyes. I had been flogged not an hour before, and had been most unwillingly plying my task ever since, yet when I came to this line, even then the poet triumphed, and I wept. Certainly I little then thought of Virgil; it was the vivid picture of the enthusiasm of friendship; it was Nisus rushing on the Rutulian swords. So in a painting where, for instance, strong emotion is depicted in the human countenance, is not our first feeling and our first expression, "what speechless tenderness in that look!" "what agony in that face!" Afterwards we think of the painter; afterwards we admire the art; but not at first. Or if we do, if our first feeling is, "what a pathetic passage!" "what a noble painting!" then the poet or the painter has failed. I ask no better test; genius may have been displayed, but it has not been completely successful.

But is it so with sculpture and statuary? Is it not always there "what genius!" "what consummate skill!" "how wonderful!" Is there not always a feeling of astonishment that with the chisel, out of block or marble, such wonders should be wrought? Is not our first feeling one of admiration? and do we ever for a moment forget the art or the artist?

I don't know, people talk to me of the Apollo, of the Venus—I have seen them, I have admired them; though not with the raptures that some profess, yet I have admired, I have wondered at them; but still there is something in the dull heavy marble, that I can't get over:

"Thy blood is cold,
Thou hast no speculation in those eyes."

It is not life; when I admire most, I feel it is not life.

But I "know nothing of these arts, and therefore am not a judge." I never put two rhymes together, yet I can feel poetry. I cannot draw the vilest caricature of the human face; I know nothing of the rules of the art, but I can admire painting. If those only can appreciate sculpture or statuary who practically or theoretically are versed in these arts, that is a decided proof of their inferiority.

Why are such persons better judges? Because they can better understand the difficulties that have been overcome. They may not analyze their feelings well; but this must be the source of that higher degree of admiration, of that enthusiasm of which they are sensible.

I think these inferior arts, but I do not therefore condemn them. I condemn no exercise of skill or talent; circumstances, too, may sometimes give them an advantage. Paintings cannot bear exposure, and cannot be seen advantageously at a great height or distance. What other peculiar advantage, besides its cheapness, sculpture possesses, does not occur to me; unless, perhaps, in the grotesque. Carvings of fabulous or imaginary creatures, of dragons, dwarfs, giants, magicians, and sea-serpents, viewed by a dim light in old halls or galleries, might have a powerful effect upon the imagination, particularly of children.

However all this may be, it is at least clear to me, that nothing can be more futile than to attempt to represent by sculpture scenes in nature. It is impossible as in painting to compress within a small space rivers and mountains, so as to give a just idea of their vastness, and at the same time to introduce buildings and figures, which shall seem of no more than a proper relative size. Things appear no larger or smaller or farther or nearer than they actually are. If an artist should wish to give an adequate idea of a forest he must go to work, and carve just so many trees, and make them just so high as would be necessary to constitute an actual forest. This, however, not being quite convenient, we are presented with forests which contain two or three trees, which trees are just a little higher than a man's head. Such is the wilderness in which (in one of the pieces of sculpture I have mentioned) the intrepid Boon despatches the two Indians.

But the boldest attempt and the most ludicrous failure—a failure not of the artist but of the art—is in the "Landing of the Pilgrims."—The landing of the pilgrims! You look for the pathless ocean, the trackless forests, the gallant vessel, the pilgrims themselves, wearied but resolute, determined to be free; the wondering natives crowding the shore—for these you look, and what have you? A canoe in a mill-pond, with a man, a woman, and a child, and one Indian sitting on a stone!

The Rotunda likewise contains, as I suppose you know, Trumbull's celebrated historical pictures: the Declaration of Independence, the Surrender of General Burgoyne, the Surrender of Lord Cornwallis, and the Resignation of General Washington.

The first and last of these represent scenes, for moral sublimity, not surpassed in the annals of the world.

Of the Declaration of Independence so much has been said, so much of praise and so much of blame, that I might perhaps spare myself the trouble of adding any thing of either. It was called, you know, by John Randolph the "shin piece," from the undue share of attention supposed to have been bestowed by the artist upon the "shins" of the celebrated personages whom it represents. This is certainly rather an eye-sore; you do see too many shins; but I do not well perceive how it could have been avoided in representing such a number of persons generally in a sitting posture. Indeed it seemed to me, looking with special reference to that matter, that there had been rather an exertion of ingenuity to conceal, than a desire too conspicuously to bring forward, those important but not very graceful or expressive functionaries of the body.

The objection generally urged against this painting is that the countenances are too sedate and deliberative, too much in repose; that there is a want of energy, passion, animation; so much so, that instead of the high resolve that had been fixed upon, we might suppose, for aught that appears, the most ordinary business to be under discussion. It is even objected, that the artist has unnecessarily trammelled himself by attempting to preserve the likenesses of the distinguished actors; that this minute attention to particulars is incompatible with the attainment of any high degree of excellence; that he should have given reins to his fancy, and have shown us rather what such a scene ought to have been, than what perhaps it actually was.

That by a total disregard to dress, localities, appearance, or, in other words, by a sacrifice of historical truth, Colonel Trumbull might have produced what is commonly called a finer painting; a painting which, independent of association, might have had a stronger effect upon the passions or emotions of the spectators, may perhaps be admitted. But this is not just criticism. If I draw the ocean smiling and serene, is my design faulty because it would have been more sublime in a storm? The true questions are whether or not the design which the artist really had is noble and praise-worthy, and if so, whether he has successfully executed it.

For myself, this is one of those things in which I regard truth as of paramount importance. I would have nothing factitious, nothing for effect; above all, I would preserve, with religious veneration, the persons, dress, and faces of the men. They are represented quiet, calm, and serious; so probably, in point of fact, they were. It is an American scene. There is a sobriety, a simplicity in the American character, which accords well with our government and institutions; we do great things in an ordinary way. Here is the honest face of Sherman, the philosophic Franklin, the unbending Adams; such they were, so they looked. There is more eagerness and animation expressed in the face and attitude of Jefferson than of the others. He was a younger man, and had more ardor of character; moreover, his was the chief part in that scene; he drew the sacred deed, whose price was blood, but whose purchase was freedom. In this the artist has shown skill without violating truth. But if these ever had been represented standing on tip-toes, and gesticulating like Frenchmen, or with a wild Jocelian stare in their faces, I should have turned away with disgust.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 2.—So, Tom, you infer from my last letter that I am suffering from great depression of spirits, and prescribe matrimony! That is so like you! I never knew a married man who did not recommend matrimony as a sovereign cure for all complaints—except now and then, when I have got an honest fellow a little mellow; and then he has let out! You say I would suffer no more from "imaginary evils." I believe it. I would never again be visited by "blue devils." Very likely; but I might be visited in their stead by real flesh and blood devils; squalling, red-faced, pap-eating little devils; whom, if they did not come quite so often, it might be rather more difficult to get rid of. No, Tom, I am marked for an old bachelor; I have all the badges—the thriftless, wandering habits, the love of ease, the nervousness, and notions, and near-sightedness, together with a certain independence of speech and action, commonly called eccentricity. I like a quiet game of chess; I have no objection to a bottle of wine; I smoke; I sit up late; and I have a ghost's aversion to the morning air. I can't rock a cradle; I can't dance a baby; I can't give "my dear," the true matrimonial whine; and I detest tea, scandal, caudle, doctors, parsons, kisses, and children. Then if I did not love my wife, I should be wretched; and if I did love her, ten to one that I should be more wretched still. So you see, Tom, it won't do; I am one of that sort of men whom women detest (they have a wonderful instinct at finding us out); and though I have the highest respect and admiration for them, (sweet creatures!) yet—it won't do—it won't do.

Well, Mr. Clay commenced his great speech to-day—his reply to Mr. Hayne. I went late, and found every entrance filled: it was impossible to get within six feet of either gallery. But I never yet saw a crowd that could not be penetrated: I persevered, and I succeeded.

There is philosophy to be gleaned from this—you know I am a philosopher: really, though, if there is any thing upon which I pride myself—but I have told you so fifty times—it is now my turn for moralizing, (I wish I ever made any use of it.) However, as I said, some philosophy may be learned from looking on a crowd of this kind, and watching people as they push and struggle for better places.

At first, as in life, every avenue seems closed, every spot pre-occupied. The timid retire in despair; the bold push forward, elbow their way at all hazards; the patient wait their time and chance; the impudent pretender makes his way fastest, but he is liable to rebuffs; the patient, modest, persevering man, in the long run, seldom fails—there is a disposition to aid him on his way, and if he gets a good place, no one is inclined to question his claim to it, or to envy him his good fortune.

But to return to Mr. Clay. When the senate adjourned, he remarked that he was just about to enter on his argument. He had been speaking more than two hours. 'Till he has finished his speech I shall say nothing of the impression it has made upon me. He was in a witty humor to-day, and made, as the audience seemed to think, several palpable hits. A by-blow at Isaac Hill, and an allusion, with peculiar emphasis, to the advocates of a "judicious tariff," seemed particularly well relished. In speaking of the tariff of 1823, he remarked that it was well known that its opponents had endeavored to prevent its final passage by amending it, during its progress, in such a manner as to make it as objectionable as possible to its friends; and he said he had heard, he did not vouch for it, that that plan had been devised by a distinguished gentleman now abroad. Now abroad! Mr. Clay did not so emphasize the words; but I suppose it was a preception of the peculiar appropriateness of the tense used, taken in connection with certain recent events, which occasioned the general smile I observed upon the faces of his audience. A compliment to Irishmen, and to "ould Ireland," not the less generous if, as I have heard, every Irishman in the Union is a "Jackson man," was received with a hum of applause, and some slight demonstrations of more noisy admiration, which were instantly checked by the vice-president's threatening to clear the galleries. Mr. Clay said that of all foreigners to whom our shores gave a hearty welcome and a safe asylum, there was no one who so easily and naturally amalgamated with us, who seemed so much to feel himself at home, as the Irishman. Indeed, he had sometimes fancied that Ireland originally must have been one of the United States, and that in some great shock of nature it had been dislodged, and had floated over the ocean, until at length, most unfortunately, it had settled down in the vicinity of Great Britain. But above all, he said, the Irishman resembled the Kentuckian: there was the same reckless ardor and generosity of disposition; the same ready hospitality; the same frankness of speech that endeared to him the state of his adoption and of his best affections. It was not for him to add, the same versatility of talent and copiousness of eloquence.

SATURDAY.—This has been a true Washington day. It opened beautifully. At eleven o'clock I sat on the piazza with an uncut "Robert of Paris" in my hands, drinking the soft southern breeze, and watching the lazy clouds as they turned over and basked themselves in the sun. At one it rained; about two, sunshine again; and now, at half past four, there is another rain, accompanied by rather a chilly wind.

Mr. Clay continued his speech yesterday until nearly three o'clock, when, upon motion of Mr. Webster, the senate adjourned to meet again on Monday—upon that day I presume he will conclude.

I would not write to you last night, because I wished time to make up my own mind. What I thought of Mr. Clay, I hardly yet know, but—shall I confess it?—while every one is full of his praises, I am a little disappointed. I do not think Mr. Clay a very close reasoner; in this respect he is greatly inferior to Mr. Webster: but what has surprised me more, is that I have perceived at times, if I am not mistaken, a want, not of words, but of the best words—a poverty of language; he has copia verborum, but not curiosa felicitas in their choice, which is the distinguishing mark of genius. Is it possible, as some tell me, that this speech is equal to Mr. Clay's happiest efforts? May he not have grown a little rusty?—I half think so.

The most admired part of Mr. Clay's speech, yesterday, was his attack upon General Smith, of Maryland, and through him upon the administration for what has been termed "the proscriptive policy." In allusion to a remark of General Smith, that the friends of the "American system" were the majority; and that it became them to use the power which they unquestionably possessed with moderation and with mercy: he reminded that gentleman, that he too was a member of another majority—the majority in whose hands was now placed the administration of this government.—With very ill grace, he said, did an appeal of this kind come from any one of that majority, of which the gentleman was so conspicuous a member. What mercy, he asked, or what moderation had that majority shown? He gave a rapid sketch of the scene that the city of Washington presented in the month of March, 1829, crowded with hungry politicians from the east and the west, and the north and the south. Shadowy forms were seen by twilight, stealing into the president's house; and, in the broad day, the squares and the corners were filled with clamorous beggars, bawling for "treasury pap." He then drew a picture of the domestic misery that had followed the proscription; the mother, and the children, and the father suffering not the less, because his pride would not suffer him to show it, "despising their pity, and defying their power."

Mr. Clay's greatest power is in these attacks. It is impossible to give an idea of them—there is something tremendous, but so much is manner. It is curious to watch a man thus marked out for contempt or indignation of a large audience. General Smith sat pretty still at first, but after a little time he grew fidgety, and finally, turning round and spitting, with an attempt at indifference, he remarked, loud enough to be heard where I was standing, (I was just behind him, in the lobby) that "it was all declamation." Very unpleasant declamation it was to General Smith!

But Mr. Clay—his age, standing, and situation, at this time considered—is too fond of personalities. Why does he stoop to such small prey? He should disdain to fix his talons in Isaac Hill: he might push aside the "imbecile telum" of a General Smith, but let him reserve his own javelin for a more powerful foe.

Remember me to all inquiring friends—it will not give you much trouble. V.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

I WAS not a little amused, Messrs. Editors, one day last summer in the country, with the reflections and narrative of an old man, who, to a very colloquial disposition adds a good deal of benevolence, shrewdness, and humor. His similes (to use an expression of his own, respecting one of his neighbors) "slip off his tongue as easily as butter from hot glass." I happened once to be in his little farmhouse when he was giving his son an account of his past life. Attracted by the peculiarity of his phraseology, I was induced to listen, and, when I went home, to set down as much as I could recollect of his recital, it afforded me a good deal of merriment, and perhaps may amuse your readers. So here it is.

OLD ROBIN BIRD'S STORY.

"Harry, you are fast comin on to the stage, and must soon have a finger in the pie which the noisy, busy multitude is mixin. The old man, you know, is pretty proud of you, as well he may be, but don't take that for flattery, for truth is never flattery. You know, too, that besides havin the best farm in town, which measures most round into the bargain, there's the factory where he rolls the hard dollars like shot runnin through a tunnel, pretty fast and plagy thick. And you know you are the only child he has to pick 'em up, which you can do without burnin your fingers, for he's as clear of debt as a woman's chin is of a beard—but I needn't say any thing more about these things, for I guess you can see as fur into a mill-stun as any body that don't wear spectacles—if you can't, my old eyes have been lookin through a beam instead of a mote, and people lie worse than they used to. Now, Harry, just profit a little by the experience of one who has received more hard thumps from this villain world, and play'd old Nick more honest tricks than most of his neighbors, and Lord knows a clear conscience and a log hut here will bring a good house and a large farm in heaven. I was once young too, Harry, and had a heart as gay as a peacock's tail, and as light as the thistle's down, notwithstanding my old father (God bless him) wasn't much better off for worldly goods than a young goslin for feathers. But my arms were then as strong, and my nerves as stiff as a new cart, and my heart, gay and light as it was, was as honest as the catechism of my old mother (God bless her too) could make it. And I knew, Harry, that the world ow'd me a livin at some rate or other, until the tax-gatherer of humanity should call and make me a member of that assembly where the rich and poor, the high and low, friends and enemies dwell together as quietly and as peaceably as young kittens in a basket of tow. And so I set about gittin my bread as the Lord intended man should git it, that is, by the sweat of his brow. I went to work for old square Baker and deakun Bunce, who, thank the Lord that cast my lot in this village, are as honest men as it can boast, and pay them that do 'em a favor as prompt as the sun rises every mornin. And so I slid along an honest life as nice as a boy slidin down hill, till I got to be three and twenty years old, and then I began to slide nicer than ever, because I did what every honest man and good citizen ought to do, that is, I got a wife. And this is why I got one. One Sunday night when I liv'd with square Baker, after doin up my chores, I went into the kitchen, and after makin up a rousin fire, as I was won't to do every night, I sot down in the corner, and 'fore I thot on't I got lookin at the coals and thinkin about matters and things in general, and finally I got thinkin about myself and what prospect there was for my gittin along further in the world. I thought how other people got along that had families, and how much comfort they seem'd to take, and how happy they seem'd to be when they had their little progeny growin up around 'em, and how glad they seem'd to be to take care of 'em, and thought all their trouble well paid for by the love and caresses of the little chubby darlins. I knew I was then goin on very smoothly, had no more trouble on my heels than I could shake of at my leisure, always had a clean shirt for Sunday, and a shillin far trainin day, and now and then a spare sixpence for the needy. But thinks I to myself, by and by I shall be growin old, and then my arms won't be so strong—and the hot summer's sun and the cold winter's air will be more an' a match for me, and I can't work so well for people as I now do, and "no song no supper," the sayin is, and if I didn't do so much work, people wouldn't pay me so much, and I couldn't bear the idea of livin on people's sympathy, for I was somethin proud in them days, and would rather a man would hate than pity me. And I thought when I was old, people wouldn't want me sittin round their fires, and eatin their apples, and drinkin their cider, and they'd wish the 'old man,' as they'd call me, had a house of his own to live in, and not trouble them. No, no, Harry, it was like the mush-rat's livin in his neighbor, the wood-chuck's hole, and clearin it out durin the day to have the privilege of sleepin in it over night—or like the king-bird, who, without building a nest for himself, flies round all summer ketchin flies and worms, and then when autumn comes, goes and takes possession of the robin's nest, when he knows he aint wanted there. I thought that the robin hated the king-bird, and that when winter come the wood-chuck would pull a stun afore his hole when the mush-rat was out, and so give him a hard hint (the old man was not aware of making a pun) that his room during the winter would be better than his company. I knew the square had nearly three hundred dollars of my wages in his hand, and that if I was to settle with him then, he'd owe me a hundred more. So, takin all things into consideration, I didn't see any other way than to get married, and to get a place to put my wife, and then old Robin would have a nest of his own, and perhaps some of these years he would have some little birds to gladden his old heart and bless his old eyes. So I began to look about for a mate.

Now Polly Bates lived with deakun Bunce, and all the neighbors said she was one of the nicest gals in the country. I'd seen Polly at meetin every Sunday as regularly as the Sunday come, and always thought she was a good modest gal, and would make no bad helpmate either for any body that could get her, although she was two or three years younger than I, and her eyes were as bright as a new brass kettle, and her love was pure and watchful as the stars, and her heart as sympathizin as the waters, and tender as the young lamb; her hair was black as a crow, and her cheeks and lips were as red as a summer mornin's sky, and her teeth as white and as regular set as a row of white pint bowls on a cupboard-shelf. But, thinks I, who knows but Polly may take a notion for me; anyhow no end was ever lost or won that was not first tried for; and if she tells me no, why then it will be all over with, and I can go to lookin up somebody else that'll suit me as well as Polly, and who will tell me yes. So the next Sunday night I greas'd my new cow-hide boots nice, put on a bran new shirt, and my new brown hum-made clothes, and my best hat, and then got on to old Bob, and started off to see Polly. Well, I went in to the deacon's and found 'em all sittin round the fire, and I guess Polly and I must a look'd queer enough, for the very minit that she see me come in dress'd up so nice, it seem'd as tho' there was a kind of sympathizin feeling that run thro' her mind, that told her what I'd come for, for she color'd up as deep as a mill-pond; but I put on as good honest a face as I could, and began to talk to the deakun after takin a chair, about the sermon, his congregation, and his farm, as tho' I'd come to see him and not Polly. But the old deakun had been a member of the church too long not to know what was what; so he made some excuse for goin into the other room with his wife, and left Polly and I alone in the kitchen—and then, I guess, we felt and look'd queerer than ever. Howsomer, I'd heerd the square's daughter say, that a faint heart never won pretty Polly; and so I muster'd up all my courage, and finally, after Polly had got a basin of apples and a mug of cider, and we had eat two a piece, and drank up most all the cider, we begun to git a little over it, and had quite a social chat, so that I staid till nearly ten o'clock, when I took another drink of cider, bid Polly good night, and started for hum; but, going to the hos-post, I found old Bob, who wan't used to keepin such late hours, had broken his bridle, and left me to plod hum two miles through the snow on foot. Howsomer, this didn't cool my love any, for there was a thousand fancical ideas of comfort flyin thro' my brains, and I walk'd so fast and so heedlessly, that I went half-a-mile past hum afore I found out I'd got there. Such tricks love will play us, Harry; but, as you always go in the carriage, you never need be afraid of your driver's going a step further than he's obliged to. Well, I went to see Polly a few times, and thinkin she lik'd me pretty well, I made up my mind to ask her to marry me. So I went up to the deakun's agin the next Saturday night, determin'd to have my lot cast. Polly look'd as plump and bloomin as a hill cover'd with daisies, and when I set down in the corner opposite to her, I never felt so odd in my life. This love-feelin', Harry, makes such fools of us that we can't hardly tell a crow-bar from a meeting-house steeple, and we are no more fit for business when we are in love than a duck is for a dancin'-master. My heart was full as a brook in the spring, and I thot every minit it would melt or break. Howsomever, I brought on the subject as well as I could, but I felt sort of odd at being so fur off from Polly, so I draw'd my chair close to hers, and kept tryin' to ask her the question, but findin' that the longer I waited the worse I grew, I ventur'd to take hold of Polly's hand; and oh! the touch of it! it thrill'd thro' every vein in my body, like a clap of thunder thro' a brush-heap. Then seein' the ice broke, I ask'd her plumply if she'd have me? She blush'd red as a trainer's feather, trembled like a lamb in a thorn hedge, and finally she said, "yes." My suspense was then all over; my heart leap'd into my mouth like a frog into a puddle, and I could a chaw'd it up for joy! The next Sunday the parson publish'd us, and the next thing was to git married. They were goin' to have an apple-bee at one of the neighbors the next Wednesday night, so after doin' up my chores the square went with me up to the deakun's, and Polly went to put on her best calico frock to have the ceremony perform'd, and while she was out, some of her young friends, who didn't know that she was goin' to be married, (so shy had she kept it,) stop'd in to have her go to the apple-bee. She told 'em to wait until the square had married us, and then we'd all go together. So the square tied the knot for us, and then we all started off for the apple-bee, in high glee. With the wages which I then had, and them that Polly and I afterwards earn'd, we bought from the square the little house and farm and saw-mill where we now live, and have lived ever since we was married, taking as much comfort as a cucumber which has nothin' to do but lay in the garden and grow. Next to God, who gives us all good things, we love each other best, and next to each other we love our children, and next to our children we love our neighbors; and, with the Lord's blessin, we will live honestly and comfortably as we have lived, until it pleases him to call us from this world, when we hope to be separated only for a little while, and then meet again to live with each other in God's presence for ever."

The principal circumstances of the old man's simple and candid story common report had long since made me acquainted with; but they seemed doubly interesting coming from old Robin himself. For the purpose of forming some apology for giving his "chubby darlings" valuable presents, I have often visited his retired house, to eat tarts and johnny-cake, which his "pretty Polly" is famed for making, and her neatness as a housewife is proverbial; indeed, to use one of old Robin's expressions, her kitchen floor is so nice that a "fly would slip up if he were to undertake to walk across it."

SKETCHES OF CHARACTER.

REMINISCENCES OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

LETTER FROM COUNT PULASKI TO DR. FRANKLIN.

WHEN Pulaski left France, in 1776, he promised to write to Franklin, then residing as minister, in Paris, and give him a full account of what he thought of the progress of events in the great struggle of American independence. To this agreement he faithfully adhered; and the observations of this enlightened foreigner, no doubt, assisted the philosopher in making up his estimate of things in regard to the revolution. He was particularly requested to write his opinion of the talents and characters of the generals engaged in the American cause. These men had mostly grown up since Franklin's prime of life, and he did not feel so much acquainted with them as with their fathers. Pulaski was sagacious, open-hearted, and free in his remarks.

He continued his correspondence with the doctor until his death. The following letter, which we extract from the manuscript of the new novel, mentioned last week, entitled the "Polish Chiefs," was written in the year 1778:—

"MY DEAR DOCTOR—I have named Washington to you in my former communications, and I can safely say, that every day my veneration for him increases. He seems equal to any occasion, rising with it, and developing just such talents as are required for the exigency. His moral bravery is equal to his physical courage. He is careful of human life—a rare characteristic of a modern commander—yet he has none of that sentimental tenderness that would make him forego real advantages for fear of a little danger. He has the true gift of command, dignity and ease. In our last battle, he had some misunderstanding with General Charles Lee, for which Lee is to be called to a court-martial. Lee is a good officer, well acquainted with modern tactics, and unquestionably brave; but he is profligate, and reckless of his conduct here as of future life. It is well known that he is a freethinker, and that does not suit a great proportion of the army, who are strict believers in Luther or Calvin, or some other reformer. Lee is a scholar, and a man of wit, and might be more useful in the army than he is. It is whispered that he and his friends are intriguing to make him commander-in-chief. This will not do. The result of the court-martial will, I apprehend, put a quietus to that impression. However distinguished the talents of Lee may be, he is unfit for these grave and practical people.

"If Washington was to be taken off, General Green would, probably, be called to succeed him, if the wishes of the army were consulted. He came out from the people, and rose at once from his merits; and has sustained that high reputation which was given to him by his own state, ever since he became a continental officer.

He is cool, clear-headed, and firm of purpose; and is popular with the few of discrimination, as well as with the many who are guided by impulse.

"Knox is much admired and respected by the army; he is a bold gigantic-looking officer, who combines reflection with youth, and a sage demeanor with a lofty spirit. Washington is his friend, and puts high confidence in him. He is another of those men who have grown up for the occasion. He was a sergeant in an artillery company in Boston; but when the commander of it left the country, Knox was made captain of the corps; and, joining Washington at Cambridge, was soon rapidly promoted in the army. Regularity, spirit, and no small share of science, are seen in his deportment; and he probably is now a severer student than any cadet in Paris. Such a man will be distinguished by every opportunity to display himself. From his very errors he comes at the truth. I find that he has among his camp equipage a valuable collection of military books—a rare thing in this republican army. They now and then take a set from the British, and commence reading them.

"Sullivan, I have not had much of an opportunity to become acquainted with; but the New England people are satisfied with him as a general, and they are sagacious, and generally correct in their opinions of men. He has great spirit, and a good head: such men will be distinguished in any walk of life.

"These are foremost men that I have mentioned; but there is a younger class, who are principally in the staff, of an equal cast of mind, and of superior education, having generally just left their institutions of learning, or the early course of professional life, to join the army. There are some elegant young men among these. Major Fairlee I would mention as one of them. He is quite young; but for sagacity, wit, and knowledge of his profession, he has no superior. Playful and satirical, or instructive, as he varies from one subject to another, I have taken much delight in his society, and think he has given me more instruction in pronouncing the English language, than any other officer I have met with. This is probably owing to my enjoying his society so much.

"The young French general you have sent to America, is a nobleman of nature as well as of accident. He is winning in his manners, and is the charm of social life. He puts aside all the pretensions of rank, and comes down to a level with all his brother officers. I could not have supposed that one born and educated in such a court as that of Louis fifteenth and sixteenth, could have been so much of a republican in his manners. He has the confidence of Washington, the love of the great mass of the officers, and the adoration of the soldiers. He is never easy unless on duty, and happy only when that duty is satisfactorily performed. He is a good soldier—full of resources, and not easily discouraged. His men have full confidence in him, and that is every thing in a general. No crusader was ever more ardent in the cause than Lafayette is in yours. He is certainly able beyond his years. Seldom has this world seen a general, not yet out of his minority; and yet he seems quite at home in military matters; but this may be accounted for by his having a military education, which always gives a man a gravity beyond his years.

"He appears to have identified himself with this country, and will not give it up as long as he can find one soldier to support him. These Frenchmen are full of enthusiasm, and that you will not find fault with in such a cause. I think, my dear doctor, that you owe much to this same young Frenchman. He came with his pockets full of money, his head crammed with military manœuvres, and his heart overflowing with philanthropy and republicanism; and he is still as full of fight as a young cadet. Of all the officers from foreign powers he is the most popular with the army; and, I think, bids fair to retain that popularity; and, in a struggle like this, no man can sustain a command without some share of popularity. The French now here respect the general as much as the army love him. His fame is not confined to the army, but his influence is great in reconciling jarring interests, and he is as ready to heal a breach as any man I know of. His services will be gratefully remembered if this country obtains her freedom, for such a man or his deeds cannot be forgotten.

"There is a southerner of fine character and high promise devoted to the cause—Colonel Laurens, from South Carolina. He has the elements of a great soldier in him, and if the war is to be long continued, he will rise to some high command. He is quick to discern, and as quick to execute, and has that great necessary gift from heaven to make him illustrious—I mean that power, which all can feel and no one define, of diffusing a chivalrous spirit into all within his influence. In the late battle of Rhode Island, Laurens and Colonel Henry B. Livingston were distinguished for having displayed great talents and bravery. In fact, my dear doctor, your country is rich in talents of a high order, in every department; time and opportunity only are wanting to develop them; and, in the destinies of your people, these will come.

"I should do wrong, while on this subject, if I did not name to you one of my most favorite soldiers, Colonel Alexander Hamilton. He is one of the most promising men of the army. With great simplicity of character, he unites uncommon energies of mind. He gathers knowledge with an intuitive grasp; and holds it with the tenacity of brass. He is as brave as Cæsar, and as honorable as brave. He is cool in command, and furious in attack; he is modest and humane in victory; intrepid and unbroken in defeat. If for a moment you discover some slight error in him, a redeeming quality is found hard by to efface it. If now and then Omphale plays with his sword-knot, she never binds him to the distaff. If sometimes Cupid, in a frolic, traces on his shield the images of beauty and the bowers of love, it is instantly polished all bright again by its use in the battle field. In council, with the air and mien of youth, he gives to pondering gravity new matter for reflection, and to irrelative honesty new vigor. They think him a boy when he begins to speak, and a sage when he has finished. He is as well fitted for the deliberative body as for the camp; and for the forum as for the hall of justice. Wherever he goes, there will be a stream of light; wherever he rests, a pillar of fire. He seems unconscious of his superiority, and yet is unawed by the most gifted minds. If his equals are no where to be found, there are many in your country I have seen, who are so many pledges that the independence of it will be achieved. In fact, it is already virtually fixed. The germ of liberty is bursting into vigorous shoots. The several states are holding conventions to establish constitutions of government, and order and harmony must be the result. Congratulate yourself, my dearest friend, for you may rest in perfect safety that the great struggle is to close gloriously; for when a people as large as the American nation will be free, they must be free. Heaven prospers those who dare assist themselves.

"The lovers of freedom have cause to rejoice throughout the world. Your countrymen have, by this perilous conflict, brought forth talents, which they themselves were unconscious of possessing. The energies of man have always been found equal to their exigencies, if untoward fate did not repress them. Separated, as you are, from the old world by three thousand miles of water, it will be found impossible for any one nation to transport a sufficient number of men to your shores in the end, to conquer those determined to be free. Half a century, a mere hour in national existence, will give your country a population of more than ten millions. You may then laugh at the world when they talk of subduing you. Your calculations have been considered dreams by the old world, but I entreat you to dream on, the truth will outstrip your calculations, and the coming time will fulfil your prophecies.

"I shall not live to see all this realized. The genius of my country, clothed in a blood-stained mantle, is for ever before my eyes, and points me to my place of rest. The wide shroud prepared for me has on it "gouts of blood;" but do not understand me as looking on this as a dreaded spectre. Oh no; it exactly suits my fancy. I wish to die in so good a cause; I wish to sleep in the bed of glory, and to fall in the discharge of my duty. There is something yet to be done, and in doing it I hope to perish. I brood over Poland, but Poland is not yet to be regenerated. The incubus of despotism is on her breast, and convulsions may ensue; but no freedom can be obtained by this paroxysm.

"The Russian power is increasing and will increase for perhaps half a century to come, but her decline after this is certain. Her ambition will urge her on to conquests—these will enlighten her hordes, and knowledge, instead of increasing the power of such a mass, will cause it to tumble to pieces. There is a mighty spirit now directing her destinies, but it will in time change, and feeble hands may wield that which is now directed by talent and wicked ambition. Do not smile at my anticipation, for I hold it good that every patriot should be a prophet. I am an outlaw, an exile, and like the last of the druids among your ancestors, I have the second sight, and "see the warp and woof of Edward's race," as I precipitate myself as a victim, for my country's cause, or rather thrown from the precipice by my country's foes. However deep I may feel for Poland, I assure you that the gloom which I witnessed on the brow of your countrymen when I first arrived here, is gone. Determination has taken the place of anxiety; and although the war is not finished, the manner in which it will terminate is no longer doubtful to any but those wilfully blind. The army think that the enemy will entirely overrun the south, and then separate the south from the north and east. In this they are wrong. The north and east can, and will, furnish troops to fight the battles of the south, and if they are not on the ground in season, or when they are wanted to prevent evil, they will come in time to avenge it. I am ordered to the south—Farewell. PULASKI."

LITERARY NOTICES.

MR. BULWER'S NEW NOVEL OF EUGENE ARAM.

WE have been favored with the perusal of this work, which, it is understood, is just published by the Messrs. Harpers; and our decided impressions are, that it is of superior excellence to any of the previous productions of this very popular writer. The principal person of the piece is the man from whom it derives its name, and the development of whose character comprises the main interest of the narrative. Eugene Aram is represented in the notices which appeared shortly after the trial, that gave him such infamous celebrity, as a man of profound learning as well as great natural powers of mind; and the defence he made on that trial unquestionably guarantees the opinion. The author has made this the groundwork of a character of very singular interest and originality, and has developed it with a degree of philosophical accuracy, as well as natural probability, which indicate a species of talent Mr. Bulwer has not hitherto displayed, at least not in so masterly a manner as in the present instance.

Unquestionably it requires a much higher power to produce a great degree of interest and excitement, by simple and natural means, than by the aid of witchcraft, or a resort to a series, or rather a farrago of unnatural incidents, neither probable in themselves, nor, if probable, at all likely to bring about the catastrophe of the piece. Invention, unchecked by judgment, is but a vulgar and ordinary feature in the composition of genius; for nothing is more easy than to imagine impossibilities. The highest order of fictions is certainly that in which a series of interesting incidents leads naturally and probably to a striking denouement. If the agency of gods and goddesses in Homer, of enchanters in Tasso and Ariosto, of witches and fairies in Shakspeare, had not been sanctioned by the popular belief, to a certain extent the interest of their vivid creations would have been deplorably lessened by the introduction of such machinery. Superstitions of every kind, which are extensively disseminated, furnish excellent grounds for the construction, and capital materials for the embellishment of fictions; for, though we may not actually believe in the existence and agency of these beings, still they are so familiar to the imagination that we do not revolt at their introduction, as we would at that of influences to which we had not been accustomed from our youth. A basis of probability is thus attained, without which, in our opinion, no fiction or work of imagination is perfect.

We think Mr. Bulwer has accomplished this object, at the same time that he has most successfully addressed himself to the taste of the day, for stirring adventures, high-wrought feeling, and tragic incident. The development of Aram's character, by means of action and dialogue, is striking, affecting, and philosophical; and the struggles of such a mind as his is represented, with the recollection of a guilt which could never be washed away, the hope of happiness and the fear of discovery, are wrought up into a most exciting narrative. One of the author's greatest triumphs is having rendered it sufficiently probable that such a man as Eugene Aram should have inspired such a woman as Madeline Lester with a love so pure, and at the same time so passionate and profound. This was one of the formidable difficulties of Mr. Bulwer, and he has successfully surmounted it. Another difficulty was to evade the disadvantage of having adopted as the hero of his story an individual whom so many of his readers knew beforehand to be a murderer. From the first, therefore, we have an infallible clue to the mysteries of the story; and must be aware, that according to all other poetical justice, (save that of our author in Paul Clifford,) the catastrophe is inevitable. The end of poor Madeline's love must, of necessity, be misery and disappointment, since the consciousness of such a crime preying on the mind of Eugene Aram, must totally unfit him for administering to the happiness of another. But these inherent defects, in the nature of the subject, and the notoriety of the principal fact, do not prevent this from being one of the most keenly interesting tales we have ever met with.

The work is also adorned with many rare and charming embellishments. There are interspersed throughout many descriptions of scenery, extremely touching and beautiful, as well as many observations which indicate a mind capable of turning aside into the path of truth, and plucking both fruits and flowers. We scarcely remember a finer philosophical truth more beautifully illustrated than in the following passage:

"And thus passed the student's life; perhaps its monotony and dullness required less compassion than they received; no man can judge of the happiness of another. As the moon plays upon the waves, and seems to our eyes to favor with a peculiar beam one long track amid the waters, leaving the rest in comparative obscurity, yet all the while she is so niggard in her lustre—for though the rays that meet not our eyes seem to us as if they were not—yet she, with an equal and unfavorable loveliness, mirror's herself on every wave. Even so, perhaps, happiness falls with the same brightness and power over the whole expanse of life, though to our limited eyes she seems only to rest on those billows from which the ray is reflected back on our sight."

A vein of observation similar to this runs through the story, and we confess we have little respect for any writer, either of fact or fiction, who does not mingle something of the kind with the tissue of his narrative; still less do we reverence a reader whose curiosity is so rampant that he cannot stop to contemplate a beautiful landscape, or to banquet on the naked charms of truth, which, say what they will, are not less lovely, romantic, and touching than the wildest creations of the imagination. When Apelles wished to delineate the goddess of love, he did not resort to his invention, but to nature and reality, and he produced a combination which, though never before perhaps exhibited in one single figure, was nature—pure nature notwithstanding.

Our time and limits will not now allow of a more extended analysis of the present volumes. We cannot conclude, however, without expressing our decided opinion that in style, sentiment, plan, and catastrophe, Eugene Aram is the master work of a man, who now that the wand of the great wizard of the north is, peradventure, broken forever, has no superior—nay, no equal, in the walks of fiction among the writers of Great Britain. Undoubtedly there are faults, both of style and sentiment, but often the faults of a man of genius are preferable to the beauties of one without genius. We are upon wafting a little sober advice across the main; "were we not most decidedly of opinion that the divine spark had much better follow its light, than that the link boys of literature, who, though they enable him to avoid a gutter, or a quagmire, never lead him to the 'cloud cap hill,' or the beautiful recesses of nature."

We perceive that the American edition of this work is prefaced by a touching little address to the countrymen of Washington and Franklin, in which the author modestly adverts to his popularity in the new world, as a subject of pride and pleasure, and offers the kindest acknowledgments of a manly spirit. Mr. Bulwer is right. The favorable estimation of a nation of freemen, containing more readers than any other on the face of the globe, and more people that can read, is a subject of just pride to any man, let him be who he will. It is something, as has been observed, allied to the voice of posterity, and is given with an independence of the influence of temporary fashion, which makes it the more valuable. The time is not far distant, when the British writers, present and future, will look to this country as the widest, vastest field remaining to them all. A hundred millions—if heaven spares the earth so long—a hundred millions of people will, in less than a hundred years, inhabit this western republic, who will speak and read the English language in all its purity. How absurd—how ineffably absurd is it then, in so many of these writers, to mingle in their works, feelings and prejudices, slights and calumnies, that will forever preclude them from circulation in this country, and deprive them of millions of readers! Certainly, overweening vanity never made a greater sacrifice at the shrine of imaginary superiority, than that of immortality in a new world. **

THE DRAMA.

THE NEW-YORK STAGE.

THE unusual inclemency of the present season has, of course, been prejudicial to the theatres. At the Park, the benefits of the most talented and favorite members of the corps have been undeserving the name. Even Mrs. Wheatley appealed nearly in vain. We state this with equal surprise and regret. No more skilful and admirable actress ever appeared on our boards. The managers could not represent most of the plays decently without her. There is no substitute for her in the whole range of our dramatic acquaintance, and she has educated her two charming young daughters with so much successful care to become universal favorites, that an overflowing house would have been but a natural and just reward of her indefatigable exertions. Mr. H. Placide, another deservedly popular actor, and one who every one imagined must be remembered by the thousands that have been delighted by the displays of his varied talents during the year, was received by two or three hundred persons, whose enthusiastic greetings were doubtless very gratifying to his feelings, but of little service to his pocket. Mr. Jones was not exempted from the effects of this apathy. If any one ever merited substantial marks of public approbation, he is the man. His rise from mediocrity to his present eminence in his profession has been so completely under our notice, that we may almost consider him an American vocalist; and the rapid progress he is making, not only in music, but also in acting, must, we presumed, attract a crowded audience. The house indeed, for the night, was good, but not what it ought to have been. This neglect of talent and industry is a bad feature in the character of our theatrical community; and the bad consequences of it recoil upon ourselves. If merit is not rewarded, and perseverance meets no more acknowledgment than is bestowed upon indolence and shallowness, we withdraw the stimulant from talent, and encourage the claims of presumption.

Cinderella has been repeated with great success, and is still the prominent attraction of the Park theatre. We think there is an improvement in Mrs. Austin's acting. Her music, as usual, is delightfully sweet and effective. The Caliph of Bagdad, and the two last acts of Der Frieschutz, have been performed. As Haroun Alraschid, Mr. Jones played with spirit and freedom, and sung admirably, notwithstanding a slight touch of the influenza. Barnes, as the Cadi, was droll and odd, and kept the house in a roar. Thorne played Chebib extremely well. He is a useful actor, and sings music adapted to his voice, very sweetly, and with effect. As an example, take his song in the Englishman in India, "Oh firm as oak, and free from care," and his personation of Caspar in Der Frieschutz, which is everywhere good, and in parts powerful. Neither must we forget his Caliban, the best on our stage. But what shall we say of Mrs. Austin, in both the operas? As Darina and Linda she was equally brilliant. Her every appearance leaves upon the public a deeper impression than the last. We take blame to ourselves for having hitherto permitted the benefit of Mrs. Hilson, which took place at the Chatham theatre, to remain unnoticed. She was greeted with a crowded house, and the most deep-felt approbation, which she well deserves.

Mr. Barnes announces his benefit, and that this is the last season of his appearance at the Park theatre. This is "wondrous strange."

An article which we had prepared on the Richmond Hill theatre has been crowded out, but shall appear in our next.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE P. MORRIS, THEODORE S. PAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1832.

New-England Magazine—American Turf Register—Ladies' Magazine—Littell's Museum of Foreign Literature—Illinois Magazine.—We find on our table this morning a host of periodical journals, each in its own way creditable to its department of our literature. When we recollect the difference between this country and England, in respect to the manner in which attempts of this kind have been hitherto supported, and the great inducement among us for talent to embark in other enterprises, we regard the present works with a gratification not wholly unmingled with surprise.

The New England Magazine is conducted with marked ability, and presents strong claims to public attention. Every number contains articles admirably well written, many, apparently, from the pens of eminent authors, and a steady improvement has been visible since its commencement. It is a vigorous, healthy, and manly publication—utters its opinions with a bold and attractive freedom, and even when we do not acquiesce in its sentiments (which sometimes happens) we appreciate the frank independence of the editors, and respect them for it. The work is correctly and elegantly printed, and we think, under its present direction, must succeed.

The American Turf Register is, as its title indicates, addressed especially to gentlemen of the turf. It is by no means limited to subjects uninteresting to the general reader, but, on the contrary, often sparkles with sketches of a light and pleasing character. To its literary merit we can bear testimony, and, we learn, that it is very popular for its more technical excellencies among the cognoscenti.

To these two deserving publications we are sincerely pleased to add the Ladies' Magazine, under the direction of Mrs. Hale. We have before solicited our fair readers to look into its pages, both from the fact that its editor is a lady, and of decided talent, and from the sterling merit of her work. We should, perhaps, be overstepping the limits of our critical prerogative in dwelling upon her amiable and estimable character as a mother, and the praiseworthy novelty of her appearance among the editorial corps; but we are sure, that when added to the spirited manner in which she conducts the magazine, these circumstances will arouse the approbation, and elicit the patronage of all admirers of female worth and talent.

Of Littell's Museum of Foreign Literature, we have also previously spoken. It furnishes us, and in a very unobtrusive way, with all the gems of the British periodicals without their politics and heavy, dull matter. It is by far a more interesting work than any single journal abroad. Its selections are made with care and taste, and afford an ample equivalent for its moderate subscription. We cordially recommend it to the lovers of foreign literature, as it ably fills a vacancy in our own, which has too often been usurped by very inferior publications.

We should apologize for having so nearly lost sight of the western writers. There are among them several bold, powerful intellects, and some of unusual eloquence and refinement. Among them, Mr. James Hall holds a prominent rank. We fear he is not properly appreciated by his brethren of the Atlantic states, because not sufficiently known; but we hear he is more read in England. We know, indeed, too little of the west altogether, and shall seize the earliest leisure to fling together a few observations on the subject. Till then, we must content ourselves by mentioning the Illinois Magazine, a work, in our opinion of the great excellence of which, all who peruse it must fully concur.

Plagiarism.—A poetic effusion, of great merit, entitled "August, by William Cullen Bryant," and commencing is again going the rounds of the British periodicals, and, of course, of our own papers. It is now before us in Littell's "Museum of Foreign Literature," copied from the London "New Monthly Magazine." The verses alluded to originally appeared in the New-York Mirror anonymously, under the head of "A Noon Scene," and we cannot compliment the courtesy of the editor who took them from us without credit, altered the title, and annexed the name of the gentleman whom he conceived to be the author. We ascribe this either to the carelessness or the dishonesty of certain among our brethren, on this side the Atlantic, who are in the constant practice of appropriating the articles of this paper to themselves, without acknowledgment. It is a dishonest and unpardonable offence, which would not be persisted in by any honorable man, and, perhaps, there is no periodical in the country that has more cause of complaint on this subject than our own. That such conduct meets the marked disapprobation of the English journals, take the following as an example, from one of the first works of the day:

"The quiet August noon is come,"

(From the London Harmonicon.)

"In the Harmonicon for August and September, we gave an essay on vocal music, quoted, as we fairly stated (p. 168,) from the 'New York Euterpeid,' and to which we appended some observations of our own. It now appears that our American contemporary had extracted the whole of the paper in question, without acknowledgment or remark of any kind, from the 'Young Ladies' Book,' (published in the city of London,) and we have thus inadvertently been led into an act, which, under any other circumstances, would be totally unjustifiable, and of which we trust our readers and the public will believe us to be wholly incapable."

Progress of Music.—It has hitherto been customary for us, "the innocents of this happy country," to gaze, with delighted wonder, and admire every thing that is prepared for us by the managers of theatres, as coming from royal establishments, and played by king's servants in England; and we doubt whether many of the dramas and dramatis personæ would have met with the same success had they been otherwise introduced to our notice. In England, we notice that the old opera of Artaxerxes has been played frequently this season, introducing Braham and a fair debutante, and got up by Sir George Smart and Mr. Welch, with a "new" and "original" finale to the first act. This new and original finale was arranged by an amateur residing in this city, to whom we are indebted for the translation of the Caliph of Bagdad, the arrangement of Cinderella, &c. and produced by Mr. Simpson at the Park theatre, three years ago, although we cannot find, on examining the play-bills, that the Covent-garden managers gave Mr. Simpson the credit which he has so elaborately bestowed upon them on similar occasions. We rather think this is the first composition which has ever been adopted at an English theatre, having previously succeeded in America, and it speaks volumes for the improvement of the art in this country.

FROM THE RUIN'S TOPMOST TOWER;

CAVATINA—AS SUNG BY MISS CAWSE, IN MARCHNER'S GRAND OPERA OF THE VAMPIRE, AS PERFORMED AT THE ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE.

Arranged and adapted to the English stage by W. Hayes—the poetry by J. R. Planche, Esq.

Andantino.

From the ru-in's top-most tow'r, I have gazed a wea-ry hour, Wen-zel to' dis-co-ver,

In the sun's de-scend-ing beam, Moun-tain glow'd and glit-ter'd stream, But they bore no lo-ver. Troop-ing came the guests so gay, But no bride-groom. Fa-ther, say, Should not that my brow shade o-ver, Should not that my brow shade o-ver?

SECOND VERSE.

Ev'ning sinks on hill and dale,
And the sobbing nightingale
Mourns one perjured lover;
From her cloudy slumber soon
She will wake the silver moon,
And to pity move her.
Night is on its starry way,
Yet no bridegroom. Father, say,
Should not that my brow shade over?
Should not that my brow shade over?

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

ERRORS OF MANKIND.

It is singular to look back upon the errors of the human race, and to observe with what zeal even the strongest minds have followed error, than which, to the most uninformed of the present day, nothing could be more absurd. Among the questions to which the old metaphysical writers devoted their talents, were the following:

Can angels pass from one point of space to another without passing through the intermediate points?

Can more than one angel exist at the same moment, in the same physical point?

Is virtue good because it has intrinsic goodness, or has it intrinsic goodness because it is good?

Is the mind's freedom of choice, an entity or a quiddity?

Can angels visually discern objects in the dark?

Can they exist in a perfect vacuum? and if they can, is that vacuum perfect?

Can the Creator exist in imaginary space, as well as in space that is real?

Can a mode exist without a substance?

Although we can scarcely peruse these profound queries without a smile, is it not possible that future ages will find among our philosophers themes of discussion equally useless and absurd?

RESOLUTION.—FROM MY DIARY.

The longer I live, the more I am impressed with the deep importance of cultivating this quality. It is greatly overlooked in the usual estimates of a man's character. We speak of his generosity, his courage, his integrity, his manners and attainments; we call him amiable, affectionate, intelligent, but we seldom inquire if he is resolute. It is equally overlooked in the received systems of education. We teach children grammar, arithmetic, geography; but it is not often that a schoolmaster watches to strengthen by precept and example the growing weakness by which the young boy yields easily to surrounding circumstances. It is true, we praise the resolution by which an individual carries on a great design, but that is not what I mean. The less obtrusive, but far more valuable peculiarity to which I allude, is that quiet, never-sleeping spirit which pervades the whole tenor of some men's existence, and is, in fact, the secret cause of greatness and wealth, and success in whatever they undertake. It is the spell by which ordinary minds pass brilliant and gifted intellects, in the journey of life; by which so insignificant a creature as an ant piles a hill for his dwelling; by which the coral insect raises an island in the ocean. If I were a father, I would strive to implant this habit in my son's character. It is more valuable than gold, and will accomplish more than genius, with half the disappointment and peril. How much I admire it—yet how totally I am destitute of it! I have ardently endeavored to acquire it, but have failed to gain it, from the very fact, that I had it not. With it I could have grasped any other virtue, and nearly any other advantage. I could have been systematic in my business, and regular in my indulgences. I could have been rich. I could have amassed knowledge, and strengthened all the faculties of my mind. It is the "place to stand on" which Archimedes wanted in order to move the world. No one can be resolute in this way without having been taught early a certain contempt for ease and enjoyment: this I have never learned. There is my weak point—every temptation overcomes me. There are moods in which I feel I could effect great things. I have a Spartan severity of thought, and a singleness of purpose, which, could I but retain it, would lead me anywhere. Could I but be isolated from the gaieties of life; could I be thrust into a dungeon, or on a solitary island, for a certain period, and with a certain object; could I, in any way, rescue myself entirely from the innumerable influences around me, and become actually the master of my own mind, I would not pass away from the earth an unremembered creature. I would leave a monument; but without resolution this is but an idle reverie. Yes—and I fear it would be no more, even in the dungeon, or the island. My own thoughts would be my enemies. Pleasure comes like a spring sun, and dissolves all my snowy designs. The satisfaction of a present impulse has always been more important to me than the success of a remote plan. Irresolution is a habit which creeps upon its victim with a fatal facility. It is not vicious, but it leads to vice, and many a fine heart has paid the penalty of it at the scaffold.—Trifling as it appears in the wavering steps of the young, as they grow older its form changes to that of a hideous monster, who leads them to destruction with their eyes open. The idler, the spendthrift, the epicurean, the drunkard, are among its victims. Perhaps in the latter its effects appear in the most hideous form. He knows that the goblet which he is about to drain, is poison, yet he swallows it. He knows, for the example of thousands have painted it to him in glaring colors, that it will deaden all his faculties—take the strength from his limbs—happiness from his heart—oppress him with foul diseases, and hurry his progress to a dishonored grave; and yet he drains it under a species of dreadful spell, like that by which small creatures are said to approach and leap into the jaws of the loathsome serpent, whose fiendish eyes have fascinated them. How beautiful and manly is that power by which the resolute man passes unmoved through these dangers!

THE YOUNG AUTHOR, OR THE EFFECTS OF CRITICISM.

"A sensitive plant your literary flower."

"I AM going to visit a young genius," said my friend B. to me, one day. "Will you accompany me?" I assented. "That you may understand the character of the person we are about to visit," he added, after we had started, "it will be necessary that I should give you a sketch of his life:

"Edwin Delisle was an only child. His parents were rich. He was brought up with the expectation of filling the highest rank in society. The best masters were provided for his instruction; but his wild and joyous nature led him to prefer pleasure to learning, and his wayward desires were too much indulged. Because the stream of knowledge flowed to him unsought, it was disregarded. A number of unfortunate speculations reduced Mr. Delisle from affluence to bankruptcy. Unable to bear up against the shock, he shortly after died of a broken heart. His widow soon followed him to the grave, leaving Edwin, at the age of thirteen, at once a beggar and an orphan. The care of him devolved upon his maternal uncle, who, not willing to be troubled with the 'spoiled child,' had him bound out to a trade. This was a change in his situation as unexpected as it appeared to him humiliating. He had been taught to consider dignities and honors as a part of his birthright, and his pride revolted at the idea of bowing to the will of another; but submission was the only course left him to pursue. He was kindly treated by his master; but fancy surrounded him with many ideal evils. Every little slight, every word that appeared harsher than common, was tortured into intentional insult. Every laugh was directed against himself, and the finger of scorn followed his steps everywhere. His spirits drooped, the joyous laugh vanished from his lips. He would wander forth when his daily task was done, and in silence and solitude weep over his utter desolation. He had none to comfort or advise him, for he had quarreled with his uncle, and was too proud to seek a reconciliation; and those who had called themselves his father's friends, had forgotten that he left a son behind him. But the elasticity of the young mind will not allow it to remain long inactive under the pressure of misfortune. In Edwin the fearful struggles of pride, the bitterness of crushed affection, and the indignation excited by the perfidy of friends, while it caused him to shun the communion of his kind, and drove the warm current of feeling and love back upon his own heart, likewise awakened within him a new talent, that would otherwise have remained dormant. The deep and passionate thoughts that had long been pent within him, at last found vent, and

"Burst into voluntary song."

"On discovering this new faculty of his mind, he pursued it with avidity, because it enabled him to fly from the evil that preyed upon his spirits. As his powers more and more developed themselves, a change came over his manners and appearance. His step grew firmer, and his carriage loftier. His face had lost the joyous look which it wore in childhood, but it had now gained much in intellectual expression. His solitary rambles were still continued, but he no longer gazed around him with listless indifference. He felt keenly alive to the beauty and grandeur of nature. He was no longer alone! Imagination peopled the unfathomed void.

"New hope flashed upon the darkness that surrounded him—hope that in the young breast paints all things beyond reality. He beheld himself pressing on in the path of fame. The world was already bowing in homage to his genius. He felt himself immortal. 'They shall be glad to know me yet!' he would exclaim in moments of enthusiasm, as he thought of those who once shared his father's banquets, and who now passed him unnoticed. 'They shall be glad to know me yet—and then—' His swelling heart was full, and the sentence remained unfinished. Unfortunately, like most young authors, he was too impatient to appear in print. He commenced a work which he fondly hoped would transmit his name to posterity. The midnight lamp and the first streak of the morning light, found him bending over his task. He now felt the want of knowledge. He had much to learn, and but little time for learning. The intense application to which he subjected himself, greatly impaired his health, but the mind sustained him, when the body without such support would have sunk exhausted.

"When the poem was at last completed, a difficulty arose which he had never before thought of. Where should he obtain a publisher? Many declined the risk, and he was about giving up the hope of finding one, when he accidentally became acquainted with a man whom his father had greatly benefited. The person had not forgotten the obligation, and though he suspected it would be against his interest, he undertook the publication.

"If you have ever felt your all hanging upon one point, and that point about to be decided, you can judge what were Edwin's feelings during the time that his work was in the press. At one moment his spirits rose to the highest pitch of excitement, and the next sunk to the lowest ebb of despondency. 'To-morrow your work will be delivered to the trade,' said the printer to him one day. 'To-morrow,' exclaimed the enthusiastic Edwin, as he threw himself that night upon his humble couch—'To-morrow I shall be immortal!'

"The work came out. It was a volume of miscellaneous poems. It contained many passages of great originality; but it was evidently the production of one who had been self-taught. There were many faults, and these the critics attacked as vigorously as if their salvation depended upon prostrating the luckless author.

"Need I mention the effect of this upon a mind constituted like Edwin's? It was terrible. His health, already greatly injured by his exertions, suffered from the revulsion of his feelings. The struggle for life has been long and fearful. He is now considerably better; but there is much reason to fear if something does not occur to rouse him from his despondency, that he will soon sink into the grave."

Soon after my companion had concluded, we arrived at the place of our destination. "We shall probably see Edwin alone," said he, as he unceremoniously opened the street door. We ascended a flight of stairs, when he opened another door—entered—turned—placed his finger on his lips and beckoned me to follow. I obeyed, and found myself in a small room, plainly, but neatly furnished. A few chairs and a deal table constituted the whole of the furniture. A young man, apparently in the last stage of consumption, was seated at the table. A sheet of paper and an inkstand lay before him. He did not appear to observe us when we entered. The elbow of his left arm rested upon the table, and the wasted and fleshless fingers embraced his temples. The right arm fell carelessly over his outstretched leg, and a pen, which had evidently been allowed to drop unconsciously from his hand, lay upon the floor beneath it. He appeared to be engaged in deep and engrossing thought; for ever and anon his brow would contract as if some unpleasant reminiscences were passing before him. We had stood gazing at him some time when he turned with a heavy sigh. The color rushed for a moment to his face, when his eye rested upon us, and then faded away again, leaving it as pale and bloodless as before.

"Pardon me, gentlemen," he said, with a slight inclination of the body, after he had with considerable difficulty risen, "I did not perceive you before."

After the introduction and attendant compliments were over, "I become weaker and weaker every day," he replied to a question after his health. "It cannot last much longer; the hand of death is already upon me. I feel a presentiment that I have but a few days to live."

"These are gloomy forebodings, Edwin," said my friend.

"Call them not gloomy! Oh! if you had outlived hope, and felt the agony of a mind preying upon itself, you would look upon the grave as I do, and hail it as a place of rest. Why should I wish to live? There is not a tie to bind me to the world—no! not one! All before me is darkness and despair. Thought swells to madness, and health flies the mental struggle. Oh! there is no pain so acute—no agony so intense as that which the mind inflicts. Its blighting influence spreads over all things, and withers what it touches. Life becomes a blank, whose scenes of utter despondency and hopeless misery are insupportable."

"Nay, Edwin, it is wrong—worse than wrong—it is criminal to indulge in feelings such as these. They sap the foundation of moral energy, and occasion you much needless suffering. You have gazed so long at the dark side of the picture, that at last your jaundiced eye gives everything the color of your fevered imagination. What have you suffered more than thousands who have gone before you—than thousands who are now around you? They have had to struggle with want, and sorrow, and disease, they have been afflicted and bereaved—"

"But they never felt the possession of talents that may not be developed," exclaimed Edwin, impatiently interrupting him. "They never knew what it was to have powers and feelings that have been crushed and blighted. What is poverty? What is disease, compared to the emotions awakened by wounded self-love? by self-confidence destroyed? What can equal the anguish of learning that we are unworthy of filling those offices which our proud ambition has aspired to? of knowing that we are objects of scorn and contempt; that we are looked upon as a blot, a foul blot in the creation? To be cast down from the height where we had placed ourselves, as the lords of the earth, the talented, the mighty, before whom all meaner spirits must bow in homage; to be cast down from thence, and taught that we are nothing. O it is madness! madness!" He rose from his seat, and his eye flashed with a fearful brightness, as he paced the room with rapid strides. Weakness seemed to have fled from his body at the voice of passion. Suddenly he stopped and resumed, though in a milder tone, "What has my life been but a tissue of evils? My bark of happiness has been falsely guided, and it is wrecked. Who would continue willingly to live without an aim, without a hope? I would rather die!"

"Come, come, Edwin; what though the spring of your life has been clouded, may not its summer be more bright and glorious, yielding a deeper enjoyment from the contrast? You are yet young, and a thousand sources of gratification are open before you. Pleasures of which you now know nothing will arise to cheer and lighten the path of life. Some fair divinity will court you to love, and teach you that one earthly, is worth the whole nine celestial goddesses."

I thought by the convulsive heaving of his frame that he was weeping, but when he again looked up his eyes were dry, but wild and glistening with unnatural fire.

We left him with his disappointed hopes, and although I had on parting with him endeavored to convince him that he was destined to much future happiness in this world; yet, even in the midst of my consolation, I knew he would die. It is a strange feeling, at once awful and sublime, with which we stand face to face by one whose mortal hours are numbered. We listen to the voice performing its miraculous functions for nearly the last time. We see the glassy eyes of a soul, through which streams the light, about to quit us and the world forever. We see the white hands and skeleton fingers, the withered lips, the skinny temples, and reflect that a few more suns and they will be buried in darkness, and the worm will prey on them. That pale forehead, beneath which the wonderful mind is going on with all its innumerable operations, will lose its instinct, and be as the dust; and that conscious spirit, which now feels our touch, and answers our salutation, will have gone; and the motionless bosom will not feel, nor the mouldering lips respond; and the grass will grow greenly over the faded and forgotten relics; and the sweet summer air will blow around; and they will be seen and heard and known no more upon the stage of the great busy world; and this is death; death that embraces all things; that must embrace us. So as we will, laugh, dance, sing, and play the sovereign of our little circle, we are thus doomed, and driven like sheep to the slaughter-house; and all must fall. Pause, careless, and peradventure, happy reader. It may be thou art young and pure and lovely. Perhaps one gaze in thy face would conjure up in me a thousand soft and pleasant feelings, and fill my mind with agreeable images. And thy fancy is almost ignorant of death, and thy bosom is full of far tenderer anticipations than the loathsome grave presents. I have seen such, and nearly doubted that they could die—vain and idle dreamer! Many a mournful lesson is written for me in the church-yard. I never more doubt that death will strike the young and the enchanting, but my confidence is changed to fear and pity; and after the glow with which I look upon the face of a fair woman, comes ever a trembling sense of sadness and horror. That such soft and endearing beauty must feed so insatiate and awful a monster, and be crushed with thrilling anguish, and be at length forgotten.

When I quitted the miserable boy, all my sympathies were vividly awakened. What to the reader may appear dull and common-place, was conveyed directly to my heart by the fine melancholy eyes, and the sweet tremulous voice of the unhappy young poet. I found in him a grace that interested me strangely. My friend assured me that the volume published contained pieces of very unusual merit, and his praise of it was so enthusiastic that I was induced to purchase and give it an attentive perusal. The result was a very strong feeling of astonishment and indignation that it should have been publicly assailed by persons calling themselves critics. It was evident to me that either they had not read the book, or that they did not understand it, for although the excellence of the style was materially marred by trivial errors, generally incidental to the attempts of youthful writers, I was forcibly struck with the great tenderness and eloquence of many passages, whose merit evinced talents both of brilliancy and depth. What rendered the poems more extraordinary as well as more acceptable to me was the fact, that they were original as well as beautiful in their composition, and entirely clear of those mannerisms which, however racy in superior authors, become contemptible when retailed by second-hand dealers, by imitators, and imitators of imitators. In short, the work was full of the true essence of poetry; and, instead of being ridiculed, should have been received with distinguished praise. It was, undoubtedly, to the failure of the volume that the rapidly increasing malady of the youth was to be ascribed. It had struck him to the earth, on which he now lay groveling, and from which even if he could arise, he would not. He had neglected exercise, taken his meals irregularly, become totally careless of his health, rambled, reckless of the weather, at late hours of the night, until the fatal effects began to display themselves in the form of consumption. I was sincerely interested in the event of his illness; and not being altogether without the means to serve him, either in pecuniary affairs, or among those severe censors of the public press who had inflicted upon him an injury at once so harsh and so unjust, I inquired their names, and found I knew them all intimately. Of the two least powerful one was a bigot and the other a voluptuary; the third was a young editor of promise, but still young, very young.

The occurrence led my mind to some curious observations and reflections. The public would be shocked if they could behold in a palpable form the vast proportion of criticisms appearing in the journals of this country, which are influenced by private feelings. He who from personal friendship praises a book or a composition undeservedly is, in fact, committing a falsehood, and cheating his readers; but what shall we say of him who sits in the obscure safety of his chamber, and gratifies a malignant enmity against an author, by villifying his works? This course is pursued in the United States to an extent most disgraceful, if not alarming. The truth is, no criticism should have weight unless well supported by argument; and a reviewer who asserts that a publication is bad, without bringing ample proofs of it, is not entitled to credit. For example, we read in some journal, not conducted by any responsible person, that Mr. B. has just issued his history or his poem. "It is a mere tissue of nonsense," adds the critic; "a miserable failure, full of errors and stupidity." And this is called criticism! But who is he who writes this? No one knows. He may be ignorant, vulgar, malicious; he may have a work himself in the course of publication on the same subject; or he may be, with the spirit of a cowardly assassin, stabbing thus in the dark at the reputation of a noble foe. We have known men, otherwise very good fellows, guilty of this. We say guilty, because to many their fame is what they solely depend on for a livelihood, and to destroy it by unfair means, from vicious motives, is as base as the act of a robber who demands your money with a pistol, or rather of a thief who steals it while you sleep. Of those critics who had written against the publication of my young friend, I found only one who appeared to have carefully read it. It was his criticism which had first appeared, and from which the others had taken their general impressions concerning it. I put the volume one afternoon in my pocket, and went round to visit this person. He was a sickly, unhappy-looking creature, with a face almost livid from bodily sufferings. His back was bent, his chest narrow, his fingers long, white, and bony, and a gleam of unnatural light shone from his eyes, prepossessing the observer against him, and at once betraying physical debility and moral disease. I knew him for a bigot and a wretch, and an involuntary feeling of disgust and hatred crept into my heart as I reflected that a hypochondriac and a bigot stood thus behind an engine of such power as a public press must generally be, controlling its operations and directing its force against the enemies of ignorance, superstition, and malice. I nearly turned away from the threshold in despair of accomplishing my purpose with one so bent out of the beauty and erectness of nature and virtue. I proceeded, however, partly from hope and partly from curiosity, and after having saluted him kindly, I brought forth the poems, requesting to know whether he would permit me to offer him a communication on the subject. He replied with an abrupt negative, "He had read the stuff, and did not like it."

"But, my dear sir," I replied, "I have read it also, and I do like it very much; and, although I do not profess my opinions to be better than yours, I imagine them as good. This young author's very bread depends upon this question, and it ought to be fairly discussed."

Our debate grew warm. I challenged him to prove his assertions out of the book itself. He could not. I taxed him with a violation of his duty as an editor, and his courtesy as a gentleman. He grew enraged, was thrown off his guard, and at length came out roundly with the secret cause of his severity.

"I hate that young man," he said, "and I hate his family. When I was a poor friendless adventurer his father pursued me. I became indebted to him, and he cast me into jail. Curse him and his for it; but I have gradually emerged from my obscure wretchedness into daylight and power. They who once scorned me, now fear me, and shall feel me; and I take delight in crushing the impotent shoots of those weeds and brambles which once opposed my progress."

I left him with a strong conviction of the important duties of editors. How necessary it is that they should be pure in their motives, clear in their minds, and with hearts true and gentle. How necessary that there should be ever present to them a benevolent wish to wound no feeling wantonly, to utter no opinion rashly. A careless stroke of their pen may inflict a wound that even they themselves shall be unable to heal.

I visited one other. He had done from carelessness what the first had perpetrated from malice, but he was young and ingenious, and ever open to conviction. I called him aside, and read him a few passages which I had previously marked. He was delighted. They were charming—beautiful. He would suppose them Moore's—but then—he had never seen them before. Where was the volume? Who was the writer? He should be impatient till he had made his readers acquainted with him. I handed him the work. He started, colored, and looked ashamed. (The writer of this is advanced in years, and felt privileged to address the young critic freely.)

"Yes, my friend," I said, "this timid and gifted young poet is ruined, and you have been among his destroyers. But how is this? You appear ignorant of what you have condemned."

"I am shocked at myself," he answered. "I looked hastily through it, but founded my opinion of it from that of a contemporary print."

I related the circumstance which had just occurred between myself and the editor of that journal, and so worked upon the conscience of my companion, that the very next day he publicly acknowledged his mistake, and gave the name of Edwin Delisle to the world as a writer of much more than ordinary promise.

I took the paper containing the article, and with a feeling of light-heartedness almost boyish, started for the quiet and darkened room of the disappointed student. Quiet it was, indeed, and dark. One or two members of the family in which he had resided, were gathered around the low couch, and gazing on a stiff, motionless form outstretched in death. It was the lonely enthusiast, in his last sleep, where "nothing can touch him further."

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

FROM THE COMIC OFFERING.

MISS BELL.

How oft by punsters have been teased
Poor girls, who thus are christen'd,
Obliged to seem most highly pleased,
Although they've scarcely listen'd!

If at a novel e'er we look,
We surely will be blamed;
For when we're seen to open a book,
We're blue bells quickly named!
From church on Sunday if we stay,
We hear from high and low,
"The church affairs must be astray,
The church bells did not go!"

If you with peevish folks agree,
'Tis said, with sick'ning grin,
"Whatever is advanced, you see,
Bell's certain to chime in!"

Some city beau, whom Ma desires
To ring the parlour bell,
Handing a ring to Miss, inquires,
"Will that not do as well?"

And if you e'er an orange eat,
Smart wit you're forced to feel;
For some, no doubt, your ears will greet
With "Bell, d'y'e like a peel?"

If out of town on Christmas-day,
You'll feel the bumpkin's wit,
Who says, all Bells a toll must pay,
And so you must submit!

Or if you get into a rage,
This rude affair to settle,
The wretch exclaims, "I will engage You're made o' rare Bell-metal!"

Then at the letter-sending time
Of foolish Valentine,
Who is it that can't find a rhyme
To such a name as mine?

Thus, "Dear Miss Bell, I love you well;
Oh, more than tongue can tell!
A long farewell—a soothing spell!"—
All these will rhyme with Bell!

"Within my cot in yonder dell,
Oh, come with me and dwell!
There sweetbrier yields its fragrant smell!"—
All these will rhyme with Bell!

"I suffer disappointment fell,
Death's aim I can't repel;
Soon will be heard my funeral knell—
And you'll be my death-Bell!"

There's nonpareil, and parallel,
Compel, expel, and sell,
Rebel, and smell, impel, and yell—
And more that rhyme with Bell!

Whene'er friends come to visit us,
If I should say a word,
My aunt observes, (quite in a fuss),
"Bell's tongue too loud is heard!"

Quite angry, I then silent sit,
Nor let them hear a tone,
Then some one says, with teasing wit,
"You're quite a dumb-bell grown!"

If 'twere not wrong to hang oneself,
I'd try Bell-ropes, I vow;
But then they'd say, "That silly elf
A Bell-hanger is now!"

I hope the coachman, when I die,
To church will hurry well,
A final pun, the folks may cry,
"There's Canterbury Bell!"

To ring the changes on my name,
I fear is rather bold;
So now I stop my tongue through shame,
Though more I might have told!

LOVE AND THE MYRTLE-LEAF.

From the French.

Upon a myrtle-leaf I swore—
When hearts and myrtles were in bloom—
My gentle Laura to adore,
And love her "to the crack of doom."
But mark the moral of my lay,
That proves love light as any feather;
An envious zephyr blew away
The myrtle-leaf and vow together!

A BYSTANDER'S POWER OF REGULATING DREAMS.

Dreams can be produced by whispering into the ears when a person is asleep. One of the most curious, as well as authentic examples of this kind has been referred to by several writers: I find the particulars in a paper by Dr. Gregory, and they were related to him by a gentleman who witnessed them. The subject of it was an officer in the expedition to Louisburg, in 1758, who had this peculiarity in so remarkable a degree, that his companions in the transport were in the constant habit of amusing themselves at his expense. They could produce in him any kind of dream, by whispering into his ear, especially if this was done by a friend with whose voice he was familiar. At one time they conducted him through the whole progress of a quarrel, which ended in a duel; and, when the parties were supposed to be met, a pistol was put into his hand, which he fired, and was awakened by the report. On another occasion they found him asleep on the top of a locker, or bunker, in the cabin, when they made him believe he had fallen overboard, and exhorted him to save himself by swimming. They then told him that a shark was pursuing him, and entreated him to dive for his life. He instantly did so, with such force as to throw himself entirely from the locker upon the cabin floor, by which he was much bruised, and awakened of course. After the landing of the army at Louisburg, his friends found him asleep in his tent, and evidently much annoyed by the cannonading. They then made him believe that he was engaged, when he expressed great fear, and showed an evident disposition to run away. Against this they remonstrated, but, at the same time, increased his fears by imitating the groans of the wounded and the dying; and when he asked, as he often did, who was down, they named his particular friends. At last they told him that the man next himself in the line had fallen, when he instantly sprang from his bed, rushed out of the tent, and was roused from his danger and his dream together by falling over the tent ropes. A remarkable circumstance in this case was that, after these experiments, he had no distinct recollection of his dreams, but only a confused feeling of oppression or fatigue; and used to tell his friend that he was sure that he was playing some trick upon him. A case entirely similar is related in Smellie's Natural History, the subject of which was a medical student at the University of Edinburgh.

A singular fact has often been observed in dreams which are excited by a noise, namely, that the same sound awakens the person, and produces a dream, which appears to him to occupy a considerable time. The following example of this has been related to me: A gentleman dreamt that he had enlisted as a soldier, joined his regiment, deserted, was apprehended, carried back, tried, condemned to be shot, and, at last, led out for execution. After all the usual preparations, a gun was fired; he awoke with the report, and found that a noise in an adjoining room had both produced the dream and awakened him. The same want of the notion of time is observed in dreams from other causes. Dr. Gregory mentions a gentleman who, after sleeping in a damp place, was for a long time liable to a feeling of suffocation whenever he slept in a lying posture, and this was always accompanied by a dream of a skeleton, which grasped him violently by the throat. He could sleep in a sitting posture without any uneasy feeling; and, after trying various experiments, he at last had a sentinel placed beside him, with orders to awake him whenever he sunk down. On one occasion he was attacked by the skeleton, and a severe and long struggle ensued before he awoke. On finding fault with his attendant for allowing him to lie so long in such a state of suffering, he was assured that he had not lain an instant, but had been awakened the moment he began to sink. The gentleman, after a considerable time, recovered from the affection. Dr. Abercrombie.

ANECDOTES OF ANIMALS.

A SINGULAR DEVICE.—A singular circumstance, exhibiting in a remarkable degree the reflecting faculties of a wolf, is related as having taken place at Signy le Petit, a small town on the borders of Champagne. A farmer, one day, looking through the hedge of his garden, observed a wolf walking round about his mule, but unable to get at him, on account of the mule's constantly kicking with his hind legs. As the farmer perceived that his beast was so well able to defend itself, he considered it unnecessary to render him any assistance. After the attack and defence had lasted fully a quarter of an hour, the wolf ran off to a neighboring ditch, where he several times plunged into the water. The farmer imagined he did this to refresh himself after the fatigue he had sustained, and had no doubt that his mule had gained a complete victory; but in a few minutes the wolf returned to the charge, and approaching as near as he could to the head of the mule, shook himself, and spurted a quantity of water into the mule's eyes, which caused him immediately to shut them. That moment the wolf leaped upon him, and killed the poor mule before the farmer could come to his assistance.

OLD SPARROWS ARE NOT CAUGHT WITH STRAWS.—A cat, belonging to an elderly lady in Bath, was so attached to her mistress, that she would pass the night in her bed-chamber, which was four stories high. Outside the window was the parapet wall on which the lady often strewed crumbs for the sparrows that came to partake of them. The lady always sleeping with her window open, the cat would pounce upon the birds and kill them. One morning, giving a "longing, lingering look" at the top of the wall, and seeing it free from crumbs, she was at a loss for an expedient to decoy the feathered tribe, when reconnoitering, she discovered a small bunch of wheat suspended in the air, which she sprang at and succeeded in getting down. She then carried it to the favorite resort of the sparrows, and actually threshed the corn out by beating it on the wall, then hiding herself. After a while the birds came, and she resumed her favorite sport of killing the dupes of her sagacity.

THE SPARROW PROTECTED.—M. Hecart, of Valenciennes, procured the kitten of a wild cat, which he so effectually tamed, that she became the friend and protector of a domesticated sparrow. M. Hecart always allowed the sparrow to fly about at perfect liberty. One day, a cat belonging to a neighboring house, had seized upon this sparrow, and was making off with it; but this wild cat, observing her at the very moment, flew at puss, and made her quit the bird, which she brought bleeding and half dead, to her master. She seemed, from her manner, really to sympathize very sincerely with the situation of the poor sparrow, and rejoiced when it recovered from the injury, and was again able to amuse itself with this wild grimalkin.

SURE INDICATORS OF EARTHQUAKES.—The following extraordinary anecdote of the sensibility of cats to approaching danger from earthquakes is well authenticated. In the year 1783, two cats belonging to a merchant of Messina, in Sicily, announced to him the approach of an earthquake. Before the first shock was felt, these two animals seemed anxious to work their way through the door of a room in which they were. Their master, observing their fruitless efforts, opened the door for them. At a second and third door, which they likewise found shut, they repeated their efforts, and on being set completely at liberty, they ran straight through the street, and out of the gate of the town. The merchant, whose curiosity was excited by this strange conduct of the cats, followed them into the fields, where he again saw them scratching and burrowing in the earth. Soon after there was a violent shock of an earthquake, and many of the houses of the city fell down, of which number the merchant's was one; so that he was indebted for his life to the singular foresight of his cats.

INSTINCT OF A SHEEP.—The following anecdote is really worthy of being told by the Ettrick Shepherd, or the poet of the lakes, and we therefore regret that the incident did not happen in the vicinity of "still St. Mary's Loch," or on the pastoral braes of Westmoreland. A gentleman of Inverness, on a recent journey in the Highlands, while passing through a lonely and unfrequented district, observed a sheep hurrying towards the road before him, as if to interrupt his progress, and at the same time bleating most piteously. On approaching nearer, the animal redoubled its cries, and looking significantly in the face of the traveller, seemed to implore some favor or assistance at his hands. Touched with a sight so unusual, the gentleman alighted, and leaving his gig, followed the sheep to a field in the direction whence it came. There, in a solitary cairn, at a considerable distance from the road, the sheep halted, and the traveler found a lamb completely wedged in betwixt two large stones of the cairn, and struggling feebly, with its legs uppermost. The gentleman instantly extricated the little innocent sufferer, and placed it safely on the neighboring green sward, while its overjoyed mother poured forth her thanks in a long-continued and grateful, if not a musical strain. EXTRACTS FROM THE NOVEL OF EUGENE ARAM.

Selected for the New-York Mirror.

ANGLING FOR TROUT.—Walter arrived at the banks of the little brooklet, and was awakened from his reverie by the sound of his own name. He started, and saw the old corporal seated on the stump of a tree, and busily employed in fixing to his line the mimic likeness of what anglers, and, for aught we know, the rest of the world, call the "violet fly."

"Ha! master—at my day's work, you see—fit for nothing else now. When a musket's half worn out, schoolboys buy it—pop it at sparrows. I be like the musket: but never mind—have not seen the world for nothing. We get reconciled to all things: that's my way—ugh! Now, sir, you shall watch me catch the finest trout you have seen this summer: know where he lies—under the bush yonder. Whi—sh, sir! whi—sh!"

The corporal now gave his warrior soul up to the due guidance of the violet-fly; now he whipped it lightly on the wave; now he slid it coquettishly along the surface; now it floated, like an unconscious beauty, carelessly with the tide; and now, like an artful prude, it affected to loiter by the way, or to steal into designing obscurity under the shade of some overhanging rock. But none of these manœuvres captivated the wary old trout, on whose acquisition the corporal had set his heart; and what was especially provoking, the angler could see distinctly the dark outline of the intended victim, as it lay at the bottom—like some well-regulated bachelor, who eyes from afar the charms he has discreetly resolved to neglect.

The corporal waited till he could no longer blind himself to the displeasing fact that the violet-fly was wholly inefficacious; he then drew up his line, and replaced the condemned beauty of the violet-fly with the novel attraction of the yellow-dun.

"Now, sir," whispered he, lifting up his finger, and nodding sagaciously to Walter. Softly dropped the yellow-dun upon the water, and swiftly did it glide before the gaze of the latent trout; and now the trout seemed aroused from his apathy: behold, he moved forward, balancing himself on his fins; now he slowly ascended towards the surface; you might see all the speckles of his coat—the corporal's heart stood still—he is now at a convenient distance from the yellow-dun; lo, he surveys it steadfastly; he ponders, he sees himself to and fro. The yellow-dun sails away in affected indifference, that indifference whets the appetite of the hesitating gazer, he darts forward; he is opposite the yellow-dun—he pushes his nose against it with an eager rudeness—he—no, he dares not bite, he recoils, he gazes again with surprise and suspicion on the little charmer; he fades back slowly into the deeper water, and then suddenly turning his tail towards the disappointed bait, he makes off as fast as he can—yonder, yonder, and disappears! No, that's he leaping yonder from the wave; Jupiter! what a noble fellow! What leaps he at?—a real fly—"D—his eyes!" growled the corporal.

"You might have caught him with a minnow," said Walter, speaking for the first time.

"Minnow!" repeated the corporal gruffly, "ask your honor's pardon. Minnow!—I have fished with the yellow-dun these twenty years, and never knew it fail before. Minnow!—baugh! But ask pardon; your honor is very welcome to fish with a minnow if you please it."

"Thank you, Bunting. And pray what sport have you had to-day?"

"Oh—good, good sir," quoth the corporal, snatching up his basket and closing the cover, lest the young squire should pry into it. No man is more tenacious of his secrets than your true angler. "Sent the best home two hours ago: one weighed three pounds, on the faith of a man; indeed, I'm satisfied now; time to give up;" and the corporal began to disjoint his rod.

It has been observed, and there is a world of homely, ay, and of legislative knowledge in the observation, that wherever you see a flower in a cottage-garden, or a birdcage at the window, you may feel sure that the cottagers are better and wiser than their neighbors.

What is civilization but an increase of human disparities? The more the luxury of the few, the more startling the wants and the more galling the sense of poverty. Even the dreams of the philanthropist only tend towards equality; and where is equality to be found but in the state of the savage!

How poor, even in this beautiful world, with the warm sun and fresh air about us, that alone are sufficient to make us glad, would be life, if we could not make the happiness of others!

Youth, beauty, pomp, what are these, in point of attraction, to a woman's heart, when compared to eloquence?—the magic of the tongue is the most dangerous of all spells.

Genius makes many enemies, but it makes sure friends—friends who forgive much, who endure long, who exact little.

I never see the impetuous and yearning spirit of youth without a certain and, it may be, a painful interest. How feeble is the chance that its hopes will be fulfilled! Enough, if it lose not all its loftier aspirations, as well as its brighter expectations.

There is something in those bitter feelings which are the offspring of disappointed love, something in the intolerable anguish of well-founded jealousy, that when the first shock is over, often hardens, and perhaps elevates the character. The sterner powers that we arouse within us to combat a passion that can no longer be worthily indulged, are never afterwards wholly allayed. Like the allies which a nation summons to its bosom to defend it from its foes, they expel the enemy only to find a settlement for themselves. The mind of every man who conquers an unfortunate attachment becomes stronger than before; it may be for evil, it may be for good, but the capacities for either are more vigorous and collected.

I incline to believe that the more persons advance in years, the more, even if of staid and sober temper themselves, they love gaiety and elasticity in youth. I have often pleased myself by observing in some happy family circle embracing all ages, that it is the liveliest and wildest child that charms the grandsire the most. And, after all, it is, perhaps, with characters as with books, the grave and thoughtful may be more admired than the light and cheerful, but they are less liked.

In the pure heart of a girl loving for the first time, love is far more ecstatic than in man, inasmuch as it is unfettered by desire—love then and there makes the only state of human existence which is at once capable of calmness and transport!

Words at best are but a poor vent for a wronged and burning heart.

It is better to sow a good heart with kindness than a field with corn, for the heart's harvest is perpetual.

There are seasons, often in the most dark or turbulent periods of our life, when, why we know not, we are suddenly called from ourselves, by the remembrances of early childhood: something touches the electric chain, and, lo! a host of shadowy and sweet recollections steal upon us. The wheel rests—the oar is suspended, we are snatched from the labor and travail of present life; we are born again, and live anew. As the secret page in which the characters once written seem for ever effaced, but which, if breathed upon, gives them again into view, so the memory can revive the images invisible for years; but while we gaze, the breath recedes from the surface, and all one moment so vivid, with the next moment has become once more a blank.

The doubt and the fear—the caprice and the change which agitate the surface, swell also the tides of passion. Woman, too, whose love is so much the creature of her imagination, always asks something of mystery and conjecture in the object of her affection. It is a luxury to her to perplex herself with a thousand apprehensions; and the more restlessly her lover occupies her mind, the more deeply he enthralled it.

No man forgets respect to another who knows the value of respect to himself.

OCCUPATION AND DURATION OF LIFE.

Amongst men of genius, or those who have distinguished themselves in science or literature, life is, at least in modern times, of rather a short duration. Mr. D'Israeli, in his estimate of the literary character, mentions the excitement which all eminent men are accustomed to feel, and which, by acting physically on the brain, tends naturally to abridge life amongst such persons. But the late Niebuhr, the Roman historian, we remember, observes in one of his philosophical chapters, that nothing tends more to longevity than the contemplation of projects, which one has one's self conceived, in their progress to a successful development. Hence, generals, who have retired from the field, after having attained the objects of their warfare according to their wishes, are long-lived—and the historian adduces as an example of what he says, the case of Camillus. We can ourselves quote many modern instances to confirm this opinion. Marlborough, one of the most fortunate leaders that ever commanded an army, lived rather too long for his own reputation. We sincerely hope that our posterity will not have to repeat the same thing of the Marlborough who succeeded him, and who, under the name of Wellington, carried the glory of the British arms to the ends of the earth. Perhaps it is for a contrary reason that we see so few British statesmen live long in office. Those who lead a party, and are unsuccessful in their plans, die almost always prematurely. Witness Pitt, Fox, Canning, &c. But the great Bacon died in his sixty-fourth year; Newton at eighty-four; Harvey, (the discoverer of the circulation,) at eighty-eight; Linnæus, at seventy-one; Leibnitz, at seventy; Galileo, at seventy. On the contrary, Bichat, a modern, died in his thirty-fourth year; and Davy before he reached sixty. Amongst one thousand seven hundred cases of persons in all classes of society, who have reached the age of a hundred, only one literary man was to be found, and that was Fontenelle. We have before us a list of nearly three hundred persons, men and women, in all parts of the United Kingdom, who had attained to a great age (in no instance less than one hundred) during the term of years beginning with 1807, and ending in 1823, both included, and we cannot discover throughout the whole catalogue a single name that has linked itself with an expression or a deed worthy of being remembered for an hour. So true is it, as an illustrious man has profoundly said, and as the only rival of that man's splendid fame which the modern world could produce, has repeated, "The duties of life are more than life." Rather a curious confirmation of Niebuhr's doctrine just mentioned, is to be found in the ages of all the successful painters. The Italian artists, with very few exceptions, lived long:—Titian was ninety-six; Spennello was nearly one hundred; Carlo Cignani, ninety-one; Michael Angelo, ninety; Leonardo da Vinci, seventy-five; Calabresi, eighty-six; Claude Lorraine, eighty-two; Carlo Maratta, eighty-eight; Tentoretti, eighty-two; Sebastian Ricci, seventy-eight; Francesco Albano, eighty-eight; Guido, sixty-eight; Guercino, seventy-six; John Baptist Crespi, seventy-six; Giuseppe Crespi, eighty-two; Carlo Dolce, seventy; Andrew Sacchi, seventy-four; Zucharelli, eighty-six; Vernet, seventy-seven; and Schiden, seventy-six. Monthly Review.

A MISTAKE OF COURTSHIP.

Personal resemblances are no doubt very frequently so strong as to be confounded easily. I knew an instance of a person paying his addresses to one sister, and offering to the other by mistake, was accepted and married; and he did not discover the blunder until he found his spouse cared not for the charms of music, an accomplishment which the original object of his affections possessed. I also knew of an instance in which a person ran away with a young lady, where he thought he had made a sudden conquest; but it turned out that she mistook him for his brother. Since, however, the ancients personated love as blind, such little mistakes are not to be wondered at, although, to the cool observant eye of the naturalist, perhaps, the trifling discrepancies overlooked occasionally will always be manifest. Metropolitan.

THE DRAMA.

THE NEW-YORK STAGE.

PARK.—A series of operas have been represented to fair houses. A splendid new drama, entitled "Victorine, or I'll sleep on it," has been quite successful, and will have a run. Mr. Barnes's benefit was well attended. The new opera of the "Maid of Judah," will be produced immediately, and another, touching which a great deal of expectation prevails among the amateurs, is in preparation, under the direction of one whose brilliant success in Cinderella has won for him the implicit confidence of the public. A word to the managers by the way:—A little more attention to the stage business is desirable. The servants, for instance, should be in li-beries, not in an ordinary street-dress, by no ways extraordinary for neatness. A stricter discipline should also be adopted respecting the entrances of the dramatis personæ. There is an awkward carelessness in this respect, which is an imposition on the patience of the most good-natured audience in the world. From certain of the ladies and gentlemen, and especially the chorus singers, less laughing and talking would, perhaps, be as well. If the latter could make it convenient to postpone some of those little confidential communications of a general nature, which they occasionally indulge in with the gentlemen of the orchestra, it would be more agreeable.

RICHMOND-HILL.—Mr. Russel, we understand, is about laying out his strength upon the production of the "Forty Thieves." It will probably insure a succession of good houses.

LETTERS FROM PARIS.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF EUROPE.

NUMBER SEVEN.

Joachim Lelewel—Palais Royal—Pere la Chaise—Versailles, etc.

I MET at a breakfast party to-day Joachim Lelewel, the celebrated scholar and patriot of Poland. Having fallen in with a great deal of revolutionary and emigrant society since I have been in Paris, I have often heard his name, and looked forward to meeting him with high pleasure and curiosity. His writings are passionately admired by his countrymen. He was the principal of the university, idolized by that effective part of the population, the students of Poland; and the fearless and lofty tone of his patriotic principles is said to have given the first and strongest momentum to the ill-fated struggle just over. Lelewel impressed me very strongly. Unlike most of the Poles, who are erect, athletic, and florid, he is thin, bent, and pale, and were it not for the fire and decision of his eye, his uncertain gait and sensitive address would convey an expression almost of timidity. His form, features, and manners are very like those of Percival, the American poet, though their countenances are marked with the respective difference of their habits of mind. Lelewel looks like a naturally modest, shrinking man, worked up to the calm resolution of a martyr. The strong stamp of his face is devoted enthusiasm. His eye is excessively bright, but quiet and habitually downcast—his lips are set firmly, but without effort, together—and his voice is almost sepulchral, it is so low and calm. He never breaks through his melancholy, though his refugee countrymen, except when Poland is alluded to, have all the vivacity of French manners, and seem easily to forget their misfortunes. He was silent, except when particularly addressed, and had the air of a man who thought himself unobserved, and had shrunk into his own mind. I felt that he was winning upon my heart every moment. I never saw a man in my life whose whole air and character were so free from self-consciousness or pretension—never one who looked to me so capable of the calm, lofty, unconquerable heroism of a martyr.

"Paris is the centre of the world," if centripetal tendency is any proof of it. Every thing struck off from the other parts of the universe flies straight to the Palais Royal. You may meet in its thronged galleries, in the course of an hour, representatives of every creed, rank, nation, and system under heaven. Hussein Pasha and Don Pedro pace daily the same pavé, the one brooding on a kingdom lost, the other on the throne he hopes to win—the Polish general and the proscribed Spaniard, the exiled Italian conspirator, the contemptuous Turk, the well-dressed negro from Hayti, and the silk-robed Persian, revolve by the hour together round the same jet d'eau—and costumes of every cut and color, moustaches and beards of every degree of ferocity and oddity, press so fast and thick upon the eye that one forgets to be astonished. There are no such things as "lions" in Paris. The extraordinary persons outnumber the ordinary. Every other man you meet would keep a small town in a ferment for a month.

I spent yesterday at Pere la Chaise, and to-day at Versailles. The two places are in opposite environs, and of very opposite characters—one certainly making you in love with life, the other almost as certainly with death. One could wander forever in the wilderness of art at Versailles, and it must be a restless ghost that could not content itself with Pere la Chaise for its elysium.

This beautiful cemetery is built upon the broad ascent of a hill, commanding the whole of Paris at a glance. It is a wood of small trees, laid out in alleys and crowded with tombs and monuments of every possible description. You will scarce get through it without being surprised into a tear; but if affection and fantasticalness in such a place do not more grieve than amuse you, you will much oftener smile. The whole thing is a melancholy mock of life. Its distinctions are all kept up. There are the fashionable avenues, lined with costly chapels and monuments, with the names of the exclusive tenants in golden letters upon the doors, iron railings set forbiddingly about the shrubs, and the blessing-scrap writ ambitiously in Latin. The tablets record the long family titles, and the offices and honors, perhaps the numberless virtues of the dead. They read like chapters of heraldry more than like epitaphs. It is a relief to get into the outer alleys, and see how poverty and simple feeling express what should be the same thing. It is usually some brief sentence, common enough, but often exquisitely beautiful in this prettiest of languages, and expressing always the kind of sorrow felt by the mourner. You can tell, for instance, by the sentiment simply, without looking at the record below, whether the deceased was young or much loved, or mourned by husband, or parent, or brother, or a circle of all. I noticed one, however, the humblest and simplest monument perhaps in the whole cemetery, which left the story beautifully untold. It was a slab of common marl, inscribed "Pauvre Marie!" nothing more. I have thought of it, and speculated upon it a great deal since. What was she? and who wrote her epitaph? why was she pauvre Marie?

Before almost all the poorer monuments is a miniature garden with a low wooden fence, and either the initials of the dead sown in flowers, or rose-trees, carefully cultivated, trained to hang over the stone. I was surprised to find in a public cemetery in December roses in full bloom and valuable exotics at almost every grave. It speaks both for the sentiment and delicate principle of the people. Few of the more costly monuments were either interesting or pretty. One struck my fancy—a small open chapel, large enough to contain four chairs, with the slab facing the door, and a crucifix, encircled with fresh flowers on a simple shrine above. It is a place where the survivors in a family might come and sit any time, no where more pleasantly. From the chapel I speak of, you may look out and see all Paris, and I can imagine how it would lessen the feeling of desertion and forgetfulness that makes the anticipation of death so dreadful to be certain that your friends would come, as they may here, and talk cheerfully and enjoy themselves near you, so to speak. The cemetery in summer must be one of the sweetest places in the world. It would be a sufficient inducement of itself to bring me to Paris from almost any distance in another season.

Versailles is a royal summer chateau, about twelve miles from Paris, with a demesne of twenty miles in circumference. Take that for the scale, and imagine a palace completed in proportion in all its details of grounds, ornament, and architecture. It cost, says the guide book, two hundred and fifty millions of dollars! and, leaving your fancy to expend that trifling over a residence, which (remember) is but one out of some half-dozen occupied during the year by a single family, I commend the republican moral to your consideration, and proceed with the more particular description of my visit.

My friend, Dr. Howe, was my companion. We drove up the grand avenue on one of the loveliest mornings that ever surprised December with a bright sun and a warm south wind. Before us, at the distance of a mile, lay a vast mass of architecture, with the centre falling back between the two projecting wings, the whole crowning a long and gradual ascent of which the tri-colored flag waving against the sky from the central turrets was the highest point. As we approached, we noticed an occasional flash in the sun, and a stir of bright colors through the broad, deep court between the wings, which, as we advanced nearer, proved to be a body of about two or three thousand lancers and troops of the line under review. The effect was indescribably fine. The gay uniforms, the hundreds of tall lances, each with its red flag flying in the wind, the imposing crescent of architecture in which the array was embraced, the ringing echo of the grand military music from the towers, and all this intoxication for the positive senses, fused with the historical atmosphere of the place, the recollection of the king and queen, whose favorite residence it had been, (the unfortunate Louis and Marie Antoinette) of the celebrated women who had lived in their separate palaces within its grounds, of the genius and chivalry of court after court that had made it, in turn, the scene of their brilliant follies, and, over all, Napoleon, who must have rode through its gilded gates with the thought of pride that he was its imperial master by the royalty of his great nature alone, it was, in truth, enough, the real and the ideal, to dazzle the eyes of a simple republican.

After gazing at the fascinating show an hour, we took a guide and entered the palace. We were walked through suite after suite of cold apartments, desolately splendid with gold and marble, and crowded with costly pictures, till I was sick and weary of magnificence. The guide went before, saying over his rapid rigmarole of names and dates, giving us about three minutes to a room in which there were some twenty pictures, perhaps, of which he presumed he had told us all that was necessary to know. I fell behind, after a while, and as a considerable English party had overtaken and joined us, I succeeded in keeping one room in the rear, and enjoying the remainder in my own way.

The little marble palace, called "Petit Trianon," built for Madame Pompadour in the garden grounds, is a beautiful affair, full of what somebody calls "affectionate-looking rooms;" and "Grand Trianon," built also on the grounds at the distance of half a mile, for Madame Maintenon, is a very lovely spot, made more interesting by the preference given to it over all other places by Marie Antoinette. Here she amused herself with her Swiss village. The cottages and artificial "mountains," (ten feet high, perhaps,) are exceedingly pretty models in miniature, and probably illustrate very fairly the ideas of a palace-bred fancy upon natural scenery. There are glens and grottos, and rocky beds for brooks, that run at will, ("les rivières à volonte," the guide called them,) and trees set out upon the crags at most uncomfortable angles, and every contrivance to make a lovely lawn as inconveniently like nature as possible. The Swiss families, however, must have been very amusing. Brought fresh from their wild country, and set down in these pretty mock cottages, with orders to live just as they did in their own mountains, they must have been charmingly puzzled. In the midst of the village stands an exquisite little Corinthian temple; and our guide informed us that the cottage which the queen occupied at her Swiss tea-parties was furnished at an expense of sixty thousand francs—two not very Switzer-like circumstances.

It was in the little palace of Trianon that Napoleon signed his divorce from Josephine. The guide showed us the room, and the table on which he wrote. I have seen nothing that brought me so near Napoleon. There is no place in France that could have for me a greater interest. It is a little boudoir, adjoining the state sleeping-room, simply furnished, and made for familiar retirement, not for show. The single sofa, the small round table, the enclosing, tent-like curtains, the modest, unobtrusive elegance of ornaments and furniture, give it rather the look of a retreat fashioned by the tenderness and taste of private life than any apartment in a royal palace. I felt unwilling to leave it. My thoughts were too busy. What was the motive of that great man in this most affecting and disputed action of his life? That he loved Josephine with his whole power of loving, no one can doubt. That he was above making such a sacrifice to his ambition merely, I equally believe. There is but one other principle into which it can be resolved—one that has not been sufficiently weighed by those who have written upon his character, but which, as a spring of action, is second only to the ruling passion in the bosoms of men—the desire for offspring. I can conceive Napoleon's sacrifice of that glorious woman on no other ground, and, ascribing it to this, it more proves than discredits the tenderness of his great nature.

After having been threaded through the palaces, we had a few moments left for the grounds. They are magnificent beyond description. We know very little of this thing in America as an art; but it is one, I have come to think, that in its requisition of genius, is scarce inferior to architecture. Certainly, the three palaces of Versailles together, did not impress me so much as the single view from the upper terrace of the gardens. It stretches clear over the horizon. You stand on a natural eminence that commands the whole country, and the plan seems to you like some work of the Titans. The long sweep of the avenue, with a breadth of descent that at the first glance takes away your breath, stretching its two lines of gigantic statues and vases to the water level; the wide slumbering canal at its foot, carrying on the eye to the horizon like a river of an even flood lying straight through the bosom of the landscape; the side avenues almost as extensive; the palaces in the distant grounds, and the strange union altogether to an American, of as much extent as the eye can reach, cultivated equally with the trim elegance of a garden—all these, combining together, form a spectacle which nothing but nature's royalty of genius could design, and (to descend ungracefully from the climax,) which only the exactions of an unnatural royalty could pay for.

I think the most forcible lesson one learns at Paris is the value of time and money. I have always been told erroneously that it was a place to waste both. You could do so much with another hour, if you had it, and buy so much with another dollar, if you could afford it, that the reflected economy upon what you can command, is inevitable. As to the worth of time, for instance, there are some twelve or fourteen gratuitous lectures every day at the Sorbonne, the school of medicine and the college of France, by men like Cuvier, Say, Spurzheim, and others, each in his professed pursuit, the most eminent perhaps in the world; and there are the Louvre, and the Royal Library, and the Mazarin Library, and similar public institutions, all open to gratuitous use, with obsequious attendants, warm rooms, materials for writing, and perfect seclusion; to say nothing of the thousand interesting but less useful resorts with which Paris abounds, such as exhibitions of flowers, porcelains, mosaics, and curious handiwork of every description, and (more amusing and time-killing still) the never-ending changes of sights in the public places, from distinguished foreigners down to miracles of educated monkeys. Life seems most provokingly short as you look at it. Then, for money, you are more puzzled how to spend a poor pitiful franc in Paris (it will buy so many things you want) than you would be in America with the outlay of a month's income. Be as idle and extravagant as you will, your idle hours look you in the face as they pass, to know whether, in spite of the increase of their value, you really mean to waste them; and the money that slipped through your pocket, you know not how at home, sticks embarrassed to your fingers, from the mere multiplicity of the demands made for it. There are shops all over Paris called the "Vingt-cinq-sous," where every article is fixed at that price—twenty-five cents! They contain every thing you want, except a wife and fire-wood—the only two things difficult to be got in France. (The latter, with or without a pun, is much the dearer of the two.) I wonder that they are not bought out, and sent over to America on speculation. There is scarce an article in them that would not be held cheap with us at five times its purchase. There are bronze standishes for ink, sand, and wafers, pearl paper-cutters, spice-lamps, decanters, essence-bottles, sets of china, table-bells of all devices, mantle ornaments, vases of artificial flowers, kitchen utensils, dog-collars, canes, guard-chains, chess-men, whips, hammers, brushes, and every thing that is either convenient or pretty. You might freight a ship with them, and all good and well finished, at twenty-five cents the set or article! You would think the man was joking, to walk through his shop.

THE LAST NUMBER.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 9.—You ask me how I like —. I will confess it, — is a favorite with me; I say confess it, for I am aware that the admission will affect my own character as a man of sense with many people who read what he writes, are amused with it, and then lay it down with the ungracious remark, that "there is nothing in it—he is not sound." What do these sound people ever do? I hate sound people; I never was called sound myself. Stupid rascals, yet somehow they always get along. I recollect one in college, a very sound fellow, (I don't believe he had three ideas.) I have construed his Latin for him fifty times. Well, he became a doctor, as all sound people should, and wearing spectacles, and having a solemn, self-satisfied manner, got into business; and after a few years married a fair silly little girl with fifty thousand dollars. I met him last summer at the Springs, where I drank Congress water, and foreswore wine and trout dinners, being a little out of health and a good deal out of pocket. There he was, in all the importance of recent paternity, with his little wife, and his little cab, and his little child—all his—and a new suit of black and a pair of golden spectacles. He recognized me—hoped I was well—had seldom met me—what had I been about? and at dinner he sent me his bottle and drank wine with me. All this was with a patronizing air and a superiority meant to be modestly veiled, but not concealed, which said more plainly than his words: "Ah! is that you? Come, I won't cut you. You were a genius in college, but I think I have rather got the start of you in life—You can't have been in the first society, or I should have seen more of you—poor fellow! I suppose you haven't got along very well in the world—(you see me! my wife, my cab, my child, my new clothes, and my golden spectacles)—you can't afford to drink wine, eh! you shall have some of mine. I'll drink with you. Your health, sir." These attentions were received by me with the greatest deference: it was amusing; but it was not very amusing neither, for it is but a poor joke which a man has all to himself. I succeeded, however, in convincing the fellow that I coincided with him in the opinion that he was much the greater man of the two; and I heard him whisper, in reply to some interrogatory of a friend, that I "had talents—talents unquestionably—but," and then he shrugged his right shoulder, and shook his head; which pantomimic exhibition I interpreted, "he is not one of us—he is not sound." Again, I say, the deuce take all sound people!

But — Let him not mind his critics. He is read, he is admired, and he is talked about: what more does he want? He is in Europe now, writing sketches; and very delightful sketches they are. His enemies are most magnanimous—and who shall dispute their bravery? Do they not attack him four thousand miles off?

The long speeches here (in your ear, Tom,) are rather tiresome affairs. What with the heat, and the crowd, and standing from breakfast to dinner, I think that I fairly earn all I hear. I prefer a brisk little debate.

The senate-chamber is not so large that you cannot in it form a perfect idea of the faces and personal appearance of the senators. You soon learn who they all are, at least all whom you wish to know. The shape of the room is semi-circular, and it is equally divided by a passage leading from the principal entrance to the president's chair. On each side of this passage are arranged the seats and desks of the members in three rows; the first row, or the row nearest to the president, containing six seats, the second eight, and the third ten, making on each side twenty-four, and altogether forty-eight seats, being the precise number of senators. With some exceptions, the southern and anti-tariff members are on the right, and the northern tariff members on the left of the president.

On the third row, near the extreme right, sits Mr. Benton, of Missouri, well known for long speeches and other matters not worth mentioning just now. He is a fat fair man, apparently some years under fifty, with very small hands, and a large and rather handsome face, with a peculiarly self-satisfied expression. As a speaker he is fluent, his voice clear and sweet, and his manner coaxing and conciliating; that is, when not excited: how he talks when he has worked himself into a fury, I have yet had no opportunity of judging. Near Mr. Benton is the still more noted Governor Troup, whose messages some years since used to set all the editors in the Union in commotion, and by whose dread name the Cherokee nurses were wont to still the cries of their Indian babies. He is a stern blue-beard looking sort of man: the expression of his face never changes, he never moves from his seat or position, never talks, and appears day after day in the same brown tight-bodied coat. He is just the thing to be the mystery of a watering-place. Next to Mr. Benton sits Mr. Kane, who is, I believe, the youngest man in the senate. He was elected, as I have been informed, as soon as eligible, that is, at the age of thirty, and is now, this being his second term, thirty-seven or thirty-eight. Next to Mr. Kane is Mr. Tyler, of Virginia, an honest-looking man; then Mr. Grundy, of Tennessee; and then Mr. Hayne, the orator of the south. Two or three seats further, and directly on your left, as you enter the senate-chamber, sits a remarkably handsome old gentleman, with a frank intelligent expression of countenance, large projecting eyes, and thick curling gray hair falling down behind. He appears rather infirm, and is careless, slovenly perhaps, in his dress. You like him instantly; you cannot doubt that he is an honorable (and withal companionable) person and an open and bold and independent politician. This is Mr. Tazewell; and for once, I believe, physiognomy is not at fault.

About the centre of the right you will observe Mr. Forsyth, of Georgia; handsome, rather well-dressed, with uncommonly white and regular teeth, which, in consequence of a habit of elevating his upper lip, are seldom many seconds invisible. He is a perfect contrast to his colleague, Governor Troup, in one respect, being very restless and uneasy in his seat, and continually talking to the members near him. Not far from Mr. Forsyth, in the third row, is General Smith, of Maryland; these two gentlemen, I believe, are leaders in the senate for the administration. General Smith appears to be for his age, which is near eighty, a hale vigorous man. On one side of him is Mr. White, a respectable old gentleman from Tennessee; and on the other Mr. Silsbee, a Salem merchant, with a remarkably long nose, and a man of sense. All these gentlemen sit on the right of the vice-president.

Mr. Clay's seat on the left corresponds, or nearly so, with that of Mr. Benton's on the right; and they are about as opposite in opinions as in position. Near Mr. Clay is Mr. Dallas, the newly-elected senator from Pennsylvania; and at some little distance Mr. Wilkins from the same state, a brother-in-law, and a rival candidate for the vice-presidency. Wilkins is, I should suppose, by some ten years the elder man, Dallas being (or looking) two or three and fifty. Not far from Mr. Dallas is another candidate for the vice-presidency, Dickerson, of New-Jersey.

Not far, if I recollect right, from Mr. Webster, or from each other, are your two New-York senators, Messrs. Dudley and Marcy. Mr. Dudley is a very large and remarkably handsome man. Nearly opposite to Mr. Tazewell is Mr. Holmes, of Maine; of whom I shall say nothing, unless that near him sits Mr. Isaac Hill.

Mr. Calhoun is not handsome, (though the ladies call him so,) nor has he what is termed a striking face. He has nothing of the "Southerner," (or Southron,) in voice or manner.

You had once, I think, and may have yet, a theatrical mania. Forrest has been acting Metamora with great success. Clara Fisher was here for two nights; a delightful little creature she is. I half fell in love with her for the third time.

I have been tempted to visit Charleston with an old friend, whom I have accidentally met. I have not yet made up my mind. Wherever I may be, you shall hear from me. Write more frequently, you rascal. Yours, &c. V.

THE FLY-MARKET LOAFER.

CHAPTER FIVE.

"Allow not nature more than nature needs—
Man's life is cheap as beasts."—LEAR.

THE exsiccative morning sun had evaporated the exsanguineous dew from the objects exposed in the irregular streets of our late umbrageous metropolis; the fatigued and uncolloquial queen of night had strided down hill to her western home, and the spherical and prismatic orbs which gem the cerulean and empyrean firmament, had retired with a well-bred deference to the immortal, magnificent, and hue-bestowing emperor of universal day. The orient vaporizations seemed metamorphosed into a general empyrosis; the female domiciliary assistants of the yet sleeping families had sallied out before their mansions with besoms, or brooms, in order to prevent the unwelcome accumulation of adventitious materials unfriendly to the reign of Hygeia. The soft and tuneful milkmen exercised their vocal abilities from various quarters, while the voice of those who from the simple flour, with other nutritious and heterogeneous substances, compound those manifold perpetuators of human existence, appellated loaves of bread, came clearly on the breeze, mingled with the momentarily augmenting hubbub. Now did the underlings of shopkeepers briskly prepare for their diarian exacerbations; faithful watchmen, now fairly awake, re-assumed their ordinary duties, and every circumambient object emitted unquestionable symptoms of metropolitan bustle.

The peruser of this insignificant but veracious history will, doubtless, be able to conjure up in the dim vistas of memory, a portion of terra firma in the southern angle of the city, denominated the Battery, separated by ancestral sagacity from the rest of the town, and, at present, deliciously devoted to love, beauty, and pleasure. And here let me pause for an evanescent period, to afford vent to that grateful stream of ravishing reminiscences (or, as our hero, with that winning simplicity and grace so characteristic of his class, was wont to pronounce them rumandessences) which now pour along my almost superannuated imagination, at the mention of that spot. Happy the historian who, in the course of his too frequently unappreciated peregrinations, pops upon a place of such a paradisaical quality. Thrice happy he to whom it is allotted by the favoring fates to beguile the slowly passing time in those shadowy and fragrant walks. Here are wont to resort hundreds of the inhabitants of this splendid city, arrayed in vestments varying with their pecuniary means. Here the pretty nurses bring their charge of children, to sport with them on the tender grass; here do lovers hie to unfold their timid thoughts, and poets to manufacture their extemporaneous verses; and here, when the soft moonlight falls, and raises in every bosom emotions of amorous rapture, we from our dull labors do ever and anon rove, to indulge in virtuous meditations, and, peradventure, partake of a grateful ice-cream, which may be had in the neighborhood for sixpence a glass.

On the present morning, as the day began to emit its effulgent coruscations in the east, though, perhaps, the world could scarcely have presented a scene of more enchanting, heart-inspiring, soul-melting loveliness, the good inhabitants were not yet awakened from their slumberous refreshments to enjoy it. An almost absolute solitude reigned on the spot, so deep, that the air itself appeared afraid to break it, but left the magnificent bay in mirrorstillness. A few sloops lay on its shining bosom, softened by the silvery morning haze. The dew hung in trembling drops on the branches of the trees and the blades of grass, and the picturesqueness of the prospect was considerably enhanced and magnified by the figure of an individual who might have formed a valuable subject for a Raphael or a Dominichino. It bore the appearance of a man extended on the verdant turf, firmly locked in the embraces of "tired nature's, sweet restorer." He was evidently a philosopher of the stoical sect, as his apparel clearly betrayed a Spartan love of severe economy and unassisted nature. Whether he had ever dwelt with enamored fancy upon the line of the poet—

"Beauty when unadorned, adorned the most,"

we shall not take it upon us to decide; but it was clearly evident that he acted upon the same principle. Envy itself could not accuse him of the remotest attempt at personal decoration. That noble disregard with which genius ever overlooks particulars, was visible in every part of his habilimentary system. His dilapidated pea-jacket had been intimately acquainted with the revolutionary vicissitudes of an incalculable number of summers and winters. That part of his shirt-collar which the insatiate hand of time had left, was washed only by the gentle showers of heaven, and nothing interfered with the gravity of his garb, except the fact that his linsey-woolsey trowsers had been at various periods patched, (probably by the fingers of the object of his affections) with pieces of various hues and shapes, affording a specimen of fanciful ornament inconsistent with the character of the illustrious individual by whom they were worn. His hair hung in matted masses about his temples. We need not add, that one who looked with an eye of pensive sadness upon the irresistible advances which luxury was accomplishing among the inhabitants of his beloved country, had never stooped to the effeminate use of a comb, that idle instrument by which women and vain men break up the majesty of nature. We would describe his hat, if he had possessed one to describe; but, alas! we blush to be so continually compelled to exhibit the unfeeling selfishness of human nature—some unworthy member of our race, had, while he slept, purloined that faithful companion of half his life, and would, doubtless, have stolen something else only that there was nothing else to steal.

Although jolly Phœbus, with all his might and main, was climbing up the acclivity of heaven, like some lusty brick-carrier ascending the ladder of a yet unfinished house; and, notwithstanding that the seclusion of his elysian place of retreat began to be intruded upon by the cold and heartless crowd, yet the mysterious stranger slept. He slept, careless of the world; peace and innocence reigned in his bosom. Alas! that peace was soon to be broken; that innocence to be betrayed. He was marked out by the unpropitious gods for woe. Scarcely had he turned, and kicking out his left leg to rescue himself from the fangs of a relentless mosquito, which had entered the aperture at the bottom of his shoe, and was taking breakfast upon his defenceless foot; scarcely, we say, had he turned, and with a snore louder than any of its periodical predecessors, and an expression of unguarded impatience, not uncommon among individuals of his high rank and education, exposed his features to the balmy morning air, when it was discovered (or, if any one had been there to examine, it might have been discovered) that he was no other than the Loafer himself; who, partly because he possessed that chivalric and Richard-the-lion-hearted species of taste, and partly because he had no other place to sleep, had selected this spot as the scene of his repose. His physiognomy presented an aspect calculated to strike terror and respect into every sensitive bosom. A person might have instantly seen, or to use a stronger and more elegant expression, "might have seen with half an eye," that he was recently from some of those martial exercises and warlike affrays, in which true sons of glory and choice spirits have in every age delighted to indulge. His nose was considerably swollen, and betrayed several consanguineous testimonials of having been brought forcibly in contact with some other object, (probably a human fist, strengthened in the excitement of pugnacious inspiration,) four of his front teeth were missing from their ranks, and one of his eyes presented that unnatural though not unusual phenomenon, expressed among the best writers by the phrase "banged-up."

The Loafer rose in a sitting position, and looked around, and then, by one of those powerful efforts of memory observed in great intellects on certain occasions, he seemed crossed by a vague and dreary recollection that there had once been a time when a hat had formed an item in the slender catalogue of his personal wardrobe. He cast his eyes (or rather, his eye, for only one possessed the power of beholding objects by visual perception) around him. It was no where to be seen. He inquired for it aloud, and in the tone of one accustomed to command. He was only answered by the rustle of the rising zephyr among the leaves, and the chirp of a bird which sang as if in mockery of his unhappy bereavement. Great minds are known by their actions in situations of this critical kind. A mere worldling might have hastened to search for the lost article—a woman would have wept—a passionate man would have sworn—a rich man would have gone and purchased another. How different from the Loafer! He wasted no time in futile meditations, but gradually closing his right optical organ—for his left, as the reader will have the goodness to remember, was closed already—he laid himself out composedly in a line of extension horizontal to the earth, and in another moment was in the land of Nod.

But what avails philosophy in a world like this? He had scarcely commenced a tender dream and murmured the name of his Polly, (or had time to do so, which is the same thing) when fate, who looked with an unfriendly eye upon his stoical indifference to her decrees, prepared a new trouble.

The elected fathers of this incomparable town, who take care to see that the streets are never cleaned and only half lighted, and who have an unconquerable antipathy to pigs and loafers, have always had in their employ an officer of high repute to guard this lovely promenade from their intrusion. The despot, who for many years had occupied this station, had now dispatched his breakfast and taken his horn, and with an efficient hickory stick in his dexter hand, approached the scene of action. Majesty shone in his features, especially his nose, which glowed like the firmament with "living sapphires." Shutting one eye, in order to assist him in seeing whatever was to be seen, he forthwith espied our hero, lulled by softest visions in innocent slumber. We shall not attempt to paint his wrath. Callous to every gentle feeling, he rushed towards the Loafer, who was at that very moment sitting down to an imaginary breakfast on tripe, prepared by her who, next to tripe, was dearest to his soul, when a pedestrial visitation put all his pleasant images to flight, and awakened him to a sense of his painful reality.

Perhaps the reader now expects a battle. True, the Loafer had a high sense of honor, but then the Battery-man had a long hickory stick, and was, moreover, invested with certain legal advantages of which experience had taught the Loafer to beware. He debated a moment whether he should follow the generous impulses of valor or the dignified dictates of reason. But an additional exercise of pedal power inclined him in favor of the latter, and casting from his remaining eye a glance expressive of a variety of conflicting emotions, he slowly went forth into Whitehall, and wended his way along the docks.

THE UGLY MAN.

I have the misfortune to be ugly. The length of my face, from some blunder, is horizontal; my nose is lowest where it should be highest, and in a thick-soled pair of boots I stand some inches short of five feet. To look upon me, one would think that nature had formed me in some frolicsome mood, to be the laughing-stock of her favorites. If so, she was never more successful. If I could divest myself of all selfish feelings, I should be happy; for, wherever I go, I see smiling faces, and my company is a source of never-failing pleasure. My entrance into a room has often dissipated clouds of the most threatening aspect, or removed at once those barriers of ceremony, which shut out all social enjoyment. Before I have completed the operation of opening my mouth, a simper has gone round the circle; and if I but say, "Good evening," it produces as much laughter as if I had made one of the wittiest speeches in the world. As to making a bow, I have given that up ever since an unsuccessful attempt, the winter before last, threw a most decorous old lady into such a paroxysm of laughter, that it was thought lucky that a month's illness was all she paid for twenty minute's mirth. In short I am such, that if I had lived in the time of Heraclitus, I doubt not that he would have given up his philosophy, burned his papers, and laughed out in utter despair.

But what is pleasure to others is death to me. I have often wished that I were hideous; that my features might terrify all beholders. "Any thing but contempt," I have said to myself—"hatred were far preferable." What renders the affronts that I receive doubly vexatious is, that they are of such a nature that I can take no notice of them. Once, indeed, driven to fury by half-a-dozen pretty-faced grinning coxcombs, I turned fiercely upon one of them, and, calling him an "impertinent puppy," told him, "that I should expect the satisfaction of a gentleman." But several of my friends persuaded me that it was so silly, and at the same time so boorish, to take offence at a good-natured laugh, that the least I could do was to make an apology; and an apology I made.

Perhaps the reader will say, that whatever may be my outward appearance, I may at least deserve and command respect by my virtues. No, sir; I believe that if I were possessed of but an ordinary share of either sense or virtue, I might lead a life of comparative ease; but my virtues are continually dragging me into notice. Nature, not in kindness but in cruelty, has given me a feeling heart and a lively imagination. It may appear vanity in me to speak thus; but so far am I from being vain of these qualities, that I have often wished (though I have despised myself for it) that I was one of the empty-headed, insipid, handsome men, whose face and form gave him such a superiority over me. I will give one instance, to convince you that my virtues serve but to render me still more ridiculous. The Poles, you may remember, were some time ago objects of interest, real or affected, to nearly all, and the continual topic of fashionable conversation. At this time I vindicated them warmly, in a full company, against a gentleman present; and said, "that for my own part, I should rejoice at nothing so much as, if it were in my power, to venture my life in their cause; and that I should be proud of every drop of blood that was spent in the cause of Poland and of Liberty." Whether it was the effect of my voice, look, or gestures I know not, but this speech was followed by an universal roar of laughter. I thought that it would never end, and could, with sincerity have exclaimed, with the fair Rosamond,

"Open, oh earth, and swallow me!"

I have one more incident to relate, which may, at the same time, explain the reason of your being troubled with this communication.

Among my female acquaintance is a young lady, who, though witty, and of a gay disposition, has never joined with her companions, in ridiculing and laughing at me. This evidence of good sense and good feeling gained my gratitude and esteem; and in the advances which I have made towards a better acquaintance, she treated me with kindness, and even seemed to receive pleasure from my conversation. Not to waste words, I fell in love with her; and, ugly as I am, I flattered myself that she perceived, and approved of my attachment, though, as yet, I had not mustered courage to declare it. It was some evenings since, that we were sitting together; the sun had just set—I hate descriptions; but the place, time, and every thing were as favorable as could be, for a sentimental conversation. "I suppose, Mr. B.," said my beloved, "that I need not ask you whether you are a sceptic in love; one of those who think, with the unfortunate Edwin, that love is but a name?" "Ma'am—I, ma'am," said I, not being prepared for such a question. "For my own part," continued she, "I have ever believed that love, true love, is the most virtuous feeling of the heart, and the most conducive to human happiness. Pray, Mr. B. have you ever been in love?" The most bashful men have some assurance; the most modest have some vanity. This hint encouraged me: I forgot my ugliness, and almost fancied myself one of those heroes of whom I used to delight to read. I was on the point of kneeling, when I heard a smothered laugh. I burn while I write—and, starting back in dismay, I perceived two or three young ladies, whom the false girl had concealed behind the sofa. It all flashed upon me at once—I had been made a fool of from beginning to end.

I will not describe my feelings when I returned home. I determined to leave the city, for I can never appear in it again after such a mortification.

It is for the sake of others, who are in the same situation as myself, that I have written this; and pray do you, Messrs. Editors, assure the fair sex, in whom, at least, such conduct as I have described can only arise from levity, that to laugh at a person does not prove superiority, and that an ugly man can feel!

BASIL HALL'S ACCOUNT OF THE AMERICAN DRURY.

Found among some of his loose papers.

The Park theatre has long been the admiration of every one who has never seen any other, and has invariably met the warm approbation of those who understand not a word about the matter. It is one of the principal buildings of New-York, standing very near the brick meeting-house, with St. Paul's church almost in front, and a house belonging to the Bible society immediately in the rear. It is well known to the world, that it was somewhat damaged by fire, and I cannot but sincerely regret the loss of the graceful brick pyramid which, I am told, used to stand on its top to the very great ornament of the whole street. But as that has long since tumbled into ruins, the managers have endeavored to improve it in a different manner. The beauty of the outside is a matter of serious astonishment, consisting of the best quality of colored plaster variegated by straight lines, which are ingeniously intended to imitate cracks. This gives it an appearance of venerable grandeur, calculated to strike the beholder with silent awe. Indeed, the munificence of its owners has spared neither plaster nor brown paint to impart to it a sombre cast, and anxious for improvement, they have changed it from its former color, which was yellow, here and there blackened with smoke, to one of becoming and unvaried brown. Mounting three most magnificent wooden steps, corresponding in richness to the whole of the exterior, you enter the outer lobby, at the right of which is a box-office. You purchase your ticket through a little hole in the door, and in a large crowd you must stand your chance with other adventurers of getting your arm broken. If successful in buying your ticket, you pursue your way, end your walk in the boxes, and find yourself in a large room with a flat ceiling. The seats are covered with beautiful red baize, and great care is taken in lighting the room to supply the audience with an equal degree of light and smoke. The orchestra is divided from the pit by a board partition, on the top of which, I understand, there used to be a row of iron points. These have been removed, but whether from an apprehension that they might injure the audience, or that the audience might injure them, I have been unable to discover. Several years ago, I also learn, the boxes were ornamented with paintings, which were much admired. No foolish attempts at illustrations from Shakspeare—no heads of eminent actors, &c., but beautiful pictures of ideal things which were never seen, heard, nor thought of but here. They used to be ornamented with little naked cupids, who appeared to be eating bread and butter, and rolling head over heels on brown roses and little cornucopie: but the present symbols are entirely above my comprehension, consisting of divers strange and astonishing flourishes which, were the secret but known, would doubtless be very beautiful. Over the stage is a lofty dome intended to convey to the audience the voices of the actors, who are incapable of doing it themselves. This dome is supported by four magnificent wooden columns, for the particular benefit of persons in the managers' boxes.

The scenery of this astonishing exhibition is admirable in the extreme. The same street answers for New-York, London, Paris, or Madrid—the most distant part of Russia, or ancient Greece. Often we see Monsieur Tonson's cottage snugly situated in Rome, and are delighted to behold Brutus haranguing the greasy citizens in a street like Broadway—iron railings, three story brick houses, lamp-posts, and all. I have been much pleased to witness the manner in which they manage to free themselves from the impertinent company of that sober prosing old dame, called common sense, and how sometimes they have rid themselves of her entirely. I have seen a large rock shake at the touch of a careless actor, and beheld trees which stood unmoved during all the horrors of a dramatic storm, tremble if any one perchance laid a hand upon them. I have known days, nights, and years to pass away while the musicians were playing yankee doodle; and once I remember to have been sadly puzzled upon beholding a charming girl make her appearance, who gave me to understand she was the same person I had half an hour ago beheld carried out in a bundle not much larger than my hat. The thunder and lightning, too, cannot be too much praised. The thunder is much superior to that of the heavens, which, in my opinion, is very rude, crashing and cracking as if it would break a body's bones: and the lightning is as crooked as can be, but here the thunder vents its fire in a few taps, somewhat resembling a drum, and the lightning is as soft and pretty as the flashing of a common train of powder.

I was not long since looking over the papers, when I saw Mr. Booth's benefit announced for that evening, and as I have often admired this gentleman, I determined to attend. The play, which was the Bride of Abydos, was supported to the pleasing astonishment of all parties. In the pirate's cave, when the chief discovers and embraces his son Selim, the delighted father turned to his turbaned associates with a most dignified air, pointed to him, and in a loud tone of voice, as if he intended to produce great effect, bid them behold that he knew and owned his son. Selim marched before them with surprising dignity, expecting, doubtless, to be received with transports, but the soldiers stood mute and motionless, and gaped around until somebody from behind the scenes whispered aloud, "why the devil don't you bow?" The head soldier upon hearing this, put his thumb and fore finger to his turban, thinking it was a Corjes hat. After he had finished, he told the next one what to do, and he the next, and so on until they had all made obeisance to the young chief, who, by the by, had now turned his back to them all and walked majestically to the back part of the stage. This being done, the play proceeded.

I was also much edified by the banquet scene, where Selim fires his two pistols, each of which killed its man. The scene changed, but as one of the bodies in the agonies of death had fallen too far out, it was knocked by the half of a handsome palace, which was just then making its appearance. The poor dead man, seeing no one near to take him away, concluded he had best do it himself, and actually jumped up with great agility, and scrambled out on all fours, upon which the audience were manifestly delighted, and gave him three rounds of applause, accompanied with many gratified smiles in token of their pleasure at his unexpected recovery. Numerous other beauties claim my attention, but as I must not too much encroach on the leisure of my reader, I will conclude with the consolation that he had better have not enough of my writings than too much.

FRAGMENT OF A LETTER.

You talk very seriously and pathetically about your afflictions, but the truth is, that you know nothing of the matter. Your distresses are but atoms to mine! Don't laugh at this assertion, for it is a mighty truth. Compared with me, you ought to be—nay, you are, a happy and enviable man. What are your griefs? Let me run over the black list, which you contemplate with such rueful solemnity, and discover, if I can, the dreadful intensity of its aggregate. You are not so young as you have been—your mistress is, and is likely to be for some time, absent—your favorite horse has fallen irrecoverably lame—your tenants are dilatory in their payments; and an inexorable doctor has laid an embargo upon your daily bottle. My dear fellow, I tell you again, you know nothing of misery; your lot in life is sunshine itself, contrasted with the stygian gloom of mine. Jack, were you ever dunned? Did you ever detect yourself without a dollar in your pocket, or the means of getting one in your imagination? Were you ever hopelessly in debt? Have you, in short, the slightest practical idea of the necessity of money, derived from a personal familiarity with that heaviest of all mortal curses, an absolute, bona fide, and unmitigated want of money?—not you. You are rich, Jack, and being rich, you are above the reach of real calamity. Of all your griefs, there is but one that I admit to be even unpleasant—of course I mean that devilish matter of the years. Yes, age, coming age, is an evil—a nuisance. The thought that death must come, is horrible—its sensible approach, appalling. I do not profess to be worse than the average of my fellow creatures, or to have cause to look forward upon the termination of my career with greater dread than many who profess indifference upon the subject.

Setting the question of age aside, therefore, I assert that you have nothing to complain of. There is nothing but your own laziness and want of energy, to prevent you from joining the adorable, were she even at the uttermost end of the earth, instead of a paltry intervening distance of five hundred miles. Mine is a million times more absolutely out of my reach, for she has a rich father, in whose eyes nothing but acres or bank stock may hope to find favor; and I am too much a man of honor to run away with her—to her and my certain exclusion from all participation in his goods and chattels. The misfortune of your horse is, indeed, unpleasant, particularly as far as you are personally attached to the animal; but you have others as good as he; or if you have not, you have money—money—money, wherewith you might buy many horses; and the acquisition of a new attachment is but the work of a fortnight. I have neither horse nor money. Your tenants are troublesome rascals—but I have no tenants at all; and, bad as they are, there is something pleasant in the sight of them about quarter-day, although even a part of the shekels be not forthcoming. Heavens! that I might once in my life be in the receipt of rents! Why, man, there is glory in the very sound. My tenants! rents! leases! Can you think over these things, Jack, and not feel your spirit bound within you, as at the sound of a trumpet?

Yes, my dear fellow, I confess, nay, I avow it, I deem poverty the greatest of all evils. It is the incubus that sits on the bosom, and puts to flight all the fair dreams of life. It is winter to the soul. It is chains to the limbs. It is disease. It is a dungeon. In it are concentrated every thing terrible and repulsive. From it is excluded every thing generous and inspiring, and happy. I am degraded by the same influence which renders me wretched. I would fling away years of my existence to gain wealth for the remainder. But, stop, Jack, I fear you misunderstand me. There are two observations you wish to make. I know you so perfectly well, dear Jack, with your gentle smile, and that cheerful way you have when you get into the sentimental and the philosophical. "But Fred," you would say, "believe me, you are mistaken. I am rich, yet I am not happy, or if I ever am happy, it is not from my riches. And again, there is a moral grandeur of character to be attained by experience and meditation, and doing one's duty, (your great word, Jack) which should sustain him through all possible trouble."

Well, Jack, to your first remark, I have only to say that I do not speak from the desire of wealth, but from the fear of poverty. I am timid, Jack, of all humiliation, and shrink from the rudeness, or the ill opinion even of a vulgar man, with the mute horror of a sensitive plant. Debt is my fiend, that breaks in upon all my pleasures, hopes, affections, and avocations; and as for your moral grandeur, dear, dear Jack, with a mournful sense of degradation I acknowledge that I have it not. I have relieved myself from the importunity of a dun by a promise which I knew I could not perform. Heaven knows, I am naturally sincere and frank. I have, (overlook my egotism,) I am sure I have noble impulses, and proud, nay, lofty aspirations; yes, and I have a cheerful and even a merry heart and affections that ought to unfold themselves beautifully and abundantly with the lavish fragrance of the best buds of June, had not they been ever withered and frozen in the cold bleak shadow that this same dreary, dreadful, pestilential poverty you speak so lightly of, has cast upon them.

LOVE AND POLITICS—A POET'S BIRTHDAY MEDITATION.

"Eheu fugaces, Posthume, Posthume, Labuntur anni."

ANOTHER year! alas, how swift,
Medora, these years flit by,
Like shadows thrown by clouds that drift
In flakes along a wintry sky.
Another year! another leaf
Is turned within life's volume brief,
And yet not one bright page appears
Of mine within that book of years.

There are some moments when I feel
As if it should not yet be so;
As if the years that from me steal
Had not a right alike to go,
And lose themselves in Time's dark sea,
Unbuoyed up by aught from me;
Aught that the Future yet might claim
To rescue from their wreck a name.

But it was love that taught me rhyme,
And it was thou that taught me love;
And if I in this idle chime
Of words a useless sluggard prove,
It was thine eyes the habit nursed,
And in their light I learnt it first.
It is thine eyes which, day by day,
Consume my time and heart away.

And often bitter thoughts arise
Of what I've lost in loving thee,—
And in my breast my spirit dies,
The gloomy crowd around to see
Of baffled hopes, and ruined powers
Of mind, and miserable hours
Of self-upbraiding, and despair
Of heart, too strong and fierce to bear.

"Why, what a peasant slave am I,"
To bow my mind and bend my knee
To woman in idolatry,
Who takes no thought of mine or me.
Oh God! that I could breathe my life
On battle plain in charging strife—
In one mad impulse pour my soul
Far beyond passion's base control.

Thus do my jarring thoughts revolve
Their gather'd causes of offence,
Until I in my heart resolve
To dash thine angel image thence;
When some bright look, some accent kind,
Comes freshly in my heated mind,
And scares, like newly-flushing day,
These brooding thoughts like owls away.

And then for hours and hours I muse
On things that might, yet will not be,
Till one by one my feelings lose
Their passionate intensity,
And steal away in visions soft,
Which on wild wing those feelings waft
Far, far beyond the drear domain
Of Reason and her freezing reign.

And now again from their gay track
I call as I despondent sit,
Once more these truant fancies back,
Which round my brain so idly flit;
And some I treasure, some I blush
To own—and these I try to crush—
And some too wild for reason's rein
I loose in idle rhyme again.

And even thus my moments fly,
And even thus my hours decay,
And even thus my years slip by,
My life itself is wiled away;
But distant still the mounting hope,
The burning wish with men to cope
In aught that minds of iron mould
May do or dare for fame or gold.

Another year! another year,
Medora, it shall not be so;
Both love and lays forswear I here,
As I've forsworn thee long ago,
That name which thou wouldst never share,
Proudly shall fame emblazon where
On pumps and corners posters stick it,
The highest on the Jackson ticket.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE P. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1852.

Editors' study.—A young lady of fashion complained to us the other evening that she had "nothing to read." We were somewhat startled at this, as there was a spacious and well-filled book-case in the apartment, and we fell into a silence of several minutes, during which, as the rest of the company were lively, and our fair companion seemed disposed to join them, we stole a sly glance at the ample library. Among other authors we noticed Swift, Sterne, Goldsmith, Shakspeare, Scott, Wordsworth, Irving, Paulding, and Bryant. There were also the "Spectator," the "Rambler," Pope, Dryden, and Milton; besides a large number of others, with the best histories and books of travel, some of which we had never yet found time to peruse. At first we were rather startled at being so far surpassed by a girl in the study of English literature, and felt our estimation considerably heightened for one who, amid the allurements of city pleasure, had possessed herself of all the knowledge which she must have derived from the perusal of such a noble collection of works. The conversation of one, so learned we thought, must be edifying indeed, and we seized the earliest opportunity of renewing our interview. Imagine our surprise on finding that she was totally uninformed as to the value of the works in question. She had endeavored, she said, once or twice to read Oasian and Milton, but without success; the Spectator was dull, and of all things she hated histories and travels. It was only the other day, she added, that she suffered from low spirits all the morning from not being able to get anything new with which to beguile the time.

Of the few females whom it is our good fortune to know, nearly all are fond of reading; and we have no reason to doubt that the same taste is general among our fair fellow-citizens. It often happens that our opinion is asked by them of a new work, or we are begged to bring them one. Both of these matters could be easily settled if we were well acquainted with all the different shades and passions of their minds; but these are so various, and sometimes so opposite to our previous conjectures, that we not unfrequently commit strange errors. We gave the "Life of Sir Isaac Newton" to a giddy creature, who, we afterwards discovered, expected to find it similar to "Sir Charles Grandison," and handed the "Dutchman's Fireside" to a lady whose jaded taste and unhealthy imagination could not be goaded into excitement by a stimulus less powerful than the "Monk," the "Mysteries of Udolpho," or the "Three Spaniards." We have given "Locke on the Human Understanding" to a coquet, and "Moore's Poems" to a prude, and were so soundly rated one day by the maiden aunt of a warm hearted and enthusiastic girl to whom we had innocently recommended "Thomson's Seasons," that we began to find, what we at first esteemed an agreeable privilege, gradually metamorphosed into a service attended with vexation, if not with danger. But our experience has not always been uninteresting. We love to hear people's off-hand, unguarded opinions of books. It is by far a better standard of character and talent than physiognomy. Let us know what you read, fair lady, and your real thoughts of what you read, and a year's common acquaintance would be nothing to it. We remember having once read a passage of the "Sketch Book" to a wild young girl, whose high spirits were excited by a merry scene. It was an experiment to see whether a page of perfectly sweet eloquence and tenderness would have any effect upon her, and what, in the midst of her seemingly irrepressible merriment, and so we watched to behold the change which her features underwent; how her attention was gradually arrested, fastened, and aroused—how gently she yielded to the mastery of the writer, whose thoughts met answering thoughts in her bosom, sleeping there with a kindred beauty, and awakened suddenly by his tender art. We do reverence involuntarily a clear spirit, when we find it thus susceptible to all the noble impressions which greater minds produce. We love to send the fine thought like an arrow to the heart, and to feel that it is quivering there as it did in our own.

One of the particular conditions imposed upon us by borrowers of a book is that it must be new, or at least some romance which they have never seen. To find new and interesting novels for a whole circle of industrious readers, is rather more than our presses, although themselves very industrious, enable us to do, and we therefore suggest a plan, which we sincerely hope will be considered a satisfactory substitute. Instead of a sickly thirst for lack-a-daisical novels, suppose our fair friends should endeavor to cultivate a healthy appetite for compositions more nutritious and substantial, which must enlarge their minds, improve their hearts, and extend, to an incalculable degree, their sources of enjoyment. We propose that, instead of being so over anxious to study the fashionable authors of the present day, they shall learn a little of those who have gone before. If they think they have no taste for Addison, Johnson, and Goldsmith, they, in most cases, mistake themselves; although it may be true that their taste has never been properly cultivated. But what then? Because sixteen or even thirty precious irrevocable years have vanished without their discovering wherein consists the true value and beauty of reading, shall they still close their eyes to it? We would not make young girls critics and philosophers, but it would add wonderfully to their characters and happiness if they were competent to form just opinions of books; and were sufficiently intimate with the general principles of natural philosophy to derive gratification from the perusal of rational knowledge, and to look abroad upon the universe with intelligent eyes, the better to appreciate it and its Creator. The reader will remember Addison's humorous list, in the thirty-seventh number of the Spectator, of Leonora's library, in which he found "the classic authors in wood," and by their side "Clelia: which opened of itself in the place that describes two lovers in a bower." Dare we express a fear that the taste of Leonora is not yet extinct, and that many a capable mind at the present day suffers itself to be narrowed down by the perpetual contemplation of trifles? Our Humes and Miltons do not open of themselves. There is also a strange idea prevalent concerning literary women; and we have heard very honest fellows "pray to be delivered from them," as if they were something odd and troublesome. It is true, there have been females whose zeal for literature outran their discretion; but these are no more specimens of well-read women than the miser who saved his candle and died in the dark, is a fair representative of prudent and economical men. It is not to be expected that every young lady will be well read; other avocations may employ too much of her time. But when she does read, we would suggest higher themes than can be found in their exclusive partiality for most modern novels. It may be difficult to change the taste immediately; for, in a mind already enervated with marvellous fiction and sickly sentiment, the finest and simplest treatise on natural philosophy or history, will not immediately produce an excitement. But persevere, and to an intellect of ordinary intelligence, the great truths of time and nature will soon begin to unfold themselves with a powerful interest. We cannot conceive why a young girl, who is delighted with Pelham, should not be yet more delighted with Plutarch. There is more romantic incident, more displays of attractive character, more variety and good writing in the latter. A servant maid, without exactly knowing what she is reading, will be fascinated with the noble old historian; and so, as the story goes, was the mistress, till she found out that his lives were true. Indeed she who languishes for the next novel with such a mine of unexplored eloquence and wit about her, resembles a youth pining to death for the love of a statue, though wooed, on every side, by the most brilliant of living beauties.

Causici's Bust of Clinton.—This piece of marble statuary is now exhibited for public inspection at the New-York Institution, in the rear of the City-hall, in the room adjoining the surrogate's office, between the hours of twelve and three o'clock. Viewed with reference to the peculiar circumstances under which it was executed, it is certainly an extraordinary production, as the artist never had but one brief and cursory opportunity of studying the original. It is truly a matter of wonder how he has effected so striking a likeness. Unlike many other efforts at chiseling the features of distinguished individuals, it conveys at once to the spectator's mind the idea of intrinsic grandeur. Not only are the lineaments of the countenance correctly preserved, but the character of the man is seen at a single glance. The impress is prominent and decisive. Superior intellect, with its thousand magical associations, sits enthroned upon the brow, giving a corresponding expression to every feature.

Excellence in sculpture is admitted to be of difficult attainment. It is the eldest (possibly, with one exception) of the sister arts; and among its modern votaries, few have risen so high as Signior Causici. Without reverting to the ancients, Canova, of our own day, is one of the few who has won for himself an immortality of fame. His Advent was that of genius, led by untiring perseverance, too seldom its friend and guide. In all his works there is visible the result of refined and cultivated taste. He rarely attempted sublimity, while manifesting the capability of attaining to it; seeming perfectly contented with the pervading grace which characterized his efforts. Thorswalden commenced a career which promises to close, as it has advanced, in brilliancy. Chantry, a contemporary, is highly and justly regarded, and the effort which graces Boston, has met with warm and just eulogiums. Willingly assenting to its merits, we may challenge a comparison between that production and Causici's Clinton, under the conviction that the decision, if uninfluenced by prejudice, will assign to the latter the palm of excellence. Causici was a pupil of Canova, and it is admitted that he has done no little credit to his master.

We have in other departments of this journal hitherto alluded to the great estimation in which our distinguished young countryman, Greenough, is at present held in Paris. We could not properly omit the mention of his name in an enumeration of the sculptors of the present day.

We cheerfully comply with the request of a correspondent, and insert the following sonnet from the New-York American.

SONNET,

Written in St. Mark's Church-yard, New-York.

(St. Mark's Church-yard is situated in a beautiful and retired place, formerly about three miles distant from New-York; but the city, so rapid in its growth, has already nearly reached it, and will undoubtedly, in a few years, entirely surround it.)

Ye dead, a gentle feeling pure I deem,
Prompted the wish, when life's short day was past,
Calmly to sleep in this sweet place at last—
Courtied by wild flowers and the pale moon's gleam!
Where pensive meditation loves to dream.
O thou, too frail to bear life's chilling blast,
For whom on earth a bitter lot was cast—
Who dropt into oblivion's sunless stream,
Like a green leaf, snapt from a summer bough!
Ah! soon no more shall silence round thee reign,
(No more the wild birds trill sweet notes for thee!)
But soulless sound, and reverie profane—
Yea, list! comes rolling onward even now,
The multitudinous city, like a sea!

WHO ARE THE FREE?

FROM POLISH MELODIES—THE POETRY AND MUSIC BY J. A. WADE.

With proud defiance.

Who are the free? Who are the free? Slaves be-neath their chains may be; The thun-der's sound is strong-ly bound Be-fore it bursts to li-ber-ty!
Free-dom's a pas-sion of the mind, 'Tis not to earth or air con-fined; 'Twill strug-gle more the more you bind. Who are the free? Who are the free?

SECOND VERSE.

WHERE are the free?
WHERE are the free?
On hill, in glen, or desert sea?
Perhaps they sleep
In dungeons deep—

But still their dream is liberty!
A battle-plain may be a slave's—
A prison-ship may ride the waves—
There are two places—HEARTS AND GRAVES!
Where ARE the free!
Where ARE the free!

THIRD VERSE.

Then WE'RE the free,
WE ARE the free;—
For, though in chains or liberty,
Our hearts and souls
Have no controls,

But scorners to the last will be!—
We may be robb'd of freedom's right—
We may be slain in freedom's fight—
But still, against the despot's might,
We are the free!
We are the free!

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

THE TEMPEST.

THE scene of Shakspeare's play of the Tempest is laid in one of the Bermuda islands, which an old writer declares "were of all nations, said and supposed to be enchanted and inhabited with witches and devils." It is supposed to have been the first written of all his plays, and is certainly among the most extraordinary for the wonderful oppositeness of its characters, and their difference, not only from each other, but from all that had been ever previously delineated. I could, however, never account for the harshness of Prospero to Ariel. There is something in his threats to so yielding and beautiful a creature, and one so careful to do his "spiriting gently," which jars upon the feelings. He is a thorough-bred bully in his manner towards him, for example, when he tells him, "Thou liest, malignant thing!" and threatens to rend an oak, and confine him in its "knotty entrails" till he has "howled away twelve winters."

PHILOSOPHICAL DISCREPANCIES.

The celebrated philosopher Locke, declares that personal identity consists in consciousness alone. There is a degree of truth in his meaning, as, for example; in a future existence we are totally forgetful of everything connected with this life; we are, in fact different beings, inasmuch as all the thoughts, feelings, habits and peculiarities of every kind which identified us here, being taken away, our identity is also taken away. But in examining into this doctrine, in his "Essay on the Intellectual Powers," Dr. Reid contradicts it in the following amusing manner:

"Suppose a brave officer to have been flogged, when a boy at school, for robbing an orchard, to have taken a standard from the enemy in his first campaign, and to have been made a general in advanced life; suppose, also, which must be admitted to be possible, that when he took the standard, he was conscious of his having been flogged at school; and that when made a general, he was conscious of his taking the standard, but had absolutely lost the consciousness of his flogging.

"These things being supposed, it follows from Mr. Locke's doctrine that he who was flogged at school, is the same person who took the standard; and that he who took the standard is the same person who was made a general. Whence it follows, if there be any truth in logic, that the general is the same person with him who was flogged at school. But the general's consciousness does not reach so far back as his flogging, therefore, according to Mr. Locke's doctrine, he is not the person who was flogged. Therefore the general is, and at the same time, is not, the same person who was flogged at school."

TALKERS.

What is the reason that women have the reputation of being greater talkers than men? I am inclined to believe, from the experience of a long and busy life, that the idea is tolerably true, but I do not think it is any thing derogatory to the character of the fair. They are finer and more delicate creatures than men; more easily acted on by passing events; quicker to perceive, and with a natural desire to make others participators in their feelings, and a rapid facility in expressing all the innumerable changes always going on in their minds and hearts. They bear about the same relation to men that air does to water. Who can peruse the affecting account of the pippin woman's last moments without acknowledging the sex possessed of powers peculiar to themselves.

"The crackling crystal yields—she sinks—she dies;
Her head chapt off, from her lost shoulders dies;
Pippins she cried, but death her voice confounds,
And pip—pip—pip along the ice resounds."

TEST OF FRIENDSHIP.

One of the surest evidences of friendship that an individual can display to another, is telling him gently of a fault. If any other can excel it, it is listening to such a disclosure with gratitude, and amending the error.

MODESTY OF NEWTON.

It is a singular fact, that the modesty of Newton would have prevented his publishing the results of his researches. Not one of his mathematical writings were voluntarily communicated to the world!

EXTRACTS FROM A MODERN DICTIONARY.

Public meeting.—An assemblage of a few hundred persons to express the opinion of two hundred and fifty thousand: so each individual present pledges himself for the sentiments of six thousand of his friends. There is, however, a mystery about the proceeding. A great city in this manner will utter the most terrible signs of indignation against a man or a measure to day, of which, yesterday, they spoke in terms of the highest praise. Either the public do not know their own mind, or there must be wonderful misprints in the papers. But the simplicity and ease with which this useful custom is managed, cannot be too much praised. A whole country by its means, without the slightest expense or trouble, may be made to issue their opinion even upon subjects which they never heard of.

Broker.—A person who sells the use of money, of which he never has any himself, but has always to get from a friend.

Pawnbrokers' shops.—Vortexes, scattered over the surface of society, which suck down the poor and friendless.

The last night of an actor's appearance.—The last night, till the next time.

Want.—A monster that grows more hungry with feeding.

Manuscript tragedy.—A nuisance.

Umbrella.—An article which gentlemen consider themselves privileged to steal.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

TO FITZ-GREENE HALLECK, ESQ.

BY THE LATE JOSEPH R. DRAKE, M.D.

"You damn me with faint praise."

Yes, faint was my applause and cold my praise,
Though soul was glowing in each polished line;
But nobler subjects claim the poet's lays—
A brighter glory waits a muse like thine;
Let amorous fools in love-sick measure pine,
Let Strangford whimper on in fancied pain,
And leave to Moore the hacknied rose and vine;
Be thine the task a higher crown to gain—
The envied wreath that decks the patriot's holy strain!

Yet not in proud triumphal song alone,
Or martial ode, or sad sepulchral dirge;
There needs no lay to make our glories known!
There needs no song the warrior's soul to urge
To tread the bounds of danger's stormy verge;
Columbia still shall win the battle's prize!
But be it thine to bid her mind emerge;
To strike her harp until its soul arise
From the neglected shade where low in dust it lies!

Are there no scenes to touch the poet's soul?
No deeds of arms to wake the lordly strain?
Shall Hudson's billows unregarded roll?
Has Warren fought, Montgomery died, in vain?
Shame! that while every mountain, stream, and plain
Hath theme for truth's proud voice or fancy's wand,
No native bard the patriot harp hath ta'en,
But left to minstrel of a foreign strand
To sing the beautiful scenes of nature's loveliest land!

Oh! for a seat on Appalacha's brow,
That I might scan the glorious prospect round!
Wild waving woods and rolling floods below,
Smooth level glades and fields with grain embrown'd;
High heaving hills with tufted forests crown'd,
Rearing their proud tops to the heaven's blue dome!
And emerald isles like banners green unwound,
Seen floating o'er the lake, while round them roam
Blue billowy helms and dancing plumes of foam.

'Tis true, no fairies haunt our "verdant meads,"
No grinning imps deform our blazing hearth;
Beneath the kelpies' fangs no traveler bleeds,
No gory vampyres taint our holy earth,
No spectres stalk to frighten harmless mirth,
Nor tortured demon howls amid the gale;
Fair reason checks these monsters in their birth;
Yet have we lay of love and horrid tale,
Would dim the manliest eye and make the bravest pale!

Where is the sterile eye that hath not shed,
Compassion's dew-drops o'er the sweet M'Crea?
Through midnight wilds by savage bandit led;
"Her heart is sad—her love is far away;"
Elate that lover waits the promised day,
When he shall clasp his blooming bride again!
Shine on, sweet visions! dreams of rapture play!
Soon the cold corpse of her he loved in vain
Shall blight his withering heart and fire his frenzied brain!

Romantic Wyoming! could not be found,
Of all that roam thy Eden-bowers among,
To wake a native harp's untutored sound,
And give thy tale of woe the voice of song?
Oh! if description's cold and nerveless tongue
From stranger harp such hallowed strains could call,
How doubly sweet the descendant wild had rung,
From one who lingering o'er "thy ruin'd wall,"
Had pluck'd thy mourning flowers and wept thy timeless fall!

The Huron chief escaped from foemen nigh,
His frail bark lanches on Niagara's tides;
"Pride in his port! defiance in his eye!"
Singing his song of death the warrior glides:
In vain they yell along the river's sides;
In vain the arrow from its sheaf is torn;
Calm to his doom the willing victim rides,
And till adown the roaring torrent borne,
Mocks them with gestures proud, and laughs their rage to scorn!

Arouse! my friend!—let vivid fancy soar;
Look with creative eye on nature's face—
Bid "goblin's damn'd" in wild Niagara roar,
And view in every field a fairy race!
Spur thy good pacolet to speed apace,
And spread a train of nymphs on every shore!
Or if thy muse would woo a ruder grace,
The Indian's evil manito's explore,
And rear the wondrous tale of legendary lore.

Away! to Susquehanna's utmost springs
Where throned in mountain mist Arouski reigns,
Shrouding in lurid clouds his plumbeous wings,
And sternly sorrowing o'er his tribe's remains!
His was the arm, like comet ere it wanes,

That tore the streamy lightning from the skies,
And smote the mammoth of the southern plains!
Wild with dismay the Creek affrighted flies,
While in triumphant pride Kencava's eagles rise.

Or westward far where dark Miami wends,
Seek that fair spot as yet to fame unknown,
Where when the vesper dew of heaven descends,
Soft music breathes in many a melting tone;
At times so sadly sweet it seems the moan
Of some poor Ariel penanced in the rock—
Anon a louder burst—a scream! a groan!
And now amid the tempest's reeling shock,
Gibber, and shriek, and wail, and fiendish laugh, and mock.

Or climb the palisado's lofty brows,
Where dark Omanas waged the war of hell,
'Till roused to wrath the mighty spirit rose
And pent the demons in their prison cell:
Full on their heads the uprooted mountain fell,
Enclosing all within its horrid womb!
Straight from the teeming earth the waters swell,
And pillar'd rocks arise in cheerless gloom,
Around the drear abode, their last, eternal tomb.

Be these your lofty themes! but ne'er resign
The soul of song to laud your lady's eyes;
Go kneel a worshipper at nature's shrine!
For you her rivers flow, her hills arise;
For you her fields are green and fair her skies;
And will you scorn them all to pour your tame
And heartless lays of forced or fancied sighs?
Still will you wrong the muse, nor blush for shame,
To cast away renown and hide your head from fame?

Come! shake your trammels off! let fools rehearse
Their loves and raptures in unmeaning chime;
Cram close their crude conceits in mawkish verse,
And torture hacknied thoughts in timeless rhyme:
But thou shalt soar in glorious verse sublime!
With heavenly voice of music, strength, and fire,
Waft wide the wonders of thy native clime;
With patriot pride each patriot heart inspire,
Till Europe's bards are mute before Columbia's lyre.

ORIGINAL BIOGRAPHY.

SKETCHES OF DISTINGUISHED CHARACTERS.

WASHINGTON IRVING.

FRONTING this page, we present our readers with an accurate likeness of WASHINGTON IRVING; and we do so with pride and pleasure, as a just tribute to one of the most successful writers, not only of the country, but of the age. The few brief observations with which we shall introduce the engraving, can scarcely aspire to the name of biography. We can give only a brief outline of what the world has been frequently told already. His life has been marked by no extraordinary events, and is destitute of romantic interest, unless such as some prolific fancy may conjure up from the fact that one so highly gifted with the power of describing the tender and amiable in others, should have himself preferred the secluded path of celibacy. It is indeed a subject which affords us but a slender hope of adding any striking interest, as every particular proper to be brought before the public has long furnished materials for innumerable admiring pens, while from near shades of character, and anecdotes of private friendship, delicacy would forbid our withdrawing the veil.

Mr. Irving was born in this city, in 1782, and is now, therefore about fifty years of age. He received a classical education, and was a student of Columbia college. In 1805 he embarked for Bordeaux, on a tour through France and Italy, instigated partly by the love of travel natural to youth, and partly by the hope of restoring the vigor of a constitution somewhat impaired, it is said, by the intemperance of previous literary application. In 1807 he returned to New-York, completely restored to health, after having visited Rome, Florence, Naples, Switzerland, Flanders, Holland and England.

He remained in this country until 1815, engaged in various literary works which rapidly advanced his reputation, and afterwards proceeded to London, his present residence. He has, however, since that period, occasionally resumed his travels, and report speaks of the marked distinction with which, in the city of Dresden, in 1822, he was treated by the king and queen of Saxony and their court.

We are not surprised to learn that a mind so naturally fertile commenced at an early age to pour out its treasures in some of the public presses, those channels through which thought flows far and wide. A number of essays, written by him at the age of seventeen, appeared in the "Morning Chronicle," under the title of "Letters of Jonathan Old Style." The reader will remember that these have since been very unceremoniously republished in a pamphlet form, and without the consent of the author, by some uncourteous speculator on other men's talent. They present, however, to the admirer of Mr. Irving's later productions, many features prettily characteristic of his future peculiarities, and form an amusing display of those budding graces whose full-blown beauties have attracted such universal attention.

Salmagundi was commenced in 1807, in conjunction with a circle of highly gifted gentlemen, (among the most conspicuous was the author of the "Dutchman's Fireside") some of whom have since won their way to literary eminence, and some to political or professional distinction, while many have been swept away by death. This amusing little work received such unequivocal marks of popular favor, that we may well suppose that the principal contributor surveyed the prospect of a future literary career with eyes not wholly undazzled. Accordingly, he appears to have braced himself up to it, if not with considerable assiduity, at least with increased confidence. In 1810 he published "Knickerbocker's History of New-York," a work, combining the forcible humor of Cervantes, Butler, and Fielding, with the elegant, although playful, grace of Addison and Goldsmith. It is nearly superfluous to descant upon the spirit and character of this composition. It is a rich satire upon certain events and characters, as well as numerous of our national peculiarities. No one ever possessed a keener perception of the ludicrous, as well as the graceful and the tender, than our author; and although, in the veracious history under consideration, but few attempts are made at the latter requisite, there are certain passages and pages of unusual eloquence, and struck off with a curious facility, that effect the mind like the easy elegance of some natural object—a flower opening under a June sun, or a vine laying forth its tendrils, through which gleam the mantling bunches of the purple grapes—nothing can be at once more unpremeditated and unartificial than the flowing and melodious sentences of Mr. Irving, when warmed with his subject. The success of Knickerbocker exceeded the anticipations of even the most sanguine among those who immediately perceived its great excellence. In the same year, 1810, the reputation of the writer was advanced by an unusually fine biographical sketch of Campbell, prefixed to an edition of that charming poet's works. This trifle was praised by the critics as a specimen of elegant composition, scarcely surpassed in the language. To these were soon afterwards added brief narratives of the lives of the most distinguished among our naval officers during the late war. They were published in the Analectic Magazine, at the earnest solicitations of the proprietors of which, it is said, they were written. The "Sketch Book" and its sequel, "Bracebridge Hall," were the next and more important undertakings of our author. Few literary productions have been received with more eager and universal curiosity and admiration. They have been translated into a variety of languages. Every body has read them, and they will always be considered an indispensable ornament in the library of every lover of eloquence, wit, and sentiment. On the year following the publication of Bracebridge Hall, which appeared in 1823, he completed and sent forth the "Tales of a Traveler." These seem hasty compositions; but although less generally eulogized than their predecessors, are frequently enlivened by strokes of lurking humor, and gleamings of elegant fancy, and resemble those loose sketches in the portfolio of a fine painter, which, however careless the outline, or common-place the subject, betray, nevertheless, evident touches of the master hand.

With his more recent contributions to the literature of his country, the first of which is the invaluable Life of Columbus, our readers are of course acquainted. Respecting the superior excellence of this composition, there seems to be but one opinion throughout the learned circles. It fills a vacancy in English history, and no one living could have succeeded better. The golden materials for the History of Columbus could not have been committed to any more appropriate individual, for he stands nearly in the same relation to our literary, as his immortal subject does to our natural hemisphere, both having in their own departments steered boldly out into regions unexplored, and produced their discoveries to the astonishment of the eastern continent.

His works vary, perhaps, more in character than those of any other living writer. Others have all been distinguished in some peculiar department. Mr. Irving, with the easy confidence of genius, has struck into several of the most opposite description, and it is difficult, if not impossible, to decide in which he has manifested the most power. The perfect beauty of his sentimental pieces—their touching pathos, and tender refinement, claim for them the palm of superiority. There is a trifle of his, a brief story of common life, called the "Wife," which strongly tempts us to such a conclusion. If he had not sought any other walk, he must have acquired fame in this. Yes—this is his forte. But then his humor, of which he is a perfect master—the broad and irresistible burlesque of Knickerbocker, fraught with sly drollery and good natured satire; the ludicrous drawings interspersed though the Sketch Book; the fine wit in Salmagundi, and the rich vein opened in Bracebridge Hall—yes, there can be no doubt of it—he is happiest in the humorous. It is on delineations of this nature that he must rest his claims to superiority. By the way, there is yet another field opening upon our view—history. His later works, not found only on the toilette of beauty and fashion—in the hands of the young alone, or of the old and grave in their lighter moments; but on the table of the learned and the wise—in the library of the thoughtful statesman—the severe scholar. There is something dignified in writing a history, and this Mr. Irving has done admirably. He has advanced fearlessly and successfully to a higher grade of literature and fame; and as he addresses a grave circle of readers, and on a more important theme, there is visible in his manner an appropriate change, strongly characteristic of the good sense of the author. He has relaxed the studied elegance of his style for pure perspicuity and manly strength. We miss the smoothness and polish, but recognize the graceful shape and fine material. The sweet melody of the Sketch Book would become tiresome in an extended history. He has therefore properly modified it for the occasion, and has commenced a most romantic and powerfully interesting series of events in a form attractive to every reader; and we suspect this will carry his name farther into future time than even the fascinating offerings of his earlier years, and more excited fancy.

We conclude this cursory view of the life of Washington Irving with our sincere congratulations to our readers on their prospect of soon welcoming him again, at least for a brief period, to these his native shores. Yet his visit here will form a new era in his quiet and happy life, and will it not be a delightful event to us, old and young, his friends and readers? We cannot refrain from drawing a thousand pretty pictures of these things. How forcibly—with what a mixture of melancholy and joy, and merriment and regret, must they strike such a mind as his? He must write another Sketch Book, that's certain. We have pored, with a delightful fancy, over the voyage of the youthful enthusiast from his native plain country, with the mighty world, broad and brilliant, before him. Now let us read the wanderer's homeward thoughts, and hopes, and fears, and recollections. Time—time has been busy with him, and with all around him. There will be shadow on the forehead, and shadowy thoughts beneath it, and the ghosts of a thousand buried hopes and wishes will flit across his imagination, as he hangs, on his return, over the same ever restless waves, and muses on the haunts of Dolph Hyleger, and the misty blue hills of "Sleepy Hollow," and the old angles and narrow lanes, and prim steep-roofed Dutch houses, and all the surrounding scenery, and all the merry inhabitants of the "good city of Manahatta." How we should love to tread with him through the labyrinths of this changed and growing metropolis, and to follow him in all his meetings with old faces; to see him recognize the wild and lovely girl, whom he left romping in exuberant youth, now appearing to his eyes, chastened down into the sweet mother, with a group of glowing and miniature likenesses, gazing up at the author of the Sketch Book; and then to watch with him the stately man whom he left erect in the vigor of health, now converted into a dim and faded resemblance of his former self, with bent shoulders, a seamed forehead, and trembling hands.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

NEW METHOD OF PREVENTING STEAM EXPLOSION.

PERHAPS there is no subject of more general interest at this day than the fatal accidents which have attended steam navigation. So many lives have been lost, to say nothing of the destruction of property, that he who invents a method of remedying the evil, and securely guarding against future danger, may be justly termed a public benefactor. For a long time this has been a desideratum among the learned, all of whom, we believe, have hitherto failed, or whatever may be the efficacy of their theories, have not succeeded in putting them actually in practice; but we met with a paragraph in a late number of the Albany Daily Advertiser, which indicates a probability of divesting the steam engine of its dangerous character. The plan was communicated by Richard Varick De Witt, Esq. of the Albany Institute, in an essay on the means of preventing the explosion of steam boilers. He recommends what he terms a "hydrostatic safety-pipe, being a tube of a diameter proportional to the size of the boiler, and extending from a few inches below the surface of the water to a height of two feet to every pound of steam pressure that may be required. For instance, if the usual pressure at which an engine is worked be fifteen pounds, the pipe would be thirty feet high; as soon as the steam acquires this force, the pipe would necessarily be filled with water, and any increase would drive the water out of it, until its lower orifice was uncovered, when it would afford a ready passage to the steam; it would also give immediate notice, if, from neglect, or otherwise, the water should happen to get below the point, at which it ought to be kept." He remarked "that his plan is not liable to any of the objections which other means for the purpose were; a safety valve might be overloaded by accident, or intentionally; if it were under lock and key, it might become fixed in its place by rust; fusible plugs might not melt soon enough, but no possible danger could arise when the plan he suggested was adopted, except through wantonness in closing the pipe. A drawing was exhibited of the apparatus, as applied to a boiler."

We cordially unite with the editor of the Albany Advertiser in commending this plan to the notice of scientific men.

NAMES.

"WHAT'S in a name?" Much more than you, without great reflection, would be apt to suppose. I confess it may appear a very small matter whether a man is called George Washington Clark, or Lafayette Clark, or Benjamin Franklin Clark; for the mere circumstance of having the names of such celebrated men cannot make a child grow up to be a statesman or a philosopher; but, kind reader, that it is not so small a matter, I will presently demonstrate. How supremely ridiculous, as a general thing, are the cognomens of the small fry of this nation, and more especially of those non-descript inhabitants of the western wilds, whose astonishing increase defies all the calculations of Malthus!

When in my younger days I played the pedagogue, I asked a little scamp of a boy his name. "Hannibal Lafayette Wilcox." Only think of it—the Carthaginian general and the hero of three revolutions conjointly to designate a blockhead, aged ten! I was in a court of justice, and the magistrate was about to pass sentence on some prisoners. The first one called was a woman of the lowest grade; her face was bloated and red, her eyes so swollen that they seemed ready to start from their sockets, and her name was Virginia. The classical vagabond! It is a notable fact, that every second black female you meet is either a Venus or a Diana.

Luther Calvin Smith, who, in the very beginning, to prevent all gossiping and surmising, I inform you is my hero, was a native of Connecticut. His parents were good, pious people, who thought that by giving their son the names of two such exemplary Christians, he himself would be a Christian; and, as a faithful chronicler, I am bound to say that their fondest hopes seemed to be realized. Luther came home with great regularity every Saturday as soon as the half holiday commenced, and learned the given number of verses before he even thought of play. He was never known to loiter on the village green after sunset. On Sabbath morning he was remarkable for his stillness; never letting so much as a whistle escape, save once, which sad accident happened on seeing all the inhabitants of the sty rioting in his garden; then he did whistle, to call the dog. His conduct in church was most exemplary, and might safely be recommended to the young city lads, who pride themselves on disturbing the whole congregation; yet, with all his apparent attention, there would a little mischief display itself, such as putting a bent pin on the seat, so that his brother might sit thereon; and he once found the wrong hymn for his mother, who, good lady, persisted in singing in her pew, and would not join the choir; she sang out most melodiously, to the great astonishment of the said choir, for they were singing long and she short metre. And he was even suspected of playing off his pranks on the good parson Wheeler, though I know he was never discovered in any such affair; but I forget, I did not mean to write the biography of Luther Calvin Smith, but only so much thereof as is necessarily connected with the story.

He subsequently went—where many a wild young man has been before—to college. While there, he was distinguished for deeds rather opposite to those which gave his namesakes their celebrity. He was college bully, college wit, and college mischief-maker. Nevertheless, there were some things which, in the eyes of the learned, redeemed his character: he was decidedly the best debater, the best poet in the institution, and—one more trait, and I have done describing L. C. Smith's character—his frequently replenished purse constituted him a happy antithesis to the gentleman in Thomas Hayne's Bailey's song, who mournfully observes,

"Oh! were I in a foreign land,
They'd find no change in me."

We were classmates, and our friendship commenced somewhat in the following manner:—I received by the post a letter directed to Luther C. Smith, which was the appellation my friends had bestowed upon me, so that I might have a name somewhat different from the thousand and one Smiths—by the way, the C. stands for Cæsar. After having perused and re-perused the letter, I was as much at a loss as I was after the first reading to know from whom it came; it alluded to scrapes; and, heaven knows, I was never engaged in one in my life; scenes and people, of whom I had never heard. I put it in my pocket and came to the sage conclusion, that before I took another letter from the office, and paid eighteen and three-quarter cents postage, I would see if it looked like a hoax. I was at the eleven o'clock recitation, and the tutor of our division said, "Luther Smith will declaim." Up started myself and another fine-looking young man. "Why," said the tutor, "I called for Luther C. Smith."

"I am here," said I.

"And so am I," rejoined the other.

And here the class all laughed.

"Pray, sir," said the tutor to me, "what is your name?"

"Luther Cæsar Smith," I answered in a full, sonorous voice.

"And yours, sir?"

"Luther Calvin Smith," said Dromio of Connecticut.

I lived in New-York, and the matter was adjusted. As I was the younger, I waived my right to Luther, and was merely L. Cæsar Smith. I then handed him his letter, and we were friends. Strange as it may appear, and much as I fear that some ungenerous persons will doubt my veracity, still it is true that we favored each other so much that we could scarcely be distinguished.

A few years after having left college, I met with the following adventure. I was walking very leisurely in one of the parks, when a man caught my cloak, and inquired,

"Is your name Smith?"

"Yes, sir."

"Luther C. Smith?" looking at a paper he had in his hand.

This for a moment posed me, and I inwardly cursed my tailor, who, I supposed, had sent a constable to demand his bill. However, gathering up my cloak, I replied firmly,

"It is, sir; if you have any business with me, please be brief, for my presence is actually required elsewhere."

"I am well aware of it," he replied. "But we must be cautious. Follow me. She is waiting."

"She? who the deuce is she?"

He answered not, and I hesitated; but, knowing that at any time I should be able to retrace my steps, we entered a snug brick house, which I recognized as the domicile of Parson Tucker. A girl came toward me, muffled in a hood and cloak, and said, "My dear Luther, Mr. Tucker says he had rather not see our faces, for then his conscience could not permit him to perform the ceremony, after having been peremptorily forbidden so to do."

"Why," thought I, "this is romance in real life, with a vengeance; but I relish a good joke, so I took her delicate hand in mine, and pressed it to my lips."

They were just prepared to commence the ceremony, when a man, accoutred like myself, entered.

"Virginia," he exclaimed, "what does this mean? I have been waiting for the messenger this half-hour."

Here was a discovery; and I found, that by being where my fellow Luther should have been, I was called in to marry the charming Virginia Munson, whose sweet face I had often gazed upon, but for whose hand I had been too modest to make proposals. The mistake was soon discovered, and instead of being groom, I descended into the inferior capacity of groom's-man, with a pretty bride's-maid, whom I believe in my soul I should have fallen in love with and married, had I not found out that her name was Loretta, which, as these matters seemed to go so much by opposites, I concluded a very suspicious circumstance, and therefore remain to this day a steady and contented bachelor. LUTHER CÆSAR SMITH.

NEWSPAPERS.

Foreigners laugh at the Americans for being fond of news. There is something delightful in a newspaper, with a quiet breakfast, even to him who, dwelling in the city, must necessarily soon learn from other sources whatever may have occurred of uncommon interest. To rise from your slumbers refreshed—to have a spare hour before you plunge again into the clash and whirl of business—to unfold the damp sheet before a cheerful fire, while the fragrant coffee is sipped at leisure, and to know that busy men have been on the watch all night while you slept—that swift boats have been ploughing the dark deep—that the mails have been urged unceasingly almost with winged speed, and all to let you know, most accurately and immediately, every thing that can amuse or surprise or interest you,—it is pleasant, gentle reader, is it not? It furnishes a constant theme for reflection—it is the great arena of the world, reduced by a wonderful process into a miniature picture—as the landscape of an extended country is thrown in, with living beauty and precision, upon the narrow plate of a camera obscura, and you have waves washing, vessels sailing, trees waving, clouds melting and floating, and all the innumerable goings on of nature, produced on a space no larger than your table. But if you wish to really enjoy the luxury of a newspaper, you must live awhile in the country, after having mingled in the city din. If you can get into some remote, obscure, tedious village, so much the better. You should pine a week or two to know what people can be doing in your familiar places; and then, when some attentive friend, knowing your eager anxieties, encloses you a journal—one for instance, "for the country," with three sides covered with precious items—there's a luxury better than eating, drinking, or sleeping. With what a tremulous curiosity, on such delectable occasions, you hang over the prolific columns! How you swallow the little bits of paragraphs commencing "we understand that," and "we are requested to state;" the "new discoveries," the "interesting trials," the "singular rumors,"—with what an insatiable appetite they are all devoured. Even the "dreadful murders," the "melancholy accidents," the "distressing fires," things which at home you do not read at all, are all magnified into an unnatural importance. I have, at such times, waded even through the "ship news," the "New-York markets," and the "commercial" head. I have even experienced a tender regret that there had been "nothing doing in ashes during the past week," and stroked my chin with self-satisfaction on learning that "a parcel of Cuba white bees' wax had been disposed of at thirty-eight cents, short price." I read the "passengers" in the ships, the "auction sales," the "court calendars," and all the heterogeneous medley to be met with in a briskly conducted gazette; and once I trudged through six columns of congressional proceedings—I did, upon my word—speeches and all; but then it was raining, and I was tremendously at a loss for something to do.

Newspapers! dear newspapers! friends to liberty—to man! many a delightful surprise I owe to you! many a hearty laugh—many a soft regret—as, for instance, it was but the other day, in casually casting my eyes over one of you, they pounced upon the stunning item, uninteresting to all the world—to me, alas, how eloquent—how sad! "On Thursday evening last, by the Reverend A.B. Mr. John Grimmer to Miss Henrietta L." the very being I had selected for myself, and intended to take as soon as I got a little settled in business! Then, Mr. John Grimmer—who was Mr. John Grimmer? How dim all the surrounding matter appeared to those two magic lines. They shone out like a star in a midnight sky. This, I confess, is an objection to newspapers. They are so cold hearted: under the very words that nipped my budding passion so unceremoniously, it told me that United States bank stock was one hundred and twenty-five, and that the schooner Porpoise, Captain Herring, was in, thirty-five days from Malaga. What did I care for the schooner Porpoise? what did I care for the United States bank stock? I, who loved, and was treated in such a shameful style.

Yes; newspapers are like men of the world. They march steadily on through misery and joy, without turning to the right or left, or if ever they do grieve, ten chances to one it is for some event that no one cares a farthing for in reality. They tell you your mistress is married—your friend is dead, and recommend you to go to the theatre without fail, and hear the splendid new opera. They describe the fall of a nation in a tone that would make you believe they would end their existence from mere grief and indignation, and you stumble out of a scene of awful oppression and gory massacre into a merry drinking party or a smart repartee. One the other day really aroused my feelings on a subject of a religious nature, and just as my imagination was elevated and inspired, and a thrilling sense of devotion was spreading itself through all my veins, it assured me that a capital shaving soap might be obtained within a few doors of its office.

As for me, I am one of those persons who, having no business of their own, employ themselves as much as possible about that of other people. Not that I am what is called 'a busy-body'; or, if the term be applied to me, it must be understood in a more extended and honorable sense than is usual, as indicating one who meddles not with the private affairs of private individuals, but those matters which are more generally interesting to the public. The theatre, the circus, courts of justice, debates of the corporation, elections, charitable institutions, &c. all receive a share of my attention. You will not wonder, such being my character, that I am a constant reader of newspapers; and you must know that I have often lamented the manner in which these oracles are managed. The editors seem to think the public in great desire of information with respect to their private characters and affairs, and accordingly their columns are chiefly filled with their own petty squabbles. But I should never end, if I should detail all my causes of complaint: what I would now remark upon is the style in which our newspapers are written; or rather instead of making remarks, I will give examples. I am in the habit of selecting and copying passages distinguished by any beauty or defect, which I sometimes accompany with explanatory or illustrative notes. In about two years, during which this has been my practice, I have filled a large trunk with these papers. Thinking that it might not be unacceptable, I resolved to send you a specimen for publication in the Mirror. I drew forth a paper, without looking what it was, in order that I might send a fair sample. The one upon which I hit, an old number, has, I believe, about the average number of faults and beauties. I had copied many more passages, but I have culled those which I considered the most striking. It may likewise be stated, that there were altogether but about two columns of original matter.

1. The proposition on the first blush was opposed—
Very pretty—very pretty, indeed, but—nonsense.

2. To move down the government with all the heads of the department, paper, books, furniture, &c.

Here is an exemplification of the truth of Addison's opinion, that disorder often produces sublimity. Observe, also, how the editor has followed the advice of Cicero in placing the weakest circumstances in the middle and in the latter part of the sentence. The paper, which one would suppose that it would be the least trouble and expense to move, is situated exactly in the middle.

3. It was broadly insinuated—

This puts me in mind of a story. At the late celebration of our national birthday, I heard two men very independently disputing. 'Sir,' said one, 'that is a lie.' 'Sir,' replied the other, looking at him very fiercely, 'what do you mean to insinuate?' This, I presume, the editor would term a broad insinuation.

4. The invitation has gone up.

Let ladies who give large parties save themselves hereafter the trouble of sending round their notes—it has been discovered that an invitation will go of itself.

5. From the conscious path of honor.

Tune—High-diddle-diddle.

6. Their doors will be smacked in their faces.

Elegant familiarity! quite Addisonian.

7. Pay dear for the whistle, as Dr. Franklin calls it.

What does the writer call a whistle?

8. Make use of the Patriot, like the monkey did the cat.

The allusion beautiful, language chaste, and grammar without a fault.

9. They have a new gag to operate with—

Gag—Something put into the mouth to hinder speech, or eating. Johnson's Dictionary. Horrible! it appears, then, that the persons of whom Mr. Editor is speaking, have formed a plot to prevent him and his adherents from eating and drinking!

10. The Baltimore Chronicle gives the following hint, which we have long thought necessary and proper.

What? before it was made?

11. It appears that some young rogues meddle with the grates over our coal-vents, 'which they not only carry off and sell, but expose people to the danger of breaking their legs.

Truly, a great aggravation! The acuteness of the sentence proves that the editor had not taken his license in vain; we would recommend a difference in the punishment of those who have only "carried off the grates," and of those who, besides this, "have exposed people to the danger of breaking their legs."

The journal from which these paragraphs are taken may, perhaps, inform the public, that it had long thought this article excessively improper, and condemned it wholly at the first blush. It may, perhaps, in the plenitude of its wisdom, broadly insinuate, that I do not act upon my own responsibility, but that some other persons make use of me like the monkey did the cat, as Dr. Johnson calls it. I scorn the answer, and smile contemptuously at the insinuation. Not, though all rich men's doors should be smacked in my face; not even though a challenge should come up to me, will I wander from the conscious path of duty—I will eat and drink, let the editor operate with what gag he pleases.

Besides the elegance of the style, comes the immense importance of the paragraphs which are sometimes served up for the astonishment of the world. I have also made a list of some of these, culled indiscriminately from various papers, and hasten to give them to the public.

"We take great pleasure in informing our readers that Mr. Jacob Brown reached this city yesterday morning on his way to Connecticut, Mr. Brown's private affairs demanding his presence in that section of our great and growing country. Connecticut was the scene of several interesting events during the revolution. Mr. Brown is well, as also are Mrs. Brown and little Peter. It is said that in consequence of a scarcity of sausages in the market he was compelled to breakfast on eggs and bread and butter. Rumors are afloat that he could have been abundantly supplied with buckwheat cakes, but his extraordinary and well-known repugnance to that article prevented the possibility of setting them before him. We trust the appearance of our city will strike Mr. Brown in a favorable point of view, as after having transacted his business in Connecticut, he will immediately set off on his journey to Mobile, where his opinion of us will be much regarded. We are delighted in being able to contradict the assertion made in one of our leading contemporaries, that he had hit his nose against a pump handle on returning from his visit to the court-house. On hearing the report, we instantly dispatched a courier extraordinary to ascertain the truth, who assures us that it is altogether fabulous, the nose of our illustrious countryman being in a state of perfect preservation. We shall resume this subject to-morrow, as want of space must be our apology to an impatient public for not dwelling upon it at this time."—Independent Watchman.

"As a young lady, daughter to Colonel Flap, of the militia, was going out yesterday morning to purchase some blue sewing silk, and some other little articles, which at present we do not feel ourselves at liberty to disclose, she was startled by an ill-looking dog, who placed himself directly in her way at the south-west corner of Gooseberry-lane and Madison-street. Fortunately the dog went away immediately without any other consequences than an alarm to Miss F., who, with a presence of mind which cannot be too highly praised, proceeded on her errand and made the intended purchases in perfect composure and safety."—North American Messenger.

"The conduct of the Russians to the Poles we consider disreputable to the former as men. A distinguished gentleman, and one well known to the public, yesterday observed in our presence that he considered it 'worthy of a barbarous nation in a gothic age.'"—Brad's Daily Reporter.

THE TRANSPLANTED ROSE.

A FABLE.

In a beautiful recess, formed by the interwreathed branches of a thick wood, there once bloomed together a company of flowers. Although they were of several kinds, they lived in great friendship with each other, and, as they had burst forth in their sylvan retreat, in the early spring, they were promised by the aged trees around, a long and most happy existence. Nothing could be more delightful than the summer days and nights which they spent in each other's society. There was no envy, no jealousy, no pride—those dreadful plagues of the fair flowers of the human race—and they were luckily ignorant of any degrading luxury and wasting dissipation to sap their young strength, steal the fine hues from their fresh and tender leaves, or to bend them out of that exquisite ease and graceful simplicity which they inherited from nature. The loveliest belle, while she envied their wonderful beauty, might have more justly envied their quiet repose and cheerfulness. The breeze came to them with an equal love, and stirred them gently; the dew fell silently from heaven, and freshened their opening bloom; the sun kissed them and ripened every charming feature, and the golden bee hummed around them in the mellow afternoons; and when the rain and storm arose they remained sheltered by the strong arms of a giant vine, which they had long cheered with their radiant glances, and which, in return, bent over, and guarded them to the full extent of his power.

There is a glory about flowers which always touches me. They are types of girlish innocence. Every one who looks at them feels that, if they have any consciousness, they must be happy. They bear upon them such an unequivocal impress of supernatural care and love. They are so clearly nature's pride—her favorites: the freshest—the sweetest—the most perfect of her creations. Who that knows the world—its dark and awful tempests—its gloomy calms—its fierceness—its hatreds—its anguish—its disease,—who would not be a flower—ignorant of these things, to open and breathe a grateful joy under the glory of a summer sky?

One day there came a lord, and he paused as he gazed on them. He admired all, but most he admired a tall and superb rose, that spread out its half uncurling leaves with a simple feeling of delight. "I will have that flower," he said, "for myself. It shall be forthwith transplanted. It will be the surprise and delight of the great and the lovely. It will excel every other." And so he went away for his gardener.

The tall rose had listened with new feelings. Strange thoughts of tumultuous pleasures thronged upon her. She nodded her beautiful head, and rejoiced.

"Dear rose," said a little blue violet that peeped out beneath, "you had better be where you are, in my mind. I never heard of any good coming from transplanting such tender creatures as you from their natural homes."

"Saucy and dull violet," replied the queen of all the flowers, "thou mayest remain, but I am inspired with a new existence. I wonder I never before knew what it was to be admired, or how much I excelled all of you. It is a delicious sensation—I am the happiest of flowers."

She was interrupted by the gardener, who dug away the earth around her, and carried her to the palace of his master.

For a few hours she was intoxicated with delight. Every body praised her. She wondered that she had been so long ignorant of her merits, and how gratifying it is to be praised; but in a little time she was neglected—her color faded—her fresh leaves grew dry and withered—she hung her head—all her charms disappeared. The lord took her and cast her into the road, and, as she was about leaving her brief residence, she met the gardener with another rose all dripping with dew, and blushing with pleasure.

"Alas," she said, as she was dying, "alas, for my sweet and simple home. May all lovely flowers take warning by me, and shrink from the hand that would drag them from their happy seclusion to exhibit their beauties in the glare of public notice, and leave them, like me, afterwards to perish unprized." LITERARY NOTICES.

THE LITERARY REMAINS OF JOSEPH BROWN LADD.

A VOLUME bearing this title has lately appeared, published by H. C. Sleight. It comprises a number of effusions, mostly poetical, from the pen of one not distinguished among American poets. The collection was edited by a sister of the writer, and is prefaced by a well written sketch of his life. We gather from this all that we know concerning him. His days were passed with a scholar-like evenness, furnishing no extraordinary adventures for lovers of the marvellous, nothing brilliant or impressive, nothing to excite awe or wonder. It is merely a brief account of an amiable and intelligent young man, invested with good sense rather than striking genius, and raising the mind of the reader to a quiet approbation of a life well spent, refined by natural taste, and elevated by generous and gentle feelings. He was a native of Newport, Rhode Island, and died nearly fifty years ago. His parents possessed but limited means of promoting his education. He consequently was unable to receive the benefits of any school instruction after the age of ten years, and previously only attended an ordinary academy at different periods. Yet, even in that early boyhood, his rhyming propensity discovered itself.

He was by turns a farmer, a printer, and a physician. While pursuing the study of the latter profession, his biographer states that his application was so intense as to endanger his health, and his kind preceptor "found it necessary to deprive him of light after a certain hour at night, and when the moon shone brightly, even to take away his books."

To this excessive industry we must ascribe the fact that, notwithstanding his strong literary bias, the duties of his profession were performed so strictly as to insure him a very extensive practice. In his poetry we find a certain agreeable smoothness and good sense, which, perhaps, might have been nearly as well preserved in simple prose. His effusions to "Amanda" are tolerably well written, but (as is indeed the case with nearly all his original pieces) are quite inferior to his versifications of Ossian, with one of which we should certainly present the reader did our limits permit.

The volume contains a number of miscellaneous prose pieces, and among them two essays termed "Critical remarks on the writings of the late Dr. Johnson," from which we presume by far the greater portion of its readers will dissent entirely. The whole work is, however, creditable to the author, and much more so when we remember the time in which he wrote. His taste in poetry is more chaste and correct than that of many of his successors, who have acquired greater popularity, and, considering the age at which he fell, (we are sorry to say in a duel,) having scarcely reached his twenty-second year, we must acknowledge his talents to have been far above mediocrity, and his character estimable in an eminent degree. His subsequent career would most probably have been high and useful if not brilliant, and, as one of the earliest of the American writers, we deem this tribute but justice to his memory.

THE FORSAKEN: A NOVEL, BY RICHARD PENN SMITH.

We are pleased to welcome the appearance of another novel by an American writer, of a description so excellent as this. Mr. Smith has exhibited a decided talent in several departments. His play of Caius Marius we have already noticed in a previous number, and we are glad to find that the reputation he obtained by that effort will be increased by this story. The hour at which we perused the work renders it impossible for us to do it justice in this impression; but we shall hereafter give it a less cursory examination, and in the meantime solicit for it the attention of our readers.

MEMOIRS OF THE EMPRESS JOSEPHINE.

The brothers Harper have just issued this work, from the pen of John S. Mames, LL.D. It is a volume of unusual interest.

LETTERS FROM PARIS.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF EUROPE.

NUMBER EIGHT.

Dr. Bowring—American artists—Brutal amusement, &c.

I HAVE met Dr. Bowring in Paris, and called upon him to-day with Mr. Morse, by appointment. The translator of the "Ode to the Deity," (from the Russian of Dizzhavin,) could not by any accident be an ordinary man, and I anticipated great pleasure in his society. He received us at his lodgings in the Place Vendôme. I was every way pleased with him. His knowledge of our country and its literature surprised me, and I could not but be gratified with the unprejudiced and well-informed interest with which he discoursed on our government and institutions. He expressed great pleasure at having seen his ode in one of our school-books, (Pierpont's Reader, I think,) and assured us that the promise to himself of a visit to America was one of his brightest anticipations. This is not at all an uncommon feeling, by the way, among the men of talent in Paris; and I am pleasantly surprised, every where, with the enthusiastic hopes expressed for the success of our experiment in liberal principles. Dr. Bowring is a slender man, a little above the middle height, with a keen, inquisitive expression of countenance, and a good forehead, from which the hair is combed straight back all round, in the style of the Cameronians. His manner is all life, and his motion and gesture nervously sudden and angular. He talks rapidly, but clearly, and uses beautiful language; concise, and full of select expressions and vivid figures. His conversation in this particular was a constant surprise. He gave us a great deal of information, and when we parted, inquired my route of travel, and offered me letters to his friends, with a cordiality very unusual on this side the Atlantic.

It is a cold but common rule with travelers in Europe to avoid the society of their own countrymen. In a city like Paris, where time and money are both so valuable, every additional acquaintance, pursued either for etiquette or intimacy is felt, and one very soon learns to prefer his advantage to any tendency of his sympathies. The infractions upon the rule, however, are very delightful, and at the general re-union at our ambassador's on Wednesday evening, or an occasional one at Lafayette's, the look of pleasure and relief at beholding familiar faces, and hearing a familiar language once more, is universal. I have enjoyed this morning the double happiness of meeting an American circle, around an American breakfast. Mr. Cooper had invited us, (Morse the artist, Dr. Howe, a gentleman of the navy, and myself). Mr. C. lives with great hospitality, and in all the comfort of American habits; and to find him, as he is always found, with his large family about him, is to get quite back to the atmosphere of our country. The two or three hours we passed at his table were, of course, delightful. It should endear Mr. Cooper to the hearts of his countrymen, that he devotes all his influence, and no inconsiderable portion of his large income, to the encouragement of American artists. It would be natural enough, after being so long abroad, to feel or affect a preference for the works of foreigners, but in this, as in his political opinions, most decidedly, he is eminently patriotic. We feel this in Europe, where we discern more clearly by comparison the poverty of our country in the arts, and meet, at the same time, American artists of the first talent, without a single commission from home for original works, copying constantly for support. One of Mr. Cooper's purchases, the "Cherubs," by Greenough, has been sent to the United States, and its merit was at once acknowledged. It was done, however, (the artist, who is here, informs me,) under every disadvantage of feeling and circumstances; and, from what I have seen and am told by others of Mr. Greenough, it is, I am confident, however beautiful, any thing but a fair specimen of his powers. His peculiar taste lies in a bolder range, and he needs only a commission from government to execute a work which will begin the art of sculpture nobly in our country.

My curiosity led me into a strange scene to-day. I had observed for some time among the affichés upon the walls an advertisement of an exhibition of "fighting animals," at the Barrière du Combat. I am disposed to see almost any sight once, particularly where it is, like this, a regular establishment, and, of course, an exponent of the popular taste. The place of the "Combats des Animaux," is in one of the most obscure suburbs, outside the walls, and I found it with some difficulty. After wandering about in dirty lanes for an hour or two, inquiring for it in vain, the cries of the animals directed me to a walled place, separated from the other houses of the suburb, at the gate of which a man was blowing a trumpet. I purchased a ticket of an old woman, who sat shivering in the porter's lodge; and, finding I was an hour too early for the fights, I made interest with a savage-looking fellow, who was carrying in tainted meat, to see the interior of the establishment. I followed him through a side gate, and we passed into a narrow alley, lined with stone kennels, to each of which was confined a powerful dog, with just length of chain enough to prevent him from reaching the tenant of the opposite hole. There were several of these alleys, containing, I should think, two hundred dogs in all. They were of every breed of strength and ferocity, and all of them perfectly frantic with rage or hunger, with the exception of a pair of noble-looking black dogs, who stood calmly at the mouths of their kennels: the rest struggled and howled incessantly, straining every muscle to reach us, and resuming their fierceness towards each other when we had passed by. They all bore, more or less, the marks of severe battles; one or two with their noses split open, and still unhealed; several with their necks bleeding and raw, and galled constantly with the iron collar, and many with broken legs, but all apparently so excited as to be insensible to suffering. After following my guide very unwillingly through the several alleys, deafened with the barking and howling of the savage occupants, I was taken to the department of wild animals. Here were all the tenants of the menagerie, kept in dens, opening by iron doors upon the pit, in which they fought. Like the dogs, they were terribly wounded; one of the bears especially, whose mouth was torn all off from his jaws, leaving his teeth perfectly exposed, and red with the continually exuding blood. In one of the dens lay a beautiful deer, with one of his haunches severely mangled, who, the man told me, had been hunted round the pit by the dogs but a day or two before. He looked up at us, with his large soft eye, as we passed, and lying on the damp stone floor, with his undressed wounds festering in the chilly atmosphere of mid-winter: he presented a picture of suffering which made me ashamed to the soul of my idle curiosity.

The spectators began to collect, and the pit was cleared. Two-thirds of those in the amphitheatre were Englishmen, most of whom were amateurs, who had brought dogs of their own to pit against the regular mastiffs of the establishment. These were despatched first. A strange dog was brought in by the collar, and loosed in the arena, and a trained dog let in upon him. It was a cruel business. The sleek, well-fed, good-natured animal was no match for the exasperated hungry savage he was compelled to encounter. One minute, in all the joy of a release from his chain, bounding about the pit, and fawning upon his master, and the next attacked by a furious mastiff, who was taught to fasten on him at the first onset in a way that deprived him at once of his strength; it was but a murderous exhibition of cruelty. The combats between two of the trained dogs, however, were more equal. These succeeded to the private contests, and were much more severe and bloody. There was a small terrier among them, who disabled several dogs successively, by catching at their fore-legs, and breaking them instantly with a powerful jerk of his body. I was very much interested in one of the private dogs, a large yellow animal, of a noble expression of countenance, who fought several times very unwillingly, but always gallantly and victoriously. There was a majesty about him, which seemed to awe his antagonists. He was carried off in his master's arms, bleeding and exhausted, after severely punishing the best dogs of the establishment.

The baiting of the wild animals succeeded the canine combats. Several dogs, (Irish, I was told,) of a size and ferocity such as I had never before seen, were brought in, and held in the leash opposite the den of the bear whose head was so dreadfully mangled.

The door was then opened by the keeper, but poor bruin shrunk from the contest. The dogs became unmanageable at the sight of him, however, and fastening a chain to his collar, they drew him out by main force, and immediately closed the grating. He fought gallantly, and gave more wounds than he received, for his shaggy coat protected his body effectually. The keepers rushed in and beat off the dogs, when they had nearly finished peeling the remaining flesh from his head; and the poor creature, perfectly blind and mad with pain, was dragged into his den again, to await another day of amusement!

I will not disgust you with more of these details. They fought several foxes and wolves afterwards, and last of all, one of the small donkeys of the country, a creature not so large as some of the dogs, was led in, and the mastiffs loosed upon her. The pity and indignation I felt at first at the cruelty of baiting so unwarlike an animal I soon found was quite unnecessary. She was the severest opponent the dogs had yet found. She went round the arena at full gallop, with a dozen savage animals springing at her throat, but she struck right and left with her fore-legs, and at every kick with her heels threw one of them clear across the pit. One or two were left motionless on the field, and others carried off with their ribs kicked in, and their legs broken, while their inglorious antagonist escaped almost unhurt. One of the mastiffs fastened on her ear and threw her down, in the beginning of the chase, but she apparently received no other injury.

I had remained till the close of the exhibition with some violence to my feelings, and I was very glad to get away. Nothing would tempt me to expose myself to a similar disgust again. How the intelligent and gentlemanly Englishmen whom I saw there, and whom I have since met in the most refined society of Paris, can make themselves familiar, as they evidently were, with a scene so brutal, I cannot very well conceive.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

SKETCHES BY A BRIEFLESS LAWYER.

I HAVE often wondered how it happens that among the different professions and pursuits of life, some of them involving too the deepest mysteries of science, so much should have been sought out and discovered calculated to amuse and instruct the general reader, while the law, which may be aptly termed the grand reservoir of them all, should have been, by common consent, left so wholly untouched. None who are conversant with the literature of the present day, can be ignorant of the mingled pleasure and instruction to be derived from the "confessions" of poets and of players, which, within the last few years, have inundated the field of light literature, and presented livingly, as it were, to the imaginations of their readers, the arcana of their various and diversified professions. Who can have forgotten the thrilling interest which the recent "Sketches from the Diary of a Physician" so vividly imparted to the unlettered, no less than to the learned reader? How comes it then, I repeat, that the only profession which unites all others—which presents human nature in all its shades, and concentrates within itself every variety of character, motive and action, should have been allowed to stand alone, enveloped in the dust of ages with which it is so invariably associated—a sealed book to all but those who are induced by interest, or compelled by misfortune, to pursue it? Is it that it is a barren field, whose culture is unworthy the pains?—Surely not. Is it that no one has been, as yet, found competent to the task of gleaming amusement from its abundant resources? To admit it would be a gross libel upon the intelligence of that most learned profession. Or is it that there are none among its ranks whose leisure will permit them to devote an occasional hour to so useful and laudable an undertaking? I cannot permit myself to believe it. The leisure with which it is my good fortune to be so amply blessed, is a possession which I fear I must be contented to enjoy in common with others, who, like myself, are not annoyed by the untimely visits of anxious, and, in some instances, disappointed clients. Why then does no one step forward in a path hitherto untrodden, and which presents so much adapted to attract and rivet the attention? I am sure I hazard nothing in saying that the incidents in the life of a lawyer are more varied than are known to any other intercourse, whether social or professional. The bright, no less than the dark side of human nature, constantly presents itself to him; prosperity and adversity, joy and grief, happiness and misery, pass in review before him; and he is enabled in his varied intercourse with his species, to draw living lessons from the book of nature, which, to the philosopher and the student, are wholly unknown, unless, as they are derived from the deceptive sophistry of the schools. The divine, by habit and education, as well as by duty, regards his fellow-creature not as a member of society, or as mixing with the passions, the desires, and the prejudices with which society invests him, but tests him by a higher standard, and regards him as he is fitted or otherwise for a higher and purer state of existence. The intercourse of the physician is confined, for the most part, to circumstances which do not develop the character of the individual as he lives and moves among his fellow men. His constitution broken, and his mind enfeebled by disease, he presents a compound of feelings and passions, foreign to his nature, and the picture becomes overwrought, because it is unnatural. But in the way of the lawyer no such obstacles are placed. His profession brings him in contact with every class of society, in the ordinary avocations of life, with the accumulated advantage of furnishing him with a key to motives which to others appear concealed. No superficial observer can be a great lawyer. His concern is not with actions but with motives, and the discriminating acumen of his profession teaches him to regard the former as nothing, unless they tend to illustrate and develop the latter. And in applying this test in every case, from the daily pursuits of life to the most momentous investigations affecting even life itself, it would be indeed strange if any man could pass through a legal career without acquiring a most thorough and practical knowledge of human nature. We often hear such a man praised beyond description for his tact as a cross-examiner. Is it because he browbeats a witness, and by dint of mere bullying confuses and trips him? Is it because he artfully takes advantage of the weakness, timidity, or ignorance of an individual who may be subjected to his scrutiny; and thus, in defiance of justice, gives to truth the appearance of falsehood, and at the expense of conscience and integrity, succeeds in carrying his point? Surely it will be admitted that such a man would rather degrade an honorable profession, and that although he might with some receive credit for ingenuity, with all he ought to be condemned for his want of principle. No, the reason is, that by a close observance of human nature, by a keen scrutiny of motives, he is enabled at once to condemn falsehood from its own mouth, and tear from it the mask with which it intended to deceive. It is because, by a close analysis of the mind, every thing is brought down to the standard of motive, and is credited or not as it adheres to or departs from the infallible criterion of probability. Many a time have I seen the talent of counsel triumph over the most complicated and deeply contrived schemes of deception. Many a time have I been thrilled by the eloquence of the bar, when bearing down upon contrivance and artifice, and eliciting conviction from a cloud of doubt; and while I have been lost in admiration of the great powers of the advocate, the beautiful language of Hooker has vividly glanced across my mind:—"Of law," says he, "no less can be acknowledged than that her seat is the bosom of God, her voice the harmony of the world; all things in heaven and earth do her homage, the very least as feeling her care, and the greatest as not exempted from her power."

The title of these sketches has already anticipated me in saying, that my own experience has not supplied me very copiously with illustrations of the remarks I have made. Such as it is, however, it has at least induced me to be a close observer; and if in being compelled by stern necessity to lounge unfeared around the bar, I should not be able to put myself forward as my hero, it must not be supposed that in the sketches which follow I have been blind to the excellence of a profession of which it has hitherto been my lot to be an humble and obscure member. G.

A great portion of human beings go through their existence without being conscious of the finest pleasure, or the acutest pains of life, and without dreaming of the physical beauties of the world they inhabit.

ENGLISH LITERATURE.

BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER'S FAITHFUL SHEPHERDESS.

PASTORAL poetry is a strange anomaly in literature. It is the most natural in its object, and yet the most artificial in its character, of any kind of poetry. True, indeed,

"The love of nature and the scenes she draws,
Is nature's dictate,"

but we may doubt whether the taste which "babbles of green fields" be not always artificial, and very often affected. We never hear of pastoral poetry in pastoral ages. The idyls of Theocritus, Bion, and Moschus are far posterior to Arcadian simplicity; and Virgil wrote his Bucolics at the court of Augustus. It seems, in truth, as though it were but a flimsy copy of primitive purity, by which men sought to hide the loss of the original; an attempt to persuade themselves and others, that in the bosom of sickly refinement and rank corruption, they yet appreciate the homely joys and rude content of the shepherd's life.

But our business at present is not with pastoral poetry in general, but with a single specimen of it. And that is such a one as might almost disarm our critical severity, and make us recant all that we have said of the dulness, the forced and unnatural character of this kind of composition. It would, indeed, be treason to every feeling of taste to utter these words in the same breath with the name of the Faithful Shepherdess! If any thing could wipe away the charges so justly made against the class of writings to which it belongs, it would be this work; a work from which Milton did not disdain to borrow half of the beauties of his Comus, and which with Comus and the Midsummer Night's Dream forms a trio unrivalled in the annals of fanciful and imaginative poetry.

Did our limits permit, we certainly could not consent to forego the present opportunity of saying a few words as to the character of Beaumont and Fletcher. The two names will go down to posterity only together, and their individual fame is completely merged in this singular kind of joint immortality. They form the most curious literary partnership ever known. Their minds were most diametrically opposite in character and cultivation. Beaumont was a man of fashion and figure, of wit and gaiety. Fletcher too had a rich vein of humor—but it was fortified by deep and solid learning, and chastened by tragic, contemplative melancholy.—So different were their characters—yet their writings blend together so happily that no one can point out the junction—so skillfully is the tapestry wrought, that we cannot tell where or how Beaumont's brilliant dyes are interwoven with the more sober richness of Fletcher's "sable stole." To quote the familiar, but always beautiful lines,

"Thus they grew,
Like to a double cherry, seeming parted,
An union in partition."

The picture of two such minds laboring together in unison—two voices of such compass and power joining to produce a richer and more various harmony, is a striking and a noble one. Indeed, when we go back to the earlier ages of our literature, and the giants who were upon the earth in those days, we see but little of the angry bickerings and selfish jealousies which disgrace their degenerate progeny. Shakspeare, Ben Jonson, Beaumont and Fletcher, were not strangers and enemies, but brethren, as it were, of the same mystery. And when that knot of choice spirits assembled at the Mermaid, no animosities, no professional rivalry, no pride of authorship chilled the genial current of their souls, or restrained the free overflowings of mirth and friendship. And how brilliant the banquet that was lit up by such suns and stars of genius, contending only who should blaze the brightest. Well might Beaumont say to Jonson,

"What things have we seen
Done at the Mermaid! heard words that have been
So nimble and so full of subtle flame,
As if that every one from whence they came
Had meant to put his whole wit in a jest."

What jests and jibes! what flashes of merriment were "wont to set the table in a roar!" banquets rivalled only by the noctes canaque dum of Horace and Virgil, or those later festivities where Johnson, Burke, Goldsmith, and Reynolds renewed with the talents and the fame, the kindly feelings and close friendships of the age of Elizabeth.

We have said that critics are divided in opinion as to the authorship of most of Beaumont and Fletcher's joint productions. But the "Faithful Shepherdess" is undoubtedly Fletcher's alone. Were we disposed to draw invidious comparisons, this might be enough to entitle him to the palm of superior merit. But let us not attempt to parcel out to either that fame they earned in common, or needlessly try to sever after death those who in life were never divided in talent, in pursuits, in friendship, or in fame.

The Faithful Shepherdess is almost as striking an instance of the caprice of taste, or rather the stupidity of the world, as "Paradise Lost" itself. It was damned on its first representation, and languished for a long time unknown in spite of the efforts of Charles I. to revive it, and the free use made of it by Milton in his Comus, and the liberal eulogies bestowed by him on its author. It lay thus neglected till within little more than a century, when the false imported taste of Charles the Second's time gave way to sounder judgment. Then when the treasures of our old English authors were cleansed from the dust which had been suffered to gather round them, this gem of pure and living lustre was recognized as a rich jewel in the poetic crown of the country. We have said that this play was damned at its first representation. The avowed reason was that it had none of those vicious and indelicate scenes which, in compliance with the taste of the age, were then sprinkled through every play. So we find it stated by Ben Jonson in a poem addressed to Fletcher on this occasion, and which is conceived in so fine a strain of honest liberal admiration and generous sympathy, so worthy both of author and subject, that we need offer no apology for inserting it:

"The wise and many-headed bench that sits
Upon the life and death of plays and wits,
(Composed of gamester, captain, knight, knight's man,
Lady or Pucelle that wears mask or fan,
Velvet or taffeta cap, ranked in the dark
By the shop's foreman, or some such brave spark
That may judge for his siren's sake) had before
They saw it half, damned thy whole play—and more
Their motives were, since it had nought to do
With vices that they looked for, and came to.
I, that am glad thy innocence was thy guilt,
And wish that all the muses' blood were spilt
In such a martyrdom, to vex thine eyes,
Do crown thy murdered poem, which shall rise
A glorified work to time, while fire
And moths shall eat what all these fools admire."

And here it may not be out of place to make a few remarks on the serious charge of grossness and indecency so often urged against our authors. Of the fact there is no doubt. But let us remember in their excuse that much which our fastidious delicacy would shudder at, was unscrupulously received by their homely auditors; and that in all their gross obscenities they only followed the universal taste of their age. And we may be surprised to hear that these authors were in their day praised for the very opposite quality. A reverend prelate praised Fletcher for his "wit untainted by obscenity," and calls his works

"More pure, more chaste, moresainted than are plays."

We may question, indeed, whether we do not magnify their guilt beyond its true proportions. We are very apt to strain at a gnat and swallow a camel. Any young lady may languish with perfect impunity over the glowing pictures of a licentious novel; she may swallow the most loathsome profligacy, if it be only slightly veiled or showily adorned, while she must recoil with horror from the plain-speaking of Beaumont and Fletcher, and cannot read Shakspeare, except in a "family edition." We do not offer these remarks in defence of our authors; we know that but we trust in their case they may admit of some excuse.

"Immodest words admit of no defence,"

It is conceived to be the duty of every critic to present an analysis of the work he reviews, and we shall therefore attempt to sketch the outline of the Faithful Shepherdess; not that we can hope to give thereby any idea of the poem itself. As well might we try to give an idea of the play of colors in the human face, or of the "shape and gesture proudly eminent" of the human form, from the exhibition of a skeleton. The materials which genius employs, what have they to do with the genius exercised upon them? If authors, and above all, poets, are to be measured by this standard, Ariosto and Shakspeare must be condemned, and the frigid regularities of the French school alone admired. The plot of Comus may be comprised in three lines; and so, strictly speaking, may that of the Faithful Shepherdess. The story of both is only that of chastity and constancy, sorely tried yet triumphant, and the end of both only to show that virtue, in whatever extremity, is never without a glistering guardian,

"To keep its life and honor unassailed."

The only way we can give any idea of its beauties is by going through the play, and remarking on them as we go along; and so thickly are they strewn in our path, that all cannot escape us, however hurried our examination.

The play opens with a soliloquy of Clorin, the holy shepherdess, who, in consequence of the death of her lover, resolves to live a life of solitude, and devote herself only to deeds of charity. In this scene enters the satyr, the prototype, we may remark, of the attendant spirit in Comus, and seeing the holy maiden, in whose face

"Shines more awful majesty
Than dull weak mortality," he offers her a rustic present of fruits and flowers, and tenders her worship and obedience. The soliloquy Clorin makes when he leaves her we shall extract entire:

"And all my fears go with thee.
What greatness, or what private hidden power
Is there in me, to draw submission
From this rude man and beast? Sure I am mortal,
The daughter of a shepherd, he was mortal,
And she that bore me, mortal: prick my hand
And it will bleed; a fever shakes me, and
The selfsame wind that makes the young lamb shrink,
Makes me a-cold; my fear says I am mortal.
Yet I have heard—my mother told it me,
And now I do believe it—if I keep
My virgin flower uncorrupt, pure, chaste, and fair,
No goblin, woodgod, fairy, elf, or fiend,
Satyre, or other power that haunts the groves
Can hurt my body, or by vain illusion
Draw me to wander after idle fires;
Or voices calling me in dead of night
To make me follow, and to tole me on Through mire and standing pools, to find my ruin.
Else why should this rough thing, who never knew
Manners, nor smooth humanity, whose heats
Are rougher than himself, and more misshapen,
Thus mildly kneel to me? Sure there's a power
In that great name of virgin that binds fast
All rude, uncivil bloods, all appetites
That break their confines; then, strong chastity,
Be thou my strongest guard."

We need hardly tell our hearers where to look for a parallel passage. There are two different scenes in Comus, whose beauties are a close transcript of this:

"Some say no evil thing that walks by night
In fog or fire, by lake or moorish fen,
Blue meager hag, or stubborn unkind ghost
That breaks his magic chains at curfew-time,
No goblin, or swart fairy of the mine
Hath hurtful power o'er true virginity."

And again, the soliloquy of the Lady in the Wood:

"A thousand fantasies
Begin to throng into my memory
Of calling shapes and beckoning shadows dire,
And airy tongues that syllable men's names
On sands and shores and desert wildernesses."

These two last passages are familiar and dear to the memory of every one, yet how many of those who prize their exquisite fanciful beauty most highly, are ignorant of its source and fountain-head, and scarcely know the Faithful Shepherdess by name!

But to proceed. In the same act, Amoret, the faithful shepherdess, and her lover Perigot, agree to meet at night in a spot sacred to rural loves, by the side of a holy well:

"A virtuous well, about whose flowery banks
The nimble footed fairies dance their rounds
By the pale moonshine, dipping oftentimes
Their stolen children, so to make them free
From dying flesh and dull mortality.
By this fair fount has many a shepherd sworn
And given away his freedom—many a troth
Been plighted, which neither envy nor old Time
Could ever break, with many a chaste kiss given
In hope of coming happiness.
By this fresh fountain many a blushing maid
Hath crowned the head of her long-loved shepherd
With gaudy flowers, while he happy sung
Lays of his love and dear captivity."

The remainder of the act is taken up with the unsuccessful suit of Amaryllis to Perigot, and the wanton fires of Clorin and her lovers. In the second and third acts, Amaryllis, under the influence of jealous rage and hate, prevails on the sullen shepherds to dip her body in the well, by whose magic virtue she is changed into the shape of Amoret. In this guise she meets Perigot at his tryst, who mistaking her for Amoret, and shocked at the loose advances she makes him, attacks her, when she flies and resumes her own shape. The true Amoret enters, whom Perigot, under the influence of his error, wounds and deserts. The sullen shepherd, finding the body, throws it in the well. The god of the river rises with the body in his arms, and restores it to life. We dare not venture, however strong the temptation, to transcribe this scene; could we do so, we could show that the "virgin daughter of Loocrine," who "still retains her maiden gentleness," the pure drops she sprinkles to aid the cure, and the tribute of thanks offered by the grateful spirit, are closely copied from it, varied only as Milton has substituted for Fletcher's lively and simple beauty, the "long majestic march" of his lofty diction, and the "energy divine" of his imagination. In the fourth act Amaryllis, smitten with remorse, protests to Perigot the innocence of his love, and engages, to convince him, to meet him in the shape of Amoret, in an hour. But in her place he meets the true Amoret, and mistaking her for the disguised shepherdess, in his rage and despair again wounds her. The satyr re-entering, describes the approach of morning in the following lines, which we extract, as a fair specimen of that freshness and liveliness which peculiarly distinguish Fletcher's poetry—

"See, the day begins to break,
And the light shoots like a streak
Of subtle fire; the wind blows cold,
While the morning doth unfold;
Now the birds begin to rouse,
And the squirrel from the boughs
Leaps to get him nuts and fruit.
The early lark, that erst was mute,
Carols to the rising day
Many a note and many a lay."

Finding the body, he bears it to the bower of Clorin, to be cured by her skill. In the fifth act, the wound of Amoret is healed, and she and her lover are reconciled. Alexis, a wanton lover, is cured of the wound received from a rival; the bad passions of the wanton and malicious are purified, and the honest affections of the virtuous crowned with happiness, and the piece concludes with the following lines, addressed by the satyr to his mistress, the holy Clorin—lines, whose fine poetic spirit and chaste yet fanciful beauty, will bear a comparison even with the fairy graces of Titania, or the delicate spiriting of Ariel.

"Thou divinest, fairest, brightest,
Thou most powerful maid, and whitest,
Thou most virtuous and most blessed,
Eyes of stars, and golden tressed,
Like Apollo, tell me, sweetest,
What new service now is meetest
For the Satyr? Shall I stray
Into the middle air, and stay
The sailing rack, or nimbly take Hold by the moon, and gently make Suit to the pale queen of night
For a beam to give thee light?
Shall I dive into the sea
And bring thee coral, making way
Through the rising waves that fall
In snowy fleeces? Dearest, shall
I catch the wanton fawns or flies
Whose woven wings the summer dyes
Of many colors? get thee fruit,
Or steal from heaven old Orpheus's lute?
All these I'll venture for, and more
To do her service all these woods adore."

The preceding, we are aware, is but an imperfect analysis. There are many characters and incidents in the piece we have passed over entirely. But our limits do not admit of a fuller examination, and we prefer devoting what little time remains to us to a few remarks on the character of the author, rather than the story of the piece.

Burns has asked,

"In this braw age o' wit and lair,
Will nane the shepherd's whistle mair
Blaw sweetly in its native air
And rural grace,
And wi' the far-famed Grecian share
A rival place?"

To this we answer, that the author of the Faithful Shepherdess deserves a place by the side even of Theocritus; and by this we mean to pay the highest compliment to a pastoral poet because we look on Theocritus's as almost the only true pastorals the world ever saw. The artificial prettinesses of Virgil and Pope bear about the same resemblance to his simple beauties that the square-cut groves and formal alleys of Versailles do to the native glories of an American forest. The pastorals of the Italians are equally insipid, though sanctioned by so great a name as that of Tasso—and the few attempts of this kind made by the French have a double share of the formal dulness of

"Their country's creaking lyre,
That whetstone of the teeth—monotony in voice."

Neither Shakspeare nor Burns ever fairly entered on this tempting but dangerous field. They were content to celebrate nature as nature taught them—in songs, the echoes of her own harmony, in descriptions, living copies of her own beauties, without offering her the strained and affected compliments of a regular pastoral. Fletcher and Theocritus alone remain, and these two must divide the crown of pastoral poetry.

We have already repeatedly remarked that Milton borrowed much from Fletcher, and have alluded to one or two of these points of resemblance. But we have not time to trace out the similarity any farther, or to collate more passages of each. The general difference between Comus and the Faithful Shepherdess may be briefly stated. Each is the perfection of a different kind of beauty. In Comus all the splendors of learning, fancy, eloquence, history, and fiction are heaped up and poured forth together; it reminds us of the enchanted caverns in the eastern tale, where all the riches of the world were amassed in a prodigal, dazzling, bewildering confusion of magnificence. The lustre of the Faithful Shepherdess is that of the dew-drops which, in its author's words,

"Kiss
Every little flower that is,
Hanging on their velvet heads
Like a rosy of crystal beads."

Not that Fletcher wanted for learning—he was a profound and accomplished scholar; but in this poem he left art to follow nature, or rather retained only that perfection of art which consists in its concealment. Milton's learned pomp and classical splendor, on the other hand, never forsake him. He drank so deeply and so delightfully at the fountains of ancient genius, that he was completely imbued with their spirit. His readers, in fact, do not always remark how unbounded were the riches of his mind, and how freely they are poured forth in every line of his poetry. The whole gorgeous array of classical mythology is sometimes collected in a dozen sounding lines, and at others come sweeping by the long train of heroes and demigods, ghosts and goblins, and other denizens of the world of fancy—

"As thick and numberless
As the gay motes that people the sunbeams."

How simple, how naked the mere plot of Comus—yet in what a rich and massy drapery it is shrouded! what wealth of learning—what pride, pomp, and circumstance of imagination are piled up, as it were, around it! In the Faithful Shepherdess there is none of this splendid pageantry—this profuse prodigality of thought and diction. It is curious indeed, and highly characteristic to see how Milton prolongs, adorns, and amplifies some simple natural beauty of Fletcher's—how he transforms his rustic grace into courtly elegance and regal state. Much as Milton loved nature, he loved not to look on her in her prison of earth and her garments of clay—he sought to clothe her in the "pure ambrosial weeds" of spiritual life, and to make her look "up to th' enthroned gods on sainted seats." He was a visionary, and sought to express in all his characters and poems that ideal good, that exalted standard of perfection, ever present to his thoughts. Fletcher's beauties are less grand and majestic, but more fresh and simple. While Milton's flight is far up into the empyrean, he skims along the ground and hovers about the homes and haunts of men. Milton's is the "deep majestic melody" of the pealing organ, Fletcher's the natural touching note of her he describes so poetically as

"The nightingale among the thick leaved spring
That sits alone in sorrow—"

or, to borrow an image from another of the old worthies of the English drama, the strife between them is like that mentioned by Ford between the musician and the nightingale, where even Philomela's native wealth of song is surpassed by the consummate skill of her antagonist, and where "nature's best skilled musician" cannot compete with him whose art poured forth and redoubled

"Concord and discord, lines of different measure Meeting in one full centre of delight," and surely, after comparing Comus and the Faithful Shepherdess, we may pronounce it, in like manner,

"The sweetest and most ravishing contention
That ever art and nature were at strife in."

LETTERS FROM CORRESPONDENTS.

Messrs. Editors—Because for once in my life I venture to write something for a public print, you must not set me down for a person tainted in any way with literary propensities. I abhor, as well as despise them, and being a plain man, I am satisfied with the simple pleasure of living and breathing the fresh air, and looking around me. Your book-worms I hate, although sometimes I can scarcely avoid laughing at them. It is odd enough, to be sure, that a work written in rhyme should drive some people out of their sober senses. What wonderful fascination there can be found in listening to words of the same termination arranged at equal distances after each other, I cannot conceive. High, fly—go, flow—who, through—what is there so charming in all this? It is astonishing how silly some folks are, but take the most execrable sentiment, and one which, if uttered in ordinary prose, would be almost shuddered at, if it is only ushered in with the high, fly, go, flow, it is read with rapture, and recited and sung by the most moral and delicate of young misses. Take, for instance, Moore's famous song, "Come rest in this bosom, my own stricken deer," and let me ask what is the meaning of the two last lines:

"I know not, I care not what guilt's in that heart,
I but know that I love thee, whatever thou art."

That is, the fair girl who murmurs over this precious piece of morality at the piano, does not care what a disreputable puppy she may have for a lover—whether he got his fortune by robbing a bank or swindling his creditors—nor how many other wives he may have about town—these things are perfectly immaterial, and the two chiming words, heart, art, with which this little specimen of poetical principle terminates, have it all hollow against both law and gospel. As for me, gentlemen, I am not a man to trouble myself much concerning small matters; but I confess I have found "our rapidly increasing literature," as they call it, such an annoyance to me as to induce this present writing in the way of complaint. I have the misfortune to be the guardian of a good-for-nothing idle nephew, who has caught the rage for poetry, and as the fellow has been through college, and has naturally an oily tongue, he no sooner hears me attempting any remonstrance than he talks me out of countenance. I am endeavoring to bring him up to a decent mercantile business, but the dunce is so stuffed with old rhymes and couplets, with sentiments and sentences, and adages, and all that, that I despair of ever making anything of him. It was only the other day that I found a memorandum in his hand of goods consigned to us. "Printed quiltings—Turkey-red table covers—super Devonshire kerseys—best cambric power-loom full chintz prints—why should I blush to own I love." He does not know that I have seen this business minute, but I hope when he reads your Mirror, which he does every week, he will behold his own image reflected in it, and desist from giving me further trouble. I wish to complain to you also on another theme. As I have been industrious all my life, and carefully eschewed poetry and music, and such expensive and absurd things, I have done pretty well in business, and laid up a penny for a rainy day. My good-natured friends have not failed to discover my prosperity, and I am continually pestered with applications to subscribe to books, and to buy engravings, and to patronize "our rapidly increasing literature." Indeed, I heartily wish "our rapidly increasing literature" in Egypt. I look upon the wonderful improvement which every thing around us is undergoing with a very suspicious eye. I am not naturally, by any means, avaricious, and have not firmness to say no to applications which my reason condemns. I have, therefore, been the victim of literature, although I detest it, and am half ruined with music without being able to find anything in Cinderella half so sweet to my taste as yankee doodle, the only tune, indeed, which I either know or admire. My table is sometimes covered with engravings which I never look at. I have a quarto dictionary and twelve volumes of an encyclopædia, some books of poetry, novels, and essays—and on looking over my accounts I find that I have within the last twelve months been swindled out of one or two hundred dollars in the way of theatricals for a pretty large family, although I do not care a farthing for either play or opera. It would not be civil, gentlemen, while thus addressing myself to you, for me to say anything against your paper, which I suppose, from what I hear, is a decent sort of an affair, but I will not deny that I subscribed to it at the instigation of my family, who declared that I ought to do something for the periodical literature of the country, which it was every honest man's duty to promote by all the means in his power. It may be so; but if I go on much longer doing my duty in this fashion, instead of my supporting the literature of my country, I shall want somebody to support me. There is one paper only which I take voluntarily and read with interest. I mean "Canfield's Reporter, Counterfeit Detector, and New-York Price Current," an entertaining and useful weekly miscellany, exactly to my taste. Please to print this, and oblige your obedient servant, RUFUS RANDILL,

Of the firm of Batch, Randill, & Co.

THE DRAMA.

THE NEW-YORK STAGE.

We shall not venture any minute observations on the new opera of the Maid of Judah until we have further opportunities of judging of its merits. The story is founded on Ivanhoe, and the music by Rossini. Miss Hughes performs the principal female part, much to the satisfaction of the audience. She had previously opened her present engagement in Cinderella, the music of which she sang delightfully. The finale was enthusiastically encored. Mr. Thorne took for his benefit the Tempest and Der Freischütz, in which he sustained Caliban and Caspar. We have before complimented this gentleman on his excellent delineation of these two characters. The critics of the day pronounce his Caliban the best we have had on this stage. He heightened the terrors of the abhorred monster by the use of a remarkable voice, of striking depth and strength, and his whole conception of the part was chaste and impressive. As Caspar, also, he displayed the effect of being brought forward in business adapted to his powers, and demonstrated the injustice of compelling him into a department not in his line. He is clearly a useful performer, and merited the respectable audience which assembled on the occasion. Mrs. Austin, as Ariel and Linda, was charming as usual.

At the Richmond-hill they are improving rapidly. Mrs. Duff is a strong attraction. Report speaks of arrangements which will give this establishment increased interest.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE P. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, MARCH 3, 1832.

The present number.—Again we issue a finely executed steel plate, and an entire sheet of original matter. Our readers may depend upon the accuracy of the likeness, as it is copied with great fidelity from an admirable engraving, recently published in England, and pronounced by the British critics "the very man." It may not be considered inappropriate to add, that the mere engraving of this picture cost us three hundred dollars. We trust our persevering endeavors to deserve our large and increasing patronage will afford satisfaction.

Editors' study.—A poem from Dr. Drake, never before published! We opened the paper containing the fine, glowing verses on the first page of the present impression, with the feeling of an epicure, who pours out his glass of rare, choice, old wine, and pauses ere he drinks, to watch the crimson light, reddening and burning through its ruddy depths. We obtained the lines through the unsolicited kindness of one of the author's intimate friends, to whom we gratefully acknowledge our indebtedness, and we present them to the reader, as a choice relic of a bard, than whom America has produced none more amiable and gifted. As we imagined ourselves familiar with Dr. Drake's printed and manuscript works, we were rather surprised to have entirely overlooked these; but our accomplished correspondent informs us they were composed some fifteen years since, and will be new to most of the author's many admirers.

After the poetical department was filled with the offering referred to above, our pleasure was renewed by receiving the poem which we give below from Mr. Sprague, another able contributor to American prose literature, and who, everybody knows, has soared into the regions of poetry with a bold and successful wing. It will be perceived that the verses owe their existence to the sight of a picture. The name of the author, without further comment, will be sufficient to recommend them to universal notice.

O, it is life! departed days
Fling back their brightness while I gaze:
'Tis Emma's self—this brow so fair,
Half-curtained in this glossy hair,
These eyes, the very home of love,
These dark twin-arches traced above,
These red-ripe lips that almost speak,
The fainter blush of this pure cheek,
The rose and lily's beauteous strife—
It is! ah, no—'tis all but life.

'Tis all but life—art could not save
Thy graces, Emma, from the grave:
Thy cheek is pale, thy smile is past,
Thy love-lit eyes have looked their last;
Mouldering beneath the coffin's lid,
All we adored of thee is hid;
Thy heart, where goodness loved to dwell,
Is throbless in the narrow cell;
Thy gentle voice shall charm no more,
Its last, last joyful note is o'er.

Of, of, indeed, it hath been sung,
The requiem of the fair and young;
The theme is old, alas! how old,
Of grief that will not be controlled,
Of sighs that speak a father's woe,
Of pangs that none but mothers know,
Of friendship with its bursting heart,
Doomed from the Idol-one to part—
Still its sad debt must feeling pay,
Till feeling, too, shall pass away.

O say, why age and grief and pain
Shall long to go, but long in vain,
Why vice is left to mock at time,
And, gray in years, grow gray in crime;
While youth, that every eye makes glad,
And beauty, all in radiance clad,
And goodness, cheering every heart,
Come, but come only to depart;
Sunbeams, to cheer life's wintry day,
Sunbeams, to flash, then fade away.

'Tis darkness all! black banners wave
Round the cold borders of the grave;
There, when in agony we bend
O'er the fresh sod that hides a friend,
One only comfort then we know—
We, too, shall quit this world of woe;
We, too, shall find a quiet place,
With the dear lost ones of our race;
Our crumbling bones with theirs shall blend,
And life's sad story find an end.

And is this all? this mournful doom?
Beams no glad light beyond the tomb?
Mark where yon clouds in darkness ride;
They do not quench the orb they hide;
Still there it wheels—the tempest o'er,
In a bright sky to burn once more:
So, far above the clouds of time,
Faith can behold a world sublime;
There, when the storms of life are past,
The Light beyond shall break at last!

We are also under an obligation to a polite friend for the liberty of publishing the annexed extract from a letter of Mr. Greenough, the sculptor. It is addressed to Mr. Rembrandt Peale, and will be found interesting to a large class of the community, who regard as important the spirit of taste and improvement rapidly passing into several departments of the fine arts on this side the Atlantic:

Paris, November 8, 1831.

"MY DEAR SIR—I am taking my breath for the first time since I parted with you. I have heard of you indirectly through the papers several times, though I am not sure whither to direct this, or whether it will ever reach you. Yet I feel it a pleasing duty to inform you of my operations, and I hope you will favor me with a few words on your own prospects of benefiting the country. I arrived in this truly magnificent city on the sixth of September, and commenced modelling almost immediately. I have remodeled Cooper's head; made a bust of General Lafayette; one of the Princess Belgioioso, a Milanese lady; one of another Italian lady, and one of a Mr. Brisbane, of the state of New-York. When I tell you that circumstances required that I should be on the alert for more than a fortnight, seize each pitiful quarter of an hour afforded by the pressure of General Lafayette's affairs, you will sympathize with me, for you know what it is to come into contact with great political notables. I have, however, finished it, and they say it is like him; thanks to Cooper, who pinned the old gentleman to his chair one morning for two whole hours with stories and bon mots. I believe that was the saving of my bust, for I had become out of humor with it, and you know how fatal that often proves.

"I hear that you have been publishing, and that your book is doing good. We are all obliged to you. You can take, in consequence of your experience and your acquaintance with European art, a higher tone in instructing our countryman than perhaps any other living artist. Pray, sir, convince them that one American work is of more value to the United States than three foreign ones, even of superior merit. If they mean that all their pictures shall be painted by strangers, they are in the wrong, both as regards economy and praiseworthiness. If they do not, then let them employ us manfully, and not tell us to learn to swim before we venture into the water. I have not seen your book; I doubt if it be here.

"A friend told me this morning that you talked of returning to Europe. This grieved me, in spite of the pleasure I promise myself in your company, should you return to Florence, because I fear you are not satisfied with the state of the public feeling on art; and I had been hoping that we had made some progress since I left America.

"Cooper's new book, the Bravo, is taking wonderfully here. If you could transfuse a little of that man's love of country and national pride into the leading members of our high society, I think it would leaven them all, and leave them quite as good men, and surely much better patrons. Mr. Peale, the scholars of America have looked so much abroad for salvation in letters, arts, and manners, that they have not only overlooked home, but have unfitted all under their influence for judging impartially of anything American. They have carted sand upon a fine soil, and nothing but a flood of satire can remove it, and bring to light the fertile bottom which they have encumbered. How does Angelo? Let him draw, draw, draw, and model, if possible; for in painting I think he has more than his share of readiness. I remain, my dear sir, yours with respect,

HORATIO GREENOUGH."

From among the numerous articles furnished by our friendly and attentive correspondents, we regret that we shall be able, in addition, to enrich the present number with only the subjoined lines from the public's old and favorite acquaintance, Mr. Palmer.

TO DEATH.

Pallida mors æquo pulsat pede pauperum tabernas, Regumque turres.—Hor.

All! thou rememb'rest all
Earth's breathing forms of every name and lot;
Bearing the sable pall
And shroud alike to palace and to cot,
Where sits the monarch on his pampered throne,
Or the lean beggar housed with want alone.

O! vain the eagle's plume
That cleaves the cloud and sunward bears his form
Above the deep'ning gloom,
And flashing terrors of the coming storm—
Vain, vain, O death, that proud free pinion's might,
To pass the range of thy dark arrow's flight.

O'er th' appalling hush
Of polar wilds where desolation lowers—
O'er the unfading blush
That fills with sweetness beauty's southern bowers—
Yea, o'er each span of every spreading zone
Where beats life's busy pulse, thou'rt king alone.

Empires of far renown,
Like giant spectres, all have passed away—
The Macedonian's crown,
And the world-grasping Gaul's imperial sway
Have but the breathless being of a name,
Yet thou dost bear thy sceptre still the same.

The thunder's awful tone
Tells of the mustering tempest's waking wrath;
And earthquake's smothered groan
Proclaims the ruin that shall mark its path
Beneath the city's pomp—but thou, dark power!
Thou hast no herald for thy coming hour.

None may thy advent tell,
So feared, so shunned by all of mortal birth—
None may uplift the veil

That hides thy nameless mysteries from earth;
Though oft the future's spectral kingdom lies
In shadowy scope before prophetic eyes.

Where the bright wine is quaffed,
And dance and song love's festal moments crown,
Thou bear'st thy secret shaft,
Assassin-like to strike thy victim down,
Haply some maid betrothed, or blushing bride,
Or youthful hero in his glory's pride.

While bending o'er his lyre
In the deep hush of night's inspiring reign,
Flushed with unearthly fire,
The homeless minstrel wakes its stirring strain,
Thy hand relentless at the purposed ill,
Touches life's silver chord—and all is still.

The babe, unknown to grief,
The hoary hermit of the waste, time-bowed,
The battle's laureled chief,
The homeless sea-boy on the dizzy shroud,
And he that shrieks to hear the simoom's breath
Moan o'er the desert, bow to thee, O death!

Where guilt with innocence,
And pomp with squalid misery jostling meets,
Robbed with the pestilence,
Unseen thou glidest through the shuddering streets,
Till all is hushed where crowds were wont to tread,
Save the lone hearseman's call, "bring forth your dead!"

And ah! not those alone
Whose mortal transit from the haunts of men
Would wake no human moan,
No sigh to call their spirits back again
To their loved haunts beneath th' all-cheering sun,
Can stay thy fated curse, destroying one.

Thou mak'st the dark cold grave
Thy chosen casket for the gems of earth—
The hallowed and the brave,
The fair, the loved—yea, all of proven worth—
Thou snatchest from affection's scanty store,
And to its longing eyes return'st them never more.

Yet to the pure in heart,
Who through temptation's bright and siren sea,
Have steered by virtue's chart,
On, and still nobly on, unfalteringly;
Thou like a pilot welcome'st dost come
To bring life's failing bark to its last haven home!

A writer in a number of the Monthly Magazine, declares that thinking is extinct at the present age—that at least only one or two literary men possess the power, and he designates as one, David Ricardo, (the very gentleman so highly complimented by Mr. Verplanck, in the recent lecture which we had the pleasure of giving in these columns.) We are constrained to contradict him broadly, as will every conductor of a periodical. If thinking is extinct, by what appellation shall we name those mental workings to which we are weekly doomed, before we can make our appearance in your presence, fair lady and gentlemen readers? You forget through how many heads and hands has passed this sheet over which now, Mr. Lounger, your hypercritical glance falls carelessly. You forget how many brains have been racked; how many eyes, and hands, and feet wearied—from him who taxes his fancy for thy amusement, to him who hour after hour works the massive press, or ranges the cold streets to beguile thee of a momentary weariness—to call a passing gleam over thy face. It is curious to look beneath the surface of society and understand the vast and interminable machinery—the hidden engines, the innumerable wheels within wheels, which keep alive the impulses of the great busy world, on the mere smooth outside of which only, so many look. It has struck us sometimes, that a minute and accurate journal, or private history of a single number of any paper, from its incipient state to the moment of its publication, would be amusing; and, indeed, an observation also of its subsequent career would, we imagine, repay curiosity. What a world of subjects such a treatise would involve! The disappointed contributor whose piece has been rejected; and he whose favor has been corrected, or rather mutilated, (they always call correcting mutilating.) You would not believe how the plumage of a scarce fledged scribbler is ruffled by the substitution of a the for an a, or any such important matter. They "make it a principle" never to publish any thing but their own! We wish some one would take this point up, and discuss it coolly. It is among the unsettled interrogatories of the age, this editorial prerogative of mutilating, and ranks above the Junius question, or the Iron Mask, or the authorship of Gil Blas or Homer, or the O.P.Q. writer in the London Chronicle—but we digress. After these comes the author whose book has been reviewed. One of the most dramatic situations we were ever placed in was meeting accidentally a worthy fellow whose octavo we had just rather freely dissected. There was a half checked stage start from both parties on our being introduced, and such a deliberate tragedy dignity—such artificial courtesies—such awkward ease—such feverish indifference! But we are wrong—there was one crisis in our editorial existence, more striking and picturesque, although, from the same cause. We can always, if the worst must come, stand the glance of a man with some show of coolness and composure. If he is impertinent, of course embarrassment is at an end. If he is argumentative, we can reason and explain; if distant, we can be stately; if importunate, we can "rant" as well as he; and, if he meets us with a frank and graceful cordiality, and a noble forgetfulness of the past, we have our own way of putting things to rights; but we are not so confident by half of navigating among the shoals and quicksands of female prejudices. They do not understand business—at least they do not comprehend the imperative force which business considerations exert upon the minds of men. They feel, more than reason, and have different standards of estimating objects and events. To them, home is the centre of the world, and domestic avocations are paramount to all other matters. They are deaf and blind to the positive necessity sometimes existing for sacrificing private and personal wishes to the public good. The happiness of a dear circle around an evening hearth, is infinitely more valuable in their eyes than the remote general interests of literature or science, or even of justice. The wife looks on the judge as a tyrant who refuses to petition for the pardon of her guilty and condemned husband. The unhappy girl attached to André, thought Washington a monster for persisting in one of the most Roman acts that has graced modern times. The same principle of female character descends into the minute circumstances of life; and in the incident which we have alluded to, we were unhappily the instrument of illustrating it. An anonymous correspondent sent us a volume of poems, charmingly printed, with uncut leaves, and damp from the press. It was accompanied by a few lines on blue paper, and in a flowing neat female hand, that had never been roughened and deepened by the hacknied drudgeries of business. Then it was folded so carefully, and sealed with a wax sprinkled over with gold, and, in the prettiest sentence we ever read, solicited our favorable attention to the poetry. On examining the book we found it bad—commonplace—full of plagiarisms. The author was a gentleman of talent, but the volume was shameful. We said so—and yielding to a temptation sometimes too strong for our principles of duty, we heightened the censure with several attempts at satire, thus making ourselves merry at the author's expense. Several months after we met him with some lively friends. He was a generous and very sensible fellow, (we beg our readers, for our own sake, to believe that a man may occasionally write a simple affair, and yet be both,) careless and good-humored, and it would take a heavy critique, we soon discovered, to break a sleep of his; but there was a fair and queenly-looking girl hanging on his arm (we spare you the description) and on the mention of our name (she was his sister) there came over her face, for a moment, a slight crimson, and a half veiled flash from her fine eyes, and an expression of indescribable scorn about the lips, that made us say to ourself "Mr. Editor, you are a fool, at least this fair maiden thinks so, and that's just as well for the present. That same hand hanging so familiarly on your friend's shoulder, traced the lines on the 'blue paper,' which, rash man, you so admired, and so rudely neglected." She was for some time all smiles and gaiety, but half an hour after, while we were busily conversing with another, we accidentally beheld her seated in the shadow of a half-open door, her look expressive of the deepest seriousness, and her large eyes resting full on our face, with a displeasure not wholly unmingled with contempt. It came over us like a north-easter on turning a corner suddenly. It was evident we had offended her; and although we profess a stoical indifference to worldly opinion in the abstract, yet we cannot deny it, there is, when thus put to the test, something exceedingly disagreeable in the conviction that you are despised—despised by any one, and more especially by a woman—young, pure, accomplished, and beautiful. We inwardly foreswore criticism from that moment; but we suspect Jove laughs at editors' vows as well as at lovers'.

Careless readers would not believe the vexations we are thus put to, and how many things we are forced to consider besides the main thing. We shall open a communication with the knowing ones about town, by way of aiding us in these matters. It is getting to be a serious affair, for we were nearly shot the other day, (thank the statute against duelling for our escape,) in consequence of having reviewed a book severely, the author of which was much troubled with the liver complaint. We must, therefore, endeavor to find out whether the writers of books are afflicted with any serious disorders, or have pretty sisters, before we shall hereafter presume to offer any opinion as to their merits.

These would form fair items in the diary of an editor, and they might be multiplied to an almost infinite extent.

The new method of orthography, introduced by Mr. Webster, has been much commented on, and praised and adopted by many leading journals and eminent men, a list of whom we gave in a notice of his work. As we deem the inconsistencies which the English language everywhere betrays in this respect, to be at once glaring and yet not beyond the reach of remedy, we have endeavored to conform ourselves, as far as possible, to the rules which the American lexicographer introduced. It is an important subject, and not easily handled. We shall, one of these days, strive to furnish our views of it in a connected form, and, in the mean time, publish the communication signed A, as conveying some information.

To the Editors of the New-York Mirror.

In a late paper, you have mentioned the subject of orthography. It may be well to remark that the late Mr. Barnes, of the high school, whose unfortunate death all so much lament, published what is called "The Red Book," in which he estimated the discrepancies in English orthography at nearly four thousand; but he goes back too far, and, probably, the number now is much less; still there may be two thousand differences in the spelling of words in our best authors. Webster, in his Dictionaries and Spelling Book, recently published, has been attempting a reformation of this evil, and, by repeated revisions of the copies, has nearly accomplished the object. His rules, if followed, would reduce the orthography of English words to nearly the same uniformity as that of the French, Spanish, and Italian. This is the first attempt; but it is hoped it may succeed, and in time remove what may be considered no inconsiderable evil. A.

THOUGH 'TIS LOVELY TO SEE THE YEAR WAKING.

AN ORIGINAL SONG.—WORDS BY JOHN HOWARD PAYNE—MUSIC BY TAYLOR.—INTRODUCED IN THE TRAGEDY OF OSWALI OF ATHENS.—NOW FIRST PUBLISHED.

Andantino.

Though 'tis love-ly to see the year wak-ing From its sleep in the sea-son of snows, When its blos-soms of white and of pur-ple A-round us the al-mond tree throws, A-round us the al-mond tree throws, In morn-ing's beau-ty, Who for-gets the beau-ty of the sun that sets? In morn-ing's beau-ty, Who for-gets the beau-ty of the sun that sets? the beau-ty of the sun that sets?

2d v.—How lovely the maize, now its tresses
The frolicsome zephyrs unfold;
And the fire-fly by night as it wantons,
Tips the vine-leaves with sparkles of gold.

Whilst Dian through the olive grove,
Lights the glowing steps of love.
3d v.—And though, with his air-darkening myriads,
The stork seeks a kindlier sky,

We shrink not from leaves which turn yellow,
And, whirl'd on the cold breezes, die.
For Ceres hath a smile to bring
O'er winter's cheek the bloom of spring.

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

THE MERIDIAN OF LIFE.

THE sparkling joys that bubbled on the stream
Of early days, have vanished as a dream.
The laughing boy, and ardent youth, give place
Full soon to sober manhood's thoughtful face:
The life, that seemed one joyous day of spring,
With buoyant spirits, ever on the wing,
From idle flights has been compelled to bow—
The flowers that strew'd youth's path are faded now.
Thus let them die, that we may sooner soar
To hopes above this earth, not sought before.
Now, while the noon of life may give us time,
Ere evening's shadows on our path decline;
That when our sun has set, and life is o'er,
An endless morn may rise, and vain regrets no more.

PRIDE.

There is no virtue in the pride which fills even the pious and the good with a bitter contempt for the guilty, especially those in misfortune, and, perhaps, paying the penalty of their crimes. I have always recollected an observation I met with in the "Confessions of an Opium Eater," expressive of my meaning.

"At no time of my life," says the writer of that admirable treatise, "have I been a person to hold myself polluted by the touch or approach of any creature that wore a human shape: on the contrary, from my very earliest youth, it has been my pride to converse familiarly, more Societate, with all human beings—man, woman, and child, that chance might fling in my way, a practice which is friendly to the knowledge of human nature, to good feelings, and to that frankness of address which becomes a man who would be thought a philosopher."

LOVE LETTERS.

A volume of love letters would make an amusing book, although there are many chances in favor of its being ridiculous. I saw these two affecting lines the other day in an old paper. Like nearly all poets, the author has liberally availed himself, in his climax, of the license extended to that class of writers.

When'er I see those lovely eyes,
I rave—I burn—I dote—I die.

PUNS.

A sensible pun is not always to be met with. I like them not generally, because they are too often forced and affected, but the following is good:

A parishioner asked his pastor the meaning of this line of scripture, "He was clothed with curses as with a garment." "It signifies," replied the divine, "that the individual had a habit of swearing."

LOGIC.

It is very gratifying to come to a conclusion logically: as, for instance, that of an old writer:—"B says all Britons are liars. Now, he was himself a Briton, therefore he was a liar, therefore the Britons are not liars, therefore B has not lied—therefore the Britons are liars."

BEAUTY.

Writers generally think personal beauty a positive requisite for the heroine of a story. It requires a first-rate genius to make the unthinking reader satisfied with moral beauty as a substitute.

EXTRACTS FROM A MODERN DICTIONARY.

Challenge—A polite written request from some one of your obedient servants to give him an opportunity of shooting you through the heart.

Duelling pistol—A little instrument used by gentlemen in killing each other.

Creditor—A sensible fellow who often takes his debtor because he thinks he cannot pay, and puts him where he knows he cannot.

Tight lacing—A species of fashionable female suicide.

Flatterer—A beverage of such a tempting flavor, that the highest stoops to sip it from the hands of the meanest.

Manner—A word difficult to describe. It has been called an exhalation from the soul.

Shrew—(from Pythagoras)—the soul of a wild cat in the body of a woman.

Dun—A two legged devil with a piece of paper in his hand—a terrible animal—a monster.

Beauty—An optical delusion.

Epigram on a gentleman named Hedly.
In reading his name it may truly be said,
You will make the man dy if you cut off his Hed.

EPIGRAMS.

Notwithstanding all the thousand epitaphs, spurious and authentic, which are so frequently served up for the amusement of the public, in newspapers, the subject is not yet exhausted: and in the course of my tolerably widely-extended peregrinations, I have met with numerous ones, quite new: here and there one may have since crept into the prints, but most have never been published.

Cut off was honest Nicholas Low,
By death the mighty mower;
His body, here it lies full low,
His soul it lies much lower.

Under this stone lie two children dear,
One lies here, and the other in Gloucestershire.

A curious record of an accident by the downfall of ice is to be found in an epitaph on the son of their parish clerk, at Hampton, in Devonshire. The unfortunate young man was killed by an icicle, which, falling on his head, fractured his skull. It is singularly striking to find the little conceits of ordinary wit and humor mingling with the solemnities of death, and that the parted spirit is dismissed, on its long flight through eternity, with a bon mot; but so it is. The lines are as follows:

Bless my i,
Here I lies
In a sad pickle,
Killed by an icicle.

(The note is particularly deep.)
In the year of Anno Domini 1776!

The annexed is said to have been lately erased from a stone in Cheltenham churchyard, England, by a sapient M. D. who imagined that he detected in it a sarcastic reflection on his respectable fraternity—

Here lies the body of Molly Dickie,
The wife of Hal Dickie, Taylor.
Two great Fizeshians first
My loving husband tried
To cure my pain,
In vain;
At last he got a third,
And then—I died.

TOO FAST AND TOO SLOW:

OR, CHANCE AND CALCULATION.

FRANK HAIRBRAIN and Moses Meeker were schoolmates and contemporaries, but not friends. They were the opposites of each other in everything, and mutually despised their different habits, tempers, tastes, inclinations, and pursuits. Moses never opened his lips, or put one foot before the other, without pausing to consider what he was about—while Frank, on the contrary, relied altogether on impulse and the spur of the moment. He went headlong to work, and trusted to Providence for the result.

"What a thoughtless fool is Frank Hairbrain," would Moses mutter to himself. "He'll one of these days break his neck coming down stairs for want of counting the steps."

"What a dull, slow-motioned fellow is Moses Meeker," would Frank say; "he loses more time in thinking about an affair before-hand than it would take me to do it ten times over."

One night they were both descending the stairs in the dark, and Frank, in his haste, tumbled from top to bottom.

"There," cried Moses, "I told you what would come of your not calculating beforehand."

Moses proceeded after him very carefully. He had previously counted the steps, but unluckily missed one; the consequence was he fell on his nose, and sustained a severe contusion.

"There," cried Frank, laughing, "I knew how it would be. See what all your forethought comes to!"

Each blamed the other, and drew from these accidents an argument in favor of his own habits and disposition.

From school they went to college together, and entered in the same class. Moses was determined to do nothing without reflection, and often considered so long that he was behindhand in his studies. Frank, on the contrary, never thought of his lessons until it was absolutely necessary to learn them, and the last moment was frequently too short for his purpose. When the examination came on, the professors were puzzled which to place above the other: but at length decided in favor of Moses, because he was the steadier of the two. Frank wondered how such a slow-motioned snail as Moses should get above him, and Moses was astonished to find such a thoughtless dunce as Frank should be next him in the class. They left college together, Frank with the reputation of a lad who had a fine genius, but no application; and Moses had the credit of being an industrious plodding fellow, who supplied his want of capacity by perseverance.

It was now necessary for them to choose a profession, and Frank, without a moment's hesitation, decided for the sea. Moses, on the contrary, calculated on the advantages and disadvantages, the facilities and obstacles, until his father began to be rather impatient.

"Moses," said he, one day, "have you chosen a profession yet?"

"I am considering about it," said Moses.

"Well, I wish you would conclude soon. Time is precious, and you are losing it every day."

"It is a matter of too much consequence to be settled in a minute."

"Very well—I don't want to hurry you—but recollect that those who are always thinking, will never come to a decision."

"I will consider of it, sir."

In the meantime Frank had made a voyage, and came back heartily tired. He was out of all patience with a calm—a storm was still more disagreeable—the captain was little better than a tyrant—the society of the sailors uninteresting—the monotony of the ship intolerable—and to see nothing but dolphins and flying fish for a month, was enough to give a man the blue-devils.

"You should have thought of this before," said Moses.

"Pshaw!" replied Frank. "But what have you done all this time?"

"I have almost resolved to become a merchant."

"Almost! You have, have you?" cried Frank, laughing. "Well then, we have just arrived at the same point—I have tried one profession and am now going to try another, and you have just determined to commence one. Let us start fair, and see who wins the race at last."

"Why, I am not exactly settled; I wish to look about me on all sides, inside and out, and pause before I come to a final decision. But what are you going to undertake next?" asked Moses contemptuously.

"The law."

"You'd better consider."

"Not I—I am resolved to attack Coke upon Littleton, Blackstone, and Barlamaqui tooth and nail, and take my chance for becoming a great lawyer."

"Have you calculated the pros and cons, the whys and the wherefores?"

"Not I—for see what your pros and cons have come to—you have lost half a year already in choosing a profession."

"Well, and you have lost half a year in a profession you have abandoned."

"But I have seen the world and gained experience, while you have stood biting your nails and perplexing yourself for nothing."

"Yes—you have learned to swear, drink grog, and smoke cigars."

"And you have learned nothing."

They separated.

"What a thoughtless ninny-hammer is Frank Hairbrain," quoth Moses. "He'll never rise for want of consideration."

"What a thoughtful blockhead is Moses Meeker," quoth Frank. "He'll never come to any good for want of promptness and decision."

Frank entered the office of a distinguished lawyer, who resided in a country town and boarded and lectured a limited number of students—that is to say, as many as he could get. His method was to converse with the young men on the subject of their studies, which answered all the purposes of familiar lectures. In the course of these, he one day gave a definition of law.

"It is the perfection of reason," said he; "it is a rule of action for the government of mankind." And he desired Frank to impress this upon his memory, assuring him a definition was half the battle, and sometimes supplied the want of every other species of knowledge.

Part of the occupation of the students consisted in transcribing various legal instruments for the purpose of giving them a practical insight into the forms of judicial proceedings. The first job put upon Frank was copying a declaration with sixteen counts. After reading it over, it occurred to him it was all nonsense to be writing the same thing sixteen times—so he omitted all but the first and last counts. When the lawyer returned to the office, after having by his ingenuity and learning procured the acquittal of a fellow that deserved the gallows, solely on the ground of a mistake of an "and" for a "but" in the indictment, he asked how the declaration came on.

"All finished, sir," said Frank.

"The deuce! what, already?" and he thought he had got a treasure of a student.

Perceiving the enormous hiatus, he turned to Frank, rather sharply, saying—

"Why zounds, sir—you've left out body and soul—there is an omission of fourteen counts."

"Why, sir," replied Frank, "they were all exactly alike, and I thought it a waste of time to repeat over the same thing so often."

"You did, did you?"

"Yes, sir; and then there was such a waste of words. I counted the whereases, and they amounted to three hundred. I don't see the use of such a mass of unnecessary words."

"Indeed."

"Nor of charging a man who it appears only shook his finger at another, with beating him half to death with fists, sticks, staves, knives, swords, bludgeons, corn-stalks, and all that sort of thing."

"Pooh; these are nothing but fictions of the law."

"But I don't see the use of fictions in the law, sir."

"You don't?" cried the lawyer, in a rage. "Not see the use of law fictions—then, d—e, sir, let me tell you you'll never be a lawyer if you study till doomsday."

"I believe so too," replied Frank, in despair. "I think I'd better go and study divinity—there are no fictions there."

"Do so, it's all you're good for," said the lawyer, walking about chafing and repeating, "Not see the use of repeating the same thing over again—nor of multiplying whereases—nor of law fictions—why the fellow would pull down the 'perfection of reason,' which can no more stand without these, than a stool without its three legs."

Poor Frank was walking home in rather a melancholy mood when he found Moses, standing at the corner of a street, uncertain whether he should turn down to the right-hand or the left. It was a nice point, and cost him a great deal of cogitation. Being roused by a slap on the shoulder, from Frank, he rubbed his eyes, and came to himself, as it were.

"What are you about?" asked Frank.

"I am considering," replied Moses.

"Ah, the old story."

"Well, how do you get on with the law?"

"I've just got off with the law."

"How so?"

"O—why I could not comprehend the fundamental principles, such as whereas, repetitions of the same thing, and, above all, law fictions, and so I gave up in despair."

"How much better it would have been," said Moses, with astonishing solemnity, "had you only calculated the this, that, and the other thing, like me. You see what time you have lost."

"O, I have not lost my time entirely."

"No—why what have you gained?"

"Why, a knowledge of the importance of whereas—repetitions of words—and law fictions—is that nothing? But what have you been about all this time?"

"Why, I have been considering what I shall do."

"O—but I suppose you have made up your mind now?"

"Umph—why—not—exactly; I like to take my time, and cast about me, and look before I leap, you know."

"Of course you have decided at last?"

"Why pretty nearly. But the truth is, I am so bewildered with the liberal professions and that of a merchant, that I have not exactly come to a conclusion yet."

Frank laughed aloud.

"Well, I see we have got to the same point once more. You have not made your choice, and I have chosen wrong. Let us try again. I am going to study divinity."

"You'd better consider."

"And you'd better decide."

And thus they parted, as usual, each thinking the other the prince of blockheads.

Frank, without a moment's hesitation, entered upon the study of divinity, and plunged deep into the fathers. One day he got hold of Tertullian, and was delighted with his eloquent declamations. The professor snatched the book out of his hands, or rather from before him, for it was a mighty folio in parchment.

"You must not meddle with that book," said he.

"Why not, sir?" asked Frank. "The style is beautiful—it is like ebony—dark and shining. St. Cyprian, I recollect, when he asked for his works used to say, 'da mihi magistrum'—give me my master—and Latantius, that he was 'omni litterarum genere peritus'—skilled in every kind of learning."

"All that may be true—but have you not read in St. Jerome, and others of the orthodox fathers, that he was more to be prized for his wit than his opinions? Sir, he was tainted with the devices of Montanus, and is therefore a dangerous companion for young students, who should never perplex themselves with false doctrines."

"Fictions, sir," thought Frank: "they will certainly be my ruin. But, sir, in what did the heresies of Montanus consist? I should wish to know that I may avoid them."

"Humph—why he was—a—heretic."

"In what, sir?"

"Young gentleman," replied the professor, hastily, "you'd better apply yourself to the study of orthodox writers, and let these mischievous propagators of error alone."

"But, sir," asked Frank, modestly, "how am I to establish my faith on a basis of truth unless by comparing it with what is false, and deciding according to reason?"

"Sir," answered the professor, impatiently, "you will never do for a student in divinity if you talk about reason. Reason, sir—reason is a false light—a jack-a-lantern—a firebrand snatched from the bottomless pit—a beacon to lure mankind upon the rocks and shoals of error. It was the great cause of the fall of Adam, and will be the ruin of his posterity to the latest generation."

"Alas! sir, I had thought it the most precious gift bestowed upon mankind—reason," says Lord Bacon, 'is—'

"A fiddlestick."

"The distinguishing mark which separates the human race from the beasts of the field—"

"The mark of Cain."

"The crowning gift of a beneficent being—"

"Silence, young man!" roared the professor; "silence, I say, and be good enough to prepare to return home immediately. You will never make any figure in your present profession, with your precious reason!" and he bounced out of the room.

"Mercy upon us!" thought Frank; "who would have thought that reason was so all-important in law, and so pernicious in gospel!"

The professor returned in a few minutes with a letter, which he desired Frank to carry to his father, giving him, at the same time to understand that he was not to return. The letter ran as follows:

"SIR—I can make nothing of your son. He is the most unreasonable person I ever met with, and is perpetually referring every thing to the test of reason. I have therefore sent him home that you may consign him to some other study, and would recommend that of medicine, where this same mischievous reasoning faculty may be of some use to him. Yours, &c."

"CYRILLUS FULGENTIUS PLUM."

The old gentleman scratched his head, and was confounded at these reflections upon honest reason, whom he had ever held in high respect.

"Why the deuce do they attempt to prove the truth of their doctrines by argument," thought he, "if reason is such a mischievous and mistaken umpire? I can't comprehend, not I, why reason should be indispensable in every thing but the most important affair of all."

Frank was determined to lose no time, and commenced the study of physic the very next day. On his way to the place, he met his old fellow-student, Moses Meeker, who was at that blessed moment calculating the shortest cut to a certain point of the city whither he had determined to go, which took up more time than was necessary to walk the whole distance by the longest route.

"Well, parson," said Moses, with a silly air of mockery, "when do you give us your first sermon?"

"I shall never preach in this world," replied Frank.

"No—why?"

"Because I have the misfortune to be a reasonable being."

Such was the conclusion drawn by Frank from the sweeping anathema of the over-zealous professor, who instead of mildly and firmly cautioning him against indulging the self-sufficient pride of human reason, in opposition to authorities sanctioned by time, by the belief of millions of men of all countries, and by the words of the Omnipotent himself, had denounced that great faculty which is indispensable to the comprehension of truth, as the agent and the source of falsehood and unbelief. But to return from an explanation which seemed necessary to correct any misconception of our meaning, which is not to ridicule the pious and honorable professors of divinity, but the excesses and abuses of a fanatical and fiery zeal, which "o'erleaps itself, and falls on the other side."

"The misfortune to be a reasonable being—what do you mean? I never heard you accused of that before."

Frank explained as well as he could, and announced his determination to become a physician.

"You'd better—"

"O, I know exactly what you are going to say. For my part, I'd rather take my chance, and go wrong fifty times than stand stock still doing nothing, like you. Have you hit upon a profession yet?"

"Why—no. I have consulted all my friends and acquaintance except six, and so soon as I get their opinions I shall decide irrevocably, once for all."

"Do they agree in opinion?"

"O, Lord, no! there are six of one, and a half-a-dozen of the other."

"You must be sadly puzzled."

"To death. I don't know what to do, or which way to turn myself. I've a great mind to ask your advice."

"Now don't—I've enough to do to steer my own barque clear of the breakers, let alone yours. Besides, I'm in a great hurry to begin the study of physic."

"Yes, you're always in haste. You plunge head foremost into the first noose that comes in your way, and lose your whole life in crawling out backwards. You'll never get along in this world—I've often told you so, Frank."

"Well, after all, Moses, I'm just where you are. Nay, I'm better off, for I have learned that a sailor's life is a dog's life—that law is the perfection of reason—and that what is an excellent thing in law is good for nothing in gospel. By the time I have tried every one of the liberal professions, I shall be qualified to make a choice, while you will be still at your calculations—and then I shall settle down quietly in—"

"In the grave," said Moses, interrupting him.

"Well, well, that settles all doubts, by relieving us from the necessity of choosing at all."

"But you'd better consider—"

"No—I mean to decide first, and trust the issue to chance."

"Remember, Frank, how you tumbled down stairs at school, and sprained your thumb for want of calculating the steps."

"And recollect, Moses, how you tumbled down the same stairs and broke your nose, for want of calculating the number of steps right."

They parted as formerly, each laughing at the other in his sleeve. The doctor with whom Frank was to pursue his studies, had several other students to whom he occasionally delivered lectures, on the principles of his profession, in the evening.

He began one of these as follows:

"According to the results of reason and experience, it must be evident—"

"My dear doctor," interrupted Frank, "reason is a mere will-o'-the-wisp, a decoy with which the pride of human nature deceives itself to its utter ruin—a firebrand snatched from the bottomless pit—a—"

"Pray, young gentleman," answered the doctor, pulling off his spectacles with great deliberation, and looking wistfully at Frank; "pray, young gentleman, where did you learn this extraordinary respect of reason?"

"Of the famous professor, Dr. Cyrillus Fulgentius Plum, sir."

"Very well, all I have to request is that you will unlearn it as fast as possible. Without reason and experience, assisted by the seven sciences, no man can be a physician."

"Impossible—quite impossible, sir—I can't think of jeopardizing my future happiness merely for the sake of a little worldly prosperity."

"Then, sir, you'll not do for a doctor—no, sir, not even a horse doctor, or a quack." And Frank was immediately dismissed with the following note.

"Sir—Your son is the most unreasonable and absurd young man I ever knew, for a reasonable being. He denounces reason as a will-o'-the-wisp, and heaven knows what besides. I have no doubt he is mad, and recommend a strait-waistcoat as a precaution. Yours, &c. CELSUS ÆSCALAPIUS BOLUS."

The good parent was perplexed beyond measure with these two letters of Professor Plum and Professor Bolus, one of whom sent his son home for referring every thing to the decision of reason, and the other for reasoning upon nothing. But being a philosopher, he lighted his pipe, and suffered things go their own gait.

Without stopping to let himself be eaten up with chagrin at these provoking disqualifications which beset him at every new trial, Frank forthwith placed himself in the counting-house of an eminent merchant, who had grown rich by the mere force of the instinct of saving. One day the old gentleman was directing him to make an entry in his day-book of some sale or other.

"Is it according to reason and experience?" asked Frank, who was determined to be right this time. "Does it correspond with the seven sciences?"

"The seven devils," exclaimed the merchant, whom gout and money had made as testy as a young belle of a rainy day. "The seven sciences, and reason and experience! What the plague have these to do with the price of tobacco? I can tell you what, sir, no more of such nonsense, or you won't do for a counting-house."

"I think so too," said Frank, and sliding from his high three-legged stool, quietly put on his hat, and was walking home, meditating on what he should turn his attention to next, when he was attracted by one of the most spruce, trim, neat, fashionable, frisky little belles that ever set a man dreaming of impossibilities.

"Heavens! what an angel! I'll marry her before next Saturday, or my name is not Frank Hairbrain," said he, unconsciously aloud.

"You'd better consider," answered the veritable Moses Meeker, "before you take such a desperate step."

"No—I am resolved to marry that girl off-hand, and take my chance for the rest."

"Well, I begin to think of looking out for a wife too. But I shall go quite a different way to work, and do nothing in a hurry. I mean to study her character, and take every body's advice before I commit myself."

"Very well, every one to his notion, as the old woman said when she kissed her cow. But I'm for a coup de main—I am determined to be married by next Saturday."

"You'll repent—mind what I say—you'll repent—I don't like the cut of her eye."

"Tis the eye of an angel."

"It looks rather Tartarish. You'd better calculate the matter a little."

"No, no—I tell you it's all settled in my own mind."

"What a simpleton," thought Moses.

"What a shilly-shally fool," thought Frank.

The young lady was not given much to calculating like honest Moses Meeker, except in the way of marrying as soon as might be convenient. Her father being on the eve of bankruptcy, had hinted the prudence of disposing of herself if possible before the explosion of his affairs had frightened away all the beaux, as the explosion of a gun does all the little birds. Frank offered himself at the third interview—was accepted—and on Saturday was married according to his wise determination.

The fathers of the two young men died not long afterwards, and circumstances threw them apart, so that they did not meet again for many years.

One pleasant, mild, yet melancholy summer twilight, as Frank was sitting on a bench on the Battery, taking care of the children, while Mrs. Hairbrain was walking a few dozen turns arm-in-arm with Count Muschkin Puschkin, a foreigner of distinction, a venerable-looking person, stooping mortally in the shoulders, and carrying a gold-headed cane, stopped deliberately before him, placed his stick deliberately on the flag-stones, leaned on it deliberately, and looking Frank deliberately in the face, accosted him with great deliberation,

"If I don't mistake in my calculations, you must be my quondam friend, Frank Hairbrain, though you look very old, considering the short time since I saw you."

It was not above twenty years since they last met. But twenty years, when we look back upon them, are a shadow, a dream, a span, nothing, or less than nothing.

"Right," answered Frank, rising with his usual celerity and grasping the hand of the deliberative gentleman; "and if I don't mistake in my calculation, you can be no other than my old friend, Moses Meeker. Are you married, and have you got a profession yet? How come on the pros and the cons, Moses?"

"Alas! no," replied Moses, shaking his locks, now mixed with lines of gray. "I'm not married yet, nor have I a profession. But I calculate—hem—you are married?"

"Yes," answered Frank, sighing and also shaking his locks, which too were now of the sable silver.

"Well, well, I don't envy you."

"There is no occasion."

"I hope you are comfortable—got a good wife?"

"Can't brag much on that score—I was a little too precipitate."

"Ah—yes—I remember I told you so. And yet, Frank, as old age approaches, I confess to you, I sometimes wish I had calculated less, and trusted a little more to chance."

"And I will confess," said Frank, casting his eye towards his wife—"I will confess I often catch myself wishing that I had trusted less to chance, and calculated a little more before I got married."

"I was too slow, and consequently did nothing right."

"And I was too fast, and consequently did every thing wrong."

"How much happier I should have been if I had only possessed a little of your off-hand determination."

"And how much happier I should have been if I had only possessed a little of your prudent calculation."

"If I only had it to do again!"

"And if I only had it to do again!"

Sighed the two old acquaintances as they shook hands and parted forever.

Alas! poor human nature! how happy we should be if we could only live our lives over three hundred and sixty-five times, and profit by the blunders of each!

SKETCHES BY A BRIEFLESS LAWYER.

LAW BOOKS.

AMONG the many reforms which the present emphatically reforming age has produced, none is more prominent than the introduction of the first branches of legal knowledge into our seminaries of learning. The time has been when it would as soon have been dreamt of introducing the Koran as of placing a law book into the hands of an academical student. The outbranches of other sciences, medicine and divinity, were always supposed to be essential to the formation of a perfect scholar; and, accordingly, were to be seen on every side, urchins of twelve or fourteen, gazing at stars, analyzing substances, and talking learnedly of the vegetable and animal kingdoms, while the incomprehensibility of the law seemed to form a wall around it, which the most venturesome innovator was unwilling to incur the risk of attacking. The attempt was, however, at length made. People were, at last, persuaded that a knowledge of the constitution by which their rights were secured, and of the principles which had been adopted for their effectual protection, was as essential as stargazing and chemistry had once been; and the vulgar prejudice which had formerly existed against the science of the law, in the course of time, yielded to the establishment of professorships without end. It was well reasoned, that no man could value his liberty unless he was acquainted with the tenure by which he held it; and that love of country, and the pride of national feeling, were mere names in the absence of a knowledge of the principles on which they were founded. Like all good things, this, at length, ran into an extreme; and, instead of a gradual and progressive instilment of those principles into the mind, the introduction of legal science was rendered ridiculous by the means resorted to for its promotion. Little two-penny catechisms, with blue paper covers, were placed in the hands of children, wherein were sundry incomprehensible expressions about prerogatives, constitutions, and such like matters; and boys, who had just cleverly cleared the alphabet, were found most gravely and eloquently talking about law as "a rule of action prescribed by a superior, and which the inferior was bound to obey." Nay, so far was the matter carried, that (as we are informed by a learned writer) in one of our sister states, the first branches of education prescribed in the public schools are reading, writing, and the laws against capital offences, which last provision was, no doubt, founded upon the no less true than trite maxim, that self-preservation is the first law of nature, and upon the sagacious reflection that taking care of the life was most appropriately placed before a refinement of the manners.

But, notwithstanding all this, with but few exceptions, law and law books are confined to the profession alone; and, with the single exception of Blackstone, perhaps, such a thing as a law book is not to be found, even in the most extensive private library. Nay, if you attempt to elicit a general conversation upon the subject, you are at once set down as a most intolerable bore. I once boarded at a house where, perhaps, the majority of my fellow-boarders were lawyers; the rest were merchants and tradesmen. The lawyers were, of course, the most loquacious, and in the selection of a subject upon which to dilate, hit upon that inexhaustible one which their never-failing profession furnished to their hands. One by one, our fellow-lodgers began to disappear, until, at last, our host, in an agony of despair, besought us either to leave his house en masse, or forever eschew our legal discussions during meals.

And yet, there is, in legal literature, much that is amusing—much that is entertaining—and much, if you please, that is even ludicrous. It will be at once perceived that I do not intend to apply this remark to the dry elementary works which crowd the shelves of the lawyer, and which hold out few charms, even to the learned jurist; but to the "dramatic structure of our reports" as it has been well termed, it is most fully applicable. They are, in many instances, dull and tedious, it is true, but then they are as frequently playful and witty. The sparkling humor with which the history of the bar abounds is, in many instances, preserved; and between the quaintness of the bench and the waggery of the reporter, a leisure hour may be almost as agreeably beguiled in turning over the pages of an old volume of reports, as among the jests and witticisms of our pleasant friend Joe Miller. Let the following cases, extracted almost indiscriminately from a volume of the Modern reports, be taken to show the correctness of these observations:

"The Queen against Forby.—A woman was convicted upon an indictment for being a common scold. MONTAGUE, in the Trinity term before, moved in arrest of judgment, that the indictment was that she was communis calumniatrix, which is not the Latin word for a scold, but rixatrix; and, upon this exception, judgment was arrested this term. NOTE.—The punishment of a scold is ducking; and Holt, chief justice, when the exception was first made, said, that it was better ducking in a Trinity than in a Mischaelmas term."

"Battersby against Marsh.—The plaintiff in his bill declared, and called himself a gentleman: the defendant pleaded in abatement, that he was no gentleman, to which the plaintiff demurred. PER CURIAM. The plea is good, being confessed by the demurrer. But it being after general imparlance, they put him to answer over."

"Mrs. Dennis against Dr. Lane.—Mrs. Dennis was a widow, and had a daughter who was an heiress to eight hundred pounds a-year, to whom the doctor made love: the mother thereupon forbade him her house; yet he came at another day, and meeting the mother upon the stairs, notwithstanding she then again expressly forbade him to go forward, he pushed on to the young woman's chamber in a rude manner. This behavior frightened the daughter's mother so much, that she sent for friends to conduct her daughter to London; of which the doctor having intelligence, came, with three others, and followed the daughter, and came to the same inn, where they lodged at night, and took up the adjoining rooms to the mother and daughter, whereby they put the mother into fits for fear; and the next morning, as they were taking coach, the doctor assaulted the gentleman that put the lady into her coach, and pursued them again that day, and gave out that he would force the daughter from them, so that the mother was fain to hire men to guard the inn that night. This matter was transacted in March was twelvemonths.

"The doctor, at the last assizes at Hereford, meeting the gentleman who was the principal manager of the family, and helped to guard the daughter to London, he being a barrister at law, and a near relation to the young lady, in his gown, assaulted him, and beat him severely with a cane; whereupon the judge of assize bound him to appear the first day of this term in this court. And upon this matter being put together, and on oath by her, that she believed the assault upon her kinsman to be in pursuance of the design upon her daughter; and that she was informed he threatened her, and endeavored to corrupt her daughter's maid, to facilitate his stealing the daughter; Per curiam. The doctor's coming in that manner, in despite of the mother's prohibition, and against her will, was good cause to require the security of the peace; and so was the ensuing behaviour of the doctor upon the road. Secondly, This demand of the security of the peace ought to be fresh after the fray or cause of fear given; and therefore, if it had not been for the new assault upon the kinsman, the court would not bind him to the peace here; for the suffering considerable time to pass before the demand of security, is a great sign that the party was not afraid. But here, there being an old offence, which one ought to give security of peace for, and a fresh occasion given, which gives probable reason to believe the old grudge continued. The court ordered him to give security to keep the peace, and took his own recognizance in two hundred pounds, and that of two more in one hundred pounds each, but refused to bind him to his good behaviour, because of the length of time; though they declared, that if they had come when the matter was fresh, they would have bound him to his good behaviour, and in a much greater sum."

"Cockroft against Smith.—The defendant in a scuffle bit off the forefinger of an attorney's right hand. And in trespass, with a special ac etiam by a judge's warrant, the question was, whether the bail should not justify themselves to a sum suitable to the ac etiam? And per curiam, he was not held to that, he being very poor."

A more recent case, decided by the Supreme Court of this state, is thus amusingly reported by Mr. Wendell:

"The people, on the relation of J. Wilder, Sheriff of Genesee, versus C. C. Church.—Motion for an attachment. The defendant, an imprisoned debtor, on the limits of the jail of the county of Genesee, was possessed of a gold watch of the value of two hundred dollars, which he was exhibiting in the bar-room of an inn, in the village of Batavia, to a number of persons, boasting of its value; and, among others, urged it upon the attention of an attorney who was present, and who took it, and delivered it to a deputy sheriff, also present, in whose hands he had put an execution against the defendant for about one hundred and fifty dollars. The deputy advertised the watch for sale, and on the day of sale it was again exhibited, passing from hand to hand, when the defendant snatched it from the hands of a person in whose possession it was, and walked off with it. The sheriff, upon this state of facts, applied for an attachment, which was refused, inasmuch as he might, by virtue of his office, have commanded what force he wanted to prevent the carrying off of the watch."

These are but a few instances, taken at random, from among thousands of a no less entertaining character, with which our books abound. My object in presenting them to my readers is, that I may the more successfully urge upon them a suggestion, which has long been a favorite hobby of mine, and which I yet hope ere long to see fully realized; it is, that law books may cease to be considered in the light of a noli me tangere, and that in placing them in the hands of the general reader, a new, and not unfruitful vein, both of information and amusement, may be opened. Am I wrong when I say, that such would be the case even from the brief specimens I have already afforded? I would gladly pursue these ideas further, but the length of this article admonishes me to desist for the present. I shall, most probably, resume the subject in a future number. G.

LETTERS FROM CORRESPONDENTS.

In every trade and profession there is room for good sense and genius to display themselves. Let no man, because his lot has not been cast in a high rank of life, therefore relax his exertions, despairing of fame. It is the greatest mistake in the world. Every body knows what a fortune Contoit has amassed, by giving a peculiar flavor to his ice-cream; and there is, or rather was, in the city a baker of pies, whose renown gained him the patronage and personal acquaintance of the most respectable circles of society. Who does not know Cato? The very town horses would turn up of themselves into the little road that wound around his thronged hotel. Who has not heard of Benton the boot-maker, and Saunders the barber? Let no one despair of being great, whatever may be his sphere. As an instance, we print the annexed old fragment, which, although itself much worn and soiled, as if by the thumb of some careful student, came to our hand, enclosed in a sheet of snowy white paper. What became of the writer, or him for whose edification it was composed, we are not able to say, the envelope being most provokingly laconic and mysterious in its hints upon the subject. We presume, however, both master and scholar have paid the great debt, and the precious scrap having accidentally fallen into the possession of one of those flippant, news-retailing, rough practitioners in which the city does at present abound, has been neglected and forwarded to us by some attentive friend for the benefit of the profession. We had some idea of declining its publication on the ground that it will not interest our fair readers, they not being able, by any possibility, to appreciate the immense importance of those delicate distinctions and precepts so judiciously laid down therein; but on more mature consideration, we waived the objection, as we have often presented communications for their use which we did not apprehend would touch the fancy of the gentlemen.—Eds. N. Y. Mir.

MY DEAR PETER—As I have followed the business of shaving the chins of my fellow-creatures for thirty years, and am now, I fear, about to leave the scene forever, I cannot, my dear boy, better repay your affectionate attachment to me than by a few hints which may be more valuable to your future life than gold. In the first place, my son, do not let any weak vanity touching your present avocation gain entrance into your bosom. Guard against it as a poison, and you may look down with pity upon the numbers who will pass beneath your fingers. This is the great secret of felicity, which so occupies the attention of all mankind. Remember, my son, that a barber has committed to him, although but for a few moments at a period, the happiness of a large number of individuals. Some people may smile at the idea of paying any especial attention to impart a tinge of comfort to so small a space of time; but life is made up only of moments, and he who neglects to improve them separately, will not find them pass lightly together. Take, therefore, the greatest pains to consult the feelings of every one of your customers even in the most trifling point, and you will not only insensibly become a general favorite, and thus, in the end, probably amass a decent competency, but you will feel that you have been well fulfilling one of the best duties of human life. You will easily discover several ways of accomplishing this end. In the first place, cleanliness is all important. Never overlook it in the smallest particular. When you have properly made your lather, (which in my dying moments I can conscientiously declare I have endeavored to teach you in the best manner,) take the most scrupulous care not to daub it all over the chops of the gentleman under consideration. I tremble to reflect how injudiciously some of our profession execute this part of their business. Lay it on so cautiously as not to cover the lips. Gentlemen do not care to eat soap-suds. One of the most important points, however, to be considered, is taking hold of the customer's nose. This is an operation of a most delicate nature. The nose is one of the most important parts of the human system. This may at first seem a little strange to you from the fact, that it is neither so good-looking nor apparently so useful as the other features, yet nevertheless, in that single article, it seems, is preserved the essence of a man's honor. There is something sacred about a nose. Never touch it even in shaving, unless absolutely necessary, and then with the greatest tenderness and care. Lay the fingers gently and affectionately, as it were, on the extreme tip. I have seen ordinary barbers take hold of it as if it were a crowbar. You may depend upon it, although the person so treated may say nothing, yet he experiences an inward feeling of dissatisfaction, and secretly resolves that you shall never shave him again. **

MESSENGERS. EDITORS—I am one of the best fellows in the world, but have been ruined by my unfortunate dislike to one word, viz. immediately. I hate it. It has been my fiend through life. I might have married a rich heiress—every body told me so—I had made a deep impression. My friends urged me to address her immediately; but there it is, I never will—I never can do any thing immediately. I postponed it till I should bring a promising speculation to a close. The time arrived, and I went to my charmer, but she had just gone to a ball with a gentleman to whom she had been but recently introduced, and when, a few evenings after I made the tender avowal, she told me she was extremely sorry, but she was just engaged.

At another time, a rich merchant informed me that if I had funds he could turn them to a most profitable account, if I would call at his office the next day and unite with him in the business. I had funds then, and intended to call, but I had commenced an interesting book, and I thought when the hour fixed upon for our appointment arrived, that it was no matter about going immediately—it would be time enough the next morning. The next morning I went, but the affair had been committed to another, who made two hundred per cent. on his investment. He had been sent for, on my failure to come; he was one of that sort of fellows who do things immediately, and so he reaped the harvest. The truth is, immediately is a word full of command and despotism. It comes like a master with a whip in his hand, and I cannot bear the idea of being driven. I remember, even at school, it always used to bring the blood up to my temples. "Do it, dear Charles," and I always did it—that is, within a reasonable time; but the "Do it, sir, immediately" of my old master, brought all my mule's spirit up at once. I have been fined for non-attendance as a juror. I have lost my passage many a time in steam-boats and stages. I have lost my money. I have lost my character. I have lost all hope of getting any employment, from my enmity to that fatal word. My object in addressing you, gentleman of the Mirror, is to ask whether you can recommend me to any business which is not so pressing and imperative—so—that is—which need not be attended to immediately, by so doing you will oblige me greatly, and I will subscribe to your paper forthwith. Your obedient servant, CHARLES LOUNGER.

We cannot accommodate Mr. Lounger. We do not, to say the truth, exactly trust him. We fear for the inducement which he holds out so ingeniously in his laconic epistle. His failing has a direct bearing on it. We are quite tenacious on one point with our well wishers. If they intend to honor us as he hints, we expect them to do so immediately.—Eds. N. Y. Mir.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

WE consider the Mirror especially favored in being selected by Mr. Næck for the publication of his effusions. We present one below. It is a translation from Berenger. By the way, in printing the fine verses, several weeks since, entitled "Recollections of the People," the line "imitated from the French," was accidentally omitted. This is perhaps a matter of little moment to the reader, yet, knowing how unwilling our young friend is to appropriate the thoughts of others to his own use, we crave his indulgence for making the correction here.—Eds. N. Y. Mir.

THE FIFTH OF MAY.

From the French.

BY JAMES NÆCK.

Of an heroic empire a forlorn
And humble relic, from the Indian strand
By Spaniards I am in their vessel borne;
Long have I sorrowed for my native land—
Ere now, five years of exile being told,
Far from the Cape I hail the southern skies.
Poor soldier as I am, I shall behold
Fair France again—a son shall close mine eyes.

"Behold St. Helena!" And is it there
The hero languishes in captive pains?
Good Spaniards! here your enmity forswear,
And curse with me his tyrants and his chains.
What can I do to burst his prison's fold?
The time is past for deeds of high emprise!
Poor soldier as I am, I shall behold
Fair France again—a son shall close mine eyes!

And sleeps the mighty thunderbolt, whose burst
Crashed twenty thrones at once? the hope how sweet
To see him rise majestic as at first,
To die with kingly heads beneath his feet!
Ah! from this rock the waves of hope are roll'd,
The eagle reads no more the secret skies.
Poor soldier as I am, I shall behold
Fair France again—a son shall close mine eyes!

He wearied victory, he pass'd her by;
She paused to rest, and never more was found.
Though twice betray'd, he yet disdains to die.
But ah! what serpents twine his path around!
All laurels in their essence poison hold,
The crown of death upon the conqueror lies.
Poor soldier as I am, I shall behold
Fair France again—a son shall close mine eyes!

When steals some furtive vessel o'er the main—
"Tis He!" the tyrants cry in weak alarms:
"And comes he to demand the world again?"
To arms, to arms—let millions rise in arms!"
While he, perhaps, by agony controll'd,
Breathes to his land beloved his parting sighs.
Poor soldier as I am, I shall behold
Fair France again—a son shall close mine eyes!

In soul, in genius, great, and great in worth,
What need of sceptres for his lordly hand?
Exalted far above all thrones of earth,
'Tis his on yonder rock sublime to stand,
And thence his glory in a flood is roll'd,
A beacon to all worlds beneath the skies.
Poor soldier as I am, I shall behold
Fair France again—a son shall close mine eyes!

Good Spaniard, say what yonder meets the eye?
A flag of black—oh God! are these my fears!
Oh widowed glory!—He, thy lord, to die!
His enemies around me are in tears;
Far from the rock our silent course we hold,
The orb of day forsakes the glooming skies.
Poor soldier as I am, I shall behold
Fair France again—a son shall close mine eyes!

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

SUPERSTITION.

Poor Maria was superstitious. In early childhood she fell into the hands of a nurse who used to enforce her commands by awakening her terrors both natural and supernatural. She abused her uninformed imagination with all sorts of hideous stories. Now the chimney-sweep was coming down after her—now the Indian with his scalping-knife was at the door, and would carry her off, unless she hushed in an instant; and when even physical pain—the tooth-ache—to which she was subject—drew from her lips screams of agony, she froze the blood in her veins by threats of leaving her alone in the dark cellar, where the ghosts would come from the grave-yards and catch her. For the love of humanity, let me digress a moment to entreat the attention of mothers and nurses to this point. I should almost rather behold the lovely innocent dead in reality, than to watch its young flesh made to crawl with these dreadful delusions, and see some detestable wretch—some vile hireling nurse—some reckless, heartless mother, pouring the poison of superstition into its innocent mind, and thus polluting and embittering the bright current of hope and joy. It is done frequently, and, to a great extent, by those who should know better. It is perpetrated—this massacre of youthful peace—to save trouble. What a murderess is that mother who, to procure a momentary quiet, would inflict on the heart of the helpless being she has brought into the world, a gash which must fester for years and years, and which in too many cases is borne unhealed to the grave. Poor Maria! In early life she had the misfortune to lose her mother, an event to her fraught with more than ordinary horror. Perhaps the very tenderness with which the lovely child had been educated, tended to prepare her for more awful sufferings subsequently. Until the death of that sacred guardian, life had been only a blush of summer light; but relentless fate soon ended the happy period. Long before Maria had attained the age of five years, her mind had been peopled by the cruel oppressions of her nurse with monstrous images, which weighed on her young steps whenever she was compelled to remain alone in the dark. In other respects her spirits were buoyant. From the fine glow of her face when she went forth with you into the sunny woods, when the cheerful blue sky, and the rolling clouds were over her head, and the green branches were stirring around, and all was illuminated, you would never dream of the disordered state of her fancy, and how a few hours could change her mirth into that shrinking, shuddering, curdling horror, which the poor victims of this feeling suffer to so painful a degree. Her cheek would turn pale to cross a lonely hall in the night. When sent into an unoccupied room sometimes on any trivial message, if the twilight had commenced to fall, she would hurry back without daring to look behind her. The rustling of her frock struck her with affright, and she flew to regain the circle which she had left with a fearful presentiment that, ere she reached it, she would feel a cold, dead hand on her shoulder, or behold a form gliding across her path in the linen vestments of the tomb, and with the rigid, ghastly features of a corpse. But when she retired at night to bed, her agonies were at their height. Then it was that every ordinary object grew hideous—deformed shapes glared around her—pale faces floated on the air—grisly demons watched her from the shadowy corners—mysterious forms moved on the floor, or sat in the chairs—or stood, horror of horrors! erect by the bed-side, and froze her soul with infernal terrors—or cold fingers touched her feet—and thus her prolific imagination teemed with

"Gorgons and hydras and chimeras dire."

As years passed on, Maria became more reasonable in her fears. Her enlightened mind rejected and smiled at the monsters to which before she had paid so much respect. She had detected one night, a ghost of unusual solemnity, as a mere imposter, lurking in the form of a white dress; and found herself, on another occasion, nearly congealed with fright at a high-backed chair with a hat and feathers on it. The Indians and the chimney sweeps ceased to make her tremble. She succeeded in dismissing nearly all her ordinary fears—nay, she even smiled as she thought how often she had rushed down a pair of stairs, at the imminent hazard of her neck, to avoid a passing breeze, or, peradventure, a disturbed cat, which, if the truth were known, had been more alarmed than herself. But the effects of such intense superstition was not so easily counteracted. Although she had learned to reason, and could, therefore, on nearly every occasion, force herself to go where she pleased, at any hour of the night, without the remotest belief that she should really be intruded upon by either chimney sweep or Indian, ghost or devil, yet could she not altogether overcome a certain secret disposition to shrink, which, however she might endeavor to laugh, to ridicule, to shame herself out of it, was, nevertheless, there. A certain nervous horror would sweep across her frame, and, like a night breeze upon the strings of an Æolian, awake a trembling and mournful idea of sadness. I have related these few preliminary incidents, in order to let the reader appreciate the strength of mind displayed in the following occurrence, which has been told me as a truth, and which I have no reason to disbelieve. To many others probably it might scarcely be deemed worth relating; but we must measure facts by their consequences, and rate efforts of individual character, not solely by what they have done, but by the proportion existing between what they have done, and the means they have to do it.

Among Maria's friends was Julia, dearer to her than life. Like herself, she was young, and lovely, and pure, and then, such an enthusiast! so timid in her thoughts, and yet so fervid; you piried while you loved her. As for me, I pity any enthusiasm; but in a woman, with her helplessness and frailty, what can it lead to in this dark and stormy world? Is it not a fairy bark lapsing along the bosom of a tide that leads down the cataract where ruin is sure? Is it not like a flower, springing too early, which even when it peeps its blue eyes from the ground, you know is destined to be cut off by the frost?

Among other strange conceptions in the mind of this charming girl, was an idea that she was doomed to an early death. A lofty melancholy in her disposition gave to this presentiment a certain soothing sweetness, which softened its mournful tendency. But it was accompanied by another of a description almost too dreadful for narration, and from which most imaginations would recoil with force, and easily find refuge in incredulity. This romantic girl had derived from some story an ineradicable fear that she should be buried alive. The first impression to which I have alluded is by no means uncommon, for I have found a large number of persons of a melancholic temperament who suffered themselves to fall into a similar state of secret despondency. Any bias the soul may have originally received from reading—any early disappointment—even the ordinary operations of a contemplative mind, are sufficient to account for this; and it is a sad thought indeed, how many probably among the most noble of our race bear life with a patient resignation only as a heavy burthen, for the painful exertion in carrying which, they are in a measure consoled by the certainty of its termination. Many of my readers will not credit this. There are others who know it too well.

As for Julia, her fears—if fears they might be termed—those gentle imaginations which whispered to her of the green swell in the summer church-yard, and her name inscribed there and read by tearful eyes—her fears, I say, touching her constitution, were not even to the most sceptical observer altogether without foundation. She was slender, and rather inclined to that nervous irritability which marks wavering health. Her beauty was heightened by transient gleamings that seemed shed from a soul which, never having wholly belonged to earth, was destined soon to quit it forever. Spots of hectic sometimes glowed on her cheek; her teeth were of that unnatural whiteness said to be indicative of a feeble habit, and besides all the charms of person, refinements of character, and graces of thought and feeling which she had inherited from her mother, she was not wrong in the conclusion that she was also heir to the consumption—the fatal malady to which that beloved mother had herself prematurely yielded—one of the loveliest beings that ever grief laid in the gloomy earth. "No, dear Maria," said this affectionate girl one day to her friend, "I do not wish to disturb my peaceful resignation with any anxious hope. In a little while I shall not be here. Remember me, dearest dearest girl; and when—" then she checked her words as the tears rose in the eyes of her companion, and kissed them away tenderly. No one can tell how they loved each other!

One summer afternoon the two girls were rambling together through a rich piece of scenery, that glowed before their eyes like a picture. Every thing of nature's loveliest seemed to be there, and over the whole the blush of the mellow afternoon light had shed that singular charm, too bright for shadow, too subdued for radiance, which touches a fine landscape sometimes, as if a spell were on it. There were hills in the faint distance, blue and soft like a dream, and rich forests of lavish verdure, and velvet meadows heaved up with undulations; and a narrow river wound in under an old bridge, with the long sweeping branches of willow drooping mournfully over its mirror breast; and a village was seen in the perspective; and a pretty road, skirted with the straggling fences; and cattle were resting in groups, here and there. Every thing was so beautiful, so fragrant, so still. Such hours are holy; they belong to earth in its primeval days, there is in them so little of the hurry and clash and fever of the present world. Was it chance, or was it the intention of either, which had now conducted the pensive steps of Maria and Julia to the little church-yard, where reposed the ashes of past beings; creatures who, like them, had once loved and mourned and roamed over the very grassy fields where now they trod? Whatever might have been the cause, there they stood, and then, after several unsuccessful efforts to disburthen her bosom of the load—the anguish of gloomy forebodings which weighed down her gentle soul, Julia confided to her companion the terror which had long since taken possession of her.

"I know it, I feel it," she said; "you will soon be here alone. You will recollect this hour, this moment. You will—"

"Julia—dear Julia—"

"Listen to me, Maria. I am going to tell you my awful thoughts. When I am dead—forgive me, my beloved friend, but I must go on—when I am dead you must watch over me till—"

They fell upon each other's necks, and wept. It was many days afterwards, that in a calmer moment Maria yielded a promise, that if her friend should die first, no matter what she might be engaged in, if possibility permitted, she would abandon every other occupation, and watch over her body night and day, or see that some other person should watch, until several days had elapsed after her decease.

It was the merriest ball—every body was there. The beauty and joy of the earth seemed concentrated in a single spot, and fairest among the fair was Maria, half bewildered with delight. It was several years after the occurrences just related. Her friend had been to the West Indies, in search of health, and was expected home immediately, and, report said, quite convalescent. In the midst of the dance a gentleman, bearing the marks of haste and alarm on his person, entered the room; and on learning, in reply to his interrogation, which was Miss Maria, he addressed her hastily, and in a manner that accounted for the absence of the usual etiquette on one side, and caused it to be overlooked on the other.

"I am in too much fear and anxiety for the life of your friend Miss Julia—," he said, "to permit of time even to apologize for this intrusion; but she has just landed, after a long passage from Cuba, and is, I fear, dying at your father's house, whither she gave directions for her removal."

In a few moments the elegant girl, in all the splendors of a ball dress, was bending over the dying Julia, who, with a look of tenderness, uttered the words, "Remember your promise," and fell back lifeless on her pillow.

"Remember your promise. Yes," she thought, "while the very blood curdled in her veins, 'I will remember it, I will perform it.'"

It was daybreak when the father of Maria stole softly into the apartment where his daughter had insisted, from some unaccountable caprice, on watching by the dead all night and alone. On opening the door, he perceived her shrunk away into a corner, her eyes started from their sockets, her hands clasped together convulsively. It had been too much for her. She was dead—an awful lesson to those who surcharge youthful minds with imaginary horrors.

ORIGINAL BIOGRAPHY.

THE LATE MRS. SARAH LOUISA P. SMITH.

WHEN gifted minds are taken from the world, the public sustain a loss; and it is but justice to ourselves to mourn that bereavement, and to recount their endowments in the sincere language of affection and truth. The papers have announced the premature death of Mrs. Sarah Louisa P. Smith, formerly Miss Hickman. She was born June thirtieth, 1811, and died February twelfth, 1832, in the twenty-first year of her age. Her maternal ancestors resided many years at Newton, near Boston, but Louisa was born at Detroit, while her grandfather, Major-general William Hull, was governor of that territory. She went to Massachusetts in her infancy with her good mother, and there received her education, under her watchful eye. She early attracted the attention of those who had the care of her as instructors; they loaded the extraordinary child with medals and tokens of approbation, as proofs of her proficiency. The ease with which she acquired information was not more remarkable than the modesty which accompanied her superiority. She was so affectionate towards all her schoolmates, that they readily gave up their pretensions to share in the rewards bestowed upon her talents and acquirements. She began, from the promptings of her imagination, to write almost in infancy; and these productions were redolent with Castalian dews. She had a quick perception, and a most wonderful memory, and she acquired knowledge without any apparent effort: still her mind was in constant activity. In looking over some of her early productions, we are surprised at their depth of thought, as well as the felicitous manner in which she clothes her ideas. Her mind seems to reflect the images of nature, as the pure and transparent waters of a lovely lake. She gathered, selected, and combined these images, and gave them voice and harmony, as the fabled sea-nymphs blended poesy and song in their coral cells. Her first productions were shown to her instructors and family friends, without the ambition of literary distinction. To gratify them she now and then ventured to send some of the pieces she wrote to the periodicals of the day, under various signatures; the publishers not conjecturing from whom they came. These were greatly admired, and often reprinted. Good judges spoke of these productions as beautiful specimens of descriptive and sentimental poetry; and, although it was impossible not to see the glow of youthful fancy about them, yet no one imagined that they came from a school-girl, who had just entered her teens. While yet her name was a secret to all but a few, she heard her effusions compared with those of Henry Kirke White, and of Mrs. Hemans, and others of that school; and when her friends would no longer suffer the concealment of her name, and it was announced that I. L. C., S. L., Ella, &c. &c. was a young lady of fifteen only, the public were not a little incredulous as to the fact; but were, after a while, perfectly convinced, for she was applied to by several of the publishers of the annuals, &c. for pieces for their volumes, which were furnished with a promptitude no less surprising than their excellence. Miss Hickman being now known, she became an object of attention. If she would not have been called beautiful by the crowd, there was something so deeply interesting in her countenance, something so prepossessing in her whole appearance, that the tasteful would at first sight have pronounced her no ordinary woman. Her countenance was full of the light of mind, and her head was of that peculiar form that would have thrown the phrenologist into ecstasy. Her complexion was fine, soft, and delicate, and her expression sweet and mutable. In the autumn of 1828, Miss Hickman was married to Mr. S. J. Smith, then the editor of a literary periodical in Providence. The next season they moved to Cincinnati, in Ohio. This union was short, but one of great affection. Before they left Providence, her husband published a volume of her poems, collecting some of those previously given to the public in the columns of literary papers, and others were written as the book was passing through the press. It is at all times a hazardous thing for a poet of maturity, and in full strength, to gather up his fugitive productions, and present them in a volume. R. T. Paine, Mrs.

Hemans, and even Moore, for a while lost fame by such a course. The mind is so constituted that it will not relish a profusion of sweet morsels at once so readily as if it met them accidentally; but Mrs. Smith did not share the common fate of authors in this respect, for many of the papers, from Georgia to Maine, noticed her volume; if not all with equal discrimination, they all abounded in a high measure of praise. While she resided in the west, she was ranked among the sweetest minstrels of that region: a land of charming scenery, and of minds of fresh and vigorous thought. She found the muse on the borders of the beautiful Ohio as fond to inspire their votary as they were on the banks of the Charles, where she first courted their smiles. To form a just estimate of her merit, we must take into view her age, and the circumstances under which she wrote. She indulged in no reveries of fame or profit, but took up her pen to pass a leisure hour, and to pour out her heart upon some theme that casually came across her imagination. She had no jealousy of rival poets, but read their works with the kindest feelings, and was at all times alive to their merits. With the elements of mind, taste, and feeling such as hers, religion—pure, warm, unaffected religion—was almost certainly to be found in the very fitness of things. Hers was the religion of belief with affection; the exercise of benevolence in word and deed, attended by the brightest visions of hope and immortality. No one can express their views of futurity better than herself:

"I would not have thee deem my heart
Unmindful of those higher joys,
Regardless of that better part
Which earthly passion ne'er alloys;
I would not have thee think I live
Within heaven's pure and blessed light,
Nor feeling nor affection give
To Him who makes my pathway bright.
I could not chain to mystic creeds
A spirit fetterless and free,
The beauteous path to heaven that leads,
Is dimm'd by earthly bigotry;
And yet for all that earth can give,
And all it e'er can take away,
I would not have that spirit rove
One moment from its heavenward way;
I would not that my heart were cold
And void of gratitude to Him
Who makes those blessings to unfold,
Which by our waywardness grow dim;
I would not lose the cherish'd trust
Of things within the world to come,
The thoughts that when their joys are dust
The weary have a peaceful home.
For I have left the dearly loved,
The home, the hopes of other years,
And early in its pathway proved
Life's rainbow hues were formed of tears;
I shall not meet them here again,
Those loved and lost and cherish'd ones,
Bright links in young affection's chain,
In memory's sky unsetting suns.
But perfect in the world above,
Through suffering and trial here,
Shall glow the undiminished love
Which clouds and distance fall'd to sear.
But I have lingered all too long,
Thy kind remembrance to engage,
And woven but a mournful song,
Wherewith to dim thy page!"

The mind of Mrs. Smith was not like that of one of those precocious beings who early reach the height of their powers, and after, having astonished their friends by the premature blossoms of spring, yield no summer fruit or autumnal harvest. What she might have done, if she had lived, can easily be inferred from what she was doing when taken from us; she was then reviewing her early partialities in letters, criticizing the justice of her own opinions, and reversing her judgments when convinced that they were wrong. These are the labors of a strong mind and an honest disposition, and when taken up with ardor and persevered in, seldom fail to end in greatness.

One of her last productions was a dirge, written at the request of a friend, who was engaged in a work upon some portions of the annals of Poland, and when he came to that affecting passage of history where Kosciusko fell, and was supposed by all Warsaw to have been dead, he wished to introduce a hymn, as sung on that night of grief by the holy sisters of the convent. The following lines were furnished a few days after the request was made; they are full of eloquent beauties:

DIRGE.

Through Warsaw there is weeping,
And a voice of sorrow now,
For the hero who is sleeping
With death upon his brow;
The trumpet-tone will waken
No more his martial tread,
Nor the battle-ground be shaken
When his banner is outspread!
Now let our hymn
Float through the aisle,
Faintly and dim,
Where moon-beams smile;
Sisters, let our solemn strain,
Breathe a blessing o'er the slain!
There's a voice of grief in Warsaw,
The mourning of the brave,
O'er the chieftain who is gather'd
Unto his honor'd grave;
Who now will face the foe-man?
Who break the tyrant's chain?
Their bravest one lies fallen
And sleeping with the slain.
Now let our hymn
Float through the aisle,
Faintly and dim,
Where moon-beams smile;
Sisters, let our dirge be said
Slowly o'er the sainted dead!
There's a voice of woman's weeping,
In Warsaw heard to-night,
And eyes close not in sleeping,
That late with joy were bright;
No festal torch is lighted,
No notes of music swell,
Their country's hope was blighted
When that son of freedom fell!

Now let our hymn
Float through the aisle,
Faintly and dim,
Where moon-beams smile:
Sisters, let our hymn arise
Safely to the midnight skies!
And a voice of love undying,
From the tomb of other years,
Like the west wind's summer sighing
It blends with manhood's tears;
It whispers not of glory,
Nor fame's unfading youth,
But lingers o'er a story
Of young affection's truth.
Now let our hymn
Float through the aisle,
Faintly and dim,
Where moon-beams smile:
Sisters, let our solemn strain
Breathe a blessing o'er the slain!

The prose writings of Mrs. Smith were as direct evidence of intellectual superiority as the best of her poetical productions. They are marked with that ease, grace, and enchanting sweetness that may be found in her happiest efforts in verse. If the term may be allowed—and what shall be condemned that fairly illustrates a truth—there is a sort of eider-down of the soul under all the nestlings of her creation, that gives them the softest repose that can be imagined. She attempted no eagle-flights—these were to be the efforts of riper years—all her thoughts were in the moonlight groves of the nightingale, or in the sunny vales, among the birds of paradise, whose delicate and fairy feathers upturned to the sun, drink, reflect, and untwist all the glorious rays of light that blaze in the Indian isles. The duty of the biographer is not ours; but we would not, we could not yield the dictates of our judgment to the overflowings of the sensitive eulogist, yet we cannot take our last look of this delightful vision that has so lately passed away, without thinking that she "was free among the dead" before she had fulfilled the ordinary years of her minority. If conjugal affection, maternal care, or the prayers of a host of devoted friends could have saved her, she would still have been living. She died at the same age of the youthful bard, to praise whom, in never-dying verse, Byron stopped from his strange wanderings, and to commemorate whom, Southey wrote a volume. Whose duty it may be to become the biographer of Mrs. Smith, time must determine. To be prepared for the task, he should possess taste, feeling, and genius. S. L. K.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

COOKERY.

We have not met a person, for many a day, more to our fancy than Miss Prudence Smith, the author of the subjoined unique and humorous treatise. She makes out her case to the great satisfaction of the reader, and deserves the friendly considerations of every lover of good cheer. No man who values a pudding, and knows how to appreciate excellence in the most solid of all the arts, can forego his praise. We remember to have once heard John Randolph, in the senate, ascribe the dyspepsia to our banking system, but that detracts nothing from the originality of Miss Prudence Smith's idea in following up the love of country to a partiality for certain dishes. The work to which this lively sketch is a preface, is entitled "Modern American Cookery," and has been just published by the Harpers.—Eds. N. Y. Mir.

I think it was the Edinburgh Review, which, some years ago, pronounced Madame de Stael the greatest woman of the present age,—a decision which could only have come from one of the most barren and uncivilized countries of the Old World, where they know nothing of the excellent art of cookery; otherwise, these abstemious reviewers would not have overlooked Mrs. Hannah Glass, who, in my humble opinion, hath done more for the happiness of mankind than all the blue-stockings of this and every other age. There is scarcely a civilized being who hath not benefited by her labors in the cause of human happiness; and it is one of the indications of a base, ungrateful world, that neither statute, nor monument, nay, not even a biography or a pudding, hath been consecrated to her memory! She hath shared the fate of the great Homer, whose birth-place remains to this day a matter of doubt and uncertainty. Certain hungry poets and writers talk of banqueting on the said Homer; but this is, doubtless, because they have never had an opportunity of tasting the fruits of Mrs. Glass's unparalleled genius, which as far outshines and overtops that of Mrs. Hemans, and other female vendors of empty poetry, as doth a white fricassee or a dish of buttered eggs exceed the frothy evaporations of a sickly and fantastic brain, moistened by the dews of Parnassus. There is nothing, indeed, which in my opinion, more strongly marks the retrograde course of the human mind, notwithstanding the boastings of the present age, than this, as it were, putting the cart before the horse, in giving the preference to mere works of beauty and ornament, such as literature and the fine arts, over those of utility and necessity. If we judge by the nature of the benefits conferred, what comparison can there be between the false sentiment and flimsy philosophy of Madame de Stael and the solid puddings of Mrs. Glass? If we are to test the matter by the extension of the benefits derived from the genius of these two illustrious rivals, may it not be said of a truth, that where one hath profited by the labors of the former, thousands, yea, tens of thousands, have tasted the manifold blessings of those of the latter? Lastly, if we compare the pleasures and advantages of these labors aforesaid, is there any comparison between the delight of discussing a rich and savoury dish, concocted after a sublime receipt of Mrs. Glass, and a tough, dry point in the politics or philosophy of Madame de Stael? Can any one live on the productions of the latter, except, perhaps, a few booksellers and critics? And is there a single one of my countrymen who does not daily derive his sustenance from those of the former?

Since, then, these facts are undeniable, it follows, as a thing of course, that the Edinburgh reviewer, or whoever pronounced the dictum in favor of Madame de Stael, has been guilty of a base injustice, for which he merits to remain forever ignorant of the ineffable beauties of Mrs. Glass's productions, which, in the estimation of all persons of real unadulterated taste, are far superior to those of any other female that ever existed, and, indeed, I may say to those of any male, not excepting the illustrious Dr. Kitchiner.

To those who may be inclined, from a false and frivolous estimate of things, to undervalue the art of cookery, it will be sufficient to say, that it is the distinguishing trait which separates the man from the beast. In vain may philosophers confound themselves and their readers with definitions of reason and instinct, which run into each other like butter and sugar in a hot apple pie. I say in vain; for were it not for the art of cookery, it would forever remain impossible to give a just definition of man. He is emphatically a cooking animal, or he is nothing. Hence, in all countries which boast of a great degree of refinement, cooks are placed in the same rank with fiddlers and opera dancers; and the illustrious Signor Paganini is only to be equalled in the estimation of the refined people of Paris and London, by the illustrious Monsieur Ude. Nay, these professors of the art of all arts are not only great themselves, but they confer greatness on others; since not a few persons of high pretensions among the beau monde derive all their consequence and the attentions paid them from the fortunate circumstance of having an excellent cook. Again, the influence of cookery on domestic happiness must be evident to all those who have had experience of the toils and troubles of a married life. Plutarch (or, if not he, I know not who it was) informs us that the only way in which the divine philosopher Socrates could alleviate the acerbity of his wife Xantippe was, by a peace-offering of a cake sweetened with the honey of Mount Hymettus, which never failed to put her into a most dulcet humor. We learn, too, on the same high authority, that Diogenes, the greatest grumbler of all antiquity, could not resist the divinity of a savoury dish, and became one of the merriest creatures in existence at a plentiful feast. He counterfeited the coin of Athens to purchase a dish of peacocks' livers. In short, it cannot be denied, that all the moral qualities of mankind are disciplined, restrained, aggravated, and mollified by the nature of the food to which they are accustomed. A man who lives on solid beef, &c. will ever be found to be an overmatch for one who starves his energies upon sickly milk and vegetables. I never knew a crosspatch of a woman who was not fond of crabs and pickles; or a testy, dissatisfied grumbler who did not prefer soup made of snapping turtles, to all other food. Without doubt, eating, not manners, makes the man. The physical qualities, in like manner, depend on the nature of our food; and I have heard it asserted by an eminent physician, that he had no doubt the body might be kept in a state of perfect health by a proper adaptation of food to its various changes and aliments. Thus, for instance, the headache might be cured by a proper application of calves' head soup; the gout, by a timely administering of calves' foot jelly; the liver complaint, by a persevering diet of fried liver; and the most obstinate love-fit, by a regimen of ox heart stuffed with heart's ease, and served up with truffle-sauce, which vegetable, growing entirely under ground, is naturally cooling and consolatory. The learned Huet, the greatest scholar of his time, relates, that whenever he found himself getting melancholy he ordered a wild pigeon for supper, which he affirms to be a sovereign remedy for low spirits. Thus all mankind, in sickness and in health, are at the mercy of cookery, which hath achieved more revolutions in the world than all other causes put together. There is not one of these on record which may not be traced either remotely or immediately to the influence of hunger, which, originating in the scarcity of food, naturally produced a total annihilation of cookery and cooks, and thus led to a complete overthrow of the laws and constitution of every state where such an unfortunate attitude of things arose. It is not generally known, that the rejection of the reform bill in the British house of lords originated in an unlucky feud between two noble lords, (each holding twenty-five proxies,) one of whom had seduced the cook of the other, whose skill was unparalleled in the concoction of coquille de turbot à l'Allemande.

If, then, the mere mechanical art of compounding and cooking is held in such exalted estimation that it places its possessor in the rank of fiddlers, opera dancers and singers,* and sways the destinies of nations, what honors can be above the merits of those great public benefactors who invent, nay, create the most glorious dishes by the mere force of a sublime and original genius? Talk of an epic poem! Verily, gentle reader, it is little better than talking downright nonsense. There are the Iliad, the Odyssey, the Æneid,

* "A cook," says Livy, "is a great man; cookery is become an art—a noble science; cooks are gentlemen; and spits and stewpans are held in honor among us."

So too Seneca:—"There be many things wherein the wit of man doth magnify and exalt the good gifts of nature; but what is so noble as that divine science which teacheth to improve those gifts, adding, as it were, sweetness unto sweet, and favors more exquisite unto those which were already all but perfect!"

Confucius says, "He who finds a new pleasure is one of the most useful members of society." What does he deserve, then, whose inventive mind is so fortunate as to engender an improvement, or even a new combination, in cookery? It is the res ædæ; the perfection of human intellect—the divine art of promoting man's happiness—worthy the profoundest study of the philosopher, and the most glowing praises of the inspired poet. Alquando bonus dormitat Homerus.—The good Homer sometimes nodded, yet did he not spoil his poem; but who ever heard of a cook nodding without spoiling a dish?

the Pharsalia, the Argonauts, the Jerusalem Delivered, the Paradise Lost, the Henriade, and the Vision of Columbus;—but there is only one plum-pudding and one Mrs. Glass!

Respecting the comparison between the pleasures of sense and those of the intellect, a vast many sentimental and erudite people have belied their experience and consciences by asserting the superiority of the latter. But it is quite a sufficient answer to all such egregious nonsense (to call it no worse) to remind my readers, that, for the most part, all the exertions of the intellect are subservient to the gratification of the appetite. Why doth the poet steal verses, the historian invent history, the romance-writer compile romances, the critic retail all other opinions save his own, and the philosopher stultify himself and his readers with abstract speculations? Of a certainty for no other end than that they may be enabled to partake in the marvellous productions of the genius of Mrs. Glass, videlicet, that they may eat. Again, gentle reader! didst thou ever in all thy experience meet with a man who could perform any illustrious action, achieve any great intellectual triumph, or enjoy the charms of nature, or revel in the delights of sentiment, when he was bitterly an hungered? Verily, of a truth, to do any thing illustrious, to enjoy any good with a zest, to think, feel, or even exist, the one great thing necessary is—to eat. Without eating there would be no philosophy, no poetry, no fine arts, no creations of fancy, or productions of the intellect. Hence the maxim of the famous Latin poet, Persius, Ingenii largitor venter—the stomach is the giver of genius; meaning, doubtless, that the great stimulative to the exertions of the mind is the desire of eating. Eating may thus be pronounced the real summum bonum which so puzzled the philosophers of antiquity. It was from a remote perception of this sublime truth that one of these sages, whose name I have forgotten, laid it down as a maxim, that in order to be happy in this world, “we must live to eat, and not eat to live.”

Much hath been said and written on the comparative excellence and delight of eating and drinking; but, in my opinion, there can be no doubt of the superiority of the former. Drinking, with any other intent than to give a keener relish to the enjoyment of food, is a most swinish and demoralizing practice, inasmuch as it confounds the intellect, inflames the passions, and renders the legs, which may be justly likened to the understandings of mankind, incapable of supporting the superincumbent weight of the man-machine, or of proceeding in an upright and straight-forward course of life. It is, doubtless, for this reason that the societies for the encouragement of temperance confine their meritorious exertions to abstinence in drinking alone, justly considering, that what ignorant philosophers are pleased to call gluttony, produces nothing but gout, apoplexy, epilepsy, catalepsy, dyspepsia, and such like trifles, which neither interfere with the decorums of society, nor occasion any other immoralities than a little occasional grumbling, swearing, and ill-humor, which, being for the most part exhibited within doors, is only felt by the domestic circle, and is, therefore nobody's business, since the most accurate and logical moralists all agree that true virtue consists in a scrupulous regard to outward appearances, and that a man may be as wicked as he pleases within doors, provided he plays the hypocrite without, and sets a good example to his neighbors.

Another crying proof of the immense, yea, paramount importance of eating will be found in the examples of our young men of fashion and fortune, who go abroad, it would seem, to no other end than to purify and improve their taste in this noble science. I have observed, that with the exception of a competent outfit of whiskers, very few of them think it worth while to bring home any thing but a critical taste and profound knowledge in the flavor and concoction of certain savoury dishes, such as potage à la reine, piéd de cochon à la Sainte Menchould, omelette aux trussés, brochet au bleu, and the like, as conceitedly compounded by Delmonico and other marvellous professors of the sublime science, whom they daily visit for the purpose of displaying the improvements and advantages of travel in foreign parts. Many people of profound ignorance in these matters imagine they go abroad to improve their manners and morals, and gain a knowledge of mankind in various countries; but those who see the inside of things know very well that French cookery and the restaurateurs at Paris are at the bottom of the matter.

Lastly, to give a triumphant and convincing proof of the superiority of cookery, it will be sufficient to observe that what is commonly called patriotism, or love of country, may be traced to an attachment to certain national dishes. Would any man in his senses, except, perhaps, an Edinburgh reviewer, ever think of living in such a barren inhospitable country as Scotland, except from an inborn attachment to haggis and oatmeal cakes? In like manner, the devotion of Irishmen to Old Ireland is undoubtedly of potato origin; that of John Bull to a traditionary reverence for the roast beef of Old England, now extinct among the common people; that of the French to a morbid attachment to soups; of the Spaniards to a superstitious reverence for ollas and garlic; of the Germans for sour-kraut; of the Virginians for bacon and greens; of the universal Yankee nation for pork and molasses, cucumbers, and pumpkin pies; and of the Arabs for dates. In illustration of this, an Arab, as is said, once visited various portions of Europe, and, being asked his opinion on his return, horrified his hearers by telling them there was not a single date-tree to be seen. “What a country!” exclaimed they all; “what a country that has no dates! It is only fit for a Giaour.”

Impressed with a firm conviction of these solemn truths, from my greenest youth, when I used to play about and make dirt-pies with my brothers and sisters, I had a stirring ambition to be useful in my generation; and it was ever my opinion, as long ago as I can remember, that nothing in the whole circle of female duties was so useful and becoming to a modest and virtuous woman as a practical knowledge of the mysteries of cookery. Without this knowledge I bethought myself that no woman could properly fulfil her destiny as the companion, the friend, and the solace of man, inasmuch as I have before proved that man is a cooking and an eating animal; and my good mother used ever to tell me that she did always allay the rage and discontent of my father with a smoking hasty-pudding. Hence it was, that from my earliest recollection I devoted myself to the reading of books treating of the science or art of cookery, inasmuch that I believe there hath not been a work on that subject published for the last hundred years that I have not actually devoured. That I might become profoundly versed in the matter, I studied Greek, Latin, and French under a learned Theban, who taught these languages in six lessons without understanding them himself, which was very remarkable, and who was happy in being remunerated by nine lusty apple-dumplings, which, he facetiously observed, was one for each of the muses. After this, I made a voyage to Havre, under the care of the excellent Captain Dibdill, to whom I did present a copper stewpan in acknowledgment of his great skill in navigating his vessel, and his polite attentions to me when I was seasick. From thence I proceeded to Paris, where I remained two years and three months, lacking two days, studying and practising under the most illustrious artistes of that famous city, such as Hamel Freres, of the Café Hardy, in the Boulevard des Italiens, No. 12, and the yet more famous Corcellet, No. 104 Palais Royale. It was at these places that all the Americans and English of distinction resorted, to perfect themselves in the great end of travel; and I may say without vanity, that the unequalled reputation which some of their dishes acquired was in a great measure owing to a certain person that shall be nameless. By these means my mind is, as it were, imbued with the spirit of cookery; and I never see any animal or vegetable whatever without thinking in my own mind whether it might, peradventure, be wrought into some savory dish. Indeed, I will candidly own that I have no other standard for estimating the utility of any thing than its capacity to administer to the sovereign propensity of man—to wit, eating. “Good to eat or good for nothing,” is my maxim.

Though arrived at the age of discretion, which, in my opinion, no woman attains under fifty, I have never been married. I spoiled my complexion by poring over the fire, studying the practical part of the sublime science, and, like all great cooks that I have ever heard of, grew fat, as it were, by broiling over the coals. Hence, the idle young fellows of my acquaintance paid me little attention; and I have been for many years past left to the unmolested enjoyment of my favorite pursuit, without any other solace than the proud consciousness that I was preparing myself to be useful to the great mass of mankind, instead of being subject to the caprices of one alone. For this purpose, it has been my practice for more than thirty years past to subject every receipt for cooking to the test of actual experiment; that is to say, I tried every one, and tasted the result. If it was marvellously excellent, and of a triumphant relish, I did forthwith record it in my receipt-book, like unto Mrs. Marianna Starke, with certain notes of admiration, the number of which indicated the degree of its perfection. In this manner did I collect many hundreds, yea, thousands of receipts, the most rare and valuable ever offered to the world in one single volume.

When I had completed sufficient materials for about twenty volumes, I consulted my brother, the parson, about publishing them. But he discouraged me sorely, saying, that after all there was nothing original in them except a new recipe for making apple-sauce; that it was a mere compilation, and only telling everybody what everybody knew before. I was not a little mortified, and somewhat angry at him for talking in this manner. However, finding me determined to publish my collection, he offered me twenty dollars for the whole, as I verily believe, that he might burn them up; for I suspect he was jealous. I rejected his offer, and told him I meant to take them to New-York myself, and get them published there. My reverend brother laughed at this, but I could see he was very much frightened lest I should go. He tried to coax me not to think of such a thing; but I was resolved, and accordingly came to New-York, under the care of Deacon Roger Goodfellow, as pious a man as ever split a shingle, though some of my neighbors tried to raise a scandal about my travelling with him alone in the steam-boat. I must say, I was received with great attention in New-York, and was what they call a lion, until I was cut out by a young lady in short petticoats from Paris.

But I was subjected to some little mortification, such being the lot of all mankind, on the score that the bookseller declined to publish my twenty volumes, and set me about selecting all those receipts which had six notes of admiration to them; by which means the cream of my twenty volumes was skimmed, as it were, into one milkpan. For my part, I don't see why I may not sell twenty volumes of cookery as well as my brother twenty of sermons. I am sure I know as much about cooking as he does about preaching. However, on the score of abridgment my publisher was resolute; and I was compelled to submit with as good a grace as I could muster, but told him plainly outright, that if people now-a-days published nothing but what was original, the press would stand as still as old Squire Doolittle's mill, which is built on Little Dry River, and has had no water to set it going for the last fifteen years. My brother was wroth at this, saying it was a reflection upon his twenty volumes of sermons, which he had published at divers times.

To conclude: to the man of taste my work cannot fail of proving a rich banquet; to the antiquary in savory sauces and erudite compositions, it offers food for the gratification of his favorite pursuit; to the lovers of good fare, it holds out a fair opportunity of attaining their great object; to the epicure, a treat by treating of the mysteries of the palate; to the scholar, it cannot fail of being a treasure invaluable by solacing him in his hours of relaxation from severer studies; to the man of science, it presents a mirror in which he may see the mysteries of his craft exemplified in the practical results of experience and skill; to the sage, it will afford matter of the most lofty and interesting contemplation; to the fool, a subject of easy digestion; to the aged, consolation; to the young, anticipation; to the married ladies, the means of establishing a firm and stable government in the domestic empire; and to the young, it comes in the shape of a Mentor to teach them a charm more potent than was ever contained in the cup of Circe, or circumscribed in the girdle of Venus. Let these last abandon mischievous novels, unseemly romances, and naughty poetry, and cultivate as well as enrich their minds by a constant perusal and practice of the precepts contained in my darling little book, which I now send forth into this wicked romance-ridden world with all the feelings of a fond mother parting from an only child. So may they in good time wed some rich husband who can afford to practise all my precepts, live in a three-story house with mahogany doors, red window-frames, and marble mantel-pieces, keep a French cook, and liquidate his debts at least once in his life by advertising his creditors that he has stopped payment. The public's well-wisher,

FUGITIVE PIECES.

THE admirable poem of Dr. Drake, published in our last number, is generally admired, and, though we can hardly hope to enrich our columns with many such pieces thus snatched from oblivion, we have it in contemplation, at no distant day, to make up, in a succession of numbers, an American Anthology, which shall embrace, and fix the authorship of many poetic writings that we think the world “would willingly let live,” if properly brought before their notice. This, however, as a labor of some research, must not be prematurely hurried into. In the meantime, having observed that many of the lighter periodicals, which are starting into existence around us, find their account in serving up as a standing dish to their readers a risfacciemento of scribbles, of one kind or another, from the English magazines—and that without giving credit to the sources whence they derive these materials—it has occurred to us, as an object worthy of the Mirror, to arrest and preserve in its columns whatever, in this ephemeral kind of writing, when of native origin, tends to illustrate the tastes and manners of the day. In pursuance of this view, we commence this week, under the head of “Humors of a young man about town”—by which title the writings of the author were first known to us—a series of articles which appeared originally in the New-York American, under a variety of signatures. The first number will be found below. If the thing takes, we may follow it up, by ransacking old drawers and commonplace-books, until we can make up a museum of native curiosities, composed of writings, droll or grave, since the time of the revolution; without, however, trenching upon the room allowed to original matter.—Eds. N. Y. Mir.

HUMORS OF A YOUNG MAN ABOUT TOWN.

THE THAW-KING'S VISIT TO NEW-YORK.

HE comes on the wings of the warm south-west,
In the saffron hues of the sunbeam drest,
And lingers awhile on the placid bay,
As the ice-cakes languidly steal away,
To drink these gems which the wave turns up,
Like Egyptian pearls in the Roman's cup.

Then hies to the wharves, where the hawser binds
The impatient ship from the wistful winds,
And slackens each rope till it hangs from on high,
Less firm pencil'd against the sky;
And sports in the stiffened canvas there
Till its folds float out in the wooing air;
Then leaves these quellers of ocean's pride
To swing from the pier on the lazy tide.

He reaches the Battery's grassy bed,
And the earth smokes out from beneath his tread;
And he turns him about to look wistfully back
On each charm that he leaves on his beautiful track;
Each islet of green which the bright waters fold,
Like emerald gems from their bosom rolled,
The sea just peering the headlands through,
Where the sky is lost in its deeper blue,
And the thousand barks which securely sweep
With silvery wings round the land-locked deep.

He loiters awhile on the springy ground,
To watch the children gambol around,
And thinks it hard that a touch from him
Cannot make the aged as lithe of limb;
That he has no power to melt the rime,
The stubborn frost that is made by time;
And sighing, he leaves the urchins to play,
And lanches at last on the world of Broadway.

There were faces and figures, of heavenly mould,
Of charms not yet by the poet told;
There were dancing plumes, there were mantles gay,
Flowers and ribbons flaunting there,

Such as of old on a festival day
 Th' Italian nymphs were wont to wear.
 And the Thaw-king felt his cheek flush high,
 And his pulses flutter in every limb,
 As he gazed on many a beaming eye,
 And many a form that fluted by,
 With twinkling foot and ankle trim.

And he practised many an idle freak,
 As he lounged the morning through;
 He sprung the frozen gutters aleak,
 For want of aught else to do;
 And left them black as a libeller's ink,
 To gurgle away to the sewer's sink.
 He sees a beggar gaunt and grim
 Arouse a miser's choler,
 And he laughs while he melts the soul of him
 To fling the wretch a dollar;
 And he thinks how small a heaven 'twould take,
 For a world of souls like his to make.

And now as the night falls chill and gray,
 Like a drizzling rain on a new-made tomb;
 And his father the Sun has slunk away,
 And left him alone to gas and gloom.
 The Thaw-king steals in a vapor thin,
 Through the lighted porch of a house, wherein
 Music and mirth were gayly mingled;
 And groups like hues in one bright flower,
 Dazzled the Thaw-king while he singled
 Some one whereon to try his power.

He enters first in a lady's eyes,
 And thrusts at a dandy's heart;
 But the vest that is made by Frost, defies
 The point of the Thaw-king's dart;
 And the baffled spirit pettishly flies
 On a pedant, to try his art;
 But his aim is equally foiled by the dusty lore that envelopes the man of must.

And next he tries with a lover's sighs
 To melt the heart of a belle;
 But around her waist there's a stout arm placed,
 Which shields that lady well.
 And that waist! oh! that waist—it is one that you would Like to clasp in a waltz, or—wherever you could.

Her figure was fashioned tall and slim,
 But with rounded bust and shapely limb;
 And her queen-like step as she trod the floor,
 And her look as she bridled in beauty's pride,
 Was such as the Tyrian heroine wore
 When she blushed alone on the conscious shore,
 The wandering Dardan's unwedded bride.

And the Thaw-king gazed on that lady bright,
 With her form of love, and her looks of light,
 Till his spirits began to wane;
 And his wits were put to rout,
 And entering into a poet's brain,
 He thawed these verses out:

"They are mockery all—these skies, these skies—
 Their untroubled depths of blue—
 They are mockery all—those eyes, those eyes,
 Which seem so warm and true.
 Each tranquil star in the one that lies,
 Each meteor glance that at random flies
 The other's lashes through;
 They are mockery all, these flowers of spring,
 Which her airs so softly woo—
 And the love to which we would madly cling,
 Ay! it is mockery too;
 The winds are false which the perfume stir,
 And the looks deceive to which we sue,
 And love but leads to the sepulchre,
 Which flowers spring to strew."

THE DRAMA.

THE NEW-YORK STAGE.

THE Maid of Judah, at the Park theatre, continues to attract large audiences, and to elicit general, and we think increasing signs of gratification. No one can fully appreciate even a single piece of music at one hearing, far less a long opera. The mind is at first rather bewildered and dazzled. The actors, the interest of the plot, the scenery, the dresses, all divide the attention. It is only after one or two repetitions, when the excitement created by these in a measure subsides, that the beauty of the music begins to break upon you with a new power. This remark is peculiarly applicable to compositions like most of those in the present opera, which are of a high order, but occasionally too grave to strike an ordinary fancy at first, although the beauties of Rossini are frequently discernible. We are not inclined to rank the Maid of Judah with Cinderella as a piece. It wants the rapid succession of gay, soft, and tender melodies, the light and brilliant accompaniments, the splendid chorusses, which have given to its predecessor such an unprecedented popularity. Portions of it, although beautiful, are comparatively heavy, and the characters are not so well cast. For example, Mr. Richings had the part of Cedric, a glaring blunder in the management, we cannot term it at all a rare one, as a similar mistake in Masaniello has given the audience marked displeasure. Cedric should clearly have been awarded to Mr. Thorne. Whenever there is a part in which this gentleman's voice would tell, it seems fated that he is to be excluded, and he too often is thrust, doubtless as much against his own will as that of others, into light tenor business; why, unless to preclude the possibility of his appearing to advantage, we are totally at a loss to divine. We must, nevertheless, add, in justice to Mr. Richings, that he got through his music, considering its excessive difficulty, with great tact, and added one other to the numerous evidences he had previously furnished, of his sterling merit and general utility. In saying that the bass solos and divisions, written for a first-rate singer, were not within his reach, we mean only to complain of the cast. The overture selected by Rophino Lacy for the Maid of Judah was that of Semiramide; and he has, after the custom of the day, introduced various parts of it into the melo-dramatic music. The overture played on the present occasion is not distinguished by any extraordinary merit. Why it was chosen we are unable to say, as we heard the overture to Semiramide, one of Rossini's best efforts, played admirably at this house a short time since. On the whole, however, the Maid of Judah strongly excites the audience, and will advance the reputation of this establishment for opera. As Rebecca, the high-minded and beautiful Jewish maiden, Miss Hughes, in several respects, surprised us very agreeably. She sustained it with a spirit and impassioned feeling, a warmth and vividness of conception, and a general grace and power, which we had not discovered in her previous efforts. All her dialogue with Bois Guilbert was beautifully given. We were not prepared to find her so charming an actress. Her singing was very sweet and effective. The slow movements in which the piece abounds were executed with a most pleasing ease and firmness, and fine intonation. The quintette and chorus in the fifth scene of the last act, are exquisite, perhaps equally so with any thing of the kind, our audience, as yet inexperienced in opera, have ever had an opportunity of hearing. We allude to

"Oh! cruel fate, with horror fraught,
 To tyrant rage I fall a prey.
 Condemned to die—oh fearful thought!
 My soul recoils with dread dismay."

The melting, the thrilling power and meaning imparted to these four simple lines are wonderful. They occur immediately after the condemnation of the beautiful and unhappy Jewess to be burnt at the stake. The parts are filled by Miss Hughes, Messrs. Jones, Thorne, and a young gentleman of pleasing address—Mr. Stanley. The tremulous and appealing tenderness and pathos which Miss Hughes here flings into her voice, will be observed by every hearer; and through all the parts there is a character of subdued despair, of deep anguish and horror—a moaning and a wailing of lamentation that perhaps expresses, as well as sound could do, the farewell to life, the dark thoughts of death, which youth, and innocence, and feeling, and love might breathe while trembling on the awful brink. We do not think it easy to overrate the beauty of this composition, nor to award too warm praise to those by whom it was sung.

Mr. Jones, with his fine rich tones, could scarcely fail to distinguish himself in Ivanhoe. Indeed, we thought several times we liked him better than ever. He has, however, one song which, although we hear it with pleasure, seems too light for his broad, and if we may so speak, massive voice. We mean "When the trumpet of fame." It is, however, an inspiring air, and was encored. "All by the shady greenwood tree," too is extremely light and animating. Barnes acted Wamba in good style, with one or two exceptions. Placide has nothing to do in Gurth to call forth his talents. The band, this season, have played well together, and they executed the music set before them in this opera to the letter. Nevertheless we cannot deny that the orchestral parts are defective. A second tenor is absolutely necessary, and the effect of the two clarionets playing leading parts, the one enacting first hautboy, the other first clarinet, with a second to neither, throws such preponderance into the leading melodies, the harmony being totally deserted, as to be destructive of the effect. Every musician, and to such we address this observation, will readily subscribe to its justice. The trombone also evidently played the bass of the stringed instruments, and not that which was intended for it. Now, having fulfilled our duties as critics, we have pleasure in repeating that the management has presented the public with a beautiful opera, and one worthy of universal patronage.

RICHMOND-HILL.—The new drama of Victorine, as nightly performed at this theatre, is well worth seeing. It would scarcely be possible to find a more effective representative of the bewildered sempstress than Mrs. Duff, and the whole piece is got up and cast in a judicious manner. Dimond's popular play of the "Doubtful Son, or the Secrets of a Palace," is in preparation, and will shortly be produced.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE P. MORRIS, THEODORE S. PAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, MARCH 10, 1832.

Removal of Washington's bones.—We congratulate our readers on the negative which the firmness of an individual has put on the question lately resumed in congress touching the remains of Washington. As far as we can ascertain, there is scarcely a person of intelligence in the city who did not regard the proposition to convey them to the capitol as absurd, if not sacrilegious. What could be more strikingly opposed to the character of this great, yet calm and retiring man, than an ostentatious procession—an empty pageant—a marble temple—an oration, perhaps? It would be a display for the vain, and a gratification for the curious, but a mockery to the reflecting, and an insult to the memory of him who can gain no more fame from the speeches of any man. Every body has heard of the tomb of Washington. Only a vulgar taste would wish to behold it tricked out with flimsy decoration. It needs no aid from monument. Even the most exquisite specimen of art would only disturb our impressions, and degrade the moral grandeur of the place. Nothing is to us more noble and inspiring than the majesty of nature which marks the spot, and the deep, yet tranquil associations which it awakens. We love simplicity in all its forms. It enhances beauty, adds splendor to genius, and ennobles even virtue. We acknowledge the fine power of its presence whenever we meet it, even in the ordinary occurrences of life. It makes music and poetry charming. Science—nature itself we love for its sake. But as an expression of any extraordinary moral feeling or principle, it is indispensable. Go to the grave of one you love, and cover it with gold and silver—let there be spread around it every costly display of wealth as a tribute to the departed, how instinctively the soul would recoil! how infinitely it would prefer the plain green sod, and the drooping branches, and nature in her ordinary attire. But over the sleeping place of persons not known to fame, it is requisite to fix some distinguishing token, at least where the lost one is mouldering in a crowd of others. Yet this token should be plain, in our estimation. No carving, or gilding, or labored epitaph would we behold above those whom death has snatched from our eyes. If our impressions of one merely dear to our affections would be disturbed and lowered by an attempt at display, how much more inappropriate then would be such an effort in the scene where repose the ashes of Washington? Now he rests beneath a simple mound, which overlooks a magnificent river. The spot is overshadowed by trees, beneath which his venerable form has moved. Near is the mansion where he lived and died, and adjacent stands a broken summer-house, often consecrated by his presence. Every where around are inscribed the names of the thousand pilgrims who have been there amid the soft and pleasant summer shadows, elevated with grateful love and awe for the savior of their country; and the whole Eden is as far removed from the jar of human life as he himself was from its low thoughts and its selfish passions. Around are only the sounds and the charms of nature—the scented breeze—the bursting flowers—the lavish verdure, and the blue sky of a world which he rendered better and happier,—and the stranger who treads through these sacred solitudes feels all his soul absorbed in the most elevated meditations. Now, who wishes to break in upon this quiet and beautiful repose of nature—this silence fitting the dead, with the throng and pressure of eager steps, with the sound of drum and fife, and thus to pamper a vulgar appetite for national excitement, to violate the sanctity of the tomb, and drag out the sacred relics to the light of day?

Address of General Lewis.—We learn with pleasure that the corporation have solicited a copy of the address pronounced by our venerable fellow-citizen, General Morgan Lewis, on the late anniversary of the birth-day of Washington, and that it will be published, together with the odes written by Mr. Woodworth, and also an account of the general ceremonies of the occasion. It will form a neat pamphlet, and will be acceptable as a memento of the day.

New-York Traveller.—A large and very handsomely printed sheet, bearing the above title, has recently made its appearance among the weekly papers of this city. Its columns are well filled with interesting matter, much of it original. The editor and proprietor is Mr. Freeman Hunt, a gentleman, if we may judge from his former efforts, every way qualified to conduct it. If the succeeding numbers equal the first, we shall have no reason to retract the very favorable impression we have already received of the general utility and excellence of the work. It is more especially valuable to travellers, to whose service it is devoted; and that, in these days of steam-boats, rail-roads and omnibuses, means to the service of every body. We welcome Mr. Hunt to the editorial corps of the city, and wish him every success in his new and laudable undertaking.

New-England Magazine.—These numbers are, from their great merit, fully entitled to notice, as they successively appear. The work is gaining rapidly in public favor, and deservedly receives the most pointed eulogies from the press. We are gratified in being at length able to recommend a monthly magazine which is at once good, and bids fair to be permanent. Peabody & Co. are the agents for this city.

The Court and Camp of Buonaparte.—This is a neat volume, just from the press of the brothers Harper, and contains a full-length portrait of Talleyrand—very pretty indeed. It forms the twenty-ninth number of the Family Library.

Employment for Females.—Seven hundred females are employed at a lace establishment, in Newport, Rhode-Island. An eastern editor is in raptures about the matter, and declares it a pleasant sight to see so many ladies taking the veil!

Italian Politics.—The English papers state, on authority, that the Italians detest the very name of the French, and are looking anxiously for a coalition with Austria.

Charles X.—The Parisians are quarrelling about Charles the Tenth again, and in a manner which implies a strange state of feeling. The newspapers censure the chamber of peers for proposing to substitute the word "king" for "ex-king," in a proposition respecting the discarded monarch and his family. They accuse the peers of having made the suggestion in order to court popularity.

Cholera Morbus.—An American traveller in Europe hopes the authorities of this country will not be so unwise as to adopt quarantine regulations for guarding against the importation of this scourge, as those in Europe have been found totally inefficient for the purpose. His objection is, that they embarrass commerce!

SECOND VERSE.

Nay, wherefore ask, since gifts are ours,

Which may well im - bue,
Earth's many troubled founts with showers
Of heaven's own balmy dew;
Oh, mingled with the cup of grief,
Let faith's deep spirit be,
And every prayer shall win a leaf

LOVE.

Love is a pain, love is a pleasure,
It is a burden, it is a treasure,
It is a pang, it is a bliss,
It is a hit, it is a miss.
Love makes us proud and makes us shabby,
It makes us sad and makes us crabby;
Oft makes us wise and full of wit,
But oft'ner fools, for bedlam fit.
Love's full of hope and full of fear,
Feels flatter'd there and slighted here;
Is selfish now, devoted then,
Loves all mankind and hates all men.
Love makes oft rich and often poor,
The miser's and the spendthrift's cure;
Makes ugly fair, and stupid bright,
Makes right be wrong and wrong be right.

A SPANISH PROVERB.

Tell me what friends your daily rambles share,
And I will tell you who and what you are.

REPARTÉE.

The faculty of replying suddenly and to the purpose, is to be acquired by mingling with the world. A student, if you give him time, will invent the most severe retorts; but the ready colloquist has learned to be rapid as well as witty. In the hands of a gentleman the power may become exceedingly useful in exposing presumption and repelling impertinence. I have seen somewhere the versification of a fine repartee by Lord Castlereagh:

"As t'other day Lord Castlereagh
Stopped to change horses on his way;
While at his ease reclining on his couch,
A N—h ragman ventured to approach;
His face distorted by malignant grin,
The index of the little soul within:
Rejoiced that he had hit upon a plan
To gain applause, and to insult his man.
He offered snuff, and, with a spiteful sneer,
Said, 'Irish blackguard,' to the noble peer.
His lordship, whose good genius never lags,
Quick answered thus the saucy man of rags:
'I seldom snuff, but, good sir, when I do,
I'll always think of blackguard and of you.'"

A RIDDLE.

A correspondent has sent us the annexed riddle as an original production. It may be so; we have no means of judging. The solution is nothing.

Before creating nature will'd
That atoms into forms should jar,
By me the mighty space was fill'd,
Of me was form'd the first made star.

For me a saint will break his word,
By the proud atheist I'm revered;
At me the coward draws his sword,
And by the hero I am feared.

Scorned by the meek and humble mind,
Yet by the vain, and poor possess'd;
Heard by the deaf, seen by the blind,
And to the troubled conscience rest.

Than sacred wisdom I am wiser,
Yet by every blockhead known;
I'm freely given by the miser,
Kept by the prodigal alone.

As vice deform'd, as virtue fair,
The courtier's loss, the patriot's gains,
The poet's purse, the coxcomb's care,
Read, you will have me for your pains.

AN ECLIPSE NOT MENTIONED IN ASTRONOMY.
Godlike in soul, his radiant brow he reared,
A seraph's peer mid Eden's bowers and balms,
Till at his side the lovely Eve appeared,
And veiled his beauty in superior charms.

Epitaphs.

ON A SLUGGARD.

Ho! passerby—come, sing or sigh,
Or laugh, as the humor takes thee;
Here, under ground, I sleep so sound,
The deuce himself can't wake me.

Here lies General Tully,
Aged one hundred and five years fully;
Nine of his wives beside him doth lie,
And also the others when they die.

ANTIQUITIES OF NEW-YORK.

THE WALTON MANSION-HOUSE.—PEARL-STREET.

Drawn by Davis.—Engraved by Mason.

WHAT citizen or stranger has ever passed through Franklin-square, in this city, without gazing with interest on an antiquated, large, three-story edifice, built in the English baronial style of the last century? It is called the "Walton-house," because it was erected by an aristocratical Englishman of that name, nearly a century ago, and has ever since remained in the family. The entrance-hall is in the centre of the building, with large, old-fashioned parlors and drawing-rooms on each side. The portal is in fine keeping with the style of architecture, which then distinguished the English patricians from the plebeians.

The portico is supported by two fluted columns, and surmounted with the armorial bearings of the Walton family, richly carved and ornamented; but, like all insignia of nobility on this side the Atlantic, somewhat the worse for wear. Were we conversant with the technics of heraldry, these arms should be described, but being totally ignorant of the mysteries of that profound science, we are not competent to the task. The pride of ancestry is a kind of pride of which we know nothing, although we have read much; and so long as we know that our grandfather did his duty in the revolutionary war, and received a certificate of approbation from Washington, we are not ashamed of him, and feel quite indifferent whether he inherited "the blood of all the Howards," or whether one of his remote progenitors actually turned the spit which sustained the goose which fed the queen when she heard the news of her foes' defeat on Shrove-Tuesday.

The Walton-house is now No. 326 Pearl-street, in the midst of a most dense population; but, when it was first erected, there was but one building on that side of the street, between Peck-slip and the commencement of Cherry-street. The diagonal junction of the latter with Pearl-street, then created an acute point of land, which now constitutes Franklin-square. At the period to which we allude, there were not half-a-dozen buildings in Pearl-street north of Franklin-square. For many years afterwards, that region, comprising at present the populous streets called Roosevelt, James, Oliver, Catharine, and Oak, together with Batavia-lane, was an impassable bog, denominated "Swamp Meadow," being almost wholly covered with stagnant water, holding communication with the Collect by a stream which crossed Chatham-street.

That section of the city which is still called the "Swamp," extending from Beekman to Frankfort-street, was then literally a swamp, being a wet, boggy waste, covered with trees and bushes, where wild birds built their nests and laid their eggs, as they fondly thought, far from the invasion of wicked school-boys, who learned their a b, abs, somewhere in Broad-street. Here, also, did sportsmen resort for game; here did whole herds of swine, not then employed as city scavengers, earn their own living by rooting up roots and ground-nuts; and here were luscious blackberries, far more plenty than satisfactory reasons for winding Pearl-street round the margin of this quagmire. The natural course of Pearl-street, from Peck-slip, is Cherry-street. But the whole city (modern improvements always excepted) is a labyrinth—a puzzle—a riddle—incomprehensible to philosophers of the present day.

With these introductory remarks we publish the following description of the Walton-house, politely furnished by Mr. Pintard.

This family dwelling-house was in its day—indeed, still is—a noble specimen of English architecture a century ago. It is a brick edifice, fifty feet in front, and three stories high, built with Holland bricks, relieved by brown stone water-tables, lintels, and jams, with walls as substantial as many modern churches, standing along the south side of Pearl-street, formerly called Queen-street. The superb staircase in its ample hall, with its mahogany handrails and bannisters, by age as dark as ebony, would not disgrace a nobleman's palace. It is the only relic of the kind that probably at this period remains in the city, the appearance of which affords an air of grandeur not to be seen in the lighter staircases of modern buildings.

This venerable mansion is one of the very few remaining in uninterrupted succession in the family of the original proprietor. It was erected in 1754, by William Walton, Esq., who lived and died a bachelor, and bequeathed by him to his nephew, the late Honorable William Walton, whose son, advanced in years, now occupies the premises. The family of Walton, of English ancestry, is one of the most respectable of this city; we know not whether allied to the Reverend Izaak Walton, of angling memory, whose delectable treatise on the subject will be read and esteemed by amateurs of the rod, line, and hook as long as waters flow and trout swim. The first William was distinguished by the appellation of Boss Walton, by way of pre-eminence. The title is Dutch, and given even now by apprentices and subordinates to their principals and superiors.

Boss Walton was a merchant, and resided in Hanover-square. He acquired an ample fortune by an advantageous contract with some Spaniards of St. Augustine, which enabled him to build by far the most expensive, capacious, and elegant house at that period in New-York. When the foundation was laid, his fellow-citizens all wondered that he should choose a site so far out of town, it being then almost at the eastern extremity of the city, but at the present time it is considerably west of the centre, between the Battery and Corlaers-hook. This edifice was the pride and admiration of our forefathers of former days—and children, as the writer of this article well remembers, as an incentive to good behavior through the week, were treated with a walk on Saturday afternoon to see and admire Boss Walton's fine house.

Boss Walton was very hospitable, and gave, as he could well afford, the most sumptuous entertainments of any person in those plain, but bountiful days. At the termination of the old and last French war with this country, in 1759, (which was crowned by the conquest of Canada, whereby the British colonies in America, and especially the province of New-York, were relieved from the incursions and aggressions of the French, and the dreadful terrors and sufferings by the tomahawk and scalping-knife of their savage allies, the Indians,) every demonstration of joy was evinced by the good citizens of Albany and New-York. The British army, on its return from Canada, was hailed and treated with the most profuse prodigality. Among others, Boss Walton entertained the chief officers in a magnificent manner. His table was spread with the choicest viands, and a forest of decanters, sparkling with the most delicious wines. The sideboard groaned with the weight of brilliant, massive silver—none of your tinsel, superficial, plated ware that dazzles and mocks the eyes of modern times.

After the peace of 1763, the English parliament manifested its intention of taxing the colonies for the purpose of refunding the debt incurred by the recent war. The colonies had no objections to paying their liberal quota of the expenses, but wished to do it in their own way, through the medium of their own legislatures, which were best acquainted with the circumstances of the people, and remonstrated against "taxation without representation;" pleading, moreover, that the colonists, harassed by long and sanguinary wars, were poor and exhausted—which was the fact. The plea, however, was rebutted in parliament, by an appeal to the elegant entertainments given by the citizens of New-York to the officers of the British army, and the dazzling display of silver plate at their dinners, equal, if not superior, to any nobleman's, which hospitality and exhibitions were adduced as proofs of the wealth and prosperity of the colonies. But every colonist was not a Boss Walton—the generality of our merchants and citizens were humble, but not indigent. Remonstrances were vain—the ministry persisted—the stamp act, duties on teas, &c., were soon enacted, which led to discontents and riots—and opposition to the mother country ensued. The Boston portbill and reinforcement of British soldiers in that town followed, which led to the battles of Lexington and Bunker-hill, the declaration of independence, and a seven years' war, that ultimately terminated in its acknowledgment by the British king, and the emancipation of these United States from foreign thralldom and subjugation. Long may they exist, free from domestic strife, and in their present happy enjoyment of civil and religious liberty!

ORIGINAL TALES.

THE CRIME AND THE PUNISHMENT.

"Poor Charles! He is so sensitive—so enthusiastic—so delightful—so—so—every thing, I almost fear I shall soon love him in earnest."

"In earnest, Caroline—in earnest?" replied Mary, with unfeigned astonishment; "and do you not already love him in earnest?"

"Ridiculous, Mary. Do you think it? You talk like a little girl."

"If suspecting you of loving Charles B—, and expressing my suspicions—if this is talking like a girl, I confess—"

"But, Mary, who is Charles B—? a mere worthless—"

"Worthless!" exclaimed Mary, with increased emphasis and wonder.

"I mean worthless as to money, Mary; penniless, I mean. You know he has neither wealth, nor friends, nor influence, nor is he likely to have any of these all-important matters."

Mary looked down and bit her lip. Her eyes even grew slightly moist, and a new color passed over her cheek. She was thinking to herself how much dearer these very deficiencies, which her companion represented as insuperable objections to loving him, made Charles B— to her.

"No, Mary," continued Caroline, "I do not love him. I even spoke jestingly when I said I feared that I ever should. I never thought—never dreamt of such a thing."

"But, Caroline, your looks, your words—all, all your actions when he is present, contradict your assertions. And he looks on you with such a deep passion, that I am sure, although I am no great believer in heart-breakings either among men or women, yet I am sure what you have said would—"

"Fiddlestick! nonsense!" replied the beautiful but heartless girl, blushing with gratification. "That he loves me, I know well enough, but for my loving him, excuse me; oh, no! the man I marry must be a great, rich, and admired. He must be the glass of fashion, and the model of beauty; he must be the envy of the men, the adoration of the women; he must attract all eyes. He must have a house furnished like Aladdin's palace; pictures, books, music, splendid equipage, obsequious servants, admiring friends. In summer we will travel, in winter we will revel; life shall be all a gay, bright, magnificent dream."

"Poor, poor Charles, indeed," murmured the lips of Mary; "and he thinks you love him—"

"Well?"

"And you, Caroline, I fear—"

"Well, what do you fear, with such a pair of pitying blue eyes as these?"

"I fear, Caroline, you have led him on to think so."

"Why, ha, ha, ha! was ever such a joke? To be sure I have—I like him—just so far off. I delight to have him fix those melancholy black eyes of his directly on mine as if, the saucy fellow, he was dreaming of all sorts of tender things, and had the power of reading every thought of my mind, when, with all his penetration, he knows just as much about what is passing there as he does of the matters in the moon."

"And yet you say—"

"But, don't interrupt me; let me speak in my defence, will you? It is a superb gratification to feel that you have the love of such a being as he certainly is. He is so noble, and so sad; and he calls me Miss Buckingham, as if he were all the while wanting to say dearest Caroline; and he watches me so wherever I go—in the dance, when I am singing—even when he is behind me, I can feel his eyes."

"But, Caroline, are you not afraid that when he comes to know your real opinion of him—"

"What, that he will blow his brains out? Oh! that would certainly be delightful, now duelling is out of fashion, and against the law, (what stupid people they send to the legislatures!) the only real way a lover has of showing his sincerity to his mistress, is to shoot himself."

"And how do you mean to explain your intentions to Charles?"

"I don't mean to explain them; let him ask, let him offer. I declare I have not had an offer these three months. I don't see the use of being a belle, if one does not have offers."

The characters of the two young ladies, between whom this conversation occurred are tolerably well developed by it. The one was a coquet; lovely as she was cold-hearted; brilliant but superficial; the only talent which she really possessed was a faculty of making herself appear much better than she actually was. The other, a sweet modest girl, of a totally opposite description; not so striking in her appearance, but with a softer and a dearer face, and a more quiet grace, more enduring and winning beauties, both of mind and person. She had beheld—for she could not avoid seeing—that Charles B— was strongly attached to her friend, and she had at first realized a kind of noble and disinterested happiness in the reflection that he would be happy. She was, therefore, as she well might have been, thunderstruck, at the little éclaircissement which had just taken place between her and Caroline. A strange throng of opposing and tumultuous thoughts crowded upon her. Why should she start with a secret joy at what she had heard, notwithstanding her indignation against the unfeeling conduct of Caroline, and her pity for the disappointment which awaited Charles? There could only be one reason—she had never permitted herself to search for it before. She hastened to her apartment alone; she buried her face in her handkerchief; burning tears gushed from her eyes; she could no longer conceal it from her own reason. She loved him herself—deeply, dearly. A gleam of rapture shot across her soul, and yet her love was unbidden; perhaps, nay, certainly unwished! Shame crimsoned her cheeks; again she buried her glowing cheeks. Oh! Cupid, Cupid! thou hast a world of cruelties to answer for.

Among the few friends really attached to Charles B— was young Lewellen, the heir of a noble and wealthy family in England. Two people of opposite characters may be, nevertheless, devoted to each other, and Charles and Lewellen were familiar and fond as Damon and Pythias. The one was gentle and sad, the other bold and merry. Charles was silent and reserved in company, while Lewellen displayed a thousand flashes of wit and humor. One laughed at the world, the other felt more inclined to weep.

They met one evening; the one with spirits so high as to be scarcely repressed, the other moody, and apparently miserable.

"I am the happiest fellow in the world," said Lewellen.

"And I am the most wretched," added Charles.

"I am inspired with love," said Lewellen.

"And I am racked with it," added Charles.

"The loveliest creature in the universe has made an Apollo of me," said Lewellen.

"And the loveliest creature in the universe has made a fool of me," added Charles.

They were confidants on all subjects, and Charles listened with a beating heart to a glowing account by his friend of a half-budding attachment just springing in his breast, for a being as pure and amiable as light ever shone on.

"And she loves you?" asked Charles.

"I have every reason to believe so."

"And you love her?"

"Dear Charles, I pause often before I give myself up to a woman, but I am just trembling on the brink, and I feel a touch, a breath could cast me down headlong."

"Happy fellow," replied Charles; "how different your fate is from mine. I too loved, and thought my love rewarded. Step by step I have been led on, until at length I find I have been trifled with by a detestable, heartless coquet, and am now cast off."

"But, dear Charles, are you sure the mistake has not been on your side?"

"Impossible! impossible! The idea that a sweet woman had given up her soul to me, is the last that I would admit into my mind. Nothing but a series of long and close observations could ever make me believe it; but then my diffidence has limits, and bating all the world of looks and double entendres with which, in this instance, I have been greeted, she has herself so nearly told me she loved, that, shame upon her and my own credulity, I no longer doubted, and accordingly offered her my hand."

"And she, I suppose, blushed and sighed, and turned away her head tremblingly, and lisped out 'no,' or she did 'not know what to say,' or she was 'totally unprepared,' or any other of the thousand capricious things with which women love to torment us, their tyrants, when for a brief moment we are in their power. You then, like a true swain, you withdrew from her presence, overwhelmed with confusion, and have come here to unbosom yourself to me; and she has hastened, 'on the wings of love,' to unbosom herself to some friend of hers, and—"

"Indeed, Lewellen," said Charles, reproachfully, "you wrong us both. She coolly answered that such a question from me was not unexpected, neither was it unwelcome, inasmuch as it afforded her an opportunity, without any violation of female propriety, to repress a feeling which she had long had cause to fear had arisen in my heart; a feeling, she added, as unbidden on her part as it was unwarranted, and, as it must be, hopeless on mine. Oh! who could have believed Caroline N— such a consummate hypocrite, such a finished coquet!"

"Caroline N—!" exclaimed Lewellen; "I am thunderstruck. Why, it is Caroline N— of whom I spoke; who loves me; whom I nearly loved—can there be two Caroline N—'s?"

"Yes, Lewellen, there are; but they are united in one person. Caroline N— the lovely, the amiable, the pure; and Caroline N— the vain, the heartless, the deceitful, the hateful."

A glow of crimson shot over the face of Lewellen. He reposed both in the judgment and veracity of Charles the most implicit confidence, and he loved as much as he respected him. They parted, and I will hasten to the end of my story. It was several months after the period just alluded to, Caroline and Lewellen appeared more intimate than ever. It was a match—every body said so. What a fine young couple they were? How many admiring eyes followed them, as they passed along the fashionable and crowded promenade. His tall, erect, and elegant form, so graceful and manly, and she hanging so affectionately and so confidently on his arm; and then he was so rich. She was a fortunate girl; and she was so brilliantly beautiful. He was a happy dog.

One evening the two young men were together at the residence of Mary and Caroline. From more careful examination of the character and reputation of the latter, they had discovered her irresistible propensity to exercise her fascinations upon the men without any more serious intention than that of amusing herself with their struggles, and exposing her conquests.

There is no hate like love slighted, and confidence betrayed; and when the attachment of an honest man is trifled with, the time he takes in passing from one extreme to another is very short.

As for Charles, his feelings had taken a new turn. I will not descend to minutiae; but, at the time of which I speak, he was sitting in the embrasure of a large and heavily curtained window, in a very earnest, and, apparently, delightful conversation with Mary; and from the expression of perfect satisfaction which had settled upon her features as she felt the gaze of Charles B— lingering on them, the observer might draw what conclusion he pleased. It is wonderful what a spiritual beauty the consciousness of requited love sheds over a sweet woman's face. Earth has no gift to offer her like these moments. There are certain faces which light up, like the sky, in its richer colorings—faces which you have often looked at without discovering any thing extraordinary in them, and which others pass over without notice. Charles thought, as he gazed, it was very strange that he had never observed before how infinitely more graceful and charming every look of Mary's was than those of her cousin. He had been blind—deaf—stupid—under the influence of a silly passion; these, and similar thoughts, passed through his mind.

At the remote end of the opposite apartment opening into the one where they sat by means of two large folding doors, Lewellen also hung over the seat occupied by Caroline at the piano. There needed no ghost to come from the grave to convince any observer that they were, (as the expression is) making love. Yes, Caroline, the gay—the wild—the free—even she was caught at last. When such a creature does at length yield to the influence of passion, she is thrown off her guard. Lewellen, too, by his manner, betrayed the deepest devotion—she felt that her heart was full of happiness—she felt that her eyes no longer concealed the subtle and oppressive feelings of delight which had overpowered her bosom.

A conversation, which had been carried on through the breaks of the music, and sometimes mingling with it, in a low tone, at length appeared drawing to a crisis. He took her willing hand. She thought he would press it to his lips. She felt his face was over her, warm with looks of love, and lifted her eyes tremblingly to his. A strange sight met her. His noble features were, indeed, lighted up, but with a withering look of indignation and contempt. She was starting from him, but he held her hand, grasped in his, and spoke, in a low deep voice, every rich, mellow tone of which sank, like a dagger, into her soul.

"Miss N—, do not deceive yourself. I should once have loved you. I thought you fair and honest. I have found you false and cruel. She who could wantonly sport with the feelings of one man, can never be faithful to another."

He cast her hand from him sternly, and left the room. It was an impudent thing in him to use any lady so, good reader, I confess, but I really think she was rightly served.

THE METEMPSYCHOSIS.

BY ROLEY M'PHERSON.

Endor. Transformed! did'st say?
Magus. Ay, in the body of a horse, his cabin'd soul,
Fretted beneath the bestial drudgery;
And murr'ring curses, with its hopeless prayers;
Did seek deliverance.—The Pythagorean, a MS. tragedy.

In a very thoughtful mood I was, during the last summer, strolling along the streets; it was a soft, dreamy day in June. The sun, half obscured by a hazy fleece of vapors, straggled like a loitering school-boy lazily upon its course. The passengers in the streets, "like wounded snakes," dragged their lengths along. The very spirit of dulness seemed to pervade all things, myself among the rest; a feeling quite uncommon with me, who am noted for a certain sprightliness of manner, quite at variance with the general appearance of things on the day to which I allude. Thus sauntering along, cogitating the while on the last novel, the late batch of aldermen, and other dull and sleepy subjects, I was suddenly awakened from my stupor by a violent trembling, that shook me from the soles of my feet to the extreme end of the longest hair on my head. I thought of Mount Atlas in an earthquake, and the tower of Babel in an ague-fit. I wondered at the cause; it seemed, too, as if I had grown six inches taller. There was something very odd in this, happening, too, upon a warm day in June, and upon a man who had witnessed six engagements and never trembled! I continued my walk, not, however, without the determination of inquiring of my physician the first symptoms of yellow fever. The next thing that surprised me was, to see a gentleman, whom I did not know nor recollect of ever having met before, take off his hat to me in the most civil way imaginable; accosting me, at the same time, with a "How d'ye do, Mr. Smith?" Now, as my name does not happen to be Mr. Smith, I wondered at the man's impudence; for I certainly looked upon it as such. Mistake it could not be. I was well assured of that, not only from a certain confidence in the fellow's look, but also from a firm conviction I have, and always have had, that I bear no resemblance whatever to any person with the every-day name of Smith. I looked back upon the stranger, but thinking it hardly worth while to ask an explanation, I moved on. I had not taken more than twenty steps, when a very well-dressed and rather rakish spark ran towards me, with both hands extended, in the manner of one who salutes an old friend, and seizing upon my ten digits, squeezed them heartily, while he exclaimed,

"Ah! Smith, my boy, how are you? Glad to see you. How's wife and the little Smiths?"

This was too much. "Sir," said I, with the most dignified air of surprise and resentment, "you, you are mistaken, my name is not Smith."

"Not Smith," cried he, with a most provoking laugh, "not Smith; come, that's a good one; ha! ha! one of Bob Raffer's old jokes, eh? Do very well with his creditors; sly fellow that Bob. But come, doff that sober phiz of yours, and tell us did you really lose on Betsey Baker, or was that all a take in?"

I was perfectly dumb with astonishment; but thinking this was carrying a joke rather too far, I at length found words to inform my facetious friend that I was as ignorant of Bob Raffer or Betsey Baker as he was of the manners of a gentleman. With this, accompanied by a look of contempt, I turned upon my heel, and had the satisfaction of hearing two or three loud "ha, ha's!" and a "that's a good one," from the fellow, as he scampered up the next street.

I had hardly got rid of this annoyance, when another and another person, neither of whom I had ever seen, passed me with an easy familiar nod of recognition, that completely astounded me. Was I asleep! in a trance! or actually in the possession of my senses! Had all these people conspired to trick me into the idea that I was not myself! I was absolutely bewildered; it was evident something was in the wind; but what the mystery was I could not unravel. But my troubles had only begun; for while I was in the midst of these feelings of astonishment, vexation, and bewilderment, one of those very civil gentlemen, known among "the fancy" under the cognomen of "barons," (Anglici) bailiffs, accosted me with a bow and a grin; the one as an apology for the other, and both as an apology for his business with me. After a "Good morning, Mr. Smith," this most obsequious of bum-baileys presented me with a writ, at the suit of one Thomas Selvage, tailor, against "Mr. Penruddock Smith, for the sum of four hundred and twenty-three dollars and fifty-seven cents," the same being "for divers articles of gentlemen's wear," purchased of the said Thomas Selvage at sundry times. After examining this document with the most perfect surprise, I turned to the interesting bearer of it, and informed him in as few words as possible that he was deceived in the person, that my name was not Smith. The wretch screwed his face into another horrible grin.

"Mayhap, I've saw Mr. Smith afore to-day, so no tricks upon travelers; if so be as how you have the ready, I'll not trouble you, but knowing your odd sort of ways, you see I'm not to be come over, so down with the dust, or you'll have to take up lodgings in the 'lock-up,' yonder."

"Lock up! villain! what do you mean?"

"Why, I mean as how you must settle that are bill, or change your lodgings, that's all."

I was certainly very angry. "Tell me instantly," said I, raising my cane, "who sent you with this paper, and lead me directly to your employer, or I'll pulverize you, you dog!"

"No use gettin' in a passion; if you mean, to settle with Mr. Selvage, why I'll go with you to the shop."

"About it, then," said I, seeing no use in talking to the fellow. I followed him to the shop of Mr. Thomas Selvage, "tailor and men's mercer," as a huge sign over a gaily dressed pair of windows, indicated. Behind a table, with shears in hand, and with sundry pieces of cut and uncut broadcloth, stood the "fraction" himself.

"Do you know," said I, "the meaning of this paper, and why I am arrested in the place of a person I never saw in my life?"

"Do I know the meaning of it?" repeated the ninepin, "ay, sir, and unless you settle that bill, or find bail in the course of two hours, by—(and the thing absolutely swore)—I will put that writ in force upon your body."

My cane was a second time raised, and in an instant the corporeal frame of this ninth part of a man would have been annihilated, had I not in the very act happened to cast my eye upon a looking-glass that stood near; the figure that I saw there reflected arrested my arm, and I stood a perfect statue, in an attitude that bore a particular resemblance to Ducrow's personation of Hercules in the act of striking the Nemean lion. If mortal man can be thunderstruck, without actually coming in contact with the bolt itself, I certainly experienced that deadening sensation, from a sight of the figure that was reflected back from the glass, and which, if I had any faith in the truth of the mirror, must be a likeness of myself. Yet it was not myself. Instead of the sleek, comely visage that it had ever been my pride to look upon, there gaped the perfect picture of a worn-out rake; two lack-lustre eyes looked out above a pair of haggard, cadaverous cheeks, between which jutted forth a fiery red nose, that absolutely seemed to illuminate the ghastly features of the countenance, like the deep light of a lamp shedding its halo upon the ghostly tenants of a sepulchre. I was petrified with amazement and horror at the spectacle. I rubbed my eyes, and looked again; the same abominable portrait rubbed its eyes, and gazed also. Suddenly a light broke in upon me! The philosophy of Pythagoras, the abominable doctrine of the transmigration of souls, passed like lightning before me! I saw it all—it was evident that my soul had taken to itself another body—that myself was not myself; and that, by the infernal machinations of some evil spirit, my own body of flesh and blood was undoubtedly the habitation of the vile soul whose clay covering was now inhabited by my own. Despair seized me. I was mad with the most horrid fears, the most terrible anticipations; but, thank heaven, one moment of cool thought was given me in the midst of my frenzy. It decided me upon the course I was to pursue. It seemed to me that the tailor, the abominable anatomy that stood confronting me, was in league with the devil, to destroy me, and pick my pockets, by giving to me the image of one of his hopeless creditors; with this impression, I rushed upon the fraction, and with one blow made him bite the dust. I had hardly done this, when a tremendous stroke from the baron's club laid me prostrate; with the fall I awoke upon the floor of my room, upon which, it seems, I had tumbled from my bed, having, it appeared, all this while been dreaming! I had fallen asleep while reading of the origin and progress of the philosophy of Pythagoras the Samian. Hæc mihi dormienti visa sunt.

LITERARY NOTICES.

EUGENE ARAM

Is making a great sensation. As every body has either read it, or is going to read it, we deem that the few following observations, gleaned from a well written review in the London Atlas, will be found to contain at least a dash of truth:

"In all that relates to simplicity of structure, management of plot, dramatic effect, and the maintenance of individual interest, this novel is the most compact and complete Mr. Bulwer has yet produced. It is distinguished by his usual facility and elaborateness, his picturesque ruminations, and his prosodical hauteur; but it has less of his egotism, his fashion of speech and dress, and his violent self-will, than any of the others. We admire it as much for its freedom from those literary impertinencies, which would appear to be indigenous to the author's mind, as for the qualities of excellence it actually puts forth. Where the philosophy of character is concerned—and this is a work which especially aims at mental portraiture—the author is as wordy, and as lengthy, and as discursive as such a topic could well permit him to be: but the subject mastered his vanity, and in the endeavor to paint the lofty, and sublime, and inexplicable nature of Eugene Aram, he, fortunately for his readers, lost sight of himself. Now, if the descriptions of character, and the soliloquies of the hero, and the mystifications of the author were carefully weeded out, and the necessary links of reflection re-written by some man who could condense his thoughts into the essence of expression, instead of suffering them to be diluted into a watery flow of words, this novel would be that one, Pelham excepted, upon which, as a whole, Mr. Bulwer might rest for whatever future fame it might be his destiny to enjoy. But in a work that professedly dissects the heart, lays open the workings of the darker passions, and impersonates the remorse of guilt, the agonies of shame, and the struggles of a superior nature between the pangs of conscience, the love of purity, and the ambition of fame, all superabundant strokes of art, all declamatory expletives, reduce the value and fritter away the identity and intensity of the picture. Deep emotions are never noisy or capable of descriptive illustration. Habitual misanthropy or lacerated pride, that coils within the soul like a sleeping serpent, will not utter its trains of thoughts, or give vent to its tortures in long and painfully particular speeches. On the contrary, real passion and actual suffering are abrupt, and powerful in their brevity; and so foreign is description to them and their states of mind, that they even avoid the literal use of words, and fly to some hidden, but palpable analogy, that oversteps all intermediate points of delineation, and bounding at once to the extremity, brings the whole purpose instantly into view. Hence metaphor is the common language of strong feeling. Hence in every tongue the paramount affections, and desires, and passions, have resolved themselves into verbal images that convey in a breath a group of emotions, and a perfect reflection of a rushing throng of ideas, which volumes of description would fail to embody. And that habit of referring existing and acute emotions to familiar analogies, to save the pain of detailed delineation, is universal to all men under all circumstances. Agony may be said to distil the thoughts into words of power, that come singly but full of meaning, and strong to bitterness.

"The novel of Eugene Aram is less various than the genius of Mr. Bulwer led us to expect; but that is a meritorious sacrifice to the higher demands of the subject. It has but few characters, all of which are well discriminated and sustained. The author informs us that he originally intended to throw his materials into the dramatic form, and although he subsequently changed his intention, he has manifestly worked out his story in that spirit. The plot is single, and always before the reader. It is not distracted by a phantasmagoria of transparent personages fitting before the eyes. The interest of the narrative gradually increases to the end; and is not compromised even by the previous knowledge of the catastrophe, so skilfully has the author conducted the subsidiary plot that winds round the fortunes of the hero.

"Mr. Bulwer has, perhaps unintentionally, made Aram a morbid reasoner, and a moon-touched raver throughout. Occasionally, he gives him a good melo-dramatic attitude, makes him frown, and look as cold as ice; anon he throws back his curls, and shows his fine white forehead and intellectual head to the best advantage; but, instead of painting the fire within, restless for ever, and eternally seeking an escape outwards, he chooses to delineate him as one whose imagination is diseased, and whom a love of nature on the surface—stars, flowers, and running waters, has reduced to a mere mumbler of pretty passages—a babbling of phantasies. There are portions of the tale where this dullness is overborne by flashes of the actual man—but they soon fade away into the primeval gloom of a false taste and an erroneous conception. Now, there is nothing of this kind in Godwin's character of Falkland. There the imagination from the first was diseased; but, nevertheless, there are no romantic concomitants in the person, or bearing, or speech of the slave of honor to give him an adventitious interest. Godwin makes Falkland a small man—an accomplished man, and a recluse. But he never for a single instant describes him after a fashion that recalls to your mind the picture of Satan Montgomery, with his blue eyes directed to the heavens, his throat bare, and his hair curled like Endymion."

CABINET CYCLOPEDIA.

This work, now in the course of publication by Carey and Lea, is gaining ground in the public opinion, and very justly. It is conducted on a plan which possesses real and peculiar advantages. Each volume contains a subject uninterrupted, accompanied by appropriate illustrations, and is perfect in itself. A subscriber may omit particular numbers, or discontinue at any time, without breaking the set. The essays contained in them are addressed to the general comprehension, and for the contributors Mr. Lardner boasts some of the most celebrated men of the age—Walter Scott is among the number. We really conceive this to be a great undertaking, and acquiesce in the opinion of a London paper, that it is "full of moral and intellectual excellence."

SONGS OF THE ETTRICK SHEPHERD.

It is not necessary to criticize the songs of this popular contributor to Blackwood. They have been collected in a volume, and just published in this city, by Mr. Stoddart.

MR. THEAL'S FRENCH GRAMMAR.

This is a small elementary work, just published by Peabody and Co. A rather peculiar and excellent mode of classification is introduced in it, and it is well adapted for the use of persons commencing the study of the French language.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE GAMBLER.

THERE WAS a mansion of the olden style,
High on an eminence that overlooked
The vine-hills, gardens, and the winding streams
And rivers, and the pleasant valleys green
Of sunny France. 'Twas fashioned to the taste
Of by-gone years, and still remained untouched
By time. It had been the abode of wealth
And grandeur, and within its antique walls
Old men had bowed their silver heads in death,
And children sprang to manhood, and so passed
Away with age as nature bids, all gave
Broad rich domains had numbered with their lords,
The bravest of the brave, whose cherished names
The minstrel wove in songs of valiant deeds,
With sword and lance in holy Palestine.
The sun arose above the fair blue hills,
Dispersing from their brows the light gray mists,
And opening the gay flowers, and kissing dew
From their fresh leaves, and drawing forth their sweets.
His bright beams through the lofty casement streamed
Into the wide and tapestried chamber, where Eugene reclined upon a couch, like one Fatigued by anxious watching. It was he—
That did possess this vast inheritance.
His downcast eyes, subdued and sad, were bent
Upon the carpet in a thoughtful gaze.
His dark locks fell upon his lofty brow,
Disturbed, not by the pillow, for unpressed
For two nights it had been. The long-drawn sigh
Betrayed the sorrow rankling in his heart;
And the wan cheek from which the rose had fled,
Perhaps for ever, and the drooping lid
Of those once brilliant eyes, too truly spoke
Of long hours spent in wretched wakefulness.
The well-curved lips no longer wore the bright
And pleasant smile that nature gave, 't express
So winningly the sweetness of his soul.
Their color too was gone; a livid hue
Like that implanted by the touch of death,
Was only left upon their quivering forms.

Beside him sat the jewel of his heart,
The object cherished from his youth, on whom
He had bestowed his wealth of love, and whom,
Above all earthly things, ay, fortune, fame,
He richly prized. Her fair arm softly leant
On his, and with a tenderness she gazed
Upon his troubled features, while she smoothed
The damp hair from his forehead with a hand
Of marble whiteness. She too was dismayed;
Her countenance betrayed a spirit grieved
And tortured by a throng of saddened thoughts.

There stood a child, light-hearted, lisping words
In mirthful innocence, and mingling them
In playfulness with names of those she loved;
And offering to her father a bouquet
(Of roses, violets, and myrtle buds,
Which she had culled while yet the morning dew
Beamed on the foliage, and together bound
Their stems; and as they were unnoticed all,
And she was greeted with no soft caress,
The pearly tears rolled down her damask cheek,
And on his face she looked complacently,
And in a tone of sorrow kindly spoke,
And placed the flowers upon his bosom; when,
As from a slumber roused, he raised his head,

And with an effort, looking on his child,
He smiled, and gently stroked her flaxen hair,
And would have spoken, but his gloomy thoughts
Returned to their dark channel ere a word
Had passed his trembling lips. He quickly drew
A silken purse, in which remained but one
Small solitary coin. 'Twas near the last
Of his once ample fortune, which the hope
Of gain, illusive as an April sky,
Had bid him venture in the play. His eye
Shone with its wonted lustre, while the toy
Was swinging in the air, and with a smile
That for a moment lighted up his cheek
He looked upon his wife, and mildly said:
"My love, behold, my fate has made me poor;
Nay, start not! we have gold remaining yet,
And I shall hie me to the game again,
When Fortune, fickle as the autumn winds,
Like a repentant lover will prove kind,
And bless the hazard. Yes, once more I go
With borrowed means—detain me not—I must Away—'tis for thy good and for our child's—
We are but beggars now, I'll make you rich!"

The hour of midnight was at hand, when through
The chamber where the gathering was, the lamps,
Neglected and untrimmed, burned low and glared
Their sombre light upon the shadowy walls.
There was a table centered in the room,
On which lay cards and heaps of golden coin
Profusely scattered, while a splendid purse,
With undrawn strings, half buried with the wealth
It once contained, and costly pocket-books
Were thrown aside unclosed; and on each end
A richly fretted candlestick was placed
Whose wick sent high its spire of flame and smoke
From out the socket, and lit up the pale
And fiend-like features of the four that sat
Reclining forward with an earnestness,
And gazing on the cards with blood-shot eyes
Intently, and with skilful fingers dealt
To recommence the play, with thousands staked
Upon the issue. 'Twas the last for him,
The hated one of Fortune, who had seen
The waste of his inheritance, and still Clung with a tiger's fierceness to the game
He knew not, while a ray of hope yet beamed
Upon his mind. His light and delicate frame,
Unused to tedious watchings, that had been
From childhood nursed in luxury and ease,
Exhausted, nerved itself anew. His cheek,
Death-like and hollow, gathered a new flush
Of fitful redness; and his sunken eye
Strained up its swollen lids, from whose fiery balls,
Deep-veined with blood, the dim lamp's ruddy light
Brought out a maniac stare unfixed and wild—
His dark hair loosely hung upon his wan
And beating temples, shadowing their white hue;
And as the current of his thoughts went on,
The workings of his brow, where stood the sweat,
Wringing out profusely by the spirit's toil,
Betrayed the struggle. Not a sound was heard
While the last game was pending, save the fall
Of cards upon the table, or perchance
The muttering of a curse by him who marked
His ruin, or a trembling sigh long drawn
With difficult breathing. Ever and anon
A savage glance would fiercely penetrate
The hellish group, as in his breast there lurked
Suspicion of a deep laid scheme of wrong.
Significant signs passed unobserved by him;
And every motion of the brow, and eye,
And lip had meaning in it; and the smiles,
Now many unsuppressed, evinced how sure
The golden victory was; yet not a word
Was whispered—hushed was every one, intent
Upon the play, awaiting anxiously Its close!*

The moon was mounting in the sky, and stars,
Countless and brilliant, gemmed the blue expanse;
And zephyrs were abroad upon the hills,
And o'er the green and fragrant fields, with sweets
From dew-wet blossoms gathered on their wings.

High on a bank that beetled o'er the sea,
Lost Eugene stood, reclining 'gainst a rock,
Regarding first the waters that beneath
Rolled ever onward with a ceaseless roar;
Then stretching his uncovered arms abroad
Towards a sail that moved on ocean's breast,
And calling on the distant mariner,
And laughing till his o'erstrain'd voice grew hoarse.
The sea-birds were awakened by his shriek,
And from their nestling places in the crags
Flew wildly round with a shrill cry of fear.
Along the strand the dashing waves sent up
Their hollow moan, and he did answer them,
And fancied that he heard the call of those
He loved; and so he spoke familiarly,
And whispered words of love as to his wife
And little one.

Then came his reason back;
And as the stern sense of reality
Again possessed his heart, he slowly knelt
And breathed a prayer to heaven.

* * * * *
All—all was still;
The ocean-birds were slumbering; the green sea
Rolled its bright billows quietly, 'neath which,
Far down amid the caves and coral groves,
A beautiful proud face was floating dark—
And monsters of the deep were gliding by
The cold dead form of Eugene.

THE BIOGRAPHY OF A CONTENTED MAN.

WRITTEN BY MYSELF.

I WAS so much pleased with the article in the last number of the Mirror, which appeared as the fragment of a letter from a barber, that I resolved, it being extremely laconic, to indulge my literary propensities so far as to send you a little biography of myself, interspersed with some remarks, the results of my long experience upon the subject of my profession. You must know, that being in early boyhood of a weak and sickly turn of body, and a rather contemplative character of mind, my father, a lusty New-England farmer, was at a loss what to do with me. Be a farmer I would not, and indeed I am convinced my talents pointed out a higher path. A sailor's life was very much against my inclinations, for I have always had an antipathy to salt-junk, and to being turned out of bed at nights. My motto has always been, 'enjoy the present, take comfort while you can get it; or, as my father used to say, 'make hay while the sun shines.' There was some talk of keeping me at school, and bringing me up to a profession.

"Thank you, my good folks," said I, "your kindness exceeds your figure." A profession, indeed! I laughed in my sleeve, and almost in my sleep, at this plan; which was, I have since had reason to believe, a freak of my poor, dear, foolish mother's. Good soul! she believed there was no one like Bob. I should certainly be a judge or a bishop; or, if the bent of my genius was warlike, who knew what might happen? General Bob Jenkins—Commodore Bob Jenkins. I have no doubt, bless and rest her soul, that if she had been much pressed, she would have been satisfied with a captaincy. As for me, I always had a dash of good sense in my composition. You have found such people, good reader, sometimes, have you not? Plain fellows, that see at a glance in a plain way what the most refined and sentimental minds, with all the grace of feeling and the advantage of education, fail to discover. Now I had three brothers, you must know, and as different from me as black is from white. Their names were Peter, Jack, and Obadiah. Peter, with a good deal of trouble, got into the navy; Jack went to teaching school, in a little village in Connecticut; and, at the same time, studied law. Obadiah staid on the farm, and worked like a horse. I remember one day we were all assembled in the old house, Peter, with his new uniform coat and flashy buttons, as proud as a peacock; Jack, bent half-double from close attention to his books, and already beginning to talk pieces of Latin and other nonsense; and Obadiah, in his linsey-woolsey trousers and short sleeves, with a great pair of hands hardened with honest labor, and a face bronzed with constant exercise and exposure. They all went on about their own business. The lawyer was going to make a tremendous noise, one of these days; the sailor thought it so noble to fight and die for one's country; the farmer intended, if ever he had any money, to buy the farm adjacent ours, to cultivate the grape, and supply the country with domestic wine.

"It's all in my eye, my good fellows," thought I. "I have made choice of a profession. None of your stuff about dying for your country, but a decent, easy, idle, honest calling, guarded from half the troubles of life, safe from the summer's heat and the winter's cold, safe from bodily and mental labor, safe from politics and danger, from envy, hatred, and malice. I don't care a farthing about the opinions of other people. I want to enjoy my life myself. Learning? fiddlesticks. Look at your students, your lawyers, your farmers, your doctors, and your soldier. Glory! Die for your country! Have your head shot off, to be put in the newspapers! I was extremely obliged, but had rather be excused." So I did forthwith reveal to my aspiring friends and relatives that I had discovered which way my genius lay.

My father looked at me, my mother's face brightened, the boys stared at each other, and winked.

"I guess a doctor," said my father.

"A clergyman," said my mother.

"A lawyer," said Jack.

"My friends," said I, with that sort of resolute composure, which one puts on when he knows what he has to say will rather kick up a bobbery, "you are wrong. I am going to New-York. I am going to be a—barber."

"A what?" burst from every lip. The boys laughed, my father looked surprised, my mother was petrified with horror; but my mind was made up, and so were my arrangements. I was then sixteen. Every body knows, or every body ought to know, how the Yankee families manage these matters. A host of sons grow up to be great, tall, gawky boys, and then disperse, to seek their fortunes. Some of them go to the south, clear forests, buy plantations without any money, and pay for them out of the profits, open stores and taverns, and all that. Some, by hook or by crook, heaven only knows how, go to the legislature, and get to be great men, and members of congress. Some turn peddlers, go to Louisiana, and pass themselves for colonels. Whole shoals float down to New-York, and teach school. That's regular Yankee. Set one of these raw farm-boys down in the midst of a strange city, and he goes to teaching school the first thing. If he does not know how, he learns. Some of the greatest men in the nation have sprung up so. I know one in particular; always shave him when he comes to town. He commenced by teaching little boys the multiplication table, and now—I should not wonder if he were president before he dies. So much for Yankee schoolmasters. They are odd, rough creatures at first, but fine men. Do you mind that, my pretty city squash? Such an one may charge the jury yet in a suit in which you are defendant.

Well, as others did, so did we. Jack became a lawyer, Peter spent his youth tost about over every ocean, and Obadiah worked the farm after the old folks died. They happened to be all in my shop—office (as Jack called it) yesterday. I shaved them all round for nothing, and, in mine own opinion, they all thought sixpence saved was as good as a shilling gained; at least they talked so. Jack's law business did not agree with him much; he was not so successful as he might have been. He said the profession was excessively crooked; he could scarcely get along.

Peter had gained some credit abroad on board one of the United States ships, but then he had lost an arm in an encounter with a piratical vessel, and had received a gash over his face, which twisted his right optic down, like a wall-eyed horse. Honor is a capital fine thing, but then an arm! an eye! Only think of it. As for Obadiah, he was, I think, rather more fortunate than either of the others. To be sure, he had a world of trouble with the farm, and had a touch of fever and ague, which, being prevalent in the neighborhood, not only kept him sick, but prevented his selling the farm. He had, therefore, nothing to do but remain, ague or no ague, for he was too poor to let it at a loss; but then he had neither lost his eyes nor his limbs, and seemed, on the whole, tolerably satisfied. His aspirations had never been very brilliant. My own adventures were of a very different cast. I had roved about nearly all over the states. There is scarcely to be found a pretty town within a hundred miles that has not, for some time at least, been ornamented with my pole. I have shaved high and low, far and wide. I have had under my close inspection human faces till I am as learned in the art of physiognomy as Lavater himself; and as for happiness, believe me, if you want to find it, pass by your palaces and temples, keep away from courts and country-seats, follow not the wealthy, the wise, the great, poets, orators, nor authors, but come into my shop, and you have the man. I have heard cries from all quarters, that human nature is depraved, that the world is wretched. A fiddlestick for such stuff. I am a right merry walking contradiction; not but that I have met with reverses, but when they came I snapped my fingers at them, boxed my razors, pulled up my pole, and started off in search of some more auspicious abode. To say the truth, I have been driven to this very often. I have been ruined twenty times, but what is ruin to me? I have always laughed at it. I was expelled from one country village because I kept my shop open on Sunday morning, and from another because I kept it shut on Saturday. I have roamed and traveled, always light-hearted. I have shaved in steamboats and hotels, and as for this city, there is not a face of any note about town that I don't know as well as I do my own. Not only am I acquainted with a vast variety of faces, but I have studied the geography of each one with care, and know every line, mark, and wrinkle thereon, well enough to draw a chart of them. I flatter myself I am not altogether undistinguished in my profession. I appreciate fully the important duties I have so frequently to perform. When a man takes off his coat, and sits down to be shaved, I have noticed that he undergoes a singular revolution of character. He vows insensibly that for the time being he will disentangle himself from every care. It is something like a warm bath. He is about to enjoy a luxury. He is going to be waited on. He lulls himself with pleasant reveries. He does not care two farthings for any body in the world, except such as he can remember with satisfaction. He is a lord, an emperor. I have often had occasion to remark this species of transformation. I have sometimes shaved the merest vagabond, a fellow absolutely out at the elbows, with a beard an inch long, and like a shoe-brush, and the whole exterior of one who was a wretch, without being (as the man in the play says) proud of wretchedness, and who I knew, moreover, the moment he quitted my presence, would sneak off with the unequivocal humility of a dog flying from a broomstick-handle; yet, in my chair he would betray that lurking consciousness that rises secretly in the heart of the humblest individual undergoing the agreeable operation of shaving, which, under the direction of a good artist, I fearlessly assert is one of the most delightful to which an intelligent individual can be subjected. It furnishes an excitement without any consequent depression of spirits; and the languid inanimation into which every one falls while surrendering himself thus to the discretion and taste of the barber, is the best evidence thereof. Yet, gentle reader, there be people who look down on my virtuous, useful, and simple business with contempt. A lawyer, forsooth—and what is a lawyer? one whose trade it is to make right wrong, and wrong right; and a soldier? one who kills for pay; and all your host of great and proud men? What are they better than I? Nay, are they so good? Is there not in every other business a dash of temptation to do evil, which even the best inclined cannot always entirely resist? Not so in mine; for, while it is humble and honest, it is easy and free from care, and (in your ear) as for wealth, the profits of my last year exceeded the income of the chancellor of this state.

SKETCHES BY A BRIEFLESS LAWYER.

THE TRIAL OF A MURDERER.

THE first cause of any degree of importance in which I was ever concerned, was the defence of a murderer. It is now upwards of twenty years since. Like most of my brethren who have no adventitious introduction to business, I was compelled to loiter from day to day about the criminal courts, waiting the rare windfall of a retainer; or, what is of almost as much importance in drawing one into notice—the honor of being assigned by the court as counsel for some one of the unfortunate wretches who are daily brought before those tribunals—whose defence might afford me an opportunity of displaying to advantage whatever talent I may have supposed myself to possess. I had had reason to flatter myself with the favorable notice of the presiding judge; and, in the plenitude of his good will, he had promised me the post of junior counsel in the first case which came before him, calculated to excite public interest, and thus afford me the long wished for opportunity of challenging a rank among my older and better established brethren of the bar.

This opportunity at length occurred. A murder had been committed in the populous town of —, which was characterized by circumstances of the greatest atrocity, and, at the same time, of the most impenetrable mystery. The victim had been a stranger in the place, without friends or connections, and almost without home. He had lodged at the hut of an obscure laborer, whose poverty was extreme, but whose integrity had never incurred even the breath of suspicion. At the time of the murder, no motive could be conceived to exist on the part of any one, and, least of all, on the part of the host, for the commission of the crime. The deceased had been apparently a man without resources, and from the inoffensiveness of his habits, was most unlikely to have subjected himself to the hatred of a single human being. He was discovered upon the highway, about a mile from the town, dreadfully mangled, and, to every appearance, but recently murdered. The intelligence was communicated through the town with the rapidity of lightning, and, in a moment, as it were, every one was in eager pursuit of some clew by which to solve the mystery that on all sides was admitted to hang over the dark transaction. Thousands of suspicions and surmises were afloat upon the subject, the most natural of which, as well as the most readily believed, seemed to be that the crime had been perpetrated by one of those midnight wretches who, at that time, infested the town, and who, it was at once supposed, had pursued his victim to the spot where he had been found, and there committed the bloody deed. An inquest was held upon the body. No information, however, was elicited calculated to dispel the doubt in which the whole affair was enveloped. The landlord testified that the deceased had gone out early on the evening of the day preceding that on which he was discovered, but professed himself ignorant of any thing further. A verdict was rendered "that he came to his death by bruises inflicted by an unknown person," and there the matter rested. Suspicions continued to be as vague as they had before been, and although the sensation naturally produced by the perpetration of so heinous an offence, could not be said to have entirely subsided, it began to settle down in the conviction that all efforts to discover the criminals would prove ineffectual.

The excitement of the moment, produced by an occurrence of absorbing interest, invariably blunts the perception, and takes from it that keenness of vision which examines and scrutinizes closely the motives of human conduct. The stormier passions, in cases of this description, generally take the lead, and it is not until they have ceased, and given way to the calculating coldness of reason, that the mind is enabled to connect together a chain of circumstances leading to a clear and palpable conclusion. It was so in relation to the crime to which I have referred. But as its novelty and atrocity began to wear away, various minutiae, which had before passed entirely unnoticed, stood out in bold relief, and fixed suspicion upon the humble laborer, who had acted in the relation of host to the unfortunate man. He was indicted, and arrested for the crime. He was, as I have already remarked, miserably poor. Wretchedness was deeply imprinted on every line of his countenance; and, from his utter inability, both from want of means and friends, to provide professional aid, it became the duty of the court to assign him counsel. This task was allotted to me, in conjunction with a barrister of greater experience and more extensive practice than myself; and I never shall forget the feelings with which I heard the announcement from the bench that I was appointed to take charge of the prisoner's case.

How much do they mistake the character of the legal profession who represent it as a mercenary band, accessible only through the medium of paltry gold, and deadened to the kindlier sensibilities of our nature! And how much more ignorant are they of the noble impulses of the soul, who regard the advocate, zealous and ardent in the defence even of guilt, as the dissembler of his own judgment, and as the cool and calculating hypocrite, forcing convictions upon others by which he himself, as an individual, would be ashamed to be governed! I will not deny that before I became identified with the feelings and motives of a lawyer, I was inclined to attach much importance to the popular error on this subject, and to wonder wherein consisted the magic charm in the relation of counsel and client, by which the former became identified with, and yielded his convictions to, the entire control and influence of the latter. I confess, I say, that when I heard counsel, not merely of the greatest talent, but of the most unquestionable integrity, urging conclusions the most fallacious, from premises which, to the uninitiated, must have seemed the most absurd—and that too with a force, a zeal, and a conclusiveness which forbade a doubt of their sincerity—I was at no trifling loss to divine the cause which could produce effects so strange and so unaccountable; but when even the limited practice of a professional life induced me to apply the test to my own feelings, the doubt vanished, and the difficulties which before seemed insurmountable, disappeared at once. We are creatures of sympathy—it is the bond which connects us together in every relation of life, from the least to the most extended, and may be truly said to constitute the charm of our very existence. But when its ties are strengthened by the consciousness that we are relied on for protection—without closely scanning the motives of the being who has thrown himself upon us—we yield it at once, readily and cheerfully—from the same noble motive which prompted the Neapolitan fisherman to protect even his mortal enemy, for no other reason than that he had, although undeservedly, thrown himself upon his hospitality. I have heard the expression from one of the first lawyers who ever graced our bar—whose memory and whose virtues it is our delight to honor, and whose eloquence still rings in the ears even of the youngest of the profession—that on looking back upon a long and laborious professional life, he could not upbraid himself with advancing one argument which he did not conscientiously believe to be well-founded, or with having assumed the management of a single case in which he did not think he should have succeeded.

As respects the unfortunate individual whose fate was now in some measure in my hands, the new relation in which I was thus placed, excited these feelings most powerfully; and the doubts and suspicions which, in common with the rest of the community, I had entertained, now yielded to considerations of a more solemn and sacred character. I viewed every circumstance with an eagerness and an anxiety which none but those who have been similarly situated can appreciate. I scrutinized every minute fact with a closeness of which I can convey no idea—and although I was perhaps the only person concerned in the case (unless my associate) who entertained such an opinion, I soon satisfied myself that my client was innocent. His trial at length was appointed. The court was crowded with intent and eager spectators, and the prisoner was placed at the bar. Never shall I forget the ominous forebodings which passed through my mind as he entered the dock. I saw a human being whose situation could not but have attracted the pity of all—but which was immeasurably heightened to me by a deep sense of the heavy responsibility I had assumed—standing upon a spot which he was soon to exchange for the proud air of freedom, or for the awful solitude of the grave! How intensely did I watch every form, however unimportant, and with how many appalling associations is every incident of this solemn scene connected. The holding up of the right hand—the reading of the indictment—the arraignment—the tremulous answer of “not guilty” to the question of the clerk—the slow, solemn, and deliberate proclamation that the jurors who were to be called were to pass between the prisoner and his country upon his life or death—the oath to each juror, while he and the prisoner were, according to the form, charged to look upon each other—these were matters of form indeed, but they were the forms by which a human tribunal were slowly proceeding to the awful sacrifice of a human life!

I need not dwell upon the details of the trial. It was a long and painful one. The evidence, as is usual in such cases, was principally circumstantial, and after it was concluded, it became my duty to address the jury. If there is any situation more trying than another, it is that of a counsel who is placed, as it were, as a shield between the life and death of an individual—at the moment he rises to urge his case upon the consideration of a jury. For my own part, at least, I felt it peculiarly so. Every eye was upon me, every ear was intent; and I felt that a thousand hopes were concentrated upon my exertions, which the novelty and interest of my situation told me I would in vain attempt to realize. I could not shut my eyes to the fact, that I was contending against the convictions of my audience; and yet, so easy is it to awaken the better feelings of our nature, it was equally evident that their sympathies were strongly enlisted in favor of the prisoner. Indeed, throughout the whole of my experience and observation, I have uniformly remarked, let the evidence be ever so strong, that the acquittal of a prisoner draws after it from the audience the most unequivocal marks of approbation. The case was strongly pressed on the part of the prosecution; and, after the charge of the judge, who rather inclined against the accused, the jury retired to deliberate upon their verdict.

“Perhaps,” says a popular writer, “in the whole course of a criminal trial, there is no period more awful than that occupied by the deliberation of the jury.” And if this remark be true, as it respects the promiscuous assemblage whom curiosity has drawn together, how forcibly does it come home to those who feel themselves identified with the miserable wretch, whose destiny that deliberation is soon to determine. For my own part, this interval was the first in which I felt capable of realizing the scene around me. In the ardor of the conflict, remote consequences are entirely overlooked, and every other consideration becomes merged in the desperate struggle for victory; but, when that conflict is over, and the regular and solemn forms of a court have given place to the eager watchfulness, and the death-like hum of the anxious spectators, a feeling comes upon us very like that which pervades us in the chamber of death. We begin to reason and reflect, and as we turn our eyes towards the fated being who stands before us, an object of mingled sympathy and abhorrence, awaiting his doom, we seem almost to have overstepped the brink which separates us “from the unknown dark.”

After an absence of an hour, the bustle in the lobby, and the impetuous rush of the crowd outside into the court-room, gave token of the return of the jury. They immediately entered, preceded by the officer in whose custody they had been, with the brief but awful announcement, “jury’s agreed;” and, after being ushered to the bar, resumed their seats. The solemnity of the scene at this moment baffles description; every eye was fixed upon the criminal; and so silent was the crowd, that respiration itself seemed to have been suspended. The clerk at length rose, and after calling the names of the jurors, directed them and the prisoner to rise. “Gentlemen of the jury,” said he, “look upon the prisoner; prisoner look upon the jury.” The dull and sunken eye of the criminal seemed to fall unconsciously upon his judges, and the clerk proceeded to inquire in the usual form whether the prisoner at the bar was guilty or not guilty. No one who has not witnessed it, can conceive the effect which the announcement of the verdict of guilty instantly produces. The prisoner alone of all the group seemed unmoved. His pale and death-like hue, and the vacant and wan expression of his eye, indicated an utter unconsciousness of his situation, which a careless observer might have construed into an indifference to his fate, but which was in reality the lethargy of a mind harrowed and goaded by the extremest suffering, and deadened by the most torturing anxiety.

The firmness proceeded to pronounce the awful sentence of the law, with firmness, but not without great feeling. A tear stood in every eye around; and even the stern officer who guarded the prisoner—a man whose very calling familiarized him with misery, was seen for once to yield. The last office of the judge was at length concluded. The death-like hum which had preceded the return of the jury, again was heard among the spectators, as they slowly withdrew, while the prisoner resumed his seat, reclining himself upon the front of the bar. I tried to speak to him, but could not—and my heart sickened, as his lustreless eye caught the expression of mine, while the officers of justice gathered around to remove him to his solitary and cheerless cell.

I never saw him but once afterwards. It was the day before his execution. The scene was so novel and affecting as entirely to overpower me. I knew not what to say. The circumstances around me were too solemn to admit of any thing like the gratification of mere curiosity, and I was too much overcome to attempt the language of consolation. After a few moments’ pause, I rose to depart. He followed me towards the door, as far as the chain by which he was bound to the floor would allow, and his voice faltered as he pressed me warmly by the hand, and implored me to receive the last blessing of a dying man.

AN ESSAY ON FLIRTATION.—BY A FINISHED FLIRT.

O! heavy lightness! serious vanity!
Mishapen chaos of well-bearing forms!
Feather of lead, bright smoke, cold fire, sick health,
Still-waking sleep.”

I BELIEVE in love—in devoted, enduring, inextinguishable love: I believe in attachments which know no variation, except from hope to despondency: I believe in tenderness, unintermitted through years of trial—in truth, unbroken through years of temptation; I believe, in short, in affection which, though circumstance may diminish, time itself can never subdue! But, happily for human nature in general, such melancholy passions can exist in only a few, a very few minds. The mass of men are but little acted upon by those subtle influences which the philosophic Dane tells us,

“Lead the will to desperate undertakings
As oft as any passion under heaven
That does afflict our natures.”

While the exception to the general laws of mortality, those who “Love in vain, strive against hope—

Yet, in this capacious and intemperate sieve
Do still pour in the waters of their love,
And lack not to lose still!”

the perverse fidelity of these gentlemen, I say, arises from a kind of constitutional constancy, an hereditary madness, which one inherits, as Cassius did, “the rash humor which his mother gave him.” Such love, and such lovers—uniform, tedious, and pertinacious—are to be excluded from polished society; they belong to lumbering quartos, and semi-barbarous ages; and are now as much out of place as would be Sir Philip Sidney’s Arcadia in a modern lady’s boudoir, or a man-at-arms of the fourteenth century dancing the German cotillion. But flirtation—delightful flirtation!—gay, buoyant, and versatile—thou art the cement and the soul of society, at once uniting the most incongruous characters with thy caprices, and inspiring the most sluggish natures with thy piquancy! Fresh from the mint of selfish vanity, thou art stamped with the impress of true feeling—and all may coin, and all may circulate thee, yet be not nearer “bankrupts of the heart.” Like the thoughts of genius, thou rovest unfettered through every realm of whim or fancy; and, with the bee, thou gatherest thy hoards of enjoyment alike from sweet or bitter sources—the gaiety of intoxicated vanity or the gloom of wounded pride! Sentiment and satire are equally tributaries to thine empire of sensation; and subtle wit and morbid feeling but minister to thy greatness! Thou art, in fine, the kingdom and the sceptre of woman’s authority; the vantage ground where man never intrudes but to become a captive; the bauble which he never attempts to play with without being subjected to its power.

Oh! how my woman’s pen could dilate upon this subject!—not to mention the thousand shades into which, like a changeable silk, it runs; how fondly could I dwell upon “the sentimental;” how gaily upon “the romping,” and how profoundly upon “the metaphysical flirtation!” But here I have not room for even the passages in illustration, which throng upon my memory. The twilight whispering by the open window of a summer evening, or the clearer, deeper tones upon an autumn walk by moonlight; the laugh, the glance, the restless motions in the ball-room, with the accidental and startling touch of ungloved hands; the —

“I’ll see no more!” Yes! a ball-room, though the least appreciated, is decidedly the best field of all others for a flirtation; not but that a drive in a gig, a winter’s work-table, or a rural walk, have each their peculiar advantages, and that, either, with particular individuals, might be preferable for the scene of action; but, in a chance affair, the gig may be dangerous, unless you are a good tactician, and know your enemy; the charm of the conflict, too, is in some measure destroyed by being thus forced into action. Again, by a winter’s fire-side, there is danger of interruption from mamma, or some uncouth brother who has the barbarity to ask you to mend his glove! In “the rural walk,” your gentleman may become too pastoral; or, indeed, you may really feel a little sentimental yourself, and let something escape from you it may be inconvenient to recollect afterwards! In a ball-room, now, one is not subjected to any of those disagreeable annoyances. You stand any where you please—no one looks at you—for all whom one cares about are similarly engaged. If your cavalier is not sufficiently alert in his feelings, you have only to pique them into vivacity, by praising his handsome friend, who he knows is engaged to you the next cotillion. If his sensibilities are too much excited, and his animation begins to aggravate into heroics, you can pass him on to your sentimental cousin, who keeps an album, and likes Byronism. In short, you have here every facility for your operations; and every resource in case of failure; for, even if the subject of them is stupid, inert, or otherwise impracticable, is there not some man who loves you to idolatry—some dark-haired, pale-faced Werter of a fellow—for these, as all women know, are the only lovers that really feel. Is there not, I say, one who loves you to distraction, watching the progress of your complaisance toward another the while; the seething of whose brain in “shaping fantasies” is delicious even in thought? The master of nature tells us that

“As in the sweetest bud
The eating canker dwells, so eating love
Inhabits in the finest wits of all;”

and what pleasure can be greater than overwhelming a man of sense with confusion and dismay, by tenting his feelings to the quick, and thus discovering to himself the extent of his weakness and your power? Do not think, beautiful reader, who lingerest upon these idle words a moment, do not think that I would libel our sex by acknowledging, even impliedly, the frivolity and heartlessness which men, austere or flippant themselves, would at times ascribe to us. I am speaking of woman in a state of warfare, as Byron calls a state of love; and why should I not dwell with rapture on her keenest triumphs, as well as on her lighter successes over the enemy? Why pause to lament the perverted powers of minds, which, however noble, must originally have been in some way radically wrong, to be unstrung by our coldness or levity—and this, too, when there may be none such among the many whose vanity is made to minister to ours? Why should men of sense claim greater consideration for their feelings than fops and fools, whose attentions contribute so much more to our amusements; especially when, while the latter evince their emotions with that delicacy and elegance which the weakest may acquire from continual contact with the best society; the former betray theirs sometimes as irksome appeals to sympathy, and again as irresistible provocatives to derision? If we regret that the other sex know so little of us, we have a right to feel indignant that they do not take pains to know more. But wherein is the great difference between us, that the world have been so long harping upon? Women do not, indeed, entertain a sentiment or an emotion of any kind as steadily as men do; for the vivacity of our natures will not admit of that; but our susceptibilities are quicker, and far more amiable in their complexion. I never saw a man in love in my life, who, however well-bred, was not morose; and, however good-tempered, sullen at times. Indeed Rochefoucault, whom we will allow to speak for his sex, though not for ours, says that love is nearly allied to hate; and any woman who has amused herself with observing a man struggling to subdue a misplaced attachment, must know that the peculiarities of his manner might be mistaken for the manifestation of either. Dear fellows, how they must fret in their fetters, when even the gallant and accomplished Raleigh is led to exclaim—

“If love be life, I long to die:
Love they that list for me;
And he that gains the most thereby,
A fool at least shall be.
But he that feels the sorest fits,
’Scapes with no less than loss of wits.”

But I have rambled from the fairy ground of flirtation to the wizard haunts of love, and the sombre dullness of these last passages must be attributed to the wayward genius that for a moment mastered this little crow-quill. But now I breathe again, like the forester in Der Freischütz, when emerging from the den of the wood demon. If such are the sullen influences in ideality of the fiend whose power men mock by painting him as an infant, how fortunate are we in living, when the reality is unknown. I declare I never can see those lines of that saucy Etheridge without shrinking with apprehension, though I will not believe that there is a word of truth in them.

“Ladies, though to your conquering eyes
Love owes its chiefest victories,
And borrows those bright arms from you,
With which he does the world subdue,
Yet you yourselves are not above
The empire nor the griefs of love.
Then rack not lovers with disdain,
Lest love on you revenge their pain:
You are not free because you’re fair—
The boy did not his mother spare—
Though beauty be a killing dart,
It is no armor for the heart.”

THE YOUNG DUKE OF BORDEAUX.

The Paris papers lose no opportunity of impressing upon the minds of the citizens the impolicy of putting their "trust in princes." It is true the "Carlists," the adherents of Charles X. occasionally circulate pleasant anecdotes, illustrative of the strong attachment which the batch of banished monarchs still entertain for their own beautiful France, and occasionally tell what fine things the young Duc de Bordeaux, Henry V., utters in behalf of his far away kingdom; but we suspect little benefit results from the gossip, if such articles have circulation in Paris as the following, which we translate from the Courrier des Etats Unis, into which it was copied from a Paris paper.—U. S. Gazette.

A SMART SAYING OF THE DUC DE BORDEAUX.

The Quotodienne tells a most affecting anecdote, with tenderness enough to draw tears from the eyes of every one of its subscribers.

The three kings, father, son, and grandson; support, as well as possible, the sorrows of their exile. The father goes a gunning, the son sits and twirls his thumbs, and the grandson reads Telemachus, in order to learn how to govern his absent people.

Madame Gontaut was going to give a ball at her house; Henry V., the king in partibus, with his sister, and several other children of their own age, expected to pass a pleasant evening. His little majesty had been promised some dances, cakes, and sugar-plums; but, unluckily, Madame Gontaut struck upon a new idea relative to the troubles in Lyons.

She called the little king. "Sire," said she to him, "if you will be very good now, you shall have the little hobby-horse that you asked me for yesterday."

Children have a curious idea, that to be a "good boy" means to deprive one's-self of pleasure. The king made some slight objections, tempered, however, with a hope of getting the hobby-horse. The little horse, it must be confessed, was a very beautiful affair; it was a dapple gray, with a long mane and a tail of real horse hair, with pretty brass castors to its feet; a leather bridle, red velvet saddle, and pretty stirrups.

"And besides that," said Madame Gontaut, "you shall have some sweetmeats with your supper."

The king smiled. "The hobby-horse and sweetmeats too?" said he.

"Yes, but then you must remember to be a good boy."

"Well, then, I suppose you are going to set me up in the great arm chair, and make me hear how they talk at court."

"No; there is nothing to be done but to retain a word or two at once, before the Duc de Guiche, and the other persons round your grandfather. I will announce to you that my ball must be put off, because of the misfortunes of France, consequent upon the troubles in Lyons."

"Ha, ha, ha."

"Your majesty is scarcely right. Then you will whisper to me, but loud enough for all the company to hear—'my dear nurse, and I am not allowed to be there.'"

"What is that for?"

"Because."

"I shall never be able to remember all that."

"Yes you will; repeat after me—'My dear nurse.'"

"My dear nurse."

"And I am not allowed to be there."

"And I am not allowed to be there."

"Admirable: Your majesty—"

"Admirable. Your—"

"You must not repeat that—but hush, here come the Duc de Guiche and the other courtiers."

And when all the company had entered, Madame Gontaut went up to the little legitimate monarch, and said, "Sire, France is suffering; we shall have no ball this evening."

The king put his mouth close to Madame Gontaut's ear, and said, "My dear nurse, I can't remember one word of it."

"O, son of Henry the Fourth. O noble scion of an immortal race. Happy people! Happy France! Would your grace believe, that his majesty has just said to me, with the most touching expression of tenderness, 'my dear nurse, and I am not allowed to be there.'"

"Happy France," they all exclaimed; "the young king groans for the sufferings of his people, and the tears of his country fall upon his heart."

"Dear nurse," said the king, "now give me the pretty hobby-horse, and don't forget the sweetmeats for supper."

A LITERARY BUTCHER.

The London police reports are sometimes more interesting than any fiction, and possess an additional value as pages torn from the book of actual reality. We met the following morceau in a late paper, and appropriate it as having claims to our attention from the literary elegance of the epistle of Mr. Woodward.

A little man, named Woodward, indicted a tall man, named Jack Goddard, for having assaulted him in the performance of his duty as a ticket-porter, the defendant not being one of the fraternity, and, therefore, not qualified to load a cart with beef in Newgate-market.

Evidence was called to prove that the defendant and other unprivileged persons were loading a cart with meat, while the prosecutor was unemployed. It was stated that when the prosecutor interfered, the defendant seized him, shook him violently, and prevented him from performing the work to which his privilege entitled him.

Mr. Alley, for the defence, read the following letter, which the prosecutor had, he said, transmitted to the defendant's master, and which was calculated to show the animus with which the prosecution was undertaken, at the same time that it afforded a specimen of the literary powers of the butchers of Newgate-market.

"SIR—I shall esteem it as a very particular favor, if you would persuade your man (Goddard) not to persevere to insult me on the king's highway. It will save a deal of trouble and combustion with him; I want no altercations with him. It will be quite time enough next December sessions, when we'll have 'the tug of war.' I fear not, Sir, all the united efforts and conglomerations of the whole body of innholders. I will do now what I have never done before—I will expose to all the country people how and in what way their meat is detained and taxed by you innholders, to the ruin of the public in general. Yes, I will make it as clear as the sun in his meridian splendor. You innholders shall have such a rocket of truth against you, that shall shake the very foundation of all your Guy Fawkes sort of a secret plot and conspiracy. (Loud laughter.) My simple memorial defeated the innholders' memorial, which I proved to be an issue of gross and wicked falsehoods. Since 1819 I watched every dreadful movement; and my pen shall not cease until the public are in possession of all the facts involving the contention between you and me; and I possess those documents as shall paralyze your standing army against me. (Laughter.) If you are a freeman, recollect you have deliberately sworn in the chamber to support all the ancient customs and privileges of the city; and if any man will violate an oath when in a court of justice, what will he not do? But, however, you know as well as me, that there's a time when a man would do any thing for the love of money; but, believe me, single-handed industry shall give such a convulsive shock to the whole of this nefarious system that shall, like the 'baseless fabric of a vision, leave not a wreck behind.' (Great laughter.) The Guildhall—the Guildhall shall be my ground! Truth and Perseverance my seconds, Fortitude my bottle-holder, Patience my time-keeper, and justice the umpire. I am, sir, your undaunted

ROBERT WOODWARD,

"Ticket-porter, teacher of geography and astronomy, the use of the globes mathematically, and butcher." (Excessive laughter.)

The recorder asked Mr. Alley whether he wished the letter to be entered upon the record? It appeared to be well deserving of such a distinction.

Mr. Alley said that he would be content with an acquittal for his client. He had promised the document to the secretary of the British Museum.

Witnesses then stated that the dispute was commenced by the prosecutor and other ticket porters, and the defendant was acquitted.

NATURAL HISTORY.

THE POISONED VALLEY.

A SINGULAR discovery has lately been made near Batten, in Java, of a poisoned valley. Mr. Alexander Loudon visited it last July, and we extract a paragraph from a communication on the subject, addressed by him to the Royal Geographical Society.

"It is known by the name of Guevo Upas, or Poisoned Valley; and, following a path which had been made for the purpose, the party shortly reached it with a couple of dogs and some fowls, for the purpose of making experiments. On arriving at the mountain, the party dismounted, and scrambled up the side of a hill, a distance of a quarter of a mile, with the assistance of the branches of trees and projecting roots.—When a few yards from the valley, a strong nauseous and suffocating smell was experienced; but on approaching the margin, this inconvenience was no longer found.—The valley is about half a mile in circumference, of an oval shape, and about thirty feet in depth. The bottom of it appeared to be flat, without any vegetation, and a few large stones scattered here and there. Skeletons of human beings, tigers, boars, deer, and all sorts of birds and wild animals, lay about in profusion. The ground on which they lay at the bottom of the valley appeared to be a hard sandy substance, and no vapor was perceived. The sides were covered with vegetation. It was now proposed to enter it, and each of the party having lit a cigar, managed to get within twenty feet of the bottom, where a sickening nauseous smell was experienced, without any difficulty of breathing. A dog was now fastened at the end of a bamboo and thrust to the bottom of the valley, while some of the party, with their watches in their hands, observed the effects. At the expiration of fourteen seconds the dog fell off his legs, without moving or looking round, and continued alive only eighteen minutes. The other dog now left the party and went to his companion; on reaching him he was observed to stand quite motionless, and at the end of ten seconds fell down; he never moved his limbs after, and lived only seven minutes. A fowl was now thrown in, which died in a minute and a quarter, and another which was thrown after it, died in the space of a minute and a half. A heavy shower of rain fell during the time that these experiments were going forward, which, from the interesting nature of the experiments, was quite disregarded. On the opposite side of the valley to that which was visited, lay a human skeleton, the head resting on the right arm. The effects of the weather had bleached the bones as white as ivory. This was probably the remains of some wretched rebel hunted towards the valley and taking shelter there unconscious of its character."

While we are on the subject of discoveries, we must not omit the mention of a strange fossil forest, found near Rome by a pedestrian tourist, Dr. Weatherhead. An article in the January number of the Edinburgh New Philosophical Journal of the Sciences represents it as being forty feet in thickness, and extending for several miles along the banks of the Tiber, close to Rome. The petrific matter is a calc-sinter, and from the layers of ligneous debris being freely intermixed with volcanic dust, the discoverer of this interesting circumstance thinks there can be little doubt but that this colossal phenomenon was occasioned by an earthquake, of which the memory is lost—probably long prior to the foundation of Rome. It is singular that so curious a fact in volcanic geology should have escaped observation for so many ages.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

A LEAF FROM THE JOURNAL OF A STUDENT AT LAW.

JANUARY 15, 1832.—I will write, I think, something for myself, that may please me, if I save it, and my life, twenty years hence. I think fast enough, but have been waiting for courage to turn away from a good fire. I wonder if I am honest?—No, not if—I wonder whether I am honest, or not? Wonder, do I?—I need not. This afternoon, Sunday, a man came to me to get some conveyancing done. I told him I would do it, so that he should have his papers at nine o'clock this evening. He wanted an assignment of a part of his property—goods in his store, and goods which he had consigned to an auctioneer—to two of his creditors, in which there should be an agreement that he should become the agent of his assignees to sell the goods. At it I go. On getting to the office, where I expected to find a bill in equity, which I had made a week or two before, and which contained a regular, a fair assignment of all the debtor's property, for the benefit of all his creditors who should become parties thereto in a certain time—the said bill in equity was not there; it was in court. What was to be done? In "Oliver's Conveyancing" I could find no form to suit my particular case. There was the form of "an assignment in trust for creditors, with various covenants, which were inserted, according to circumstances," which led me to guess there might have been just such assignments made as the one which I wanted to make. Accordingly, I drew up an indenture of two parts—the form says, "this indenture of three parts," tripartite—and put in a covenant about the debtor's becoming the agents of the assignees, and put on some seals! But what a wretched thing! how wretchedly I felt! I had led the man to suppose, by questions I put to him, that I knew all about assignments. A jackass knows as much. All that was covenanted in my assignment was, that they the two creditors, were to take the property as assignees, and the debtor was to become their agent, to sell the same to the best advantage for the assignees, and to devote the proceeds of such sale to the liquidation of his debt to them. Of course, though I know nothing about the circumstances of any of the parties, such a transaction is fraudulent—a partial, illegal assignment, and won't hold. I wish the d— I had them, as I have often done before—as I do every day. I lied to get out of the scrape. I did up my assignment of "two parties" and its fellow. I had somehow stumbled upon the fact, that all the parties to an instrument of the writ must have a copy of it, and wrote a note to the debtor man, telling him a downright lie—that when I agreed to do his business, I expected the assistance of a gentleman whom I could not find, and frankly owning that I did not know whether there was any thing legal about the assignment which I had made him, or not. This packet I left at my boarding-house, where he was to call at nine o'clock for his papers. You see I had not the courage to face him. Another lie I also told him in the note, viz. that I had been looking after him to explain the affair! This is what I mean by my "honesty." I am a liar and a coward; for I came back to my office, built a fire, locked the door, and have been here ever since. It is now nearly eleven. I had some thoughts of staying here all night, and sleeping on chairs. To-morrow, when the citizen comes for an explanation, I shall confirm all the lies I have told him, and, probably, tell him several more. It is a rainy, drizzly night. I have been sitting here, with strange thoughts, warming my feet. What is the use of trying to embody such thoughts?

Eleven o'clock.—I have concluded to remain here all night. I've put on some coal, and fastened my door, and shall be on three chairs in three minutes. God be with me through the watches of the night! How dare I call on him, whom I used to pray to in love and humbleness, on the wet pillow of my boyhood? How cold and hard my heart has grown! It was always an insincere one, and desperately wicked. That I knew—always knew—know it now. Why do I not mend it?—why not probe it?—What good is in knowing myself to be bad, unless I repent? Good—why, the more I know, the more have I to answer for. How people try to deceive themselves!—how we create mole-hills into mountains, and vice versa, to suit our inclinations, our vanity, our sinful desires! Do I believe the Bible? Do I believe the Christian religion? The delirious and divine desire to know, is always goading me on. My fire burns cheerfully—I should be afraid if it didn't; and I am weary. I suspect I shall go home to bed yet.

Next day.—I did remain here, and slept considerably, on three chairs, though not enough to prevent my keeping a brisk fire all night. It was a glorious night! I heard the storm scold without, with a delight I have not felt since I was a child, when I used to lie and listen for hours, in a cockloft, to the pattering of the rain. Delicious music it was! And I was so warm and comfortable in my snug room, reclining, as I said before, on three chairs, with the cushion of one for a pillow—my feet towards a glowing Schuylkill fire. There is a good deal in keeping the feet warm, I do believe. It is delightful to feel the heat creeping along up to the very heart, and then making the glad blood follow it back again. Before I laid down, I felt an indefinable fear of something, being alone, in a large court-house, with a dozen rooms; but when the blood began to circulate freely, I never felt more tranquil and happy in my life. The "perilous stuff" left my bosom, and a kind presence filled it. I found the earth, when I turned over in the morning, covered with snow.

CONTENT AND PLEASURE.

A FABLE.

There was a soft flower. It bloomed in the midst of a wood. Nothing could exceed its delicacy, its brightness, its grace, and loveliness. The surrounding air was loaded with its breath. In its half closed leaves was a spell of such potency, that every other flower in its presence appeared dim. Its name was Pleasure.

Whoever passed by the beautiful acclivity where it grew, wanted to pluck it. Unfortunately, however, it was only to be found on a place difficult of access, and was surrounded with various kinds of briars and thorns. Still, however, it was the delight of every eye, and the wish of every heart.

On the road side, which wound along by the bank where Pleasure bloomed so brightly, there grew in some profusion a plant of a very inferior kind; at least so it appeared when any one looked on it, which happened very seldom; for it was so plain in its colors, so humble in its attitude, so lowly and unpresuming, that it was generally quite disregarded; or, if seen accidentally by those in pursuit of Pleasure, was trampled down as something worthless. Here and there might be found one passenger, who, after gazing a while on Pleasure, and on the violent exertions made by the crowd to procure it, shook his head, picked the little floweret at his feet, kissed it, and put it in his bosom. The name of this plant was Content.

But however inferior it might be to Pleasure in beauty, it certainly had one advantage over its brilliant rival. The former was rarely found in any quantity. The road to it was most frequently troublesome and dangerous, and its buds too, were often also almost beyond the reach, and so singularly small and fragile that the very airs of summer blew off the downy blossoms and wilted the delicate leaves. The latter, on the contrary, was a hardy plant, and burst up every where in a lavish abundance. The road was lined with it. Sometimes it shot forth with vigor even in the very path, peeping up from the hard trodden ground and between the stones scattered around. About the bases of rocks and the twisted roots of old trees it lay in masses, and away in under the shade of still summer places, where the traveler in his haste would scarcely ever dream of looking, it might be seen unfolding its cheerful buds, and pushing out fearlessly with a right fresh and merry aspect.

When storms arose, Pleasure always suffered. It shrunk up like a sensitive-plant; and when the wind and rain passed away, the green bank was sure to be scattered all over with fragments of blossoms and broken leaves. Poor Pleasure! If summer breezes disturbed and ruined it, how could it be expected to stand the fierce tempest, the scorching heat, the bitter cold, and all changes of season which come so suddenly and certainly over this world? Even in its calmest moments Pleasure drooped secretly with the thought that its beauty was brief, and its very life precarious. Every whisper among the leaves of the trees alarmed it—every rolling cloud in heaven struck a damp and a shadow upon its radiance.

But all this while Content was perfectly free and satisfied, and cared almost as little for the changes of the season as if it were immortal. There was about it an enduring hardihood, which defied the storm. The long hot droughts of summer, which burnt up the tender charms of Pleasure, had no material effect upon the leaves of Content, and when the frightful thunder-shower arose, and the large heavy drops came splashing and dashing down, and drenched nature in one universal flood, Content peeped out, as the deluge subsided, with a refreshed and gay beauty, which almost equalled that of Pleasure, in its best moments.

A youth came by one day, and as was the case with all who passed the spot, was struck with the sight of Pleasure, and resolved to obtain it. On so doing, he trod upon Content, but the voice of the crushed flower was unheard in his eagerness to advance. When men are hastening, with wild hope, in the pursuit of their desires, they are deaf to a thousand low sweet tones of nature, which, on their retreat, after disappointment and danger, and anguish, and, perhaps, despair, sound in their ears with an irresistible power. In a short time the youth came back, wearied, faint, and bleeding with wounds received from the briars. He was one of those wild, reckless children of passion, with which the world abounds, and who waste energies and courage in idle and pernicious enterprises, which, if applied to more noble purposes, would make them virtuous and happy.

He had plucked the flower, but it was broken and soiled; already its vivid tinges were fading away, and its luscious perfume grew fainter every moment. He soon discovered also, to his amazement and horror, that though it was so fair and lovely, his wounds smarted at its touch, and the scent which he had at first inhaled with a violent delight, took the strength from his limbs and the courage from his heart—made his eyes languid, his resolution weak, and his intellect dim and heavy. As he rested on a rude bank, far below the spot ornamented by the deceitful plant which had caused him so much trouble, the fine flower which had still then escaped his observation, uncurled its scented leaves, and glowing with a beauty which grew more palpable the more closely it was examined, thus addressed the tired and despondent boy:

"I called to you, fair youth, as you were mounting yonder steep so hastily, and told you to beware, but you, like all your race, paid no attention to my warning. Indeed, I doubt whether you even heard it. I am, however, not very sorry for your sake that you have had a little experience, since it will induce you to rest a moment, and listen while I confide to you a secret which you do not appear to understand. You must know then, that the plant up yonder, specious as it is, has ruined more people here in my very sight, than there are leaves in that forest. It not only attacks them with pain, but it inflames them with guilty hopes and reckless passions. It is a poison. I am a medicine. If I cannot cure, I can impart strength, which will enable you to sustain all sorrow. I am to be found everywhere. Nature has given me to her children, with a liberal hand; if they choose but to seize me, instead of trampling me beneath their feet, in search of more gaudy, but more worthless objects. I am full of the spirit of goodness: though I am seldom cultivated in the gardens of the great, I spring up, unbidden, around the feet of the tired traveler, and by the threshold of the poor man's cottage, and it is their own fault if they do not discover my value."

THE DRAMA.

THE NEW-YORK STAGE.

MASANIELLO has been represented at the Park with a new cast—Miss Hughes, Elvira—Mrs. Hackett, Alphonso. They were both well received. Yet we doubt whether the change has produced an effect commensurate to the expectations of the public. As sincere friends to Miss Hughes, we regretted the introduction of a hacknied ballad by Lee as a substitute for the beautiful duet of Mercandanti. On the second night, however, a more classical song was sung in place of the ballad. The practice of foisting the pieces of inferior artists into the works of such masters as Rossini and Auber cannot be too highly deprecated. For the character of the establishment we wish, on such subjects, that a more judicious taste could be consulted. If it does not yet exist in the public it may be created. Expectation is greatly excited touching the forthcoming opera of "La Dame Blanche." We learn that it cannot fail to dazzle all lovers of opera. It is under the most competent direction.

RICHMOND-HILL.—Mrs. Duff, Mrs. Anderson, and several other attractive performers are at this house. Mr. Russell is multiplying his claims upon our attention. We would suggest that one or two of the subordinate actors should be dismissed and replaced by better ones. With a slight additional expense the best plays might be performed here in a manner to gratify any audience.

THEATRICAL ITEMS.—Mr. Sinclair has made a hit in Boston. It is said that a large and elegant theatre is to be erected in Broadway, north of Chambers-street. Persons desirous of information are referred to Mr. Russell, the manager of the Richmond-hill.

Eugene Aram has been dramatized by a gentleman of this city. Mr. Hackett is very successful in Charleston.

Mr. Forrest, Clara Fisher, and young Kean are delighting the lovers of good acting at the south.

The Bostonians appear astonished at Cinderella. They have filled the theatre every night of its representation, and on one occasion a crowd besieged the box-office for seats early in the morning.

The Bowery theatre will re-open on Monday next, and Mr. Hamblin pledges himself to produce "a company equal, if not superior to any in this country." He also promises a selection of Shakspeare's plays cast in the most efficient manner.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Lake Poetry.—A well written and very gentlemanly communication has been received respecting an article in the last number of the American Quarterly, on the subject of the Lake school of poetry. We regret that our views on this matter prevent its appearance. Criticism in this country is as yet, we fear, in its infancy. It does not act on any philosophical principle, but too often from caprice, ignorance, or personal enmity or friendship. It always goes too far, or not far enough. It is seldom dispassionate. It contains nothing of moderation. Its object is not to instruct authors—not to form public taste—but to manufacture articles—to make readers laugh or admire—to display the critics' own prowess, wit or learning. This is by no means always the case, but it is so too frequently. For our own part, we have been very quiet under numerous attacks from sources which we did not deem worthy of notice, because those attacks were clearly not written in the spirit of candor and justice, without which a critic is only a black-guard in print. On such occasions we are sure the public will decide properly.

A man in this country cannot be written down. Our able pens are employed upon nobler undertakings. The people are too universally enlightened. The critic himself would fall by the criticism of each individual reader. It is as base a slander for a reviewer to state that any writer is contemptible, without proving him to be so, as it is for a citizen to say his neighbour is a thief, without being able to adduce the proper evidence of the fact; and so the public will determine. Therefore, our correspondent is informed, we decline making this paper the arena of any discussion or angry quarrel, which, from the character of our opponents could not have justice for its object, or be conducted according to the rules of common courtesy. Silence is the best reply. The writings, both of Mr. Bryant and Mr. Willis, can take care of themselves. The former gentleman, who is attacked in the Quarterly with a virulence savouring something of political malice, is present, and can take the measure of his antagonist whenever he pleases. Mr. Willis, who most likely is getting paid off now, for having in former times laid the lash on the shoulders of the critic, is luckily (or unluckily, we scarcely know which) absent. His compositions speak for themselves. The article on the Lake school of poetry could never have been written by the enlightened editor of the Quarterly, whom we respect sincerely; and the only wonder is, how it found its way into that excellent journal. We are told the critic is a disappointed brother poet. We believe it. He has that air, and writes as if smarting under some keenly unpleasant recollection which urges him on till his censure curdles into a rankling hate. The critic will learn that there is no surer method of awakening public feeling in favor of any man than a deliberate and palpable effort to oppress and trample him down.

Salmagundi.—In a late notice of Washington Irving, we stated that the papers for Salmagundi were written by a circle of literary gentlemen. It struck us that a closer inquiry into this subject would not be uninteresting; and we have, accordingly, ascertained precisely the authors of that popular publication, a point, by the way, which has been the subject of many contradictory opinions. All the poetry, and two of the prose articles, were from the hand of William Irving; the rest were furnished, in about equal parts, by Washington Irving and J. K. Paulding. A correspondent asserts that Dr. Peter Irving was a contributor. This idea has no foundation whatever in truth. We trust "Mustapha Rub-a-dub" will take this as a satisfactory reply to his interrogation.

Newark Daily Advertiser.—It is a singular fact, that scarcely any attempt has hitherto been made in the state of New-Jersey to establish a daily paper. This surprises us, considering the population of many of its cities and towns, and the importance of such an establishment. Newark is the largest town in New-Jersey, and the eighteenth in the United States, and contains about eleven thousand inhabitants. No American town with such a population should be without a daily journal; and we hope the time is not far distant when this will be the case. A small folio sheet, neatly printed, entitled the "Daily Advertiser," has been commenced in Newark, by George Bush & Co. which, no doubt, will be liberally supported.

England.—The population returns of Great Britain have been recently printed by order of parliament. "The whole population of England," says the report, "is thirteen millions twenty-nine thousand three hundred and eighty-eight." There is something rather precise about the eighty-eight.

Female politics.—A meeting has been called at Manchester, of independent free English women, to discuss the best means of uniting with the political union of the working classes, in furthering the objects of reform!

Unread books and communications.—We solicit the indulgence of publishers and authors for postponing the notice of several volumes, which we have not as yet had time to examine. A number of articles are also lying before us which we shall use our earliest leisure in perusing. One or two private letters from correspondents also, touching upon these points, we have read with some regret. Our friends must be aware that we cannot at once run through all the manuscripts—read all the books—attend all the theatres—examine all the paintings and exhibitions—do our own scribblings—pursue our own studies, &c. &c. without finding ourselves occasionally a little at a loss in what way to occupy our time most advantageously. To correspondents, even when we decline their pieces, we are always sincerely grateful, and we have no idea of offering them any neglect. One or two who have lately hinted civilly something that way, will oblige us by receiving these assurances as an apology for every apparent negligence on our part than which, we repeat, nothing could be farther from our intention.

Portrait of Washington Irving.—Application having been made for extra copies of this engraving, for framing, a number have been struck off on large paper, and may be had at this office.

Cholera Morbus.—Dr. Charles Mifflin, of Philadelphia, has written from abroad a treatise on the cholera, calculated to allay alarm respecting its progress to this country. A rumor has been in circulation, but is contradicted, that this scourge had appeared at Mobile.

Novel writers.—It is said that Carey and Lea pay Cooper five thousand dollars for each one of his novels.

Sociable.—A paper at Saco, Maine, mentions the following marriage: On Christmas Eve, the Rev. Wm. Jenkins married Theophilus, Richard, Thomas, Titus, Jonathan, Ebenezer, and John Hutcheson—to Misses Martha, Eliza, Sarah Ann, Mary, Judith, Virginia, and Peggy Wells. This is wedded bliss by wholesale!

Commissioner for Georgia.—The governor of Georgia has appointed Thomas Jefferson Smith, counsellor of this city, commissioner to take acknowledgment of deeds for the state of Georgia. Mr. Smith holds the same office for the state of Pennsylvania.

On examining our books, we find that a few subscribers are yet in arrears. The number, it is true, is small; but, nevertheless, may not be overlooked. To most, bills have been sent; and we respectfully request, that all indebted will be kind enough to cancel our very moderate claims, without further notice.

HERE'S A HEALTH TO THEE, MARY.

A BALLAD—SUNG BY MR. BROADHURST, IN THE FARCE OF JONATHAN IN ENGLAND, AT THE ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE—MUSIC BY G. B. HERBERT—WORDS BY BARRY CORNWALL.

Moderately slow.

Here's a health to thee, Ma-ry, here's a health to thee, My gay friends are gone, and I am a-lone, To think of home and thee, Ma-ry, to think of home and thee. There are some who may shine o'er thee, Ma-ry, And ma-ny as frank and free, And a few as fair; But the sum-mer air is not more sweet to me, Ma-ry, is not more sweet to me. I have, &c. [see below.]

2d verse.

I have thought of thy last low sigh, Ma-ry, and thy dimm'd and gen-tle eye: I've call'd on thy name when the night winds came, And heard my heart re- ply, Ma-ry, and heard my heart re- ply.

Second verse.

Be thou but true to me. Ma-ry, and I'll be true to thee, And at set of sun, when my task is done, Be sure that I'm e-ver with thee. Ma-ry, be sure that I'm e-ver with thee.

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

MOODS OF THE MIND.

THERE are moments when misery and happiness seem to meet and change character: the latter becomes oppressive, the former welcome. There are times when hatred pauses to smile, and love to frown. There are periods when every valuable object on earth appears valueless, and all the soul's wishes are fixed on unimportant events. I often experience a stagnation of feeling, which the most sudden and striking accident can scarcely arouse me from. While again, a look goes through me like a dagger, and I start and wonder at common actions. I sometimes wish myself dead; while again, life rises to such a precious and unutterable value, that the thought of parting with it strikes a chill of awful horror and astonishment through all my veins. I would give worlds for the equanimity of some men—but it is all a matter of nerve.

THE TEETH.

Incipient disorders of the teeth are too generally neglected. Every parent should, as an imperative duty, submit his child's mouth to the inspection of a judicious dentist at least twice a year. The amount of trouble and agony suffered from this species of negligence would, doubtless, startle and appal any one who could behold it in the aggregate. Yet what shameful cowards most men are, in this respect. Day after day, month after month slips away, after they discover the inroads of decay, before they can muster resolution to seat themselves in the dentist's chair; and too many procrastinate, till driven by intense anguish to the crisis; and then, instead of the slight operation that would have been originally necessary, are edified with the extraction of two or three, which earlier attention might have preserved.

STATISTICS.

Williams's Register for 1832 contains some interesting statements, from which we derive the following:—There are four millions five hundred thousand bushels of salt annually manufactured in the United States. There are two hundred and fifty-eight newspapers at present published in this state. The only counties without papers are Putnam and Rockland. There are sixty-four papers printed in this city, of which thirty-three are weekly and thirteen daily, making about ten millions six hundred and twenty-eight thousand six hundred sheets annually. The subscriptions of the city papers, exclusive of the advertisements, are estimated at about four hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

An elegant writer observes: "the coin that is most current among mankind is flattery; the only benefit of which is, that by hearing what we are not, we may be instructed in what we ought to be."

What is lighter than a feather? Dust.—What is lighter than dust? Wind.—What lighter than the wind? A coxcomb.—What lighter than a coxcomb? Nothing.

AN HONEST EPITAPH.

Beneath this turf with wild-flowers clad,
A kindly heart reposes;
With many a virtue faults it had—
But "thorns are hid mid roses."

THINGS FOUNDED IN REASON.

The idea of superiority felt by a man in a big steamboat over another in a little steamboat.

The contempt a man who is going the whole route in a stage feels for one who gets in to ride only a few miles.

The dislike a person experiences against a stranger who wears his hat rather to please himself than any body else.

The pride of a gentleman in the boxes at the theatre over one in the pit.

The credit you award to a shopkeeper when he assures you, on his "honor," such an article cost him so much.

The belief of any thing because it has been in the newspapers.

ORIGINAL TALES.

THE MERCHANT AND THE SHEPHERDESS.

A TALE OF THE EAST.

THE discontent which runs through every rank and degree of life, has been deservedly condemned by the philosophers of all ages, as one of the bitterest reproaches to human nature, as well as the highest affront to the divine Author of us all. If, indeed, we look through the whole creation, and remark the progressive scale of beings as they rise into perfection, we shall perceive to our own shame and confusion, that every one seems satisfied with that share of life and pleasure which its Maker has appointed for it, man alone excepted, who is pleased with nothing his bounty imparts, unless blessed with every thing his power can bestow; perpetually repining at the decrees of Providence, and refusing to enjoy what he has, from a ridiculous and never-ceasing desire for what he has not.

The object which is at a distance from us is always the most inviting, and that possession the most valuable which we cannot acquire. With ideas of affluence and grandeur, we are apt to associate those of joy and pleasure, and because riches and power may conduce to our happiness, we hastily conclude that they must do so; that pomp, splendor, and magnificence, which attend the great, are visible to every eye, while the sorrows they feel, and the dangers to which they are obnoxious, escape observation.

Hence it is that almost every condition and circumstance of life is considered preferable to our own; that we often fall in love with ruin, and beg to be unhappy; in short, we weep when we ought to rejoice, and complain when we ought to be thankful.

The following narrative is, by tradition, attributed to Heli Ben Hamet, a moralist of Arabia, who delivered his precepts in public orations.

Dost thou ask for a torch to discover the light of the morning? Dost thou appeal to argument for proofs of divine perfection? Look down to the earth on which thou standest, and lift up thine eyes to the worlds which roll above thee. Thou beholdest splendor, abundance, and beauty. Is not he who produced them, mighty? Thou considerest; is not he who formed thy understanding, wise? Thou enjoyest; is not he who gratifies thy senses, good? Can aught have limited his bounty but his wisdom? or can defects in his prudence be discovered by thine? To Heli, the preacher of humility and resignation, let thine ear be attentive, thou whose heart has rebelled in secret, and whose wish has silently accused thy Maker.

I rose early in the morning to meditate, that I might without presumption be heard. I left my habitation, and turning from the beaten path, I wandered without remarking my way or regarding any object that passed, till the extreme heat of the sun, which now approached the meridian, compelled my attention. The weariness which I had insensibly contracted by the length of my walk, became insupportable; and looking round for shelter, I suddenly perceived that I was not far from the wood in which Rhedi, the hermit, investigates the secrets of nature and ascribes glory to God. The hope of improving my meditation by his wisdom gave me new vigor; I soon reached the wood—I was refreshed by the shade, and walked forward till I arrived at the cell. I entered, but Rhedi was absent. I had not, however, waited long before I discovered him among the trees at some distance, advancing towards me with a person whose appearance was, if possible, yet more venerable than his own, and whom before I had never seen.

When they came near I rose up, and laying my hand upon my lips, I bowed myself with reverence before them. Rhedi saluted me by name, and presented me to his companion, before whom I again bowed myself to the ground. Having looked steadfastly in my countenance, he laid his hand upon my head and blessed me.

"Heli," said he, "those who desire knowledge that they may teach virtue, shall not be disappointed. Sit down. I will relate events which as yet thou knowest but in part, and disclose secrets of Providence, from which thou mayest derive instruction."

We sat down, and I listened as to the counsel of an angel.

Selima, the daughter of Sanbad the shepherd, was drawing water at the wells of Adail, when a caravan which had passed the desert arrived, and the driver of the camels alighted to give them drink. Those which came first to the wells belonged to Nouraddin, the merchant, who had brought fine linen and other merchandise of great value from Egypt. Selima, when the caravan drew near, had covered herself with her veil, which the servant of Nouraddin, to gratify a brutal curiosity, attempted to withdraw.

Selima, provoked by the indignity, and encouraged by the presence of others, struck him with the staff of the bucket; and he was about to retaliate the violence, when Nouraddin, who was himself with the caravan, called out to him to forbear, and immediately hastened to the well. The veil of Selima had fallen off in the struggle, and Nouraddin was captivated by her beauty. The lovely confusion of offended modesty that glowed upon her cheek, the disdain that swelled her bosom, and the resentment that sparkled in her eyes, expressed a consciousness of her sex, which warmed and animated her features. They were graces which he had never hitherto seen, and they produced a tumult in his breast which before he had never felt; for Nouraddin, though he had now great possessions, was yet a youth and a stranger to woman. The merchandise which he was transporting had been purchased by his father, whom the angel of death had interrupted in the journey; and this sudden accession of independence and wealth, did not dispose him to restrain the impetuosity of his nature. He therefore demanded Selima of her parents. His message was received with gratitude and joy; and Nouraddin, after a short stay, carried her with him to Egypt, having first provided for her family, besides punishing, with his own hand, the servant by whom she had been insulted at the well.

But he delayed the solemnities of marriage till the time of mourning for his father should expire; and an affection which he could not suppress, was without much difficulty endured, now its object was in his power. He anticipated the happiness which he believed to be secured, and supposed it would increase by expectation, like a treasure by usury, of which more is still possessed as possession is longer delayed.

During this interval Selima recovered from the tumultuous joy of sudden elevation; her ambition was at an end, and she became susceptible to love. Nouraddin, who regretted the obscurity of her birth, only because it had prevented the cultivation of her mind, labored incessantly to supply the defect. She received his instruction not only with gratitude, but with delight; while he spoke, she gazed upon him with esteem and reverence, and had no wish but to return the happiness which he was impatient to bestow.

At this time Osmin, the caliph, was upon the throne of Egypt. The passions of Osmin, thou knowest, were impetuous as the torrens of Marab, and fatal as the whirlwind of the desert. To excite and to gratify was at once the whole purpose of his mind; but his wish was still unsatisfied, and his life was wretched. His seraglio was filled with beauty, but the power of beauty was exhausted; he became outrageous to revive his spirits by a new union, which he demanded of Nardic, the eunuch, whom he had not only set over his women, but over the whole kingdom. He demanded this with menaces and execrations. The trembling slave, therefore, caused a proclamation to be made, that whosoever produced the most beautiful maiden within two days, should stand in the presence of the caliph, and be deemed the third in the kingdom.

Caled, the servant of Nouraddin, had returned with him into Egypt; the sullen ferocity of his temper was increased by the desire of revenge, and the gloom of discontent was deepened by despair; but, when he heard the proclamation of Nardic, joy kindled in his aspect, like lightning in the darkness of a storm; the offence which he had committed against Selima enabled him to revenge the punishment which it had produced; he knew that her marriage was near. He therefore hastened to the palace, and demanded to be brought before Nardic, who, in the midst of magnificence and servility, the flattery of dependent ambition, and the zeal of unlimited obedience, was sitting pale and silent, his brow contracted with anxiety, and his breast throbbing with apprehension.

When Caled was brought into his presence, he fell prostrate before him.

"By the smile of my lord," said he, "let another be distinguished from the slaves who mingle in obscurity, and let his favor elevate another from the dust, but let my service be accepted, and let the desire of Osmin be satisfied with beauty. Selima will shortly be espoused by Nouraddin; but of Selima the sovereign of Egypt only is worthy. Haste, therefore, to demand her; she is now with him in the house to which I will conduct the messenger of thy will."

Nardic received this intelligence with transports of joy; a mandate was immediately written to Nouraddin; it was sealed with the royal signet, and delivered to Caled, who returned with a force sufficient to compel obedience.

On this day the mourning of Nouraddin for his father had expired; he had changed his apparel and perfumed his person; his features were brightened with the gladness of his heart; he had invited his friends to the festival of his marriage, and the evening was to accomplish his wishes. The evening was also expected by Selima, with a joy which she did not labor to suppress; and she was hiding her blushes in the breast of Nouraddin when Caled arrived with the mandate and the guard.

The domestics were alarmed and terrified; and Nouraddin, being instantly acquainted with the event, rushed out of the apartment of Selima with disorder and trepidation. When he saw Caled he was moved with anger and disdain; but he was intimidated by the appearance of the guard. Caled immediately advanced, and with looks of insolence and triumph presented the mandate; when Nouraddin saw the royal signet he knelt to receive it, and having gazed a moment at the superscription, pressed it upon his forehead in an agony of suspense and terror. The wretch who had betrayed him, enjoyed the anguish he suffered; and perceiving that he was faint, and had not fortitude to read the paper, he acquainted him with the contents: at the name of Selima he started as if he had felt the sting of a scorpion, and immediately fell to the ground.

Caled proceeded to execute his commission without remorse: he was not to be moved by swooning, expostulation, entreaty, or tears; but having conducted Selima to the seraglio, presented her to Nardic, with hope and exultation. Nardic, whose wish was satisfied by her stature and shape, lifted her veil with impatience, timidity and solicitude; but the moment he beheld her face, his doubts were at an end; he prostrated himself before her, as a person on whose pleasures his life would from that moment depend. She was conducted to the chamber of the women, and Caled was the same hour invested with his new dignity; an apartment was assigned him in the palace, and he was made captain of the guard that kept the gates.

Nouraddin, when he recovered his senses, and found that Selima had been conducted to the seraglio, was seized by turns with distraction and stupidity; he passed the night in agitation; by which the powers of nature were exhausted, and in the morning he locked himself in the chamber of Selima, determined to admit no comforter, and to receive no sustenance.

While Nouraddin was thus abandoning himself to despair, Nardic's description of Selima had roused Osmin from his apathy. He commanded that she should be prepared to receive him, and soon after went into her apartment. Familiar as he was with beauty, he could not behold Selima without emotion. He perceived, indeed, that she was in tears, and that his presence covered her with confusion; yet he believed that her sorrows could be easily removed, and that by kindness she might be soothed. But the moment he approached her, she threw herself at his feet, and intreated to be heard, with an importunity which he chose rather to indulge than resist; he, therefore, raised her from the ground, and supporting her in his arms, encouraged her to proceed.

"Let my lord," said she, "dismiss a wretch who is not worthy of his presence, and compassionate the distress which is not susceptible of delight. I am the daughter of a shepherd, and betrothed to the merchant Nouraddin, from whom I have been forced by the perfidy of a slave, and to whom I am united by indissoluble bonds. O! let not the terrors of thy frown be upon me. Shall the sovereign of Europe stoop to a reptile of the dust? Shall the judge of nations retain the worthless theft of treachery and revenge? Or shall he, for whom ten thousand languish, rejoice in the sufferings of one alienated mind?"

Osmin, whose breast had by turns been inflamed by love and indignation while he gazed upon the beauties of Selima, and listened to her voice, now suddenly threw her from him, and departed without reply.

When he was alone the feelings which eloquence had suppressed, soon became again predominant, and he commanded Selima to be told, that if within three hours she did consent to be his, he would cast the head of the slave for whom he had been rejected at her feet.

• The eunuch by whom this message was delivered, and the woman who had returned to Selima when the Caliph retired, were touched with pity at her distress, and trembled at her danger; the evils which they could scarce hope to prevent, they were yet solicitous to delay, and therefore advised her to request three days' preparation, that she might sufficiently recover the tranquillity of her mind to make a just estimate of her own happiness; and with this request, to send, as a pledge of her obedience, a bowl of sherbet, in which a pearl had been dissolved, and of which she had first drank herself.

To this advice she at length consented, and after some throes of desperation, prepared to put it in execution.

At the time when the resolution was taken, Nouraddin suddenly started from a restless slumber; he was again stung by an instantaneous reflection upon his own misery, and indulged the discontent of his mind in this exclamation:

"If wisdom and goodness do indeed preside over the works of Omnipotence, whence are oppression, injustice, and cruelty? As Nouraddin alone has a right to Selima, why is Selima in the power of Osmin? Oh! that now the justice of heaven would appear in my behalf! that from this hour Nouraddin was Osmin, and Osmin Nouraddin!"

The moment he had uttered this wish his chamber was darkened as with a thick cloud, which was at length dissipated with a burst of thunder, and a being, whose appearance was more than human, stood before her.

"Nouraddin," said the vision, "I am of the region above thee; but my business is with the children of the earth. Thou hast wished to be Osmin, and as far as this wish is possible it shall be accomplished: thou shalt be enabled to assume his appearance, and to exercise his power. I know not yet whether I am permitted to conceal Osmin under the appearance of Nouraddin, but till tomorrow he shall not interrupt thee."

Nouraddin, who had been held motionless by astonishment and terror, now recovered his fortitude as in the presence of a friend, and was about to express his gratitude and joy, when the genius bound a talisman on his left arm and acquainted him with its power.

"As often as this bracelet," said he, "shall be applied to the region of thy heart, thou shalt be alternately changed from Nouraddin to Osmin, and from Osmin to Nouraddin."

The genius then suddenly disappeared, and Nouraddin, impatient to recover possession of Selima, instantly applied the bracelet to his breast, and the next moment found himself alone in an apartment in the seraglio.

During this interval the caliph, who was expecting the issue of his message to Selima, became restless and impatient; he quitted his apartments and went into the gardens, where he walked backward and forward with a violent but interrupted pace, and at length stood still, frowning and pensive, with his eyes fixed on the clear surface of a fountain in the middle of the walk. The agitations of his mind continued, and at length broke out in the following soliloquy:

"What is my felicity, and where is my power? I am wretched, by the want of that which the caprice of a woman has bestowed on my slave; I can gratify my revenge, but not my love. I can withhold felicity from him, but cannot procure it to myself. Why have I not the power to assume the form in which I might gratify my wishes? I will at least enjoy them in thought. If I were Nouraddin, I should be clasped with transport to the bosom of Selima."

He then resigned himself to the power of imagination, and was silent; but the moment his wish was uttered, he became subject to the genius, who had just transported Nouraddin to his palace. This wish therefore was instantly fulfilled; and his eyes being still fixed on the water, he perceived, with sudden wonder and delight, that the mirror reflected another image, and that his figure had been changed. His fancy had been warmed by the ideal affection of Selima; the tumult of his mind had been increased by the prodigy; and the gratification of his love being the only object of his attention, he hastened instantly to the palace, without reflecting that as he would not be known, he would be refused admittance. At the door to which he advanced with eagerness and precipitation, he was stopped by a party of the guard, that was now commanded by Caled. A tumult ensued; and Caled being hastily called, believed that Nouraddin had scaled the walls of the gardens to recover Selima, and rejoicing in an opportunity of revenge, instantly stabbed him with his poniard, but at the same time received that of the caliph in his heart. Thus fell at once the tyrant and the traitor; the tyrant by the hand which had been armed to support him in oppression, and the traitor by the fury of the passion which his perfidy had excited.

In the mean time the man who was believed to be slain, reposed in security upon a sofa; and Selima, by the direction of her women, prepared her message and the bowl. They were dispatched to the caliph, and received by Nouraddin. He understood by the message that Selima was yet inviolate; in the joy of his heart he took the bowl, and having emptied it, he returned it to the eunuch, with a command that she should be brought immediately into his presence.

In obedience to this command she was conducted by her women to the door—but she entered alone, pale and trembling; and though her lips were forced into a smile, the characters which grief, dread, and aversion had written on her countenance, were not effaced. Nouraddin, who beheld her disorder, exulted in the fidelity of her love, and springing forward, threw his arms about her in an ecstasy of tenderness and joy, which was still heightened when he perceived that in the character of Osmin these embraces were suffered with reluctance, which in his own were returned with ardor. He therefore, retreating backward a few steps, applied the talisman again to his breast, and having recovered his own form, would have rushed again into her arms, but she started from him in confusion and terror. He smiled at the effect of the prodigy; and sustaining Selima on his bosom, repeated some tender incidents which were known to no other—told her by what means he had intercepted her message, and urged her immediately to escape, that they might possess all their desires in each other, and leave the incumbance of royalty to the wretch whose likeness he had been able to assume, and which he was now impatient to renounce. Selima gazed at him with a fixed attention till her suspicion and doubts were removed; then suddenly turning from him, tore her garments, and looking up to heaven, imprecated curses on her head, till her voice faltered, and she burst into tears.

Of this agony, which Nouraddin beheld with unutterable distress, the broken exclamations of Selima at length acquainted him with the cause.

"In the bowl," said she, "which thou hast intercepted, there was death. I wished, when I took it from my lips, that the draught which remained might be poison. A powder was immediately shaken into it by an invisible hand, and a voice whispered to me that him who drank the potion it would inevitably destroy."

Nouraddin, to whose heart the fatal malignity had now spread, perceived that his dissolution would be sudden: his legs already trembled, and his eyes became dim; he stretched out his arms towards Selima, and his countenance was distorted by an ineffectual effort to speak: impenetrable darkness came upon him; he groaned, and fell backward. In his fall the talisman smote his breast, his form was again changed, and the horrors of death were impressed on the features of Osmin. Selima, who ran to support him, when she perceived the last transformation, rushed out of the apartment with the wild impetuosity of distraction and despair. The seraglio was alarmed in a moment; the body was mistaken for that of Osmin, was examined by the physicians, and the effects of poison were evident. Selima was immediately suspected, and by the command of Shomar, who succeeded his father, she was put to death.

"Such," said the companion of Rhedi, "was the end of Nouraddin and Selima, of Osmin and Caled, from whose destiny I have withdrawn the veil. Let the world consider it and be wise; be thou still the messenger of instruction, and let increase of knowledge clothe thee with humility."

While mine eye was fixed upon the hoary sage who had thus vouchsafed me counsel and knowledge, his countenance became bright as the morning, and his robe fleecy, like unto a cloud; he rose like a vapor from the ground, and the next moment I saw him no more.

I then turned towards Rhedi the hermit, chilled with reverence and dumb with astonishment; but in the countenance of Rhedi was the calm cheerfulness of superior virtue, and I perceived that the sanctity of his life had acquainted him with divine intelligence.

"Hamet," said he, "the voice which thou hast heard is the voice of Zachis, the genius by whose power the wonders which he has related were produced. It is the province of Zachis to punish impatience and presumption by fulfilling the desire of those who wish to interrupt the order of nature, and presume to direct the hand of Providence. Relate what thou hast heard, to preserve others from his power. Now, therefore, let virtue suffer with patience, and vice dread to incur the miseries she would inflict; for by him who repines at the will of heaven, his own portion of good is diminished; and he who presumptuously assumes the sword, will turn the point on his own bosom." LITERARY NOTICES.

MOORE'S NEW POEMS.

Mr. Moore has struck off a new volume of poems at last; a mere trifle, but very pretty. It is entitled the "Summer Fete, a poem, with songs;" and seems to have been received with a satisfaction which this enthusiastic and delightful poet had scarcely a right to expect, after his past successes. There is nothing more difficult to be carried without injury than a very brilliant literary reputation. Mr. Moore, has, however, essayed again, and thereviewers give this a high rank among his other works. The songs interspersed through the light plot are set to melodies, and by the combined attractions of music and poetry, may well hope to win their way to the lips and the heart of every lover of these arts. Here is a gay carol sung by a young girl to her elder sister while engaged in the ceremonies of her toilet:

ARRAY THEE, LOVE.

Array thee, love, array thee, love,
In all thy best array thee;
The sun's below, the moon's above,
And night and bliss obey thee.
Put on thee all that's bright and rare,
The zone, the wreath, the gem,
Not so much gracing charms so fair,
As borrowing grace from them.
Array thee, love, array thee, love,
In all that's bright array thee;
The sun's below, the moon's above,
And night and bliss obey thee.
Put on the plumes thy lover gave,
The plumes that, proudly dancing,
Proclaim to all, where'er they wave,
Victorious eyes advancing.
Bring forth the robe whose hue of heaven
From thee derives such light,
That Iris would give all her seven,
To boast but one so bright.
Array thee love, array thee, love,
In all thy best array thee;
The sun's below, the moon's above,
And night and bliss obey thee.
Now hie thee, love, now hie thee, love,
Through pleasing circles hie thee;
And hearts, wherein thy footsteps move,
Will beat when they come nigh thee.
Thy every word shall be a spell,
Thy every look a ray,
And tracks of wondering eyes shall tell
The glory of thy way!
Now hie thee, love, now hie thee, love,
Through pleasing circles hie thee,
And hearts, wherein thy footsteps move,
Will beat when they come nigh thee.

Here is another song, extremely Mooreish:

THOU COM'ST NOT.

Oh, where art thou dreaming,
On land, or on sea?
In my lattice is gleaming
The watch-light for thee;
And this fond heart is glowing

To welcome thee home,
And the night is fast going,
But thou art not come.
Thou com'st not—no, thou com'st not!
'Tis the time when night-flowers
Should wake from their rest;
'Tis the hour of all hours,
When the lute murmurs best.
But the flowers are half sleeping
Till thy glances they see;
And the hush'd lute is keeping
Its music for thee.

Yet thou com'st not—no, thou com'st not!

After this there is an invitation to purchase in

VANITY FAIR.

Who'll buy? 'tis Folly's shop, who'll buy?
We've toys to suit all ranks and ages;
Beside our usual fools'-supply,
We've lots of playthings, too, for sages—
For reasoners here's a juggler's cup,
That fullest seems when nothing's in it;
And nine pins set, like systems, up,
To be knock'd down the following minute.
Who'll buy? 'tis Folly's shop, who'll buy?
Gay caps we have of foolscap make,
For bards to wear in dog-day weather;
Or bards the bells alone may take,
And leave to wits the cap and feather.
Tetotums we've for patriots got,
Who court the mob with antics humble—
Alike their short and dizzy lot,
A glorious spin—and then—a tumble.
Who'll buy? 'tis Folly's shop, who'll buy?
Here misers may their bones inter
In shrouds of neat post-obit paper:
While, for their heirs, we've quicksilver,
That fast as heart can wish will caper.
For aldermen we've dials true,
That tell no hour but that of dinner;
For courtly parsons sermons new,
That suit alike both saint and sinner.
Who'll buy? 'tis Folly's shop, who'll buy?
No time we've now to name our terms,
But whatso'er the whims that seize you,
This eldest of all mortal firms,
Folly & Co., will try to please you:
Or, should you wish a darker hue
Of gods than we can recommend you,
Why then, as we with lawyers do,
To Knavery's shop next door we'll send you.
Who'll buy? 'tis Folly's shop, who'll buy?

We have room for only one more extract:

BACCHANALIAN SONG.

Some mortals there may be, so wise, or so fine,
As in evenings like this no enjoyment to see:
But, as I'm not particular—wit, love, and wine,
Are for one night's amusement sufficient for me.
Nay, humble and strange as my tastes may appear,
If driv'n to the worst, I could manage, thank heaven,
To put up with eyes such as beam round me here,
And with wine such as this, six days out of seven,
So pledge me a bumper—your sages profound
May be blest, if they will, on their own patent plan:
But as we are not sages—why send the cup round—
We must only be happy the best way we can.
A reward by some king was once offered, we're told,
To those who'd invent a new bliss for mankind:
But talk of new pleasures!—give me but the old,
And I'll leave your inventors all new ones they find.
Or should I, in quest of fresh realms of bliss,
Set sail in the pinnacle of Fancy some day,
Let the rich rosy sea I embark on be this,
And such eyes as we've here be the stars of my way!
In the meantime, a bumper—your angels, on high,
May have pleasures unknown to life's limited span;
But, as we are not angels, why let the flask fly—
We must only be happy all ways that we can.

This volume will probably be republished here soon, when we shall notice it more at length.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

The Messrs. Harper have lately added to their library of select novels Miss Burney's "Evelina," one of the popular romances of the last century.

Carey and Lea are busy as usual. They have just issued two publications: an American octodecimo edition of Lord Mahon's "Life of Belisarius," a work highly praised by the British critics; and in a single octavo, of nearly seven hundred pages, a revised and greatly improved edition of Bourrienne's "Life of Napoleon;" a volume, the interest of which is already well established.

The oration delivered in the Middle Dutch Church, on the late centennial anniversary of Washington's birth-day, by Major-General Morgan Lewis, has been published by G. F. Hopkins and Son. Attached to the discourse is an account of the proceedings, printed by order of the common council. This forms a satisfactory record of a most interesting occasion, and the publishers have issued it in a style of typographical neatness which has, in a marked degree, distinguished their press.

Mr. Dunlap is about publishing a volume, entitled the "History of the American Theatre." The subject is rife with interest. Nearly every body is pleased with sketches of this kind. They are always full of wit and incident. Mr. Dunlap was for several years the manager of the Park, and has already compiled an amusing life of Cooke. The work promises well.

THE FINE ARTS.

PAINTING.

MR. DUNLAP'S HISTORICAL PAINTINGS.

THE panoramic exhibition in the great gallery of the National Academy at Clinton-hall, consists of four very large paintings: the Christ Rejected, the Bearing of the Cross, the Calvary, and the Death on the Pale Horse, so arranged, in a semicircular form, as to produce a panoramic series, displaying the rejection of the Savior, and his final triumph. This series of subjects from the Evangelists, occupies nearly one thousand square feet of canvas, displaying seven or eight hundred figures. The room is lighted in the centre, and in the evening by gas, on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, at which times the artist lectures on his own paintings, explaining them, as a painter and an historian. The whole is new, as a combination of pictorial effect, and literary and scientific exertion.

There are, in the gallery, several paintings, by old masters, and Mr. Dunlap's last historic composition, the Attack upon the Louvre.

We publish the following extract from the manuscript of the artist's lecture on his picture of the Christ Rejected, delivered before a large audience of ladies and gentlemen, among whom were several of the clergy of the city:

"This moment of intense interest having been chosen by the painter, let us take a rapid glance at the manner he has represented the principal characters who are actors or sufferers in the awful scene. Here stand the military satellites of the Roman power (that power which blindly prepared the world for the reception of light.) In front stands the centurion, as yet an indifferent spectator, a mere 'man having authority,' and obedient to those having higher command. His wife hangs upon him, looking with sympathy on the man of many sorrows. Pilate, the representative of the emperor, is seated, and although wishing to save him in whom he found no fault, is too conscious of his high office to rise, or otherwise than as a judge, to display his emotion. The Savior having answered him, turns partly from him, and from the furious Caiaphas. Bound by Annas, decorated, in derision, by Herod, with kingly ornaments, and bleeding from the wounds inflicted by the crown of thorns, he evinces, by his attitude and countenance, his superiority to his clamorous enemies, and resignation to the death he had chosen as testimony to his truth. Caiaphas, in all the pomp of his once high office, with violent action, cries—'Away with him! crucify him!' The elders and people are echoing the cry. Peter, who had in a few short hours, fought for, denied, and shrunk from the look of his master,—who had wept bitterly under the conviction of the fallacy of man's resolution and extreme weakness, now feels that indignant spirit revived which filled him when his teacher was seized as a criminal. Mary of Magdala, the representative of that sex ever first to pity, and ever first to relieve; the beautiful Mary Magdalen, those locks dishevelled with which she had wiped the feet of her benefactor, looks to him in an agony of unmitigated sorrow; while the mother, in the majesty of woe, subdued by knowledge of the future, stands erect, with her eyes turned to heaven, and so supported, upholds the drooping head of her young companion, the daughter of Cleophas. Others of the daughters of Jerusalem are overwhelmed with grief and consternation, while friends and enemies await the decision of the man on whose word life and death seem to hang.

"Such appears to have been the events which imagination had presented to the painter's eye, which, like the poet's, ought to glance from heaven to earth—from earth to heaven; but is too often chained by circumstances to a lot and thoughts very far below the exalted sphere to which he aspires. His ardent fancy shows him these scenes of interest and of glory; but he has to labor often in poverty, and disappointment, and neglect, while striving to fix them on his canvas."

MUSIC.

CINDERELLA IN BOSTON.

The extraordinary power of pleasing every body, which is the peculiar attribute of this opera, can only be fully appreciated by those who have witnessed its effect during its various peregrinations. It signifies not, whether it meet with cultivated musical taste, as in New-York; with partiality for music, without frequent opportunities of hearing it well executed, as in Philadelphia and Baltimore; or with an audience more familiar with every other branch of the drama than with opera, as at Boston—the same end is effected; every body goes to see Cinderella, and some to hear the music; but all are delighted. The managers had promised that no pains or expense should be spared in the production of the piece, and they redeemed their pledge to the very letter. The dresses were entirely new and very splendid. The scenery also was new and good. The best executed sketch was the fairy lake and landscape; the latter, however, although more dazzling, has not so much of poetry in the idea as that at the Park, and the fountain looked much too solid to pass for a fluid. Peacocks, and long-necked birds, of glittering appearance, were in abundance; and, on the first night, were of considerable annoyance to the musical portion of the audience, for sundry pleased and judicious spectators, totally unmindful of the fairy chorus, then chiming away in full harmony, manifested their delight at the expansion and compression of the bird's tails, by a loud clapping of hands. The change from the kitchen to a moonlight view of the Prince's palace, was equal, but not superior, to that which you have witnessed. The last scene is better in New-York, but the dresses have not been equalled in any city of the Union. Before I quit the subject of scenery, I cannot help expressing my opinion that a false taste pervades most of the establishments which I have inspected; every thing is sacrificed to glitter. In lieu of natural foliage, judicious light and shade, and good perspective, we invariably find the extravagant and outré leaf of tropical climates introduced into every scene. Skies, burning with immense red suns, and nights, radiant with huge white moons; and, at every six inches, red, green, and white foil, introduced to give a gaudy appearance. Indeed, instead of fancying ourselves in the dominions of a prince of Salerno, we rather expect to see some Maroon robber—some three-fingered Jack, make his appearance; and, instead of a rattling chamois hunting chorus, like that in Cinderella, which commences "What wild sounds," we are sooner prepared to hear,

"Come let us dance and sing,
While Barbadoes bells do ring."

Now, although Mr. Jones partook of these faults in common with others of his brethren, I must do him the justice to say, that if he would keep Stanfield a little more in remembrance, he would be a most promising artist. The chorusses were got up under the direction of Mr. Comer, and were admirably drilled; the female was rather weak, in comparison to the male chorus, which was extremely effective. I cannot help adding, that an example might well be taken from Mr. Comer's management of this department in New-York. Five or six rehearsals were sufficient to produce this opera on the part of the band, for the chorus singers were completely perfect in their business, and sung as well at the first rehearsal as at the last. The band, on the whole, was good; the clarionets, flute, and bassoon admirable; but the violins were weak, there being but one second. They played however, well together, led by Milon. I now direct your attention to the dramatis personæ—and, as I have previously had occasion to mention Mr. Walton's performance of the Prince, I shall only say that on this occasion his acting was easy, and his singing decidedly improved. Mr. Comer's Dandini was excellent. Mr. Collingbourne, as Alidoro, was as correct as possible in the music, and Mr. Johnstone was entrusted with the part of the Baron. I cannot pass over this gentleman so lightly. The talents of Comer and Walton are familiar to your readers; but Mr. Johnstone is comparatively a stranger to you, although a native of this country, and I am happy to introduce him to your notice. With a baritone voice of excellent intonation and some power, Mr. Johnstone is endowed with a fine ear and great clearness of pronunciation. His execution of the dream-song was first-rate—and, when we consider that he can never have heard similar music, and that his conception of the part was entirely original, I am inclined to look forward to his rising high in the profession, if opportunity be afforded him. I do not affect to compare him with Placide. He has not had the same advantages; and, in my humble opinion, no actor can rise to perfection who has not studied in a good school. The late Mr. Bernard is the model on which Mr. Placide has moulded many of his characters, particularly that of Lord Ogleby, and the Baron has partaken of that study. In addition to this, the Italian and French companies have not been unobserved by Placide—and consequently he has had opportunities certainly not enjoyed by Mr. Johnstone. Yet, notwithstanding, this gentleman's personation of the Baron was marked by good sense, and was highly entertaining. Much has often been said about natural acting. I confess I am rather sceptical on this point. I do not deny that nature fits many persons peculiarly for the profession; but I am inclined to believe that the forcing and pruning hand of art is as necessary to insure thorough success as the gift of nature. How often is the above truth forced on the observation of those who remark the proceedings of the drama? How frequently do artists of both sexes land on these shores, studied in certain parts in which they produce an effect; and, after they have resided here a short time, they are excelled by the resident artists of the country? The reason is plain—they come moulded and shaped in those parts after the model of some person of ability; and, while they depend on such acquired habits, their popularity lasts—when left to their own conception, their true value becomes apparent. If, then, this mere imitative quality can serve persons not gifted highly with talent, how much must constant study in a school of good acting benefit those whose genius is above direct imitation? Craving pardon for this digression, I now have to notice the tallest and the funniest Pedro that I have yet met with. Mr. Barrett, in the absence of Mr. Andrews, who was indisposed, undertook the character—and most ably did he perform it. His length of limb, so well calculated to represent awkwardness, and the way in which he made up his face, were irresistibly ludicrous, and he had the audience in a convulsion of laughter from the moment of his appearance to the last scene. The change of dress has always been a failure in every city except Boston; even at the Park this business is entrusted to sundry strong and energetic agents, who are so determined to do their duty that they fasten a strong rope round the luckless actor, and if the garments will not quit his person, they drag person and all off the stage! How often have we witnessed Mr. Thomas Placide make his unwilling and forcible exit—malgre his struggles—by dint of such a rope. In talking of an exit by a rope we do not mean to be personal. Mr. Barrett contrived to strip his extensive figure most adroitly; his quondam garments disappeared in an instant through the stage, and a splendid chapeau plume descended from the roof of the theatre, and literally chased the amazed Pedro round the stage, until it finally took possession of his cranium. I feel convinced that had the lately arrived pantomime projectors, including the four men monkies who are sojourning here, probably driven out of England by the real lions, had they witnessed this feat of legerdemain, they would have taken to their beds and died of chagrin. Mr. Barrett is likewise happy in other matters, for he nightly produces the fattest and most naughty looking live rat that ever graced a cage. On the first night, the animal contrived to extricate himself; at first he meditated a leap into the orchestra; but a terrible "sacre bleu!" from Mr. Milon, altered his intention, and he made for the side scenes, escaping the blow aimed at him by Pedro, and taking advantage of the drapery of Cinderella and the Fairy Queen, under which he skulked to cover his retreat. The extraordinary activity which Mrs. Austin and Miss McBride displayed when they saw the approach of this four-footed intruder, caused a scene of laughter and confusion that cannot be described. The two sisters were represented by Miss Eberle and Mrs. Smith. The former sang with spirit and acted with humor. The latter lady, although said to have ability in parts suited to her, appeared entirely out of her proper sphere in that of Thisbe. Miss McBride looked extremely well as the Fairy. In short, what with circumstances accidental and incidental to the opera, we never saw Cinderella represented with more eclat. The houses abound in numbers and respectability. B

ENGRAVING.

VIEWS OF NEW-YORK AND ITS ENVIRONS.

The fourth number of this work is published. The engravings are creditable to the artist; and, although open to criticism, are certainly quite pretty and accurate; and, considering the moderate price, have a strong claim to notice. They present to travellers and strangers cheap and well executed views of the most interesting portions of the city. Six more numbers will conclude the volume. The present contains a view of the Washington Institute and city reservoir. The former establishment, conducted by the Rev. Mr. Wickham, with the assistance of Mr. John Lutz, is well known as an excellent academy, two miles from the city-hall. The other three plates are, "Hudson River, from Hoboken;" "Coffee-house slip;" and the "Theatre, Park-row."

THE DRAMA.

NOTICES OF THE NEW-YORK STAGE.

At the Park theatre the benefit of Miss Hughes was attended by a full and fashionable audience, who evinced again their gratification at her attractions in the Maid of Judah. Mr. Woodhull receives applause as Isaac. Tom and Jerry has been re-produced. The new comedy, called Lords and Commons, will not succeed, we presume. A lively little piece, entitled the Quartette, was well received. Miss Hughes sings in it very sweetly. Mrs. Knight has an engagement. She has always been a favorite. Sinclair, as Masaniello, after a successful tour to Boston, was welcomed back with marked favor. This is the first character in which this gentleman, in spite of several defects, which we have already noticed, displayed his real and unquestionable powers as a vocalist. He sings the music of the bold fisherman with striking effect. It is a great pity that he did not make his debut in that character. There would then have been no difference of opinion respecting his powers.

The American theatre re-opened on Monday, with a company to which large and valuable additions have been recently made. There is something well calculated to arrest the attention and awaken the sincere good wishes of every lover of the legitimate drama in the resolution expressed by the manager to represent Shakspeare's plays properly. The attempt is a good one, and we trust it will be successful.

There has been a disturbance at the Richmond-hill about Anderson. This gentleman is certainly the greatest man in the United States. His "life" will be looked for eagerly by future ages. Sir Walter Scott—Mr. Moore—who is to be his biographer?

The theatrical article in our last was furnished by a friend. Neither of the editors of this journal were present at the theatre. As one of the morning papers has taken some exceptions to the remarks, we insert the following extract of a note, received too late to publish entire, from our correspondent on the subject:

"On the first and second representation of Masaniello, under the new change of characters, Miss Hughes, instead of retaining the beautiful duet of Mercandanti, which she and Mrs. Hackett would have sung charmingly, substituted a piece arranged either by Lee or Bishop, from the yager's chorus, in the opera of Guillaume Tell, and which had been sung to death at the Park theatre as the hunter's chorus in Cinderella. The melody and words of this song, ending with the usual ti-ra-la-la, were so inappropriate as to excite regret, notwithstanding it had an encore from those discriminating gentlemen who applaud any thing, and who are known as 'the friends of the house.' It was received very coldly on the second representation, and, in consequence, was entirely omitted on the third, and an air familiar to those who remember Malibran, was substituted, and sung with charming effect."

There—that is all we know of the matter. We certainly would not willingly do Miss Hughes an act of injustice.

NEW MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

The following pieces of music have recently been issued by Mr. Birch:—"Whilst I listen," arranged with symphonies and accompaniments; "The rose will cease to blow," as sung by Mr. Salmon; and "The breaking of the day," a favorite cavatina.

LETTERS FROM PARIS.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF EUROPE.

NUMBER NINE.

Malibran—Paris at midnight—a mob, &c.

Our beautiful and favorite MALIBRAN is playing in Paris this winter. I saw her last night in Desdemona. The other theatres are so attractive, between Taglioni, Robert le Diable, (the new opera) Leontine Fay, and the political pieces constantly coming out, that I had not before visited the Italian opera. Madame Malibran is every way changed. She sings, unquestionably, better than when in America. Her voice is firmer and more under control, but it has lost that gushing wildness, that brilliant daringness of execution, that made her singing upon our boards so indescribably exciting and delightful. Her person is perhaps still more changed. The round, graceful fullness of her limbs and features has yielded to a half-haggard look of care and exhaustion, and I could not but think that there was more than Desdemona's fictitious wretchedness in the expression of her face. Still, her forehead and eyes have a beauty that is not readily lost, and she will be a strikingly interesting, and even splendid creature, as long as she can play. Her acting was extremely impassioned; and in the more powerful passages of her part, she exceeded every thing I had conceived of the capacity of the human voice for pathos and melody. The house was crowded, and the applause was frequent and universal. ●

Madame Malibran, as you probably know, is divorced from the man whose name she bears, and has married a violinist of the Italian orchestra. She is just now in a state of health that will require immediate retirement from the stage, and, indeed, has played already too long. She came forward after the curtain dropped, in answer to the continual demand of the audience, leaning heavily on Rubini, and was evidently so exhausted as to be scarcely able to stand. She made a single gesture, and was led off immediately, with her head drooping on her breast, amid the most violent acclamations. She is a perfect passion with the French, and seems to have out-charmed their usual caprice.

It was a lovely night, and after the opera I walked home. I reside a long distance from the places of public amusement. Dr. Howe and myself had stopped at a café on the Italian Boulevards an hour, and it was very late. The streets were nearly deserted—here and there a solitary cabriolet with the driver asleep under his wooden apron, or the motionless figure of a municipal guards-man, dozing upon his horse, with his helmet and brazen armor glistening in the light of the lamps. Nothing has impressed me more, by the way, than a body of these men passing me in the night. I have once or twice met the king returning from the theatre with a guard, and I saw them once at midnight on an extraordinary patrol winding through the arch into the Place Carrousel. Their equipments are exceedingly warlike, (helmets of brass, and coats of mail) and with the gleam of the breast-plates through their horsemen's cloaks, the tramp of hoofs echoing through the deserted streets, and the silence and order of their march, it was quite a realization of the descriptions of chivalry.

We kept along the Boulevards to the Rue Richelieu. A carriage, with footmen in livery, had just driven up to Frascati's, and, as we passed, a young man of uncommon personal beauty jumped out and entered that palace of gamblers. By his dress he was just from a ball, and the necessity of excitement after a scene meant to be so gay, was an obvious, if not a fair satire on the happiness of the "gay" circle in which he evidently moved. We turned down the Paysage Panorama, perhaps the most crowded thoroughfare in all Paris, and traversed its long gallery without meeting a soul. The widely celebrated patissier of Felix, the first pastry-cook in the world, was the only shop open from one extremity to the other. The guard, in his gray capote, stood looking in at the window, and the girl, who had served the palates of half the fashion and rank of Paris since morning, sat nodding fast asleep behind the counter, paying the usual fatiguing penalty of notoriety. The clock struck two as we passed the façade of the Bourse. This beautiful and central square is, night and day, the grand rendezvous of public vice; and late as the hour was, its pavé was still thronged with flaunting and painted women of the lowest description, promenading without cloaks or bonnets, and addressing every passer-by.

The Palais Royal lay in our way, just below the Bourse, and we entered its magnificent court with an exclamation of new pleasure. Its thousand lamps were all burning brilliantly, the long avenues of trees were enveloped in a golden atmosphere created by the bright radiation of light through the mist, the Corinthian pillars and arches retreated on either side from the eye in distinct and yet mellow perspective, the fountain filled the whole palace with its rich murmur, and the broad marble-paved galleries, so thronged by day, were as silent and deserted as if the drowsy gens d'armes standing motionless on their posts were the only living beings that inhabited it. It was a scene really of indescribable impressiveness. No one who has not seen this splendid palace, enclosing with its vast colonnades so much that is magnificent, can have an idea of its effect upon the imagination. I had seen it hitherto only when crowded with the gay and noisy idlers of Paris, and the contrast of this with the utter solitude it now presented—not a single footfall to be heard on its floors, yet every lamp burning bright, and the statues and flowers and fountains all illuminated as if for a revel—was one of the most powerful and captivating that I have ever witnessed. We loitered slowly down one of the long galleries, and it seemed to me more like some creation of enchantment than the public haunt it is of pleasure and merchandise. A single figure, wrapped in a cloak, passed hastily by us and entered the door to one of the celebrated "hells," in which the playing scarce commences till this hour—but we met no other human being.

We passed on from the grand court to the Galerie Nemours. This, as you may find in the descriptions, is a vast hall, standing between the east and west courts of the Palais Royal. It is sometimes called the "glass gallery." The roof is of glass, and the shops, with fronts entirely of window, are separated only by long mirrors, reaching in the shape of pillars from the roof to the floor. The pavement is tessellated, and at either end stand two columns completing its form, and dividing it from the other galleries into which it opens. The shops are among the costliest in Paris; and what with the vast proportions of the hall, its beautiful and glistening material, and the lightness and grace of its architecture, it is, even when deserted, one of the most fairy-like places in this fantastic city. It is the lounging place of military men particularly; and every evening, from six to midnight, it is thronged by every class of gaily dressed people, officers off duty, soldiers, Polytechnic scholars, ladies, and strangers of every costume and complexion, promenading to and fro in the light of the cafés and the dazzling shops, sheltered completely from the weather, and enjoying without expense or ceremony, a scene more brilliant than the most splendid ball-room in Paris. We lounged up and down the long, echoing pavement an hour. It was like some kingly "banquet-hall deserted." The lamps burned dazzlingly bright, the mirrors multiplied our figures into shadowy and silent attendants, and our voices echoed from the glittering roof in the utter stillness of the hour as if we had broken in, Thalaba-like, upon some magical palace of silence.

It is singular how much the differences of time and weather affects scenery. The first sunshine I saw in Paris, unsettled all my previous impressions completely. I had seen every place of interest through the dull heavy atmosphere of a week's rain, and it was in such leaden colors alone that the finer squares and palaces had become familiar to me. The effect of a clear sun upon them was wonderful. The sudden gilding of the dome of the Invalides by Napoleon must have been something like it. I took advantage of it to see every thing over again, and it seemed to me like another city. I never realized so forcibly the beauty of sunshine. Architecture, particularly, is nothing without it. Every thing looks heavy and flat. The tracery of the windows and reliefs, meant to be definite and airy, appears clumsy and confused, and the whole building flattens into a solid mass, without design or beauty.

I have spent the whole day in a Paris mob. The arrival of General Romarino and some of his companions from Warsaw, gave the malcontents a plausible opportunity of expressing their dislike to the measures of government; and, under cover of a public welcome to this distinguished Pole, they assembled in immense numbers at the Port St. Denis, and on the Boulevard Montmartre. It was very exciting altogether. The cavalry were out, and patrolled the streets in companies, charging upon the crowd wherever there was a stand; the troops of the line marched up and down the Boulevards, continually dividing the masses of people, and forbidding any one to stand still. The shops were all shut, in anticipation of an affray. The students endeavored to cluster, and resisted, as far as they dared, the orders of the soldiery; and from noon till night there was every prospect of a quarrel. The French are a fine people under excitement. Their handsome and ordinarily heartless faces become very expressive under the stronger emotions; and their picturesque dresses and violent gesticulation set off a popular tumult exceedingly. I have been highly amused all day, and have learned a great deal of what it is very difficult for a foreigner to acquire—the language of French passion. They express themselves very forcibly when angry. The constant irritation kept up by the intrusion of the cavalry upon the side-walks, and the rough manner of dispersing gentlemen by sabre-blows and kicks with the stirrup, gave me sufficient opportunity of judging. I was astonished, however, that their summary mode of proceeding was borne at all. It is difficult to mix in such a vast body, and not catch its spirit, and I found myself, without knowing why, or rather with a full conviction that the military measures were necessary and right, entering with all my heart into the rebellious movements of the students, and boiling with indignation at every dispersion by force. The students of Paris are probably the worst subjects the king has. They are mostly young men of from twenty to twenty-five, full of bodily vigor and enthusiasm, and excitable to the last degree. Many of them are Germans, and no small proportion Americans. They make a good amalgam for a mob, dress being the last consideration, apparently, with a medical or law student in Paris. I never saw such a collection of atrocious-looking fellows as are to be met at the lectures. The Polytechnic scholars, on the other hand, are the finest-looking body of young men I ever saw. Aside from their uniform, which is remarkably neat and beautiful, their figures and faces seem picked for spirit and manliness. They have always a distinguished air in a crowd, and it is easy, after seeing them, to imagine the part they played as leaders in the revolution of the three days.

Contrary to my expectation, night came on without any serious encounter. One or two individuals attempted to resist the authority of the troops, and were considerably bruised; and one young man, a student, had three of his fingers cut off by the stroke of a dragon's sabre. Several were arrested, but by eight o'clock all was quiet, and the shops on the Boulevards once more exposed their tempting goods, and lit up their brilliant mirrors without fear. The people thronged to the theatres to see the political pieces, and evaporate their excitement in cheers at the liberal allusions; and so ends a tumult that threatened danger, but operated, perhaps, as a healthful event for the accumulating disorders of public opinion.

ENGLISH LITERATURE.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES OF DISTINGUISHED WRITERS.

TOM BROWN.

I WAS sitting in my library the other evening, in that listless, state of feeling experienced when we want amusement, yet are not disposed to be easily pleased. My eye ranged fastidiously over the backs of the books around me, passing from one attractive title to another, but still unsatisfied, till it rose to the upper shelf of my book-case, whose neglected tenants had long since been given up to be the prey of the spider and the moth. An impulse was given at once to my laziness, and I was soon on the "ladder's topmost round," disturbing their quiet slumbers, and dislodging clouds of the venerable dust which shrouded them like their funeral pall. Most miscellaneous were the treasures I discovered. Here were tenth-rate poems, which had just struggled into life to drop at once into an early and undisturbed grave; school-books, torn, dirty, and scrawled over with my youthful hieroglyphics, yet still dear to my eyes, as memorials of times gone by; and bundles of musty pamphlets, those ephemera of literature, whose subject was now as forgotten as themselves. Here were other works, too, of more sounding title and imposing appearance; ponderous histories, now scarcely known by name, except to the plodding book-worm; and novels, which had formed the delight of another age, but now unread and unreadable. As I mused over these disappointed candidates for immortality, I could not help thinking that mine was a sort of "meditation among the tombs," for the piles of lumber around me were the monuments of genius, desire of fame, learning and wit, buried in oblivion. The first book I took up had evidently been costly in its day, though its abtike splendors were now tarnished and rusty—it was "The Letters of that celebrated wit, Monsieur Balzac." I knew he was the favorite, the idol of his times, but I was content to take his wit as I had done his celebrity, on trust, and carelessly tossed him aside. A huge pile of well-fed volumes next met my eye, on whose dusty backs I could just decipher "Sir Charles Grandison." The famous novelist fared no better than the "celebrated wit," and I passed by Sir Charles, with his dozen volumes of sorrows, to turn over my old Dilworth's Arithmetic. I took it up with a smile. I laid it down with almost a tear. It was blotted and defaced, to the very extent of a schoolboy's power to injure it; but its creases, its dog's-ears, its illegible scrawls, and the caricatures with which the graver matter of the multiplication-table was abundantly relieved, had to me the charm of association with years of pure feeling and innocent delight; they carried me back to the time, now far distant, when my step was free, my hope buoyant, and my heart light. So tender and sad were the "thick coming fancies" this humble duodecimo prompted, that I could not bear to indulge them; but I could not fling aside my time-worn companion of other days, so I returned it gently, almost reverently, to its place. I turned aside to a little volume, which lay in a dark corner, a complete wreck. It had lost both covers, and was half-devoured by rats; and an industrious spider had woven his nets around it undisturbed. I took it up carefully between my finger and thumb, and blowing off the accumulated dust of I know not how many years, found it was an odd volume of Tom Brown's works. Here was more food for thought. The scholar, the wit, the fine gentleman, the oracle of coffee-houses, the delight of clubs, the "arbitrator elegantiarum" of his day; had he, too, fallen into neglect? had his humor palled, his wit grown stale, his elegance been forgotten? As I looked on the shattered volume I mentally repeated Hamlet's apostrophe to Yorick's skull, "Where be your gibes now? your gambols, your songs, your flashes of merriment that used to set the table in a roar?" Brown, too, was "a fellow of infinite jest, of most excellent fancy;" and his fame stood at one time as high as that of any comic writer in our language. His talents were solid, too, as well as brilliant; he was a good scholar, and his learning is as conspicuous in his writings as his wit. It has not been able, however, to save him from the speedy forgetfulness of the world. The title-page of the volume I had picked up told me it was the ninth edition of his works, and yet how few, in this country at least, have ever even seen them! By some, indeed, he has been remembered: by plagiarists, who have borrowed from his works as audaciously as though they felt sure of never being detected in drawing from so obscure a source. The volume I had lighted on contained his "Letters from the Dead to the Living." I did not rise from the perusal till I had finished them, neither will any body else who can relish genuine native humor and keen satire. It he introduces all the famous and infamous of antiquity, writing from the infernal regions to kindred spirits of his own time, who send them appropriate answers. Antiochus compliments Louis the fourteenth, on having surpassed even him in pride and cruelty; the bloody Alva calls from his grave on the disciples of Loyola, not to pause in the career of persecution he commenced; the revengeful Philip instructs his successor in the wicked arts of tyranny; Juvenal complains to Boi-leau of the decline of letters; and Pindar threatens Tom D'Urfe with his vengeance for daring to call his odes Pindaric. In biting satire it yields to few works but Swift's; yet Swift is a classic, and Brown unknown! The labored witticisms of Pelham are applauded to the skies; the stale jokes of Coleman and Reynolds never tire; yet "Tom Brown of facetious memory," as Addison himself christened him, is neglected! At the end of the volume was an appendix, containing "Miscellanies in Prose and Verse, by Mr. Brown and his friends." Here were memorials of a race now extinct, the wits by profession, the critics in laced coats and full-bottomed perriwigs, who gave law to theatres and coffee-rooms, and sought to combine the graces of the man of fashion and the rake with those of the wit and the scholar. With all their vices and follies, how far superior were these men to their successors, the four-in-hand swell, or mincing exquisite, of the present day! There was, at least, grace in their profligacy, and courtly elegance in their affectation. They had often sense and learning, too, to give point to their wit; and we doubt much whether any of the fashionable clubs in London could produce any thing to match the Latin verses of Brown and his comrades. There are also many epigrams, which these self-constituted censors never failed to discharge against every new absurdity. That unfortunate poet who stands condemned to such an unenviable immortality in Martinus Scriblerus, seems to have been favorite game of theirs. Thus we have an "Epigram on Sir Richard Blackmore's poem of Job."

"Poor Job lost all the comforts of his life,
And hardly saved a potsherd and a wife;
Yet Job bless'd God—and Job again was blest;
His virtue was essayed, and bore the test.
But had heaven's wrath poured out its fiercest vial,
Had he been then burlesqued, without denial,
The pious man had yielded to that trial.
His pious spouse, with Blackmore on her side,
Must have prevailed, and Job had cursed and died."

Another, alluding to his profession of physician:

"I charge thee, knight, in great Apollo's name,
If thou'rt not dead to all remorse and shame,
Either thy rhymes or physic to disclaim,
Both are too much one feeble brain to rack;
Besides, the bard will soon outdo the quack:
Such shoals of readers thy stale fustian kills,
Thou'lt scarce leave one alive to take thy pills."

There are also poems of a different stamp; and there are few finer bacchanals in the language than the "Whet."

In all these writings, both prose and verse, there is much coarseness, much indecency. It was the fashion of the age; and the man who wished to be called a fine gentleman, would have thought his character incomplete without it. But we are so far improved in externals, at least, that much which was then innocent is now shocking. We are corrupt enough at heart, as the scores of profligate novels which pollute our press abundantly testify, but then their poison is wreathed with flowers; no matter what their principles, there is not a single coarse expression in them—a triumph of purity on which we cannot congratulate ourselves sufficiently. Brown had not made such advances in refinement; neither, in truth, had Addison, Steele, Pope, or Dryden; whether the influence of even the worst of their works is as bad as that of the fashionable light-reading of the present period, we for one have always doubted.

But the work which displays Tom Brown's genius in the most advantageous light is his "Laconics, or New Maxims of State and Conversation." They are not written in the misanthropical vein of a La Rochefoucauld, by one striving to show himself superior to his fellows by despising them, but in a manly, though observant and sarcastic spirit. Neither are they like the flat common-places of Lacon, which trust to be thought original, on the strength of an affected sententiousness, but in reality new and striking views of life and manners.

NANNIE.

"Et l'on revient toujours
A ses premiers amours."

STREAM never flowed more smoothly, flower never sprang more brightly, nor did bird ever sing more sweetly than in the romantic village of Royleigh. Nature there put on her sweetest face, and smiled like the maiden in her walk; the fleecy clouds seemed to forget to rain, but sent their refreshing damps upon the ready earth in morning and evening dews. As in all country towns, a road runs through the centre, distinctively called "the street;" from this others branch in different directions, over hill, dale, and shaw, and the wayward traveller can soon pass from the dull row of country-stores, fields, and houses, which are so methodically arranged on Royleigh street, to a pleasing variety of hill, dale, and stream; spreading groves of thick firs dip into the Royleigh lake, (a beautiful sheet of the clearest water) and clothe the rising hills with everdaring verdure. Standing on the top of Brastow hill, he could, in one coup d'œil grasp some of the most boasted scenery of Massachusetts. The lake lies tranquil below, bearing on its broad bosom two large and ragged islands, which, according to the village gossip, have seen dark deeds and light deeds, which "tongue mustn't tell on." To the north large mountains rise in wide undulations, covered with pines and gray rocks; this chain curls, as it were, around the lake, and, becoming more level on the south, forms the sight of the village; on the west, grove is piled above grove, and ravine opens upon ravine. The shores are beautifully indented in little bays and soundings, affording a rich harvest to the patient angler. Two brooks empty their waters in slight cascades after purling their sweetest music at the foot of Brastow hill. Besides this relish to the eye, the ear is greeted with the merry song of birds, the murmuring of water, the dashing of the mill-wheels, the coarse chant of the villager, the halloos of the fisherman, and the crackling echo of the sportsman's gun. Peace seems happily united with motion. Near enough to Boston to hear without joining its clamor, Royleigh wears the same tidy aspect that it wore in pilgrim days; as the staid maiden becomes the staid matron. Its farmers are the same steady cider-drinking race—pious, industrious, sober; with the exception of now and then a black sheep to form a contrast to the white ones. Votings, trainings, and the like, were the seasons of their unvariegated life, at which the urchins rambled about the church green, the youth supported or carried arms, according to the mouth-word of their doughty captain, and the elders retired to their beer or cider in the shade of those magnificent elms which have flourished for years and years in front of Davie Fisher's well-known inn, "The Stag." In short, Royleigh possesses all the natural advantages among which a lover of nature, an intellectual man, one who could unite the good qualities of companion, sportsman, and reader would desire to pass his days.

When I had learned the difference between si and non, and was considered fit for the tutor's surveillance, I was posted off with the tears of my mother, the kisses of my sisters, and the advice of my father to Royleigh academy. Dear mass of hedge-row, stile, spire, and roof, how I loved thee! thy worn threshold, ivy-clothed belfry, tiled roof, and quaint windows! How many of my boyish sorrows were begotten and soothed in thy precincts! There, too, how many of my boyish joys, dreams, and hopes sprang and were crushed even in their birth! But those are passed, I have no sorrow now.

In the school I was called a "smart boy," on the play-ground a "clever fellow," in the village a "paragon." From these epithets you may judge I was a good scholar, a boon companion, and a gentleman. My leisure was employed in sports and rambles. At ten I was a promising sportsman, and have been known to wing a tame duck at the distance of two strides! At fourteen I could wing a wild one across the lake; knew the best haunts of the best fish; rode the straightest saddle in Royleigh; leaped highest, ran fastest, breathed longest of all the youth under and over my age in school and village.

I one day loitered adown the side of Brastow hill with my fishing rod in my hand and my pouch at my back, now picking wild-flowers and dissecting their tender petals, now cracking the sparkling stone, and pouring on its nice admixture of mica, quartz, and shorl; and now securing the flying insect to admire and reflect upon its gauzy wings and gorgeous colors. In this employment, moral and physical, I loitered along the windings of the little stream until it opened, with its murmuring cascade, upon the lake. Here, throwing my eye along the well-known shore, I fixed upon a site for angling. Not more than three hours had passed since the dawn, and the trees, hedges, and rocks were glittering with dew; a few boats were on the lake, the flocks were out of their folds, and had begun their daily browsing; the crow was heard in the woods, and the tawny land-gull was scaling across the lake.

After bobbing for a while, I let my rod float on the water, and fell into a reverie.

"Solitude! what a charming thing!" thought I; "one can think, feel, do as he pleases; no one to contradict, tease, or threaten. One can wander here or there, up or down, fish, sport, botanize all alone! Alone—alone!" this word sounded rather dolefully to my mind's ear, (for who will dispute that the mind has an ear to match the eye?) This changed my reverie, and my thoughts, like a turn-coat politician, immediately took a different range. "To wander with a choice companion, to delight his eye by pointing out to him the distant views, the choicest fishing-grounds, the brightest flowers; to scale with him the tallest tree to gather eggs or nuts; to tell him my secrets, and to hear his in return; to lay my head on his bosom and gaze on his bright eyes, and swear to love him more than myself, and to love till death; to lock my arm in his, to join his wanderings, to share his joys and sorrows, to stand by his side when attacked, and to be his solace if beaten—"

Just then a fairy creature ran down the bank a short distance from the spot where I sat, and paused upon a little rock which was nearly covered with the pure water of the lake. She was about twelve, perhaps thirteen; bright eyes, rosy cheeks of a brilliant color, which would put rouge itself to the blush. She had on a clean, short frock of blue and white check, which hung off her delicate shoulders, displaying the white linen of her dress; a coarse straw hat was jauntily thrown on one side of her head, and her whole insouciance exhibited a neatness that would have shamed the negligé of a city lady.

After pausing awhile, and inhaling the clear air of the wood and water, she shook off her stout leathern brogans, and put her pretty white feet into the water. Was there ever any thing more artless and lovely than her position and manner? Ovid himself would have adored her for a hamadryad, and even Narcissus would have raised his head?

I was on thorns. I would not have broken her reverie for a purse of eagles; and still, if ever eloquent words were boiling in my mouth, it was then. I raised my rod, and setting the cork in the water, fixed my eyes steadily on it, and uttered a loud "hem!" The fairy at first covered her pretty eyes with her hands; then peering through her fingers, appeared to take a survey of me. I nodded to her familiarly, and bade her "good morning."

"Good morning," was the soft reply.

"Truly, young lady," said I, "if you have the least pity on me, come and show your face to the fishes, and charm them into this water, for I have not even had a nibble the whole morning."

"I do not think the fishes would come at my bidding," said she, "but if your flies want mending, I will do it with pleasure, for I am a glib hand at making flies."

"Well, it seems to me," (fumbling over my fishing-tackle,) "my flies are rather out of order, and if you will oblige me—"

"Oh, certainly," said she, as she tripped over rock after rock, and seated herself by my side. Meanwhile I had taken care to pull three or four of the little artificers to pieces, so that she might not have her walk for nothing.

"If you would but teach me," said I, "how to make them, I never should have occasion to trouble you again; my fingers are not as delicate as yours, and I always make a bungling piece of work." (This was a fib, for I had the credit of making the best flies in school.)

She readily consented, and began to exhibit the well-known mystery of fly-making; first, nicely laying the cotton on the hook, then adding a pair of wings, and finally, smoothing and adorning it with colored floss. During this delicate occupation I watched her lip and cheek and eye, till I fell in love—completely in love; and the first glow of passion that ever warmed my heart was kindled on the shore of Royleigh lake, while Nannie was weaving flies.

"What is your name?" said I.

"Nancy."

"And your father's name?"

"I have no father nor mother, nor brother, nor sister. I am all alone in the world. Mr. Howard, who is fishing in that red boat, with the black stern, lets me live with him, and I go to charity-school. Mrs. Howard told me I was a foundling, and the child of nobody; and so I must expect to be grateful for the care they take of me. I am grateful; at least I think I am. I do not work much; but, somehow or other, I always get enough clothes to wear. I never weep; I am always happy; I care for nobody, and nobody cares for me."

Was there ever any thing more artless than this speech?

"Nannie," said I, "do you say you love nobody?"

She looked up, and caught my eye gazing eagerly at her.

"Why, no," said she, candidly; "I love you better than any body I ever saw."

"Me, Nannie! Why you never saw me before?"

"Oh, you don't know that. Many and many a time I've watched you, when you thought you were all alone. I've seen you at church, I've seen you in the play-ground of the academy, I have followed you in the wood when you have been gunning; I've seen you here before, fishing; I have seen you picking flowers on Brastow hill, and I loitered behind you and gathered some of the flowers you threw away; I always see you; I dream of you; I dreamed that we were married, and they say that true dreams make a reality."

What an incident!

"Then, Nannie, if you love me so well, you will let me love you in return?"

"Certainly," said she; and, as I took her hand, the mellow peal of the academy bell floated over grove and lake and island. Could any thing be more vexatious?

Day after day Nannie and I met; she was my constant companion; when sporting, she picked up my birds; when fishing, she baited my hooks, and made my flies; if sick, she cheered me; if angry, soothed me. I loved her dearly, dearly. My school hours were burdensome, for they separated me from Nannie. The haunts around the lake knew us well, for they rang often and often to our merry shouts.

Six months from our meeting I was warned to prepare for entering college. How swiftly those six months had flown! Nannie and I took our last walk in our well-known haunt at the foot of Brastow hill. She wept. So did I. She said she was afraid I would forget her. I swore by a thousand innocent oaths that I never would.

"I will write to you, Nannie."

"I cannot read writing."

"Here, then, keep this, to remember me," said I, pulling a leaf of the heart-leaved convolvulus; "and when I am of age I will return and marry you, and we will never part again, Nannie."

She dried her tears. After a thousand hugs and kisses, we parted. I was seated in the coach. I saw Nannie on the top of Brastow hill; she waved her bonnet; I shook my handkerchief, and wept all the way to Boston.

In a month I entered the walls of holy Harvard. In a year lost all my rayness. In two years was the most crack at scrapes of all the collegians, as S—t's hen-roost and W—'s galled mare can testify, if one or the other be in existence. Juno, I know, is dead; peace to her manes. In three years I gained some academic honor. In four was a staid litteratus, and in the fifth I bent my sails for Europe.

About a year after my return, after I had sported the whiskers I had cultivated abroad, and even given the sanctity of my name to a new style of barouche, I resolved (was it at all queer?) to marry. Nannie? No, I had forgotten her. This was about, let me see, twenty-eight, twenty-nine? Oh, hang the date; it was about the time that sneak of sneaks, craven, fool, dotard, as he must be, took it into his unphrenologic head to invent a stock! A stock! whereby the veriest goose, hatched in the purlieus of the mill-pond could wear the most Gordian tie of La rue vivienne! I cut my tailor dead directly, because he sold so many stocks. I could not bear to see Argus and Talbot, and Tom, Dick and Harry wear those precious insignia I had been studying, "time out of mind," to attain. As indignantly would M—e start and fume to see the noble star of the legion d'honneur twinkling on the breast of a May-street buck. I said, I believe, that I had resolved to marry. Continuons:

In the same year with the stocks Miss Victorine Gossamer made her début in "society." Among her adorers and satellites was I. Who could but love her bright eyes? Who could but love her ruby lips? Who could but love her fifteen thousand per annum? I knelt. She patted my cheek with her fan, and accepted me.

We were tout en tout to each other. Patronized the Athenæum. Were never apart. Gave to the neglected mall a new tone. Spent three hours each day in buying meubles, and writing to France for more. In short, were the life of Boston a whole winter. Thousands of invitations were on our tables, and hundreds of quizzing-glasses were levelled at us in the theatre, street, and salon. In six months we died. That is, we were married.

A year thence I was quietly seated at the fireside, awaiting breakfast. The clock had struck ten. Master John Gossamer Vintage, our eldest son, was squalling most vociferously from the nursery. Victorine entered, with a flushed cheek, and seating herself beside me, placing her satin slipper on the fender, and wrapping her jewelled hand in her moussaline quarré, began: (I was reading.)

"Oh! the miseries of married life! I do think, Unwin, my dear, even you could not have tempted me to marry had I known half or a quarter of the miseries of marriage. Don't you think, Unwin, the nurse has vowed not to give the babe another bit of food until she has a maid to wait on her; and Gossamer is crying as if his little heart would break."

"Oh, Victorine, for peace sake, give her a maid, if she wants one."

"And then my maid has stood out for wages, and will have a dollar a week, besides my cast-off frocks and bonnets. The fille de chambre has gone to be married. I wonder that the legislature does not pass a law against the marriage of servants. I've lost the key of my casket, and must break the lock or stay at home from Mrs. O—s' soirée choisie. Oh, no one was ever so miserable. Unwin, you don't pity me; my heart will break."

"Victorine," said I, carelessly turning over a leaf, "did you speak to me?"

Just then John entered, to announce the arrival of the new fille de chambre.

"Show her up," said I.

"No," said Victorine, "let her wait in the entry till I can see her in my dressing-room."

The breakfast came, was scarcely touched, and disappeared. Victorine sounded the bell. John entered.

"Order the coach at once; tell Humphrey to put on his new livery, and be careful to wear a collar; ~~what is la mode~~ for masters to go without, servants must wear them; put the orange cockades on the horses, and give Humphrey this list of stoppages."

"And John," added I, "send up the new fille de chambre with a glass of water."

"Impudent varlet," sighed Victorine, as she pinched my cheek, and adjourned to her toilet.

I soon heard the creaking of a pair of new shoes on the stairway. In another moment the new fille de chambre entered, with a plate salver bearing the water. Her eyes were downcast, her cheek was pale; she was clad unlike a city maid; she raised her eyes; looked at me; I could not mistake that glance; she screamed, and fell. It was Nannie. I bore her to the window; fanned her, and kissed her! Just then Victorine entered.

"What's this?" cried she. "The floor covered with water and broken china, and my husband in the window kissing a servant maid! Oh, Unwin, Unwin, I did not dream of this!" and falling into a chair, either for spite or sorrow, she wept.

Nannie soon revived.

"I knew 'twas so; I guessed it, I guessed it; see here," pulling from her bosom the withered leaf of convolvulus. "I have not forgotten you, but you have long, long forgotten Nannie; I forgive you, and I hope heaven will too."

She left the room. I tried to sigh; I could not. I tried to weep; I could not. Should I follow her? No, there was Victorine; my bride, my wife, was weeping for me. I approached her; and gently drawing her to me, told her the tender tale of my youthful love for Nannie.

On inquiring of John for the fille de chambre, he said she had left the house in a terrible hurry, and he supposed she was mad, because she didn't suit.

I became melancholy, and needed all the tenderest cares of Victorine to soothe me. I loved, I adored Victorine; but the love of my young days, and a dream of lake, hill-side, and stream would ever and anon rush across me, like a dear but melancholy remembrance.

Last year I visited Royleigh. There was the same mossy, old school-house; not a stone or pane changed. A knot of old codgers were roaring under Davie Fisher's elms. The horn of the drover was heard winding over the lake. I strolled with Victorine to the churchyard. Beneath a clump of hawthorn, a rude stone headed a low grave. It was coarsely marked, "Nancy, an orphan. Obiit 1831. God tempereth the wind to the shorn lamb. God healeth the broken heart, and cheereth the wounded spirit." I turned to Victorine. We spake not, but tears stole from both our eyes. With heavy hearts we left Royleigh.

I am resolved to cherish the dear wife of my bosom, as I would the apple of my eye. If she depart, I shall feel more sorrow than at the death of Nannie. Nannie had the first gush of feeling from my heart, but Victorine was the cherished choice of my riper years. I sometimes dream of the days when Nannie made my flies on the shore of Royleigh lake; I think of the leaf of convolvulus, the simple pledge of our affections. But a truce to these lachrymals; Joconde knows a man may love a dozen times.

"Et l'on revient toujours,
A ses premiers amours."

REMINISCENCES OF THE REVOLUTION.

AN ATTEMPT TO POISON WASHINGTON.

When they reached Springfield they drew up at the inn, where they alighted to warm and refresh themselves. The innkeeper, whose name was Francis, was what was then termed a liberty-man, and was commonly called Black Sam, from the swarthy embrowned hue of his complexion. He had kept a similar establishment in the broad street of New-York, which was, for a long time, the centre of attraction to all the bachelors and gay-minded gentlemen far and near, drawn thither, not alone by the wit and good-humor of the dark host, but by the allowed excellence and unadulterated quality of his viands and liquors: and, be it remembered, that Black Sam was a great hero in his way—for hundreds of brawny wights had he laid upon their backs—numbered were the smooth Voltarian noses that he had converted into huge masses—and many, very many a star-beaming eye had he bedimmed by the mighty influence of his magical powers; yet, notwithstanding all this, Black Sam was universally allowed to possess good will for all mankind, and, for his friends, a generosity of feeling seldom equalled by any of his calling, or any other interested barterer of the good things of this life.

He had moved to Springfield when the British army had taken possession of the city, following the footsteps of the retreating Americans, and preferring to deal out to his half-naked and suffering countrymen their ill-savored continental whisky by the gill, rather than remain where he was and grow rich beneath the patronage of royalty.

As soon as our travelers had taken their seats at the fire in a room of the inn, a smart-looking young woman came to receive their commands—the surgeon observing her, exclaimed:

"Why, bless my heart, can this be Polly Honey?"

"The same, sir," replied the rosy-cheeked dame, with a coquettish courtesy; "but Mrs. Molly Francis now, at your service."

"And did Black Sam make you master of his house and heart to prevent your divulging a secret that would have hanged him in all probability?"

"He married me, it is true; but many think that he had a better reason than you have assigned;" and she raised her eyes to the mirror that hung opposite her.

"That is likely enough," returned the surgeon, half persuaded on a second look, of the truth of her argument. "And now, Mrs. Polly, or Mrs. Molly, if that please you better, go and prepare us a dinner and I will subscribe to all you have said."

Upon which Mrs. Francis pursed up her pretty mouth, and with another glance at the mirror, retired from the room with an air of consequence arising from self-esteem, which may be deemed pardonable in an ignorant beauty, though reprehensible in a Cicero.

As the door closed, the surgeon turned to his companion, and said:

"That simple girl was instrumental in saving the life of Washington. I may speak of it now, it can do no harm. It was about the middle of June, 1776, while the general was at New-York, waiting the approach of the king's troops, that this girl came to Francis, her present husband, whom she considered in the light of a royalist, and informed him, as a secret she had overheard, that there was a plan in operation among the government men to destroy the rebel leader (as she termed the commander-in-chief) by poison, which was to be plentifully mingled with his green-pease, a favorite vegetable of his, on the following day at Richmond-hill, head-quarters, where he was to dine. Francis went immediately to Washington and acquainted him with the danger that threatened him. The general having listened with the utmost attention, said:

"My friend, I thank you; your fidelity has saved my life, to what reserve the Almighty alone knows! But now for your safety, I charge you to return to your house, and let not a word of what you have related to me pass your lips; it would involve you in certain ruin; and heaven forbid that your life should be forfeited or endangered by your faith to me. I will take the necessary steps to prevent, and at the same time, discover the instrument of this wicked device."

The next day, about two hours before dinner, he sent for one of his guard, told him of the plot, and requested that he would disguise himself as a female, and go to the kitchen, there to keep a strict watch upon the pease, until they should be served up for table. The young man carefully observed the directions he had received, and had not long been upon his post of duty, before the unfortunate T. H.,* another of the general's guards, came to the door of the kitchen, looked anxiously in, and then passed away. In a few moments after, he returned and approached the hearth where the pease stood, and was about to mingle the deadly substance, when suddenly he shrunk back as though from the sting of the forked-tongued adder, his color changing to the pale hue of death, and his limbs apparently palsied with fear, evidently horror-struck with his own purpose—but soon, however, the operation of a more powerful incitement urged forward his reluctant hand that tremblingly strewed the odious bane, and he left the kitchen, overwhelmed with conflicting passions, remorse and confusion.

"Harold sleeps no more, the cry has reached his heart ere the deed be accomplished," said the youth on duty, in a voice not devoid of pity, as he looked after the self-condemned wretch.

"What, T. H.!" said the commander-in-chief, sorrowfully, upon receiving the information; "can it be possible—so young, so fair, and gentle! He would have been the last person upon whom a suspicion of that nature could have fallen, by right of countenance. You have done well," said he to the youth before him. "Go, join your comrades and be secret."

"The young man went accordingly, and Washington returned to the piazza, where several general officers had assembled, among whom was the hero of Saratoga, who was waiting for further instructions from congress, before he departed for Canada. In a few moments dinner was announced, and the party was ushered into a handsome apartment, where a sumptuous board was spread, covered with all the delicacies of the season.

"The commander-in-chief took his seat, placing General Gates on his right hand, and General Wooster on his left. When the remainder of the officers and company were seated, and eager to commence the duties of the table, the chief said, impressively, "Gentlemen, I must request you to suspend your meal for a few moments. Let the guard attend me."

"All was silence and amazement. The guard entered and formed in a line towards the upper end of the apartment.

"Washington having put upon his plate a spoonful of the pease, fixed his eyes sternly upon T. H., and said,

"Shall I eat of this vegetable?"

"The youth turned pale and became dreadfully agitated, while his trembling lips faintly uttered,

"I don't know."

"Shall I eat of these?" again demanded Washington, raising some upon his knife.

"Here H. elevated his hand, as if by an involuntary impulse, to prevent their being tasted. A chicken was then brought in, that a conclusive experiment might be made in the presence of all those witnesses. The animal ate of the pease and immediately died, and the wretched T. H., overcome with terror and remorse, fell fainting, and was borne from the apartment."

LETTERS FROM CORRESPONDENTS.

GENTLEMEN—In looking over a collection of letters from my friends and correspondents, the following, from the late Dr. Benjamin Rush, arrested my attention, as a communication of peculiar interest, and one which ought not to be confined to the family circle for whose gratification it was communicated.

In the first instance it was addressed to John Adams, the late president of the United States. In September, 1812, the doctor inclosed to me a copy of the same, intended only to be seen by my family and friends. Believing that it will be perused with delight and profit by the reader of taste, correct feelings, and religious sentiments, I send it for insertion in the Mirror. H.

LETTER FROM DR. RUSH TO JOHN ADAMS.

Philadelphia, July 13th, 1812.

"MY DEAR FRIEND—Can you bear to read a letter that has nothing in it about politics or war? I will, without waiting for an answer to this question, trespass upon your patience by writing to you upon another subject.

"I was called on Saturday last to visit a patient, about nine miles from Philadelphia. Being a holiday, I took my youngest son with me, instead of my black servant. After visiting my patient, I recollected I was within three or four miles of the farm on which I was born, and where my ancestors for several generations had lived and died. The day being cool and pleasant, I directed my son to continue our course to it. In approaching, I was agitated in a manner I did not expect. The access was altered, but every thing around was nearly the same as in the days of my boyhood, at which time I left it. I introduced myself to the family that lived there, by telling them at once who I was, and my motives for intruding upon them. They received me kindly, and discovered a disposition to satisfy my curiosity and gratify my feelings. I asked permission to conduct my son up stairs, to see the room in which I drew my first breath, and made my first unwelcome noise in the world, and where first began the affection and cares of my beloved and excellent mother. This request was readily complied with, and my little boy seemed to enjoy the spot. I next asked for a large cedar tree that stood before the door, which had been planted by my father's hand. Our kind host told me it had been cut down seventeen years ago; and then pointed to a piazza in the front of the house, the pillars of which, he said, were made of it. I stepped up to one of the pillars and embraced it. I next inquired for an orchard, planted by my father. He conducted me to an eminence behind the house, and showed me a number of large apple-trees, at a little distance, that still bore fruit, to each of which I felt something like the affection of a brother. The building, which is of stone, bears marks of age and decay. On one of the stones near the front door, I discovered with some difficulty the letters J. R. Before the house flows a small, but deep creek, abounding in pan-fish. The farm consists of ninety acres, all in a highly cultivated state. I knew the owner to be in such easy circumstances, that I did not ask him his price for it; but begged, if he should ever incline to sell it, to make me or one of my surviving sons the first offer, which he promised to do. While I sat in his common room I looked at its walls, and thought how often they had been made vocal by my ancestors, to conversations about wolves and bears and snakes in the first settlement of the farm; afterwards about cows and calves and colts and lambs; and the comparative exploits of reapers and threshers; and at all times with prayers and praises, and chapters read audibly from the bible; for all who inhabited it of my family were pious people, and chiefly of the sect of quakers and baptists. On my way home I stopped to view a family grave-yard, in which were buried three and part of four successive generations, all of whom were the descendants of Captain John Rush, who, with six sons and three daughters, followed William Penn to Pennsylvania, in the year 1683. He commanded a troop of horse under Oliver Cromwell; and family tradition says he was personally known to him, and much esteemed by him as an active and enterprising officer. When I first settled in Philadelphia, I was sometimes visited by one of his grandsons, a man of eighty-five years of age, who had lived with him when a boy, and who often detailed anecdotes from him of the battles in which he had fought under Cromwell; and once mentioned an encomium on his character by Cromwell, when he supposed him to be killed. The late General Darke of Virginia, and General James Irvine, are a part of his numerous posterity; as the successor to the eldest sons of the family, I have been permitted to possess his sword, his watch, and the leaf of his family bible that contains the record of his marriage, and of the birth and names of his children, by his own hand. In walking over the grave-yard, I met with a headstone, with the following inscription:

* See Washington's letter to congress, June 28th, 1776.

"In memory of James Rush, who departed this life March 16th, 1727, aged forty-eight years.

"I've tried the strength of death,
And here lie under ground,
But I shall rise, above the skies,
When the last trump shall sound."

This James Rush was my grandfather. My son, the physician, was named after him. I have often heard him spoken of, as a strong-minded man, and uncommonly ingenious in his business, which was that of a gunsmith. The farm still bears marks of his boring machine. My father inherited both his trade and his farm. While standing near his grave, and recollecting how much of my kindred dust surrounded it, my thoughts became confused, and it was sometime before I could arrange them. Had any or all of my ancestors appeared before me, in their homespun or working-dresses, (for they were all farmers or mechanics,) they would probably have looked at one another, and said, "What means that gentleman, by thus intruding upon us?"

"Dear and venerable friends! be not offended at me. I inherit your blood, and I bear the name of most of you. I come here to claim affinity with you, and to do homage to your christian and rural virtues. It is true, my dress indicates that I move in a different sphere from that in which you passed through life; but have acquired and received nothing from the world which I prize so highly as the religious principles I inherited from you, and I possess nothing that I value so much as the innocence and purity of your characters.

"Upon my return to my family in the evening, I gave them a history of the events of the day, to which they listened with great pleasure; and partook, at the same time, of some cherries, from the limb of a large tree, (supposed to have been planted by my father,) which my little son brought home with him.

"Mr. Pope says there are seldom more than two or three persons in the world who are sincerely afflicted at our death beyond the limits of our own family. It is, I believe, equally true, that there are seldom more than two or three persons in the world who are interested in anything a man says of himself beyond the circle of his own table or fire-side. I have flattered myself that you are one of those two or three persons to whom the simple narrative and reflections contained in this letter will not be unacceptable from, my dear and excellent friend, yours affectionately,

"To JOHN ADAMS, Esq. BENJAMIN RUSH."

It is not our custom to admit articles like the following, but as the writer insists upon it, we suppose there is no appeal. We make it a point to treat old subscribers very respectfully. This is from among a number of communications which have come to hand on the same subject.—Eds. N. Y. Mir.

GENTLEMEN—I have been a regular reader of your paper for the last nine years, and perceived with sincere pleasure the uniform steadiness with which it has strengthened into its present vigor. Neither have the several attacks made upon it at various times and in various places escaped my observation. You seem to be perfectly aware that these, being incidental to every successful literary establishment, are to be considered rather complimentary than otherwise, as nothing can keep you more conspicuously before the public eye, and more effectually enlist our good feelings in your favor, than by letting us see that you are baited by certain classes of critics, whose abuse is infinitely more desirable than their praise.

Since a certain badly written; ill-natured article, which appeared in a certain review, respecting two volumes of poems, I hear there is some talk of striking off another edition; and one knowing old fellow, very weather-wise on literary subjects, proposed stereotyping. It is a grave fact, that the censure of some men, pretending to literary acumen, is so much more valuable than their approbation, that an author, with whom I am well acquainted, finding that one of this gang of critics was too much occupied to "cut up" his book, actually took the pains himself to write a severe philippic against it anonymously, sent it for publication, and forthwith found its good effects in the sale of his work. In the article to which I have referred above there are several assertions so coarsely bigoted and glaringly untrue, that nothing can keep the large and respectable portion of the country to which I allude from being greatly offended, but the fact that they are from a source too insignificant to awaken any feeling so dignified as anger. For instance, that there are no poets in New-England! The public then are dunces, who have admitted Sprague, Percival, Bryant, Wetmore, Halleck, Willis, Pierpont, Miller, and others to that distinction. When such a broad and sweeping denunciation is uttered to the world, from the pages of a journal professing an interest in American literature, it is curious to learn where they come from. Who is the author? What pledge has he himself given to the country he thus insults, of his capacity either to criticize or to write? I should be happy, indeed, with your permission, to review his literary works. When a man's taste is so fastidious as to reject the compositions of such as I have named, it would be interesting to read some of his own offsprings, which one naturally would expect to find excellent indeed. But, until I have leisure for that task, may I insist upon your inserting a few lines to a gentleman who has, in the present instance, gained more distinction from the malignant bigotry of his writings than he ever could from their literary interest or merit. H.

A POETICAL PORTRAIT.

A doctor and a poet!—wondrous man!
Killing his victims every way he can.
His form a failure nature threw away
Before the soul was finished, or the clay;
Laughing to see, as o'er the earth it strayed,
What active feats the angry fragment played;
Mad as the cur through careless crowd that flies,
Barking betrays his vice, and biting dies.
Lo where he sits, while all around him lie
The various tools which dunces rashly ply—
A mortar, paper, pestle, ink, scales, pen;
Now he weighs powders, mixes verses then,
Regarding either with attention close,
Careful of each to give an ample dose.
Pity you not the unsuspecting wight
Who has to swallow what he makes to-night?
A query—which one would you rather be,
Who takes his medicine, or his poetry?
Though both the draughts be seen with loathing deep,
His patients die—his readers only sleep.
Aspiring bard! determined to be great,
If fate's against him, then in spite of fate.
Fortune, his foe, to give him brains forgot;
"Write," says the devil, "doctor, brains or not."
The devil urged him wisely—for you know
It is to him that all his writings go,
And he has hopes, if rumor whisper true,
In a short time to get the doctor too.
At it he went—tales, novels, verses, prose,
A hundred "offsprings!"—what, heaven only knows;
For nobody (the world's so dull sometimes)
Would either take his physic or his rhymes.
There was a novel—it was pretty—very—
So soft, so beautiful, so visionary;
A duodecimo—with blue board cover—
Damp from the press, and Washington the lover!
Yes, tears of love assuaged his martial fire,
And the young woman's first name was—Maria.
The doctor showed a laudable discretion
To make the general declare his passion.
He walked him out beneath a shady tree,
And there they sat and sighed, both he and she:
And when their feelings swelled to overflowing,
They took their spoons and went to eating pudding!
Supper the name, I know and love it well—
But it's a rather doubtful word to spell,
And not at all poetic—though at times
More easily swallowed than the doctor's rhymes.
Great doctor, greater poet, critic too,
He's done what England strove in vain to do—
A thing he should reflect with pride upon:
Degraded—made a fool of Washington!

Extract from the novel alluded to above.

"SCENE—A lawn—a wide-spreading tree—a table—a white napkin—a large bowl of suppers and milk—birds singing—scented zephyrs—General Washington and Maria seated upon a bench.—"Oh, Maria," said Washington, looking unutterable things, and laying his right hand upon his heart. "Oh, George!" said Maria, doing the same thing, "Oh!"—They eat the suppers and milk."

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE F. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, MARCH 24, 1832.

Editor's study.—We had been reading newspapers last night for hours—opening, and spreading out one after another, the great damp sheets of the large heap, collected from every part of the world. Although many of these are conducted with ability, they seldom furnish matter of which we can avail ourselves to any extent. There are two or three leading subjects, running like great rivers through the broad field of the American public press. Many of which we have ventured to exclude from our columns, not because they are uninteresting, but because they are so everlastingly and so universally discussed elsewhere. There are rail-roads, for example. If these ingenious inventions were as much multiplied in reality over the country, as are the innumerable accounts of them, we should take tea in Charleston this evening, and be back time enough for our drudgery to-morrow. Then the cholera rides triumphantly through a thousand columns, breaking in upon the Georgia missionaries—the party politics—

Mr. Clay—Mr. Van Buren—the United States Bank—the police reports—the reform bill, &c. &c. &c. The necessity of reading newspapers is imperative on an editor. He must know how the world is moving. It would be amusing to peruse a journal conducted by one who drew only on his own memory or imagination for matter, without being enlightened upon the vast changes in every thing continually going on around him. There is, nevertheless—there must be—there is no use of denying it, a dash of charlatanism about an editor. He must give off hasty opinions. We have turned over in bed at night when the solemn clock pealed one, as an editorial recollection passed through our heart—a truth omitted—an error made—an assertion boldly laid down in the light of day, but stealing up to our memory in these silent and lonely hours, like a ghost. We feel we are not always on firm ground, and, yesterday, with the formidable mass of journals piled up by our side, thoughts of them, and of our own among them, rose up slowly in our mind. What wrong things must be in them?—how much are they tinged by interest—by passion? How an intelligent man, of three or four centuries back, would stare to peruse them? how a well-informed one, three centuries hence, would smile! Well, we trudged on, hoping to glean here and there, some witty observations, or choice remark for thee, kind reader, whose gratification is the ultimate end of all our labors. There were some fine things about the anti-masons, and the Rio de Janeiro flour market; but flour markets and anti-masonry interest not you. Even the latest from Liverpool, or the proceedings of both the houses, would not be received from our pages with any satisfaction; at least, if we admit them, they must be stripped of their daily apparel, and newly clothed in a garb of wit or fancy.

These, and similar reflections, revolved through our minds as a huge sheet, with the late centennial anniversary, in large type, at the head of a column, lay spread out before us on the table. We commenced it; but running our glance to the end, perceived that the next article was congressional analysis, and the next general sessions' sentence day. The fire murmured with a drowsier hum—the candle-wicks lengthened and darkened. The thought of a hushed green wood passed over us, with a silvery brook, "that spoiled and pretty child of nature," leaping and flashing on its course—and we fell asleep.

Dreams! what wonderful creations they are!—what a dim, strange, wild world they open to us! What a repetition, a continuation, and reconstruction of our actual mind!—what phantasmagoria of reality—shifting—changing—magnified into colossal dimensions, stretching away into vast interminable regions—broad, deep, high. How the thoughts of the waking life pass into the imagination of the sleeper! What capricious metamorphoses—what amalgamation of remote things! We are different creatures. Every thing around is different. Wonderful sleep! It gives us a new existence. It is as completely an enchanter as any of the genii in old fables. Does it not take us from where we are? At the touch of its spell, do we not float over incalculable distances? Yes. We are transformed by a superior power; we have command over armies; we pass into magnificent scenes; the prisoner mounts with the eagle; the sick man strides again, vigorous and happy; foreign climes return us their inhabitants; the grave opens its dark portals, and yields back its inmates. But dreams, although not reality, take their materials from it. As we sank into slumber, a vast arena opened around us, thronged with phantoms. At first a multitude, mighty, compact, endless, nothing but faces; all busy, all marked by vivid expression; laughing, shrieking, writhing with pain, pale, bleeding, dying. Then came a cry. Thousands, millions of voices swelling on the wind. The plague was rolling over them—the cholera. It floated by like a dark cloud, sending its bolts here and there, and striking to death the shrinking crowds below. While we gazed, beams of light burst in, and all the mass assumed motion, rapid, joyous motion. We were in a land of rail-roads. Thousands of cars whizzed by us, up and down, like shooting stars; then we were whirled away, and went on floating and floating over cities, mountains, and oceans, till we alighted in England, by St. Paul's church. And so, we said, with a calm delighted wonder—there it is!—we are here at last. This stupendous dome that we have so often longed to see—and now we do see it. It even occurred to us that we might be dreaming, but that was improbable—the idea was dismissed immediately. Then we wandered through the endless streets, and visited all that we had ever seen in engravings—the bridges, the squares, the palaces, the myriads of people, who suddenly took us by force and made us king. We were sure we had merit, and wondered that it had never been discovered before. It was very fine this. We rode through a vast park, in a carriage drawn by twelve horses, but multitudes came thronging about us, and pressing on us, crying out "reform." We had got into the "reform bill," that the English talk so much of; and then castles came tumbling about us, and houses were set on fire, and an old man came up, slapped us on the back, saying he was Charles the Tenth, and asking how we liked royalty. Then, by one of the most natural accidents in the world, we found ourselves swimming in the great freshet at Albany, and Walter Scott came up and helped us out. We looked at him very reservedly, for we had committed a murder—did not like company, were very pale and wet, and flung back the curls from our high forehead—in short, we were Eugene Aram—shuddering—flying—pursued—caught, and dragged out for execution. We should certainly have been hanged—only our boy came in, and asked for "copy," and we awoke; and so end the dreams of an editor.

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

TO MISS A—N,

WHO TOLD ME THAT I WOULD SOON FORGET HER.

Oh, ever since that hour of glee,
 When first I gladly met thee,
 I never have forgotten thee—
 I never can forget thee!

I've seen the flashing of thine eye
 On every sunshine beam:
 Through the long day I've heard thy sigh,
 And watched thee in my dream.

I gazed upon the rose so fair,
 Sweet emblem of thy cheek.
 When music breathed upon the air—
 I thought I heard thee speak.

Thy slender form I loved to trace
 In youthful beauty proud,
 And catch the outline of thy face
 Upon the summer cloud.

Forget thee?—sooner shall mankind
 Make Mr. B—t sheriff;
 Young roses woo the wintry wind,
 Or W—r praise the tariff.

Sooner the nation fit shall see,
 (And faith 'twould be just like her,)
 For judge to put in J—n T—gee,
 And put out Mr. R—r.

Sooner the ocean shall be dry,
 Nor tempests known to blow there;
 And somebody will cease to cry,
 "Kape silence down below there!"

Sooner than all these wondrous things,
 Events more strange shall be,
 Than all my young imaginings
 Shall cease to cling to thee.

When'er you find a statesman wise,
 No more an office seeking;
 When modest worth, like mine, shall rise,
 Or Mr. C—y cease speaking.

Not even then my heart will change,
 Nor then my passion move;
 Nor things more horrible and strange,
 Can wean thee from my love.

No, though to happen it should come,
 The city-hall should budge;
 Though any chancellor be dumb,
 Or deaf be any judge;

Though old Hays civil should be seen;
 Though B—n doff his hat;
 Though Mr. S—n should grow lean,
 Or Mr. N—n fat.

No, by my every hope I swear,
 By beauty's smile and frown;
 Though Mr. Clarke should cut his hair,
 And wear his collar down;

Though I myself should write as bad
 As many others do;
 And girls no more be corset mad,
 To squeeze themselves in two;

Though some huge sheers were made to clip
 This mighty world apart;
 Yet would thy name be on my lip—
 Thine image in my heart!

MISERIES OF HUMAN NATURE.

It is very common to tell the young that human nature is deceitful and depraved. In our journey of life we are, doubtless, annoyed with numerous gloomy discoveries; but are we not also delighted with many that are agreeable? There is much misery and guilt hidden beneath the surface of society, but there is also much happiness and virtue. There are innumerable beautiful traits of human nature which do not address themselves to the eye of the casual observer, but which, nevertheless, exist, and which if they could be forever seen on the surface, would make the world appear an Eden.

WITNESSES.

In every law-case there must necessarily be a great portion of the truth excluded from the fact that it does not appear in the exact form prescribed by law, or from other circumstances. For example: you have been wronged by a rascal. The only person who knows the truth would accidentally be a gainer by the decision of the suit in your favor. No one really suspects that he would perjure himself for a trivial pecuniary advantage—but no matter—he is an incompetent witness, and you lose your cause. Witnesses have much to answer for. Without absolutely swearing falsely, they can throw a false coloring over a transaction, and prejudice the minds of a jury. This is often carried very far even by good and sensible men. It is so easy to exaggerate, to misrepresent manner, to misconstrue motive, to make accident seem malicious, and insult accidental. I have heard persons of general irreproachable character swear exactly contrary to each other in a point which they swore both beheld. Whoever has watched the progress and development of a trial, must have seen this strikingly illustrated. I believe a passionate bigoted witness may, without actually perjuring himself, commit all the evil of perjury. I am certain it is often done.

BOYHOOD—YOUTH—MANHOOD—AGE.

In boyhood we trust every body and every thing, and we love indiscriminately. Disappointment cures us of this; we often pass from one extreme to another, and look around us with a universal suspicion. A false friend—and we think there is no such thing as friendship. A deceitful mistress—and we forswear women, and deride love. We witness the perpetration of crime—and conclude all mankind depraved. Then our feelings of horror and anguish subside, and leave us more sober, and less liable to error, to hope, to despair. Many enter manhood as a traveler comes into a darkened room from the glare and dazzle of sunshine without. At first it is a deep darkness, but gradually, as the wonderful eye adapts itself to the shadow, many objects become visible which were not seen before. What is it that we discover then when the first shock of a contact with the rough world is over and has left us apparently broken down, exhausted, and misanthropic? Many are the beautiful things which then rise upon the more quiet imagination, and which, like the moon and stars, slowly ascending the silent and vast concave of heaven, after the departure of the

"Gaudy, babbling, and remorseful day," are loved more than the splendors which we were at first fain to regret. We discover single friendships, domestic love, tempered with reason and experience. We discover new and more rational hopes, opinions, and enjoyments. We find sweet recesses, into which we can retire from the jostle and roar of the great moving world. We are then, as a mariner who has been cast by the waves of the ocean upon the beach of some beautiful island, which he never could have known had the winds with which he embarked on his voyage, held him fair on his course.

THOUGHTS OF AN OLD MAN.

I have been as often disappointed in fear as hope. If many events which delighted me have produced evil consequences, so many which made me afraid, turned out to be blessings in disguise. I never did a wrong action without being ashamed of it, and afterwards regretting it generally with bitter remorse. I never performed a virtuous one without being eventually heartily glad of it. The external consequences of actions furnish no standard by which to measure their influence on the happiness of him by whom they are committed.

ADVANTAGE OF MARRIAGE.

A man gets a kind of respectability from the mere fact of having a family. I have hushed my passion when about to retort insolently to another when I thought of his children.

TYPOGRAPHICAL ERROR.—As for me, I confess with pride and pleasure that I am an obscene person.

ENGLISH LITERATURE.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES OF DISTINGUISHED WRITERS.

CHATTERTON.

To a person of even a slight literary turn, there are few hours of more calm enjoyment than those spent in reading, or solitary thought, in his library. The enticements of company or dissipation may exhilarate more for a time; but the keenest sensations are always the shortest lived, and the brief hour of riotous enjoyment is generally followed by a long period of weariness, pain, or repentance. There is nothing very exciting, to be sure, in an evening spent quietly at home among one's books; but, at all events, it is a cheap and innocent pleasure; and when the genial flame dances and crackles in the newly replenished grate, when the blazing candles at our elbow shed a flood of light over the pages of our book, and as the curling smoke of a fresh cigar spreads around its "cloud of rich distilled perfume," we, for one, look complacently on the scene before us, as the very picture of comfort. The reader, by his library fire, is, like Selkirk, "monarch of all he surveys," in this his peopled solitude. He need not try to shine when he would fain be silent, nor feign good humor when his spirit is sad. He is not called upon to amuse an uncongenial companion, nor is the free flow of his thoughts broken in upon by any impertinent interruption. If he would rather converse with others than himself, he does not want society. Companions of all sorts are around him, whom he can take up when he pleases, lay aside when he is tired of them, flatter, or censure, as he sees fit, without fear of offence; and who, though mute themselves, speak to his mind and heart as powerfully as any living voice could do it. He can pass from gravity to mirth, from benevolence to satire, unchecked and uncensored for his wayward flights. Or if he would rather "commune with his own heart and be still," where will his thoughts be so likely to be raised, enlarged, and purified as when he sees himself surrounded by the living monuments of the great and good of other days in a place which it needs little stretch of fancy to suppose is filled with their influence, and instinct with their presence?

It does not take away from the attractiveness of our employment, that a shade of melancholy will sometimes steal over the mind, softening, though not darkening the shades of thought. We know not but others may call it a fanciful weakness, but to us there is often something melancholy in looking at the motley array of volumes around us, and tracing the names on their backs, in which, as in inscriptions on a monument, their merits are set out in all the splendor of gilding. When I take up the works of some poor, despised, unhappy man of genius, I often reflect on the sorrows he endured during life, that after death his writings might give me pleasure. I cannot but think, as I cast my eyes around the names on my shelves, how many of these men were persecuted and hated, how many pined and starved, that they might one day win the applause of strangers, and be renowned among a generation that knew them not. When this feeling is strong upon me, I cannot take up the Jerusalem Delivered without a sigh for Tasso's captivity; the Lusiad reminds me that Camoens died in a hospital; in Don Quixote I see an eternal monument of infamy to the nation which let the soldier, scholar, and wit die in poverty; and then my heated fancy brings before me Milton's blindness and obscurity; Butler's neglected wretchedness; Otway's beggary and starvation. I visit Galileo in his dungeon, Dante in his exile, Kirke White on his death-bed. I drop a tear over the early grave of Chatterton: from his death I trace upward the course of his life. I see an untaught peasant boy, a child of fourteen, deceiving the best judges by his skillful imitations of antiquity, and discovering as much creative as imitative genius. I see him, not rewarded, encouraged, and assisted to cultivate his talent, but pining in unknown poverty, till the springs of life stand still for want of nourishment. I see him putting an end, in a moment of despair, to a life of misery, and then a cloud shrouds him from my sight. There is not, I think, in the annals of human suffering, a more undeserved, affecting fate than this of him,

"The sleepless boy, who perished in his pride."

A feeling of bitter indignation will, indeed, sometimes mingle with our pity, and we will deem, that as his life was no blessing to him, so the loss of it should not be regretted, and that it was better for him to perish even by an untimely, a bloody, and a guilty death, than to live on, tormented at once by pride and want; to feel himself sinking into the depths of despair, yet look in vain for a friendly hand to rescue him; and, if he escaped the gnawing pangs of a death by hunger, sooner or later to fall a victim, like the self-destroying scorpion, to the keen sting of his own fierce emotions. But comfort might yet have visited his wretched garret, and joy have lighted up his pallid features. He had scarcely entered on the threshold of life. Better things were even then in store for him. An eminent member of the university of Oxford took a journey to Bristol, on purpose to ascertain the genuineness of Chatterton's forgeries, and to patronize him, if found to be the author, but he arrived only to hear that he had poisoned himself a few days before in London. He died at the age of seventeen years and five months, young in years but old in vexation, disappointment, and sorrow. Born of humble parents, with no encouragement to study, no guide to his taste, he was a student in his very infancy, and in his twelfth year made a list of the books he had read, amounting to seventy, chiefly history and divinity. Unfortunately, too, he had even at this tender age, not only the zeal and application, but the wayward unhappy temperament of precocious genius; and, before he fairly entered into life, was old in those gloomy forebodings of blasted hopes and blighted triumphs, which, however they may darken our riper age, are so seldom permitted to cloud the joyous face of childhood.

The bent of his mind towards antiquarian studies is as remarkable as the development of it in his famous poems of Rowley. Before he could read, says his mother, he fell in love with the illuminated capitals of an old French manuscript. From this she taught him his letters, and he learned to read from an old black-letter bible. He borrowed all the old dictionaries he could lay hands on, and wrote to a friend in New-York, requesting him to make him a collection of all the "hard words" in the English language. At the age of fourteen we find him indentured as clerk to an attorney, where he passed a couple of years, copying precedents, and sharing with his master's servants their menial duties and menial fare. In this uncongenial situation, and at this early age, were the Poems of Rowley written. As a fiction, this deserves more credit for boldness than ingenuity, for the simple and awkward plot of deceit was no more than this. The office of sexton of Redcliffe church had been for a long time in his father's family. In an old lumber-room were preserved a number of title-deeds and other papers relating to the church, belonging to a Master Canyng, who lived in the time of Edward the fourth and Henry the seventh. Chatterton, in pretending to have discovered Aella's tragedy, and other poems, by Master Canyng, and his friend Thomas Rowley, a secular priest of Bristol. These he produced gradually, and always in fragments. He contradicted himself several times as to the way in which he obtained them; but this, to some infatuated lovers of antiquity, was only an additional proof that he wished to be thought the author of them, but was not. They argued their age from the ancient appearance of the manuscripts: to this it was answered, that all the old deeds had a margin of six or eight inches, which could be easily removed, and none of Chatterton's fragments exceeded that size. A still more stubborn fact was opposed to their prejudice, that these pretended poems of the fifteenth century contain several allusions to the art of knitting, which was then unknown. But the strongest argument against their antiquity is drawn from internal evidence, from the poems themselves. The words and spelling alone are antiquated, the style is modern. It has none of the labored, heavy declamation, the cumbrous learning, quaint sententiousness, and ruggedness of verse, which disfigured the poetry of that early day; but displays the polish, refinement, and easy flow of a more cultivated era. The words alone are of the fifteenth century, all the rest of the eighteenth. Yet many men of learning and judgment contended most obstinately for their genuineness. Dr. Miller, president of the Antiquarian Society, Langhorne, Bryant, and Matthias, maintained their ancient origin; which was successfully denied by Tyrwhitt, Horace Walpole, Malone, Gray, Hayley, and Johnson. It argues little for the penetration of the critical world that they could be thus grossly deceived; yet they seem not to have learnt caution from experience, for the detection of Chatterton's forgery did not make them any clearer-sighted to discover Ireland's. Chatterton's plan was certainly sufficiently clumsy. But that an uneducated boy of fourteen should have struck out so bold, singular, and original a path to fame, is one of the most extraordinary phenomena in the history of genius. His plan was long meditated, and he had prepared several other spurious fragments, to be published if the first were completely successful. He bestowed more care on them than on his avowed compositions; this sort of anonymous immortality was the height of his ambition. In his own character, says his biographer, he wrote for bread and the booksellers, in that of Rowley for fame and eternity; and there are occasional passages in them, whose beauty not even their uncouth mock antique dress can entirely conceal.

It is a melancholy task to follow his short life through its sad vicissitudes of brief success, and long harrowing anxiety. He left Bristol for London, and at the age of sixteen commenced the precarious life of an author. He was at first successful, and already exulted in anticipated triumph; but distress soon threatened him, and poverty stared him in the face. He had no friends to whom to apply, and if otherwise, his untameable pride would have spurned any relief at their hands. He who had confidently dreamed of soon rolling in wealth, was for weeks in actual want of food. The gnawing pains of hunger, and the fierce pangs of disappointed ambition, and wounded yet rebellious pride, were too much for a young and impatient spirit to endure. Life was a burden heavier than he could bear, and he laid it down. With more steadiness and principle, he would have known how to discipline without enervating his genius, and learned none but wholesome lessons in the hard school of misfortune. But he was a petted, spoiled child of genius; and it seemed as though Apollo, when he gave him his soaring talents, had made them useless, as he did of old Cassandra's gift of prophecy. He devoured every sort of books, but without method or plan; he tried every variety of composition, seeming to believe that his ability was as universal as his ambition. The different faculties of his mind did not ripen together; his feelings were more developed than his faculties of observation and discernment, and the will to do outwent the power. His fancy was strong, his reason weak, his mind active, his body feeble, and the intellectual inhabitant "o'er informed its tenement of clay." He is not to be estimated by the common rules of judgment: he was a prodigy, a wonder; and, like all prodigies, all deviations from the common course of nature, he serves rather for a warning than an example. No one surely would envy him his talents, when he sees the untimely grave they dug for him; and, while we admire his precocious genius, we should rather rejoice than regret that there are so few instances of untimely, unhappy distinction. SKETCHES BY A BRIEFLESS LAWYER.

TRESSASS ON THE CASE.

THE following is one of the counts in a declaration I received one morning from a note from a gentleman with whom I was lately engaged, in order to be read at the court at my office in the evening, and consult me about a defence.

"For that whereas the said William S— contriving and wrongfully and unjustly intending to injure the said James W—, and to deprive him of the service and assistance of Mary F—, the ward and servant of him the said James W—, heretofore, to wit," (here followed the allegation, and the count continued:) "by means of which said several premises, she, the said Mary F—, for a long space of time, to wit, from the day and year first above mentioned, hitherto became and was unable to do or perform the necessary affairs and business of the said James W—, so being her guardian and master as aforesaid, and thereby he, the said James W—, during all that time, lost, and was deprived of the service of his said ward and servant at — aforesaid."

Such are the legal terms in which one of the most extraordinary cases that ever came under my notice, was stated. The plaintiff I knew to be a man of wealth and high standing in society; and the ward, for whom he brought this suit, I had also known a year before as the reigning belle of —. And proudly, for a brief period, did she reign. Young, talented, beautiful, and rich, she possessed attractions for all classes of men, and her admirers were in proportion to her attractions. But, without any apparent cause for so doing, she had suddenly withdrawn herself from society, and, at the time I received the note from my client, I had not heard of or seen her for months.

The defendant I had been in the habit of meeting in society, but had little acquaintance with him. He could not, I think, have been over two-and-twenty at that time. His appearance, at first sight, was anything but attractive. One of his legs had, in his youth, been broken by a fall, and having been badly set, became so crooked, that when he stood upon one leg, the foot of the other was five or six inches from the ground. His head was beautifully formed, and highly intellectual in its character. On his broad and noble forehead, thought had already affixed its impress; and in his clear calm eye there was an indication of mind which could not be mistaken. His manner was reserved, and, in general, perfectly collected; but I had noticed in him, at times, an impatience of observation, and a morbid sensibility on the subject of his deformity. He appeared to shrink from any thing like familiarity from either sex; and, at the time I first met him in society, apparently had no other object than to hang on the outskirts of the circle which the beautiful girl, for whom this action was brought, always drew around her—to watch the changes of her countenance, and catch every word that fell from her lips. Afterwards, they were both so much occupied with one another, when I saw them, as most effectually to preclude the possibility of an intimacy with others.

I was, most probably, indebted to the following incident for my retainer on this occasion.

At a ball, given in honor of the birthday of Miss F—, by her guardian, I observed S—, towards the close of the entertainment, assisting a young lady, who was, apparently, very much agitated, in ascending the stairs which led to the ladies' dressing-room. The circumstance did not excite much attention in me at the time, as I thought it probable it was some lady, who, from the excessive heat of the dancing-room, had become faint. A few moments afterwards, I made my adieus, and ascended to the gentlemen's apartment. While I was putting on my over-coat S— rushed into the room, in the greatest agitation, looked wildly and searchingly around, and then running up to me and clasping my hand in both of his, begged me to get some water and come to his assistance in the adjoining chamber. I caught up a pitcher, which stood on a stand in one corner, and hurriedly followed him. He turned around as I entered, and exclaimed, "She's dead, she's dead!" in a tone of agony and despair, which I shall never forget. On a sofa, lifeless and pale as marble, lay the lovely girl, in honor of whom the fete had been given. Her eyes were closed, and her hair, long and dishevelled, partially concealing her face, had spread over her neck and shoulders. My first impression was that she was dead; but, having sprinkled a little water in her face, and felt her pulse, I discovered that she had only fainted. She soon began to give evidences of returning life, and S—, who had hitherto stood motionless, gazing intently upon her, suddenly sprang towards her, and pushing me hastily aside, clasped her passionately in his arms; then turning to me said, "bind me to you forever; lead Miss F— down stairs, and account for her faintness by the heat. I will see you at your house to-night."

He left the room. I approached Miss F—, (who had, on observing me, hid her face with her hands, and appeared so much agitated that I was fearful she would again faint,) and gently taking her hand, expressed my anxiety for her health, and my fear lest the closeness of the room, with her exertions to entertain her friends, had injured it, led her down stairs; and, after a few words of explanation to her mother, took my leave.

I did not find S— at my house, as I expected. From that time he appeared studiously to avoid me, and never, during our occasional meetings afterwards, did he allude to the extraordinary scene I had witnessed. But I am persuaded, as I before remarked, that I owed my retainer more to the fact that I was acquainted with the above details, than to any estimation in which he might have held my professional attainments.

As he had promised in the note mentioned at the commencement of this communication, S— called upon me in the evening. After a few remarks on common-place topics, he entered upon the business of our meeting. He professed himself unable to conceive the object of Miss F— or her guardian, in bringing her to me. It was known to them, he said, that he had come into the possession of a fortune, which had raised him from indigence to comparative opulence; but he thought the desire of obtaining damages could not have prompted them to a proceeding so fraught with ruinous disclosures and shame.

After a vain attempt by interrogatories to gain some information from him by which I could reconcile the present conduct of Miss F— with the character I had known her—a proud, high-spirited, and admired female—I ceased my questioning, and frankly told S— my perplexity.

"You are already acquainted," said he, in answer, "with some portion of my intercourse with Miss F—, and I do not know why I should hesitate on an occasion like this, to give you a brief account of the origin of our intimacy, and its continuance down to this time. You may perhaps remember, that about two years since I came to this place, and commenced the study of the law. I had chosen it as a profession, and at that time supposed I should have to depend upon it for a future support. For the first six months after my arrival I strenuously resisted all the attempts of my friends to draw me into society, and devoted myself most ardently and diligently to my profession. At the expiration of this time, a favorite cousin arrived in —, and a few days afterwards I yielded to her earnest and pressing solicitations, and accompanied her to a large evening party. I was leaning on the arm of an acquaintance, gazing listlessly on the gay and brilliant scene before me, occasionally making some trifling remark, which too often betrayed the little interest I took in it, when my companion, with an exclamation of admiration, drew my attention to a young female, standing near the door, surrounded by half-a-dozen gentlemen. Never had I seen a being more beautiful. But I need not attempt to describe Miss F— to you. There are few who saw her at that time who will soon forget her. The symmetry of her form, and the regularity of her features, attracted but little of my attention on first beholding her. It was in her eyes, and in the expression of her countenance, that I found cause for admiration; and I gazed until admiration was changed to wonder, as I saw there the different emotions of the soul portrayed. As I looked towards her she turned, her face beaming with a mingled expression of delight and surprise, to answer some remark with which she was evidently pleased. A moment afterwards I saw her lip curl with scorn, and her eye flash, as she replied to some impudent observation of one of these pests of society, denominated 'fashionable young men.'

"I begged my friend to introduce me. He readily offered compliance, and we walked towards her. During the time I had been gazing, the circle around her had considerably increased. My friend caught her eye as we approached, and presented me. She merely bent her head, and taking no further notice of me, continued her conversation. I was somewhat chagrined at the indifference with which she received me, but lingered near her, intending to take an opportunity to address her. She apparently was aware of my object, and seemed determined not to indulge me. I was twice on the point of speaking, when she carelessly looked another way. At length I addressed her, and in rather an embarrassed manner made some trifling observation on the heat of the room. Without making any reply, she turned away, with a haughty toss of the head, and spoke in an under tone to a gentleman who was standing on the other side of her. I was confounded; but my astonishment was soon changed to indignation, when I heard her make use of the terms, stranger and impertinence, in such a manner as to leave no doubt that they were applied to me. I soon afterwards left the house, and hurried to my room. It was in vain that I racked my brain to discover some cause for this extraordinary treatment. I could attribute it to nothing but a wanton disregard of the forms and decencies of society, or to some sudden dislike she had taken to me, on account of my deformity. 'Whichever it may be,' I mentally exclaimed, 'she shall repent it. No one, not even a woman, shall treat me with scorn, or regard lightly my claims on their attention.' I never knew why it was that I was so much affected by this occurrence. Such a reception from most women I should have regarded lightly, or have noticed merely by a smile of contempt; but here I felt differently. I was mortified, and deeply offended. In an uncontrollable agony of feeling I brooded over the insult I had endured, which I felt to have been even more an insult when received from the hands of a beautiful woman. I determined that my revenge should be as new as it was signal. I swore in the bitterness of the moment that if I had to sacrifice every other interest of my life, if my way to her should be through mortification, through insult, and through disgrace, I would gain her love. If I humbled myself before her to degradation; if, worm-like, and in the dust, my first advances were to be made, and scorned, I would still pursue. I would crawl up to her in prosperity, I would descend to her in degradation, and in misery; and scorned, and rejected in either situation, I would still persevere. I would approach her in moments of happiness, when her face was radiant, and her pulse beating with delight, and while presenting pleasure's bowl, I would then endeavor to win her affections. I would draw near to her when sorrow had thrown its dark shadow over her, and the 'sun of her happiness had set,' I would dash the cup of misery from her lip, and even then still more seek her love. I would gain it, and then—but I will not anticipate.

"I entered early upon the prosecution of my plan of revenge. The next morning I called and inquired for Miss F—, at her guardian's house, was told that she was engaged, and left my card. From this period no one was a more constant attendant at parties, or more frequently seen at public places than myself. I often advanced to Miss F—, when I met her in society, but was as often coldly repulsed. The most I could gain was a direct, and generally a monosyllabic answer to the questions or observations I addressed to her. But my attention was never withdrawn from her. I embraced every opportunity to study her character. I drew near to her in society, heard her conversation, learned her tastes, her habits, her manner of thinking—and when I had acquired sufficient for my purpose, I made another call. This time I was admitted, but received in such a manner as convinced me I was not welcome. I was not, however, dismayed. I had prepared myself for the visit, and whatever power of pleasing I possessed, was displayed. I turned the conversation on subjects which I knew were agreeable to her, and with which I had made myself conversant. I left her with the conviction that I had risen a step in her estimation. I fear that I am running too much into detail—more so than is necessary to give you a correct understanding of my conduct. I will be less minute.

"My progress in the esteem of Miss F— was slow but sure. I had this advantage: I knew her well and adapted myself to her tastes. I dazzled her mind with the treasures which had rewarded the incessant application of my previous life to study. I 'wooed her imagination in the golden language of poetry,' and words of passion—passion no longer feigned—crowded for utterance.

"Wretch that I am, I am not yet hardened enough to linger over the scenes of this period, when mad with revenge and intoxicated with love, I unrelentingly pursued my devoted victim. I cannot describe my feelings when my hard-earned triumph was completed, and I drew from Miss F— the cause of her treatment of me on our first introduction. In the confidence of unbounded affection, and in the fulness of a contrite heart, self-condemning, and deprecating my resentment, she confessed that my personal deformity had at first excited her contempt. She disliked the haughty manner of one on whom the hand of misfortune had been so ruthlessly laid, and had wished to humble him. She had humbled him—but in doing so, she had destroyed herself.

"You saw us when we awoke from our delirium. It was at her birth-night ball that she implored me to save her from impending disgrace by marriage. She was so agitated by the disclosure she had made, that I persuaded her to ascend to the dressing-room. It was in vain that she here appealed to me again, and on her knees conjured me to rescue her while it was yet possible. The swoon into which she fell on receiving my answer, continued so long that I became alarmed and rang for assistance. I found you. You saw what she suffered; but you could not, you cannot conceive the anguish which tore my bosom. I loved her then, and love her even at this moment; but I can never make her my wife." Here S— closed his narrative. During the latter part of it he had risen from his seat in great agitation, and with a brow alternately pale and flushed, with clenched hands and with a rapid and almost inarticulate utterance, had hurried through its details.

The reader has probably before this come to the same conclusion that I did—that neither Miss F— nor her guardian could seriously intend to prosecute the suit. I was satisfied that they must have been acquainted with the state of S—'s feelings; and had expected that the fear of the ruinous exposure, to a being still dear to him, which must follow a suit, would force him into an alliance. They were not altogether disappointed. I found, on after conversation with S—, that he shrunk with absolute horror from the contemplation of the consequences of a public trial, and that notwithstanding his present declarations, he had at one time resolved to embrace the alternative. I determined to seek an interview with the guardian of Miss F—; and telling S— to call on me in the morning, late as it was, made my way to the residence of Mr. W—. I found him at home and alone, and stated to him at once the subject of my interview with S—. I was not mistaken. He had not only taken this course for the purpose of forcing S— into an alliance, but had taken it without the knowledge of Miss F—. He frankly told me that if these proceedings should not have the effect he desired, he should discontinue them; but wished me for one day to forbear communicating this fact to my client.

I found at our next interview that a night's reflection had produced an entire change in S—'s feelings. He had resolved on a marriage with Miss F—, not only as a matter of justice to her, but as an expiatory sacrifice for the indulgence of his revengeful passions. But when I mentioned the fact that Miss F— was altogether ignorant of the measures that had been taken by her guardian, and that he had no intention of proceeding further, S— could hardly contain himself. He could not, he said, too soon do justice to an injured woman, and hurried out of my office, exclaiming that he was the happiest fellow in the world.

No apology, I presume, is necessary for the publication of the foregoing incidents. They are already so widely spread, and are so well known, that the mere fact of their being in print will add but little to their notoriety. I have adhered as closely as possible to the circumstances as they came under my observation, and disregarded entirely the thousand rumors afloat upon the subject. This narrative furnishes another evidence that truth is far more strange than fiction; and, although I lost my suit, I hope my readers will do me the justice to believe that I felt no regret at continuing "a briefless lawyer."

HUMORS OF A YOUNG MAN ABOUT TOWN.

NUMBER THREE.

THE AMBUSCADE—IN IMITATION OF SCOTT.*

The mountain tops are bright above,
The lake is bright beneath—
And the mist is seen, the rocks between,
In a silver shroud to wreath.
Merrily on the maple spray
The blue-bird trills her roundelay,
And the red-bird blithely flits among
The boughs where her pendent nest is hung;
The squirrel his morning revel keeps
In the chestnut's leafy screen,
And the fawn from the thicket gaily leaps
To gambol upon the green.
Now on the broad lake's waters blue
Dances many a light canoe;
And banded there in wampum sheen,
Many a crested chief is seen;
Now as the foamy fringe they break,
Which the waves where they kiss the margin make,
The shallows shoot on the snowy strand,
And the plumed warriors leap to land.
They bear their pirogues of birchen bark
Far in the shadowy forest glade,
And plunge them deep in covert dark
Of the closely woven hazel shade;
Then stealthily tread in each other's track,
And with wary step come gliding back.
And when the water again is won
Unlace the beaded mockason,
And covering first with careful hand
The footmarks dash'd in the yielding sand,
Round jutting point and dented bay
Through the wave they take their winding way.
Awhile their painted forms are seen
Gleaming along the margin green,
And then the sunny lake is left—
Where issuing from a mountain cleft—
Above whose bold impending height
The dusky larch excludes the light,
The current of a rivulet
Conceals their wary footsteps yet
Scaling the rocks, where strong and deep
Abrupt the waters foaming leap,
Along the stream they bending creep,
Where the hanging birch's tassels sweep,

* The subject of the above attempt to describe in the style of Scott one of the many incidents in the annals of our frontier warfare, that are so peculiarly suited to the genius of "the minstrel of Border chivalry," is a tradition kept in a romantic part of this state, of an armed band having been lost to a man by being precipitated from the banks of a narrow and deep ravine during a sudden conflict with a war-party of the Six-Nations.

Thread the witch-hazel and alder-maze,
Where in broken rills the streamlet strays,
And reach the spot where its oozy tide
Steals from the mountain's shaggy side.

Now where wild vines their tendrils fling,
From crag to crag their forms they swing,
Some boldly find a footing where
The mountain-cat would hardly dare;
Others as lightly onward bound
As the frolic chipmunk skips the ground,
Till all the midway mountain gain
And there once more collected meet,
Where on the eagle's wild domain
The morning sunbeams fiercely beat.

There's a glen upon that mountain side,
A sunny dell expanding wide,
Where the eye that looks through the green arcade
Of cliffs in vines and shrubs arrayed,
Sees many a silver stream and lake
Upon its rapturous vision break:
That sunny dell has its opening bright,
Almost within an arrow's flight,
Of a narrow gorge, whose upper side
Rank weeds and furze as closely hide,
As if some frolic fays had plied
Their skill in weaving osiers green,
And thus in elvish freak had tried
Its gloomy mouth to screen.

'Tis a chasm beneath the wooded steep,
Where the brain will swim and the blood will creep,
When its dizzy edge is seen,
And the Fiend will prompt the heart to leap,
When the eye would measure the yawning deep
Of that hideous ravine.

Far down the gulf in distance dim
The bat will oft at noontide skim,
The rattlesnake like a shadow glides
Through poisonous weeds in its shelvy sides,
While swarming lizards loathsome crawl
Where the green damp stands on the slimy wall,
And the venomous copper-snake's heard to hiss
On the frightful edge of that black abyss.

Here in the feathery fern—between
The tangled thicket's matted screen,
Their weapons hid, save where a blade
From straggling ray reflection made,
The Mohawk warriors lay.

The morning sees them gather there
And crouch within their heathy lair—
The scorching sun at noontide hour
Still finds them in their leafy bower,
And when the mantle gray
Of sombre twilight slowly fell
O'er rocky height and wooded dell,
They waited for their prey.

How slow the languid hours move,
How long to him their lapse appear,
To whom remorse, or fear, or love,
Does in each lingering moment prove
The gathered agony of years.

But o'er the Indian warrior's soul,
Uncounted and unheeded roll
Hours, like these in watching spent,
The moments that he knows within
When on the glorious War-Path sent,
Are calm as those which usher in
The thunders of the firmament.

The moose hath left the rushy brink
Where he steals to the lake at eve to drink,
And sought his lair in thicket dark,
Lit only by the fire-fly's spark.
Now the far heaven's veil of blue
The restless stars pervading through,
Seem o'er the wave reflected spread
To pave with studs of gold its bed.
Now as upon the western hills,
The moon her mystic circle fills,
Against the sky each cliff is flung,
As if at magic touch it sprang.
And as the wood her beam receives,
The dew-drops in that virgin light,
Pendent from the quivering leaves,
Sparkle upon the pall of night.

Deep in the linden's foliage hid,
Complains the peevish katydid,
And the shrill screech-owl answers back,
From tulip-tree and tamarak.
At times along the placid lake,
A solitary trout will break;
And rippling eddies on the stream,
In trembling circles faintly gleam.
While near the sedgy shore is heard
The plash of that ill-omened bird,*
Whose dismal note and boding cry,
Will oft the startled ear assail,
When lowering clouds obscure the sky,
And when the tempest gathers nigh,
Come quivering in the rising gale.

Oh, why cannot that loon's wild shriek,
To them a feeble warning speak,
Whose proudly waving banner now
Comes floating round the mountain's brow;

Whose gallant ranks in close array,
Now gleam along the moon-lit way;
And now with many a break between,
Are winding through the long ravine?

Oh, why cannot that loon's wild shriek,
To them a feeble warning speak!
Who careless press a foe's man's sod,
As if in banquet-hall they trod;
Who rashly thus undaunted dare
To chase in woods the forest child,
To hunt the panther to his lair,
The Indian in his native wild?

Unapprehensive thus, at night
The wild deer looking from the brake,
To where there gleams a fitful light
Dotted upon the rippling lake,
Sees not the silver spray-drop dripping
From the lithe oar which softly dipping,
Impels the wily hunter's boat;
But on his ruddy torch's rays,
As nearer, clearer now they float,
The fated quarry stands to gaze,
And dreaming not of cruel sport,
Withdraws not thence his gentle eyes
Until the rifle's sharp report
The simple creature hears and dies.

Bouyant with youth, as heedless they
Pursue the death-besetted way
As cautionless each one proceeds,
Where his doomed steps the pathway leads,
As if the perils of that hour
But led those steps to beauty's bower.
They come with stirring life and drum,
With flaunting plume and pennon come,
To solitudes, where never yet
Hath gleamed the glistening bayonet—
Banner upon the breeze hath flown,
Or bugle note before been blown.

The cautious beaver starts with fear,
That strange unwonted sound to hear;
But still her grave demeanor keeps,
As from her hovel door she peeps—
Observing thence with curious eye
The pageant, as it passes by;
Pauses the wailing whip-poor-will
One moment, in her plaintive trill,
As echoing on the mountain side
Their martial music wanders wide.
Then, as the last note dies away,
Pursues once more her broken lay.

At length they reach that fatal steep,
Which, hanging o'er the chasm deep,
With stunted copse, and tangled heath,
Conceals the gulf that yawns beneath.
The watchful Mohawk, from his lair,
One moment sees them flit there—
One moment looks, with eagle eye,
To mark their forms against the sky;
Then, through the night air, wild and high,
Peals the red warriors battle-cry.

From sassafras, and sumach, green,
From shattered stump, and riven rock—
From the dark hemlock's boughs between,
Is lanced the gleaming tomahawk.
And savage eyes glare fiercely out
From every bush and vine about;
And savage forms the branches throw,
In dusky masses on the foe.

In vain their leaders strive to form
Their ranks beneath that living storm!
As whoop on whoop discordant fell
Loudly on their astounded ears,
As if at once each fiendish yell
Awoke, within that narrow dell,
The echoes of a thousand years!

No rallying cry, no hoarse command
Can marshal that bewildered band;
Nor clarion call to standard, more
Those panic-stricken ranks restore;
Now strown like pines upon the path
Where bursts the fierce tornado's wrath.

Yet some there are who undismayed
Seek sternly back to back arrayed,
With eye and blade alert in vain
A moment's footing to maintain.
Though gallant hearts direct the steel,
And stalwart arms the buffets deal,
What can a score of brands avail
When each as many foes assail?
Like scud before the wintry blast,
That through the sky comes sweeping fast,
Like leaves upon the tempest whirled
They tow'rd the steep, are struggling hurled.
Valor in vain, in vain despair,
Nerves many a frantic bosom there
Furious with the unequal strife,
To cling with desperate force to life.
There, fighting still, with mad endeavor,
As on the dizzy edge they hover,
Their bugle breathes one rallying note,
Pennon and plume one moment float;
Then, swept beyond the frightful brink
Like mist, into the chasm sink;
Within whose bosom, as they fell,
Arose as hideous, wild a yell
As if the very earth had riven,
And shrieks from hell were upward driven.

† Ere yet the life's blood warm and wet
Hath dimmed the glistening bayonet.—Drake.

LAY OF THE OLD BARD.

Yes, I know that a shadow is over my eye,
Like twilight's dim cloud when the bright sun has set;
But bring me my harp, for my pulses beat high,
And the spirit of melody dwells with me yet.
What! though the cold world, and the care that it brings,
May have sear'd a few flowers of fancy's sweet chain,
While the magic of music still lives on the strings,
It will teach all the roses to blossom again.

Though old Time hath been writing in lines on my brow,
The record of years that are faded and o'er,
And young Beauty but smiles when I sue to her now,
Yet still I can sing what I sigh'd for before—
Then give me my harp, and I'll tell you of eyes
That could melt by their softness, and awe by their power,
As clear as the stars in the pure southern skies,
All quivering with light in love's beautiful hour!

I'll tell you of whispers in glen and in glade—
I'll tell you how blushes and beauty replied—
I'll tell you of vows breathed in secret and shade—
And I'll tell you a thousand fond fancies beside;
And shall I be sad, when such memories as these,
Like torches, still light up the hall of my heart?
No—bring me my harp, and I'll smile as I seize
The half-redeem'd treasures from memory's mart.

Then say not again that I'm feeble and old—
My spirit disdains to reply to the taunt;
While woman still charms, can the feelings be cold?
Can the bosom be chill'd which her image will haunt?
No—bring me my harp; and while younger men woo,
I'll teach them the flatteries maidens love best,
And as long as that harp, and my heart remain true,
How welcome are time and the world to the rest!

THE PRINCESS VICTORIA.

The heiress presumptive to the British crown is gradually becoming an object of great interest to all classes of her future subjects, and this interest is naturally heightened by the novelty of the throne being filled by a female sovereign, which has not been the case since the death of Queen Anne in 1702. The reigns of Queen Elizabeth and Queen Anne were among the most glorious in our annals; and the five years of Mary were unhappily too remarkable ever to be forgotten. The future appears so eventful, that the successor of the present king cannot fail to fill a distinguished place in history.

The Princess Alexandrina Victoria is the only child of the late Duke of Kent, fourth son of George the Third, by Victoria Maria Louisa, princess dowager of Luningen, sister of Prince Leopold. The Duke of Kent was always, with the exception perhaps of the Duke of Sussex, the most popular of the royal family, and was conspicuous from his active benevolence, and his protection of charitable institutions. She was born on the twenty-fourth of May, 1819, and within a few months afterwards lost her father, who died of a sudden attack brought on by sitting too long in wet clothes. The princess has consequently been under the sole care of her excellent mother from her infancy; and it is well known that no mother has more anxiously studied to inculcate on her daughter's mind a due sense of moral and religious duties, and the practice of kindness, gentleness, and forbearance to all those about her, than has the Duchess of Kent towards her precious charge. Her studies have been pursued with as unremitting attention as her health would bear; she is quick in acquiring languages, and speaks fluently English, French, and German; is well read in history; and has attained such perfection in music as to be able to take part in the private concerts frequently given by the Duchess of Kent, who is herself extremely fond of music. The princess's governess (an appointment which is chiefly a matter of form in accordance to precedents) is the Duchess of Northumberland; her preceptor, the Rev. Mr. Davies; her music master, Mr. Sale; and her instructor in the English law and constitution, Professor Amos of the London University, who attends regularly to give the princess lessons in this important branch of knowledge.

The princess has fine eyes, and a florid complexion, and strongly resembles the lamented Princess Charlotte, both in countenance and manner. She is inclined to be stout rather than tall. Many contradictory reports of the state of her health have been spread, arising possibly from the physician of the household paying her regular visits for form sake, and to satisfy the duchess's natural anxiety. We know, however, from good authority, that the princess's health is very satisfactory, and the exuberance of her spirits is a sufficient proof of there being no cause of alarm on this head. Her royal highness has certainly never been strong on her feet, but this arises, more than any thing else, from her feet and ankles being particularly small, and therefore not well calculated to bear her weight. Her disposition is spoken very favorably of, and her good humor never fails her, though she is not much in the habit of associating with young ladies of her own age, but leads, on the whole, a secluded life. From all that is known, therefore, of this interesting young personage during her yet short career, there is every reason to induce us to look with confidence to the day when she will be called on to wield the sceptre of the most powerful empire in the known world.

BLACK WORK.

A certain colonel, old, and poor, and lame,
And therefore somewhat choleric, and fervent,
Had advertised for a man servant,
And was employed in writing, when there came
Into his room a spruce and dandy footman,
Who scorn'd to be a boot and shoe man,
And therefore ask'd, as he drew near,
"Pray, sir, who does the black work here?"
"That, sir, I do myself," the colonel said,
And threw his inkstand at the fellow's head.

* The loon, or great northern diver. L'imbrin ou grand plongeon de la mer de nord de Buffon, is regarded in some parts of the country as a bird of ill-omen. The loon is said to be restless before a storm; and an experienced master of a coasting vessel informed me, that he always knew when a tempest was approaching by the cry of this bird, which is very shrill, and may be heard at the distance of a mile or more.—Wilson's Ornithology.

LETTERS FROM PARIS.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF EUROPE.

NUMBER TEN.

Garden of the Tuileries—fashionable drives—French omnibuses—cheap riding—sights—street-beggars—impostors, &c.

THE garden of the Tuileries is an idle man's paradise. Magnificent as it is in extent, sculptures, and cultivation, we all know that statues may be too dumb, gravel walks too long and level, and trees and flowers and fountains a little too Platonic, with any degree of beauty. But the Tuileries are peopled at all hours of sunshine with, to me, the most lovely objects in the world—children. You may stop a minute, perhaps, to look at the thousand gold fishes in the basin under the palace windows, or follow the swans for a single voyage round the fountain in the broad avenue—but you will sit on your hired chair (at this season) under the shelter of the sunny wall, and gaze at the children chasing about, with their attending Swiss maids, till your heart has outworned your eyes, or the palace clock strikes five. I have been there repeatedly since I have been in Paris, and have seen nothing like the children. They move my heart always, more than any thing under heaven; but a French child, with an accent that all your paid masters cannot give, and manners, in the midst of its romping, that mock to the life the air and courtesy for which Paris has a name over the world, is enough to make one forget Napoleon, though the column of Vendôme throws its shadow within sound of their voices. Imagine sixty-seven acres of beautiful creatures (that is the extent of the garden, and I have not seen such a thing as an ugly French child)—broad avenues stretching away as far as you can see, covered with little foreigners (so they seem to me) dressed in gay colors, and laughing and romping and talking French, in all the amusing mixture of baby passions and grown-up manners, and answer me—is it not a sight better worth seeing than all the grand palaces that shut it in?

The Tuileries are certainly very magnificent, and to walk across from the Seine to the Rue Rivoli, and look up the endless walks and under the long perfect arches cut through the trees, may give one a very pretty surprise for once—but a winding lane is a better place to enjoy the loveliness of green leaves, and a single New England elm, letting down its slender branches to the ground in the inimitable grace of nature, has, to my eye, more beauty than all the clipped vistas from the king's palace to the Arc de l'Etoile, the Champs Elysées inclusive.

One of the finest things in Paris, by the way, is the view from the terrace in front of the palace to this "Arch of Triumph," commenced by Napoleon at the extremity of the "Elysian Fields," a single avenue of about two miles. The part beyond the gardens is the fashionable drive, and by a saunter on horseback to the Place de la Boulogne, between four and five, on a pleasant day, one may see all the dashing equipages in Paris. Broadway, however, would eclipse every thing here, either for beauty of construction or appointments. Our carriages are every way handsomer and better hung, and the horses are harnessed more compactly and gracefully. The lumbering vehicles here make a great show, it is true, for the box, with its heavy hammer-cloth is level with the top, and the coachman and footmen and outriders are very striking in their bright liveries; but the elegant, convenient, light-running establishments of Philadelphia and New-York, excel them, out of all comparison, for taste and fitness. The best driving I have seen is by the king's whips, and really it is beautiful to see his retinue on the road, four or five coaches and six, with footmen and outriders in scarlet liveries, and the finest horses possible for speed and action. His majesty generally takes the outer edge of the Champs Elysées on the bank of the river, and the rapid glimpses of the bright show through the breaks in the wood are exceedingly picturesque.

There is nothing in Paris that looks so outlandish to my eye as the common vehicles. I was thinking of it this morning as I stood waiting for the St. Sulpice omnibus, at the corner of the Rue Vivienne, the great thoroughfare between the Boulevards and the Palais Royal. There was the hack-cabriolet lumbering by in the fashion of two centuries ago, with a horse and harness that look equally ready to drop in pieces; the hand-cart with a stout dog harnessed under the axeltree, drawing with twice the strength of his master; the market-waggon, driven always by women, and drawn generally by a horse and a mule abreast, the horse of the Norman breed, immensely large, and the mule about the size of a well-grown bull-dog; a vehicle of which I have not yet found out the name, a kind of long demi-omnibus, with two wheels and a single horse, and carrying nine; and last, but not least amusing, a small close carriage for one person, swung upon two wheels and drawn by a servant, very much used apparently by elderly women and invalids, and certainly most admirable conveniences either for the economy or safety of getting about a city. It would be difficult to find an American servant who would draw in harness as they do here; and it is amusing to see a stout, well-dressed fellow strapped to a carriage, and pulling along the parés, sometimes at a jog-trot, while his master or mistress sits looking unconcernedly out of the window.

I am not yet decided whether the French are the best or the worst drivers in the world. If the latter, they certainly have most miraculous escapes. A cab-driver never pulls the reins except upon great emergencies, or for a right-about turn, and his horse has a ludicrous aversion to a straight line. The streets are built inclining towards the centre, with the gutter in the middle, and it is the habit of all cabriolet-horses to run down one side and up the other constantly at such sudden angles that it seems to you they certainly will go through the shop windows. This, of course, is very dangerous to foot-passengers in a city where there are no side-walks; and, as a consequence, the average number of complaints to the police of Paris for people killed by careless driving is about four hundred annually. There are probably twice the number of legs broken. One becomes vexed in riding with these fellows, and I have once or twice undertaken to get into a French passion, and insist upon driving myself. But I have never yet met with an accident. "Gar-rr-rr-rr!" sings out the driver, rolling the word off his tongue like a bullet from a shovel, but never thinking to lift his loose reins from the dasher, while the frightened passenger, without looking round, makes for the first door with an alacrity that shows a habit of expecting very little from the cocher's skill.

Riding is very cheap in Paris, if managed a little. The city is traversed constantly in every direction by omnibuses, and you may go from the Tuileries to Père la Chaise, or from St. Sulpice to the Italian Boulevards, (the two diagonals) or take the "Tousles Boulevards" and ride quite round the city for six sous the distance. The "fiacre" is like our own hacks, except that you pay but "twenty sous the course," and fill the vehicle with your friends if you please; and, more cheap and comfortable still, there is the universal cabriolet, which for "fifteen sous the course," or "twenty the hour," will give you at least three times the value of your money, with the advantage of seeing ahead and talking bad French with the driver.

Every thing in France is either grotesque or picturesque. I have been struck with it this morning, while sitting at my window, looking upon the close inner court of the hotel. One would suppose that a pavé, between four high walls, would offer very little to seduce the eye from its occupation; but, on the contrary, one's whole time may be occupied in watching the various sights presented in constant succession. First comes the itinerant cobbler, with his seat and materials upon his back, and coolly selecting a place against the wall, opens his shop under your window, and drives his trade, most industriously, for half an hour. If you have any thing to mend, he is too happy—if not, he has not lost his time, for he pays no rent, and is all the while at work. He packs up again, bows to the concierge, as politely as his load will permit, and takes his departure, in the hope to find your shoes more worn another day. Nothing could be more striking than his whole appearance. He is met in the gate, perhaps, by an old clothes-man, who will buy or sell, and compliment you for nothing, cheapening your coat by calling the virgin to witness that your shape is so genteel that it will not fit one man in a thousand; or by a family of singers, with a monkey to keep time; or a regular beggar, who, however, does not dream of asking charity till he has done something to amuse you: after these, perhaps, will follow a succession of objects singularly peculiar to this fantastic metropolis; and, if one could separate from the poor creatures the knowledge of the cold and hunger they suffer, wandering about, homeless, in the most inclement weather, it would be easy to imagine it a diverting pantomime, and give them the poor pittance they ask, as the price of an amused hour. An old man has just gone from the court who comes regularly twice a week, with a long beard, perfectly white, and a strange kind of an equipage. It is an organ, set upon a rude carriage, with four small wheels, and drawn by a mule, of the most diminutive size, looking, (if it were not for the venerable figure crouched upon the seat,) like some roughly-contrived plaything. The whole affair, harness and all, is evidently his own work; and it is affecting to see the difficulty, and, withal, the habitual apathy with which the old itinerant fastens his rope-reins beside him, and dismounts to grind his one—solitary—eternal tune, for charity.

Among the thousands of wretched objects in Paris, (they make the heart sick with their misery, at every turn) there is, here and there, one of an interesting character; and it is pleasant to select them, and make a habit of your trifling gratuity. Strolling about, as I do, constantly, and letting every body and every thing amuse me that will, I have made several of these penny-a-day acquaintances, and find them very agreeable breaks to the heartless solitude of a crowd. There is a little fellow who stands by the gate of the Tuileries, opening to the Place Vendôme, who, with all the rags and dirt of a street boy, begs with an air of superiority that is absolutely patronizing. One feels obliged to the little varlet for the privilege of giving to him—his smile and manner are so courtly. His face is beautiful, dirty as it is; his voice is clear, and unaffected, and his thin lips have an expression of high-bred contempt, that amuses me a little, and puzzles me a great deal. I think he must have a gentleman's blood in his veins, though he possibly came indirectly by it. There is a little Jewess hanging about the Louvre, who begs with her dark eyes very eloquently; and, in the Rue de la Paix there may be found at all hours, a melancholy sick-looking Italian boy, with his hand in his bosom, whose native language, and picture-like face are a diurnal pleasure to me, cheaply bought with the poor trifle which makes him happy. It is surprising how many devices there are in the streets for attracting attention and pity. There is a woman always to be seen upon the Boulevards, playing a solemn tune on a violin, with a child as pallid as ashes, lying, apparently, asleep in her lap. I suspected, after seeing it once or twice, that it was wax, and, a day or two since I satisfied myself of the fact, and enraged the mother excessively by touching its cheek. It represents a sick child to the life, and any one less idle and curious, would be deceived. I have often seen people give her money with the most unsuspecting look of sympathy, though it would be natural enough to doubt the maternal kindness of keeping a dying child in the open air in mid-winter. Then there is a woman, without hands, making braid, with wonderful adroitness; and a man without legs or arms, singing, with his hat set appealingly on the ground before him; and cripples, exposing their abbreviated limbs, and telling their stories over and over, with or without listeners, from morning till night; and every description of appeal to the most acute sympathies, mingled up with all the gaiety, show, and fashion of the most crowded promenade in Paris.

In the present dreadful distress of trade, there are other still more painful cases of misery. It is not uncommon to be addressed in the street by men of perfectly respectable appearance, whose faces bear every mark of strong mental struggle, and often of famishing necessity, with an appeal for the smallest sum that will buy food. The look of misery is so general, as to mark the whole population. It has struck me most forcibly every where, notwithstanding the gaiety of the national character, and, I am told, by intelligent Frenchmen, it is peculiar to the time, and felt and observed by all. Such things startle one back to nature sometimes. It is difficult to look away from the face of a starving man, and see the splendid equipages, and the idle waste upon trifles, within his very sight, and reconcile the contrast with any belief of the existence of human pity—still more difficult, perhaps, to admit without reflection, the right of one human being to hold in a shut hand, at will, the very life and breath for which his fellow creatures are perishing at his door. It is this that is visited back so terribly in the horrors of a revolution.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

FAMILY GOVERNMENT.

It is a question very frequently and warmly discussed by young unmarried folks, whether the wife has a right to govern the husband or the husband the wife. I heard a charming girl, on the point of becoming a bride, holding forth the other evening, half in jest and half in earnest, upon this subject; and telling how she should do this and how she should do that, and she should expect, and she would never consent to have, &c. &c. A warm-tempered young gentleman, who is just cultivating a pair of whiskers, started up, and declared that when he married, which, heaven forbid he ever should, he would make his wife do whatever he ordered. "A pretty thing, indeed," said he, passing the palm of his hand across his cheek, "a pretty thing, indeed, for a man to be under the influence of a woman; a man, who has to support his family, to transact important business, to—to—to—when he comes home he ought to be the lord of the house; and his wife should not lay the slightest restraint upon him; she should not know where he goes, nor what he does; and, if he chooses to stay out till three o'clock in the morning, it's none of her business."

"And suppose," inquired the young lady, setting her head a little one side, as women will sometimes when they are getting interested in a debate, "suppose you were a rough, brutal man, without any delicacy or feeling or principle, and you should bring people to the house whom she did not think fit to associate with, what then?"

"Why, then, she should associate with them, whether she thought fit or not; she is not to be the judge of such things, but the husband."

"And is she to have no will of her own?"

"No, not contrary to her husband's."

"Well then, let me tell you, that if my husband were to treat me in that way, I should just tell his friends that if they wanted supper, they might go where they were welcome, and not come to my house."

"And if my wife were to behave so," said the young gentleman, rising again in a passion, "I would—I would—"

"Well," interrupted his fair opponent, crossing her arms composedly, and pressing her lips together closely, as she finished the interrogation, "well, and what would you do? Come, tell us now?"

The conversation here drew to a crisis, as perplexing and serious, as if they were man and wife indeed; when, pleading an engagement, I arose, and bade them good evening.

This little incident, however, gave me many new thoughts on the subject, which I had intended to fling into a treatise for the Mirror, when, in conversing about it with a friend, he offered me the use of two letters, that he said had been received, one by himself and the other by his wife, when they were on the eve of marriage. On further inquiry I discovered that the writers were, one an old bachelor, whose knowledge of the matter was consequently theoretical; and the other an old maid, famous for match-making and match-breaking, and who was pleased always to be about young brides, and favor them with her opinions. He further informed me that both he and his wife commenced with a determination to act up to the precepts contained in their respective epistles, which produced so much disturbance between them that they each agreed, instead of racking their brains for devices how to rule the other, that they would thereafter devote the same care in attempting to govern themselves, so that neither should be master, but both go along smoothly and affectionately together, contributing whatever they could towards each other's comfort and happiness. I accompanied him that very evening to his house, and found his wife waiting tea for him. Her face brightened up at his approach; she ran for his slippers while he was asking the servant to bring them, and telling him that she had received a letter from a distant friend, full of pleasant intelligence, darted out of the room to get it, with as much eagerness to serve him as if they were in the happiest days of courtship.

"There she goes, heaven bless her," exclaimed my friend, "as kind-hearted and sweet a woman as ever breathed. It is all because we neither of us aspire to be the governor. When I married her I was full of my plans to rule her, and in a week after the ceremony I commanded her to get my slippers. She told me promptly she would not. There was an insult. We did not speak for a week; we were near a separation. And so we went on for a year, and all in consequence of these infernal letters. Now, here they are," he continued, opening a drawer, "take them, read them, and print them if you like; and inform your readers, that if they wish to live in peace with their wives and husbands, they had better in all cases follow the bent of their own good feelings and discretion, and turn their backs on advisers."

I read the letters with some interest, and present them, according to his permission. In them may be found a good deal of truth, mixed with much specious sophistry. The first is to the lady.

"MY DEAR GIRL—So, you are going to get married! Well, I declare; and to Mr. N—. He is certainly a very fine man, excellent disposition, and very much respected; but, my dear Julia, there is one thing which my love for you induces me to observe. Mr. N— is a despotic man. I would not see you a slave to any one. I wish you to be ever the mistress of your house; a woman owes it to herself not to be browbeaten. If she yields to the first extortions of her husband, there is no limit to his tyranny. All men are so. They may be good or bad; there is little difference between them in this respect. They all would make their wives lead a dog's life if they could, and it is only to be prevented in her by a firm resistance to the very first encroachment on her rights. These will commence in trifles, and there they must be met; if not, you are lost. It is true, my dear, you are not physically so strong as your husband, but you are morally, and the law prevents him from using his physical strength. You can worry and tease him to death. You can thwart him perpetually in little things; not from revenge, heaven forbid! but in order to convince him that you are not one of those weak, tame, inanimate creatures, who can be treated any how. Take your own part, and he will respect you more, eventually, depend upon it. Husbands are easily managed, if you would but think so. You may not be able to run as fast as he at first, but you can tire him out. He'll come down at last, and be your slave, instead of making you his. Don't be afraid. When you are fairly married, you know he can't get away, he must yield; hundreds of husbands are tamed in that way. I have no more room at present, but remember, don't yield. Don't let him get the better of you in trifles, and after a little splashing and trouble together at first, you shall see how smoothly you will go along. Your sincere friend, SALLY TOMPKINS."

The other, to the gentleman, is equally entitled to attention.

"MY DEAR FRANK—On this important occasion let me give you a little advice. Take great care on starting not to suffer the wife to get the upper hand of you. Assume the reins yourself, and keep them with a firm hand. You know the English law allows, or did allow, a gentle flagellation on certain emergencies, although Sir William Blackstone doth recommend the husband not to resort to this method of government on slight provocation. I would suggest a regular system of discipline. Very soon after you are irrevocably, (that's a big word to swallow, Master Frank,) irrevocably united, begin to resist every thing on your wife's part which looks like command. For example, if she orders you to open the door, request her to do it herself, and if she does not, make her. This may be done by refusing her whatever she asks till she complies. If she insists on beefsteaks for dinner, buy veal cutlets. If she shows signs of rebellion, open your eyes and stare awhile, then give a long low whistle, looking at her all the time, and laugh at last as if you were partly amused and partly astonished. One thing, my dear boy, never get into a passion. By getting into a passion I mean into a rage, a fury, saying things that you must afterwards repent, starting up suddenly out of your chair, walking backward and forward across the floor, flinging a cup or plate, or any other article which you may have handy, into the fire, and then bouncing out of the room without your dinner. All these are very fine, to be sure, and will make the lady frightened, pro tem, but they are the devil when they come to be told of, and put the poor man in such a light that he is ashamed to show his face when he becomes cool. There is no one so easily governed as your full-blooded, passionate persons. I do not exactly mean high tempered. This is a different thing; a high temper, when allied to a strong intellect, is altogether another affair. I have seen such, who would take an injury coolly, but never forget it. But your furious persons are of a less formidable nature. They always overstep decency; and though they would commit any folly in a paroxysm, yet their passion and their courage ooze away together, and leave them passive and exhausted, conscious of weakness, and ashamed to look at any person who beheld their madness. You would be amused to see my friend Dick H— in the hands of his wife. She is a clear-headed, firm-nerved woman, whose equal temper has given her such an advantage over him, that she has no difficulty whatever in making him do whatever she pleases. When he is enraged, he walks out in a storm without an umbrella, or hits his head against the mantel-piece. Once, to revenge himself on her for some imaginary injury, he threw down his watch, and trod it to pieces with his heel. It was several months afterwards before he could muster sufficient resolution to purchase a new one; and in the meantime I have seen her in the presence of one or two friends, and scarcely moving a muscle of her face, so discompose him by asking the time of day, or some other question that had an oblique bearing on the catastrophe above-mentioned, that I scarcely knew whether to laugh at him or pity him the most.

"I hope, then, my dear fellow, you will always keep cool on matrimonial subjects, and never enter into any altercation with your wife. She will certainly out-talk you. The tongue is her legitimate weapon; and I scarcely ever knew a woman who, on points of domestic debate, could not talk her husband dumb before he knew what he was about. What you mean to do, do firmly, gently, effectually. If she mounts into a passion, then you have the advantage. When she comes to herself she will cry, and perhaps be sick, and go to bed without her supper. That's a critical moment when tears spring into the eyes of a pretty woman, but women can weep when they please. Tell her so, and if she cuts up any capers, put on your hat, (a little over your eyes, nothing makes a man look more determined than that,) tell the servant she need not sit up for you, as you have a key, and go forth with a slow, cool, resolute step. If possible, hum an air, in a low tone, as you pass through the hall. Do not return till three o'clock the next morning. Rise early, and go to your business cheerfully, as if nothing had happened. Dine out that day. The next time you are alone with her, she will sob perhaps, and turn slightly pale, tears again, and one or two attempts to speak about last night. Draw yourself a little up, (I am glad you are rather tall,) and change the subject instantly. Never talk about these things. There is nothing at once so contemptible and dangerous as talking. It is the ruin of whole families. I do not, of course, mean cheerful, merry, and friendly conversation; that's delightful; but I allude to the expression in mere words of any fretful, discontented feeling; discussing peevishly what you have done or are going to do. About the past say nothing, and hear nothing, unless in the way of explanation. Touching the present or the future, if she can tell you any fact in a gentle way, with which you were unacquainted, listen, but don't debate, don't wrangle. A dispute between man and wife flings damp and shadow over a whole family. If the lady has any soul, and really loves you, the failure of her first attempt to rule you will almost break her heart. Let it. Never fear that it will quite. A new view of the subject will gradually rise upon her. If she is a woman of sense, she will reason with herself, and convince herself that she had better let you have your own way than always live in a whirlpool, and all her angry emotions will soften down into a calm moonlight sort of melancholy. Then is your time to confirm her submission without injuring her love. You will come in sometime softly and unexpectedly, and find the dear little object of your stratagems sitting alone and pensive by the fire. Your heart will rise at the sight, for she is thinking, thinking of you. Her hand hangs down languidly—her foot half exposed on the fender—her eyes are fixed on the mass of bright coals; a half suppressed sigh heaves her bosom. Ah, my dear Frank, go to her then, kiss her—tell her you love her—that her happiness is your great aim, but that you are a wild, proud man, and cannot be ruled except by gentleness and affection. Your words will then sink into her soul; and as the tears come up in her eyes, her head will gradually recline on your bosom. A thousand vain plans of womanhood and mastery will melt away in the instant. She will feel it grateful as well as delightful for her tender and pliable mind to bend when in contact with your harder and loftier nature. There, my dear boy, is all of domestic felicity you must ever expect to attain. As for any pure and permanent harmony, never dream of such a thing. Little dark misunderstandings and showery passions are generated in the conubial sky by the mere ordinary warmth and revolutions of the atmosphere, precisely as clouds and tempest are formed in the natural heaven. The difference between a loving and a hating couple is, that in the one they hang continually brooding, like the heavy vapors and mists of a bad climate, while in the other they form and break away with a fine rapidity, admitting long gleams of sunshine, and disclosing the azure serenity above.

"There is one point over which I must not pass entirely. Whatever you do as a sign of independence, never afford any cause for jealousy. To a married man all other women must be but pictures. He must ever speak of them, act towards them as things totally beyond his reach, and out of his sphere. They are as clouds, or stars, or any thing most distant and separated from him. Love wine, company, gambling, fame, solitude, any thing, every thing, but, on the peril of your peace, betray no interest in any woman. The flower of love in a wife's heart will live through every other change and season, but that will kill it effectually forever to the very roots; and the meridian ardor of any subsequent display of affection will be utterly wasted on its dead leaves. And now, my dear Frank, success attend you. Matrimony resembles those plants from which the wise extract medicine, the unskilful poison. It opens upon you a new world of responsibilities as well as pleasures. It binds you to life with additional bands, stronger than as yet you can conceive. My last words to you are, never get in a passion yourself; never yield to petulance or rage in her; demand of her nothing rashly, nothing but what is right, and having demanded, enforce your wishes coolly but firmly, and with that high authority with which man is invested by law and nature. Your sincere friend, EDMUND BROWN."

I do not know, Messrs. Editors, whether to look upon the last epistle as serious or not. The hint, in the commencement, about flagellation, and Sir William Blackstone, must be only a sly turn of humor; but I am certain there is a deal of good sense towards the end. Perhaps the ladies will not like it; but that, you know, is no affair of mine. SEDLEY.

THE LATE FANCY-BALL AT THE CAPITOL.

FROM OUR WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENT.

WE are happy to have a truce, for once, to the tedious monotony of soirees, levees, and conversaziones, by an occurrence which has, for some time past, given an impulse to the gay world in Washington, and relieved us for a while from the unprofitable chit-chat of the tea-table, by turning the current of conversation into a less sluggish channel. We allude to a fancy-ball recently given by a distinguished resident of this place, which has at least the charm of novelty to recommend it. To attempt a just account of this fête would require more time than can well be devoted to the subject, and a closer and more acute observation than we profess to have; besides, the supposition that we saw every incident and character, would imply a kind of ubiquity which we are not willing to assume. A hasty outline of the principal incidents that came under our personal observation must, therefore, suffice. Having no part to play in this mimic carnival, my friend W. and myself went at an early hour to enjoy the effect of the first entrée of the dramatis personæ. To borrow the language of our poetess:

"At first the pillar'd halls were still and lone,
As if some fairy palace, all unknown
To mortal eye or step. This was not long.
Waken'd the lute and swell'd the burst of song;
And the vast mirrors glitter'd with the crowd
Of changing shapes. The young, the fair, the proud Came thronging in."

A blast from the trumpet of the avant courier, announced the approach of the Marchioness of Carrabas and suit, and immediately afterwards crowds of personages of various complexions and costume followed in rapid succession until the room became peopled, as if by enchantment, with the representations of almost every clime and caste. Swarthy Turks were seen mingling with the red sons of the forest. Pagans, Mahometans, and Christians—worshippers of the sun, the crescent, and the cross, forgetful of religious feuds or national antipathies, were jumbled together in strange and even ludicrous juxtaposition. Europeans, Americans, and Asiatics—Turks, Greeks, and Persians—Peruvians, Chinese, and Aborigines were there, mingling with the fair daughters of other nations, who seemed, as if by common consent, to have contributed their stock of charms to one common hive. We must confess that we were agreeably surprised at such an unexpected display of magnificent adornment and judicious taste, particularly among the ladies; the splendor of whose attire was admirably set off by the grotesque and original characters sustained by some of the gentlemen. Courtesy and gallantry, if not our own inclination, would prompt us to pay our court first to the queens and high-born dames who were present, as true knights were wont in days of chivalry.

The first that attracted our attention was the brilliant cortège of Queen Elizabeth, who was surrounded by her courtiers in the appropriate costumes of her reign, among whom we remarked Leicester and Sir Walter Raleigh. She moved onward amidst her retinue with all that peerless majesty and chaste severity of demeanor which so eminently characterized her royal prototype, who "thought foul scorn of Parma or of Spain or any prince that dared invade her realm." Next came the interesting queen whose untimely fate has been so much deplored, and who has extorted so many tears from the bright eyes of romantic maidens—the Queen of Scots. She was accompanied by her ill-fated companion, Rizzio, who derived additional interest from being associated with her history. Her countenance betrayed the settled melancholy of "deep-rooted sorrow," and of that grief which is tempered by resignation, without any of the austerity of bigoted zeal. Her features, naturally lovely and captivating, bore the traces of her protracted imprisonment, and we thought that we saw a hectic flush suffuse her pale cheek as she cast a reproachful glance towards her proud sister. We cannot answer for the conscience of the virgin queen; but we imagine that she must have been somewhat disconcerted at the apparition of her lovely rival, to whose death she had been accessory. Another candidate for our admiration was a French fortune-teller in a picturesque and mystic garb, surmounted by a high cap, a la Normande, who was busily employed in her vocation, revealing the varied destinies of the motley group which curiosity had drawn around her. She was seen dispensing leaves from the book of fate, which reminded us of those Sibylline leaves on which the priestess of Apollo inscribed the predictions of the oracle. It required no great effort of the imagination to suppose that a scene so fairy-like and magical had been conjured by the power of her incantations.

The colors of her dress seemed to have some mysterious affinity to those "black spirits and white, red spirits and gray" which Hecate invoked over her charmed caldron; but whether she had any agency in invoking this incongruous assemblage or not, is left to conjecture; but certain it is, she had the power of calling "spirits from the vasty deep," judging from the sons of Neptune who flocked around her, among whom we descried the apparition of Tom Coffin, whom our novelist, Cooper, so unceremoniously drowned in the Ariel. As to her personal appearance, so far from having that forbidding aspect, those elf-like locks, and those masculine proportions we so generally associate with the attributes of the gipsy tribe, she appeared to us in the more bewitching guise of a French enchantress, and instead of crying out as did Dominie Sampson, avoid thee! we must confess that we were, on the contrary, irresistibly attracted towards one—the vivacity of whose nation, manners, versatility of conversation, and happy powers of entertainment, made every one eager to have the book of fate unsealed to them. To Queen Mary she paid the compliment of allowing her to be a more bewitching siren than herself, and addressed to her the following cartel. (A la Reine Marie—who captivates alike all hearts—in death as she did in life.)

"Si je lui compare le lia,
Qu'avec la rose j'entrelace;
Marie emporte encore le prix—
Le lia meurt, le rose s'efface."

Captain Lawton, a hero of the revolutionary war, and one of the surviving remnants of the régime of the cock'd hats, was one of the invited guests, he happening to be in the city at the time, where he had come for the double object of making a pilgrimage to Mount Vernon on the centennial anniversary, and pushing his claims to a pension. This claim was predicated on an account-current for sundry quarts of blood and whiskey spilt during the revolutionary struggle, and sundry ugly gashes which had been most unscientifically applied to his person, obliquely, horizontally, and otherwise, in front, flank, et cetera.

The venerable appearance and quaint costume of the gallant captain attracted considerable attention, and we remarked that many dignitaries and fair ladies solicited an introduction for the sake of hearing him rehearse his "hair breadth 'scapes." The captain, delighted with his cordial reception, and the opportunity thus afforded him of fighting his battles over again, straightened up his war-worn frame, adjusted his ruffles, gave a more ferocious expression to his cock'd hat, and placing his hand, with a most portentous "hem!" on the hilt of his rusty sabre, proceeded to recount, at full length, all the "deeds of noble daring" which he and General Washington had done for the liberties of his country. Many, especially among the younger portion of his auditors, were uncertain whether he was in fact the veritable Simon Pure, whose awkward wielding of the broadsword was so bitterly deprecated by Doctor Sitgraves, or whether he was a personation of General Washington himself; an error which was very natural for those who had never seen the uniform of '76, on account of the resemblance they formed between his "wig of formal cut," his powdered phiz, and amplitude of nose, to these sad, chalky portraits which are to be seen, passim, on the sign-boards of every log tavern in the country. There were many features in the captain's character which the company were at a loss to reconcile with his antiquated appearance, but which he readily and ingeniously accounted for; such as his modern accomplishment of waltzing and a gaiety of manner unusual for a person at his time of life. Some one observed to him that Spanish dances and quadrilles did not savor much of the old school, and that the nimbleness of his tongue and heels would do more credit to a modern beau than to a septuagenarian; to which he replied, that it was very true, that the dignified minuet and graceful contra-dance were in vogue in his day; but for his part, having no particular predilections in favor of obsolete customs, and being still in a hale and green old age, he was desirous of keeping pace with the rising generation and the improvements of the time, and had, for that reason, at the prime age of three-score, taken lessons in the art of waltzing; and moreover, too, the force of early education and of habit had taught him that celerity of movement was a great desideratum in military science; and one of the greatest attributes consequently of a good general was to know how to retreat gracefully before an enemy. We know not how far the captain's loquacity would have gone, had he not been interrupted by one of the guests—a venerable relic also of by-gone days—who accosted the veteran by asking him if he did not recognize him as an old acquaintance, who had been with him at the battle of Bennington, where he had been greatly instrumental in the success of our troops by administering to them large potations of "Dutch courage," and where he had the honor of contributing not a little to the fame of Captain Lawton himself by fortifying his natural intrepidity with copious libations, which he in his hurry to leave (to take the field, he meant) had forgotten to pay for? The captain replied that he had no recollection of the matter whatever, but presumed that the treachery of his memory might be owing entirely to the weakness of his alcohol; and as to any unsettled balance, he "begged him not to mention it," for since he had become a member of the temperance society, he no longer indulged himself in anything stronger than mere brandy, with very little water, and had become perfectly oblivious of old tavern scores. The other was about to reply with a compliment to the captain on the clear and brilliant complexion of his nose, when he was interrupted by the hoarse and nasal voice of a Nantucket whaler, who proved to be Tom Coffin. "Starn all," cried Tom, as he lanced his huge harpoon into a pound-cake of such equivocal dimension that it looked, in his imagination, "very like a whale." "Starn all," reiterated he, as he witnessed the havoc which his nautical skill had made among the innocent crumbs. Finding his mistake, he coolly gathered up the coil of his harpoon, and made his way towards a group of personages who were consulting the oracles of the soothsayer, accompanied by a brother tar and a South American goucher, whose dexterity in throwing the lazada rivaled Tom's marine skill in throwing the harpoon. Not knowing what to make of this strange sail, Tom "rather concluded" that she was a French privateer, under false colors; and without the ceremony of waiting till his turn came to hear the predictions of the oracle, he unceremoniously thrust his harpoon aboard of the book of fate, exclaiming, at the same time, "bear down there, you French gal, and show your papers."

A spirited colloquy then ensued between her and honest Tom, to whom the responses of the sibyl were as unintelligible as were his nautical phrases to her, and the mysterious leaves were handled as awkwardly by him as she would have handled a marlin-spike.

Long Tom, who, like the Doge of Venice, had been "wedded to the sea," never had had an opportunity in his youth of deciphering the black letter mysteries of the alphabet, but "rather concluding" that the papers she gave him might yet serve to light his cigars, he carelessly stowed them in his jacket pocket among his loose change and tobacco, and strided away in quest of fresh adventures. Espying Queen Bess and her splendid cortège, his messmate, Jack, who had been accustomed to the watch in the foretop, called out "a sail," and proposed to Tom to run down to leeward and speak her. As they approached, Tom whispered to his messmate, in the gentle voice of a north-easter, "I say, Jack, what do you think of her?" Jack ventured his humble opinion that she was an American-built vessel under an English flag—and probably a prize, taken in tow by British men of war. Seeing that her consorts had parted company with her, by reason of the counter-currents in the crowd, our honest tars sailed up to speak her. Tom triced up the waistband of his muslin in order to make his best bow to her majesty. His messmate, emboldened by her royal condescension, and wishing also to scrape acquaintance with the English girl, as he called her, presumed to offer her royal highness a plug of tobacco, which he drew from his jacket pocket between his two fore-fingers with that peculiar back-handed motion so characteristic of the genuine tar. Her majesty, contrary to our expectations, accepted it, and added that she prized it more highly because her good Sir Walter had been among the first to introduce that plant into her dominions; and, as it had become a fruitful source of revenue to the royal coffers, she might add that she was indebted to this identical plant for the jewels she then wore.

Jack did not seem to comprehend this allusion, not being able to divine exactly by what strange alchemy jewels could grow out of the Virginia weed. So, taking this for an attempt to impose upon his credulity, he gave her a familiar nod over his left shoulder, and went off, whistling the tune of Black-eyed Susan.

The character of a French marquis was well personated—evinced all that "suaviter in modo," and untiring politesse which were the essential ingredients of a courtier of the old régime.

Sir Peter Teazle made his début in very handsome style, but looking more smiling than we expected from the reports respecting his family dissensions. We ascribed various reasons for his apparent good-humor; for instance, the circumstance of his being from home—the absence of Lady Teazle, and the presence of some pretty Swiss girls, with whom he was carrying on a flirtation.

Charles the Second appeared in an elegant hunting dress, and, as he was unattended by his court, we presume he wished to be incog.; but, notwithstanding his disguise, his gay and jaunty air, and laughing eye, betrayed the "merry monarch."

The taciturnity of the Indian chief, as well as that of the Turks who were there, would have been better suited to a pantomime than to such a gay drama.

The fancy dresses of the ladies, for the most part, were well chosen, and arranged in good taste; and many of them were in such perfect keeping, and displayed a style of such elegance, richness, and magnificence, that they might vie with oriental and queenly splendor. Among the most brilliant, we remarked "a priestess of the sun," glowing with the emblems of her caste, and resplendent as the orb she worshipped.

Two sultanas, attired in the rich and becoming costume of their nation, were rival candidates for our admiration. One claimed it for her commanding figure, and elegant address; and the other for her lovely and intellectual features, and beautiful form. The sternest Moslem might, if he did not mistake them for houries, have confessed for once, that women may have souls, and been pardoned for forgetting his Koran and Allah, while he bowed in homage here.

Our fair representative from the Grecian isles, was extremely fascinating. She had not been long in this country, and, having no acquaintance with our customs and manners, was seen studiously endeavoring to acquire them, by asking many questions, with native simplicity, respecting the dances, &c. She was so irresistible, that she almost persuaded us to espouse the Greek cause.

The Italian peasant was represented with such truth and felicity of taste, that we thought we beheld beneath the manteletta, a realization of the loveliness of Frascatina.

We saw also several peasants from different cantons in Switzerland, whose native charms were greatly heightened by their becoming dresses. We concluded, as we gazed on them, that a residence among the avalanches and bleak glaciers of the Alps, must be delightful in such company, and no longer wondered why the Swiss were so much attached to their native country as to be afflicted with the "maladie du pays," or to shed tears at the sound of the "Rans des Vaches."

An improvisatrice, who personated Corinna, though last mentioned, not the least interesting, was so much occupied by this brilliant scene that she declined giving us a specimen of her extempore composition on this occasion, adding, that she preferred yielding to her inspiration in such solitudes as those of the Alps, or the deserted ruins of Rome.

It would require too much time to dwell upon all the characters, and to speak of all the strange groups and combinations formed among chieftains, brigands, soldiers, sailors, hunters, &c. on the one hand, and gypsies, quakeresses, flower-girls, &c. on the other.

We cannot forbear, in closing, to speak of several allegorical figures, such as Morning, Noon, and Night, which were well personified; except that Night, with her crescent and starry train, looked as beautiful as the day; and we wished, on parting, that we could always have "such a night as this."

THE FINE ARTS.

PAINTING.

PORTRAIT OF WILLIAM PENN—DUNLAP'S LECTURES.

INMAN's portrait of Penn is now finished and exhibited in Philadelphia. We cannot pronounce upon its merits from ocular inspection; but the known talent of the artist leads us to presume it excellent. It is to be engraved by Mr. Sattain, of whose skill the portrait of the Rev. Mr. Furness is referred to as a favorable evidence.

As friends of the arts, it gives us great satisfaction to observe that the lectures delivered by Mr. Dunlap, on the evenings of Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, in presence of his pictures, and explanatory of them, have become popular. The gallery of the National Academy, Clinton-hall, is filled, literally, every evening that it is opened.

LITHOGRAPHY.

LIKENESS OF CHARLES CARROLL OF CARROLLTON.

A lithographic engraving of this venerable patriot, from an original picture by W. J. Hubbard, executed in a very superior style by Messrs. Endicott & Swett, of this city, has been just published.

SCULPTURE.

FRAZEE'S BUST OF JOHN JAY.

We find this specimen of art has excited general attention. It was exhibited last week at the exchange, where, in common with many others, we examined it with additional pleasure as the first bust executed in marble by an American. It was undertaken in conformity with a resolution of congress, and is to be removed to the supreme court-room at Washington, as a tribute to the memory of the first chief-justice, to whom it is said to bear a close resemblance. That so delicate and beautiful a piece of workmanship should have been executed by one of our countrymen in New-York, created universal astonishment. We trust congress will not suffer Mr. Frazee to be idle.

THE DRAMA.

THE NEW-YORK STAGE—ROBERT LE DIABLE, ETC.

Spring has come at last. We have walked out over the meadows and felt her breath, and seen the naked, desolate earth just beginning to melt and stir at her warm touch. The heaps of snow and ice under the fences, and beneath the high banks, are gone. There is a brighter shade of green about the brooks and on the sunny hill sides. Eastern windows are opened for an hour in the morning, and plants and bird-cages are set out on the piazzas and in the gardens. Pale, sick faces may be noted, stealing slowly along in the sunshine; and the balmy soft air touches our foreheads with a welcome feeling. We detected a fly humming under a warm shed the other day, ominous courier of its swarming people; and a bird sang near our window this morning; and the voice of coal has fallen; and we saw a lean gentleman just now walking erect, with a straw hat and a thin pair of pantaloons. Yes, spring has certainly come at last. We commence a dramatic paragraph in this way, because the invigorating influence of the season is visible in the theatrical as well as the vegetable world. The managers of all the houses begin to revive. The country folks crowd into town to buy goods, and of course go to the theatres; and the stars, which have left our sphere, wander back again in gay succession. Mrs. Austin has been doing an immense business in Boston, and will be soon here again, not only to delight the lovers of music with her brilliant round of old operas, but to enhance her reputation with new and yet more delightful exhibitions. We hear reports from all quarters touching the new forthcoming opera of "La Dame Blanche." It is expected by judges that it will achieve new triumphs in the cause of music, and add another flower to the chaplet of the fair vocalist. Forrest, too, will soon reappear. This gentleman will be welcomed, as well from his great popularity as a performer, as for the essential benefit he is rendering to the dramatic literature of the country. Clara Fisher may be soon looked for, and will be gladly greeted. C. Kean, who has been highly praised at the south, will return shortly; and other attractions are in preparation for the strangers who generally fill the city at this period.

A few nights since we witnessed, for the first time at the Park theatre, the new drama of Victorine, and we owe it to Mrs. Sharpe to say, that her personation of that character was natural and graceful. Simpson and Richings sustained their respective parts with marked ability. The entire cast is judicious, the scenery new, and the piece itself for effect, incident, and moral, unexceptionable. Every body ought to see Victorine—the neatest and best afterpiece—without exception—that has been produced this season.

The managers of the American theatre are making strenuous exertions, in pursuance of their resolution, to represent the plays of Shakspeare, and have already produced several with success, Mr. Hamblin and Miss Clifton sustaining the principal characters.

Mr. Russell, of the Richmond Hill—which house, the distant reader is informed is still open, notwithstanding the attempt made to destroy it during the late Anderson row—offers attractions of a most unequivocal kind. Mrs. Duff is nightly delighting the audience with her excellent delineations. This establishment also appears to be the arena chosen for all the "first appearances." Various young gentlemen have there lately made their bow to the public, with various degrees of success. The "Forty Thieves" has been brought forward, and numerous improvements carried into effect, from which, no doubt, the manager will reap profit.

As our dramatic information, during the past week, has been rather slender, we copy the following account from the Court Journal, of the new opera lately produced at Paris, which, as a novelty, has made more noise in the musical world than any similar composition of modern times.

ROBERT LE DIABLE.

The extraordinary success which this opera has obtained in Paris, offers a sufficient apology for dedicating a considerable space of our journal to an examination of its merits. Indeed, both the French papers and private accounts concur in representing "Robert le Diable" as one of the most striking and brilliant productions which have ever graced the stage. The French critics, who are rather given to hyperbole, have not missed this opportunity of lavishing the words enthousiasme—delire—rage, &c. &c. to describe the sensation which the opera has excited. Monsieur Fetis, professor at the "Conservatoire," an eminent composer himself, and one of the best judges of music, pronounces Meyerbeer's work one of those productions which render the author immortal. Castil-Blaze, another great authority, expresses himself in the following terms:—"This piece has produced a prodigious effect; never was success more complete—more brilliant."

The representation of "Robert le Diable" forms an epoch in the annals of the stage. Nearly a year has been spent in preparing it, and no less than two hundred thousand francs have been laid out in its production. It is what the French aptly call un tour de force; for seldom, or never, have such efforts been made in favor of one composition.

We have read "Robert le Diable," and consider it admirably adapted for the display of musical and pictorial genius. It is full of striking situations, and abounds in what is technically called stage effect. We offer a rapid outline of the plot.

At the rising of the curtain, the theatre represents a view of Palermo, on the border of the sea. Knights of all nations flock to a tournament—Robert, duke of Normandy, carries the prize—this Robert is the son of Bertha and a demon, by whom she had been seduced. Robert is a name of horror and alarm. Alice, his foster sister, presents herself, bearing a letter from the dying Bertha, which Robert is not to read until he abandons his career and repents. Robert confides his secrets to Alice; he tells her that being in love with Isabella, Princess of Sicily, he wished to elope with her, when he was attacked by a troop of cavaliers, and would certainly have fallen a victim had it not been for the timely aid of Bertram, an unknown knight. Bertram makes his appearance, and Alice shudders as she conceives that it is the portrait of Satan—the knights play at hazard—Bertram persuades Robert to join them—he consents, and loses every thing he possesses in the world—Alice presents herself to Isabella, and speaks in favor of Robert—Isabella forgives his faults, and allows him to fight for her in a tournament, in which the reward of the victor is to be her hand—Isabella sends him arms, he prepares for the combat, when a messenger stops him on the part of the Prince of Granada, who waits for him in the adjacent forest—Robert obeys the summons—the tournament in the meantime takes place—Robert does not appear, and consequently loses the prize. The third act represents a wild and dreary scene. The prince of darkness holds there his court—Bertram is the father of Robert, and his love for him induces him to keep his son in the career of crime, that by this means they may never be separated in the next world—Alice comes, by the appointment of her lover, Raimbaud, to this solitary place, and is horrified by the frantic cries of the demons, and the wild orgies which are being performed—she retreats, perceives a cross planted on one side of the scene, embraces it, and faints away—Bertram is in despair, the infernal congress has decreed that unless Bertram gets possession of Robert's soul before midnight, he loses his son forever—Robert himself is dejected on account of his losses—Bertram employs every means of temptation, and offers all the goods the world can bestow, if he proceed to the convent where the remains of St. Rosalia rest, and steal away a leaf of cypress which the saint holds in her hand—Robert consents to commit the sacrilege, and departs to the convent, the inmates of which had been condemned to the eternal flames—part of the building is in ruins by moonlight, and the statues of the nuns are seen on their tombs—Bertram conjures up the criminal nuns—the statues revive and start into life, they promise to induce Robert to keep his rash vow—a fearful scene of wild and bacchanalian passion takes place amongst the nuns, when Robert arrives, and is seduced to snatch away the branch of cypress—that moment tremendous shouts of demoniac triumph are heard. Isabella, meantime, is to marry the Prince of Granada—Robert arrives with the cypress—this talisman plunges every one into deep slumbers—Isabella succumbs to its magic power—Robert awakes her—she conjures him to renounce his criminal and secret agency, and that she will become his bride—Robert pulls the cypress to pieces—the guards awake, recognize him, and surround him—Robert is, however, delivered by Bertram, who again endeavors to tempt him—at last, he announces himself as his father. Alice, on the other hand, urges the dying injunction of Bertha—Robert remains undecided—midnight strikes, and Bertram is hurled into the fiery regions. The scene changes, and discovers a cathedral, brilliantly illuminated, where Isabella waits to bestow her hand on Robert.

The music in "Robert the Devil" displays an admirable versatility of talent. It is, by turns, graceful and tender, impassioned, solemn, or terrific, according to the situation or the feeling which the dramatist intended to illustrate. Great as the expectations which "Il Crociato" and "Margarita" might have given birth to, it is the general voice that they have been surpassed in this masterpiece of Meyerbeer. Indeed, all his former productions fall into insignificance, if measured by the standard of excellence displayed in "Robert le Diable." "Il Crociato," although emitting sparks of original genius, was evidently modelled after the manner and style of the modern Italian school. One of Rossini's greatest triumphs is that of having been imitated, unconsciously, by men of very superior talents. We see this exemplified in the case of Bellini, Pacini, Mercandanti, and others. Meyerbeer himself was not entirely exempted from the prevailing malady in musical composers; but in "Robert the Devil" he has boldly broken every shackle, and presented a work in which can be traced no resemblance to the popular Maestro, but which is so wholly original, in every respect, as to place its author in the very first rank of composers.

In this opera, Meyerbeer has happily blended the excellencies of the two first schools of music—the German and the Italian. He has judiciously preserved all the brilliancy, fire, richness, and happy caprice of the latter, with all the harmonic combinations of the former. He has not, like most eminent composers of the two schools, blindly adopted that excellence for which each is conspicuous, but has most skillfully availed himself of all the resources, both of harmony and melody. The result has been most happy; the public have not to complain that the music is too ponderous and scientific, nor can the profession reject it on the plea of its being too popular, light, and devoid of science! The finale of the first act, which begins with a graceful movement, and terminates in a terrific explosion, is conceived in a masterly manner. The opera, indeed, presents an almost inexhaustible treasure; we have five acts, into which is crowded a series of arias, duos, and concerted pieces, most of which will go the round of every public and private concert. The cavatina, sung by Isabella in the second act, the duo in the fourth, and the terzetto in the fifth, are the pieces which have more particularly excited approbation; the whole of the third act is admirable—the powerful situations afforded by the drama have completely inspired the composer.

We have said that all the sister arts had combined to achieve this wonder of the musical world; we have mentioned poetry and music; dancing and painting have contributed their quota—the fascinating Taglioni surpassed herself, as the leader of the nuns in the third act—Perrot, Montessu, and Mademoiselle Noblet, Dupont and Subia, performed a graceful pas de cinq in the second. The scenery is wonderful, even in a world of wonders, like the opera; it surpasses the magic effects of the famous "Aladdin." The view, in the third act, of the convent by moonlight, deserves a special mention, as well as the dazzling effect of the concluding scene of the opera. Cicci has excelled all his former pictorial reputation. With regard to the execution of the opera, the French critics are lavish of praise. Nourrit, the first French tenor, Levasseur, and Mademoiselle Darnoreau, did ample justice to the parts entrusted to their care—Robert, Bertram, and Isabella. The dresses, too, are praised; and, indeed, no one should be forgotten in this estimate of the most successful and brilliant production of the last ten years.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE P. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, MARCH 31, 1852.

American Literature.—We are delighted with a good book, whatever may be its origin; but the pleasure is greatly heightened when it is from an American writer. So much has been said against our literature—it is so often taken for granted, even by our own critics, that our authors are worthless—our press has so long teemed with the second-hand works of other lands—and our publishers so frequently betray their carelessness respecting the fate of native productions, that so far from enjoying an advantage in his own country, an American has absolutely an unfavorable current to swim against. It is, therefore, with sincere gratification that we behold a man of talent successfully contending against these adverse circumstances, and making his way to fame in spite of the prejudices of foreign nations and the apathy of his own.

We have now before us the Life of Gouverneur Morris, but recently published, from the pen of Jared Sparks. It is indeed a superior performance, equally acceptable from the intrinsic interest of the subject, and the able manner in which Mr. Sparks has executed his task. It is much read and very justly praised.

The second volume of the new and revised edition of "Marshall's Life of Washington," has been sent forth. Everybody knows this for a ponderous tome of great worth and of established reputation.

By the way, when are we to have the long expected "Life of Hamilton?" A man of such extraordinary character and talents presents a rich theme to the biographer.

Among other productions entitled to honorable mention, is a large super-royal octavo volume, published by Gould and Banks, and presenting a "Treatise on the Practice of the Supreme Court of the State of New-York." It is by David Graham, jun., one of the most promising young lawyers at our bar. His book would reflect honor on older heads. It is, at this time, from peculiar circumstances respecting the revised statutes, best known to the profession, invaluable as a reference upon subjects but newly settled by the legislature, bringing down their revisions of the late revised laws, and the decisions thereon, nearly to the present moment.

We have also from the Harpers the tenth edition, revised and corrected, of Wirt's "Letters of the British Spy," with a biographical sketch and likeness of the author. Every one is familiar with Wirt's beautiful compositions. They have long since passed the ordeal.

In addition, we are promised a continuation of the "Sketch-Book," by Washington Irving, from the press of Carey & Lea. It is to be called the "Alhambra." In it the reader will accompany the accomplished author through Grenada, and hear some of the legends of that region. We learn the work has been for some time ready for publication.

Mr. Cooper, too, has not been idle. A forthcoming book of his is announced—"Heidenmaner, or the Pagan Camp."

Other movements are making among us in literary matters. A novel from a distinguished author is bespoken by the publishers, and may be soon expected. Another is preparing a collection of sketches purely of domestic origin. Besides all these, one or two poetic effusions are talked of, although poets stand on dangerous ground, it seems—at least if a shot from behind a bush can kill a brace at once. When the verses of Bryant and all the New-England bards are weighed in the balance and found wanting, it behoves us to inquire whom we have to boast of in our merry moments, and to read over by our winter hearth.

We are glad to perceive that the article on lake poetry, in the Quarterly Review published in Philadelphia, although it scarcely deserves the notice it has excited, is generally condemned by intelligent people. Our readers will remember the bitter character of the literary notices, which, a number of years ago, appeared in the Edinburgh Review. Nearly every work, except such as were patronized by it from personal or political motives, was received with an indiscriminating broadside; and doubtless many a young and friendless author of merit, was sunk deep into the sea of oblivion by the overbearing enmity of this gigantic foe. Its fallibility was well exposed by Byron in his severe philippic, although the learning, experience, and splendid genius which gave its pages a wide and nearly overwhelming influence, rendered the task both difficult and dangerous. We grieve to see a journal, so generally respectable as the Quarterly Review, apeing this virulence, without any pretensions to its strength. If its contributors will read over the papers in the Edinburgh, they will be struck with the immense difference between those able, eloquent, and witty compositions, and their own awkward and clumsy attempts at satire; neither should they forget that while their own means of ruling the dominion of American literature are so slender as to render their attempts a common jest, the people upon whose credulity they would foist their spurious and interested opinions, are accustomed to examine such matters for themselves.

We have heard that if the poems of Messrs. Bryant and Willis had not been sent to the New-York press, they would have won a much more favorable reception from the Quarterly. What a striking difference there is between the narrow course of this journal respecting American authors, and that of the North American and Southern Reviews, which, without intending disrespect to any one, we may venture to place in the front ranks. The former, in a temperate and intelligent examination of Mr. Willis, points out his faults with kindness, and explains his merits with liberality and discrimination, and is distinct in approving many of his productions; the latter speaks loudly in praise of the works of Bryant, as, indeed, does the other. "Mr. Bryant," says the Southern Review, "has preserved the even tenor of his way, and been content to worship nature in her purest and sweetest forms, in a style and spirit not unworthy of the consecrated shrine on which his chaste and gentle muse has been wont to lay its votive garlands, odorous and rich as spring."

Cholera.—It is said that pieces of fresh meat, attached to paper kites, were sent up into the air at Newcastle, England, and after remaining aloft a few moments, were found filled with animal existences. We cannot vouch for the truth of this relation.

Murder.—According to a memorandum kept by a gentleman of Pennsylvania, the year 1831 was marked by one hundred and nine murders.

Distress in Paris.—An account states, that in one arrondissement of that metropolis are twenty-four thousand workmen without bread, vestments, or straw to lie on!

Silk.—The report made in the assembly of this state on the practicability of introducing the manufacture of silk, &c. asserts that it has been ascertained, by actual experiment, both in France and England, that American silk, if not superior, is at least equal to the silk of any other country.

Author of Waverley.—Sir Walter Scott is still in Italy, whence, it is stated, he will travel through Germany. At Naples, a fancy ball was to be given in his honor, at which the various characters drawn by him in Waverley were to be personified.

Military outrage.—The Montreal Courant says, "we regret to observe that two Methodist missionaries have been shot by a sentence of a drum-head court-martial in the island of Jamaica. We hope this extraordinary proceeding will be fully inquired into; it certainly is of a most serious and important nature."

An advertisement.—A person, who styles himself a mad doctor, lately published an address, in a provincial paper, beginning, "worthy the attention of the insane."

Hints to Legislators.—By the Mexican laws, if one man kill another in a duel, he becomes answerable for all his debts.

MY FONDEST! MY FAIREST!

HUMMEL'S AIR A LA TYROLIENNE—AS SUNG BY MADAME MALIBRAN GARCIA—ARRANGED FOR THE SPANISH GUITAR, AND PRESENTED TO THE NEW-YORK MIRROR, BY S. KEENE.

Allegretto.

My fond-est! my fair-est! my gen-tle Ca-ri-na! Come hi-ther, my own one! Come hi-ther to me, Bright gar-lands I bring thee, sweet songs I will sing thee, More sweet than the bird in yon em'-rald tree, While ev'-ry breeze that wan-tons by Shall soft-ly ec-ho, ec-ho sigh for sigh; And ev'-ry note, sweet, thee, By love's fond strain shall an-swer'd be, And ev'-ry note, sweet bird, shall an-swer'd be, shall an-swer'd be. My fond-est! my fair-est! my gen-tle Ca-ri-na! Come hi-ther, my own one! come hi-ther to me. Bright gar-lands I bring thee, sweet songs I will sing thee, Ca-ri-na, Ca-ri-na! I live but for Slentando. Ad lib.

thee!

SECOND VERSE.

My fondest! my fairest! though cold hearts should chide me,
Ah! what are their frowns, my own one! to me?
I feel not a sorrow, when thou art beside me—
What joy can be greater than gazing on thee?
Sweet vale and grove! bright moon and star!
To those who love, how dear, how dear ye are!
But bird and bow'r, moon, star, and sea,
Are twofold dear when bless'd with thee:
Are twofold dear, sweet love! when bless'd with thee:
When bless'd with thee, my fondest! my fairest!
My gentle Carina! come hither, my own one! come hither to me,
Bright garlands I bring thee, sweet songs I will sing thee,
Carina! Carina! I live but for thee!

THE SERAPH AND THE MORTAL.

From the French.

THE theatre — in Paris was crowded with a brilliant assemblage to witness the representations of a young girl celebrated for her beauty, virtue, artless innocence, and extraordinary talents. The critics of that famed metropolis had never witnessed loveliness and genius so universally acknowledged and admired. The highest ranks vied with each other in praising her charms, her wonderful skill in music—the voice which nature had bestowed upon her as a precious gift corresponding with the rare grace of her person and the brilliancy of her mind. It was whispered abroad that she had received offers of marriage from the loftiest in wealth and rank—that the choicest spirits of the age courted her society, and were spell-bound by her fascinations. Royalty itself had sanctioned the general opinion. Never had Paris seen an individual whose appearance was greeted with more rapturous acclamations.

The opera proceeded, until the scene appeared which was to introduce the heroine. Long before she entered, bursts of applause broke forth in various parts of the eager and dense throng—there was a moment's silence; and a creature, perfectly and exquisitely lovely, suddenly shone before them, bending with the grace of a summer bud amidst the tremendous peal of the gathered thousands which burst forth and died away, and burst forth again and again till the dome trembled and the foundation seemed rent asunder. Amid this tumult of enthusiasm, I stood with folded arms gazing at the vision, which to me seemed to have floated from the skies. A break of music from the orchestra announced a favorite air, and she came forward to the stage-lights to sing. Not in the depths of the green forest in the hush of noon—not in the desert in its wide desolation—not in the dark tomb itself, could reign a silence more perfect than hung over the vast multitude. It seemed as if the light and beautiful being, whose lofty plumes of snow bent down above a radiant face, was an enchantress, and by some potent spell had struck each one into a statue, with the coloring and attitude and expression of life. And then when the last notes, which seemed warbled from the throat of a nightingale, had passed away, the silence for a moment continued, as if no one dared disturb the air on which yet rung the echo of the most delicious notes ever heard by mortals. I thought to myself, if fate would give such a creature to me! The idea haunted me—I loved her—I was wretched.

Three years after I met her in London. Dismal! I could not believe my own eyes. There was the same face—but all the glory was gone. It was dimmed and obscured. The seraph had sunk into the mortal. It was the sun shorn of his beams. It was the angel fallen, whose brightness was not the same. I had just married an artless girl, whose modesty shrank from every eye but mine, who could neither dance, nor sing, nor play on any instrument. It happened that we embarked together on a voyage of some length. I had every opportunity of judging of the character of my fair enchantress. It was dreadful. I shuddered at the escape I had made. How many a man is rendered miserable by falling in love with beauty and accomplishments, instead of mind and soul!

ORIGINAL POETRY.

PERIODICAL LITERATURE on the one hand affords employment to the public mind, and favors its tendencies to the pursuit of science and intellectual improvement; and, on the other, it gives a more general and free spirit to literature itself than it would otherwise have, by bringing together the productions of every class of mind, displaying the main points of consideration in almost every question that can be started, opening the door to every inquirer whose talents entitle him to respect, and, in addition to this, offering something, which even in its lightness is elegant, for those who, were it not for the resources it affords, would live in a state of perfect intellectual sloth. Rev. Henry Stebbing.

SOCRATES.

THE day was almost spent, when through the streets
Of Athens pressed th' inquiring throng, to learn
The fate of Socrates. The gathering
Was dense around the temple's portico,
And every ear with deep solicitude
Was turned, to catch the peals of eloquence
That swelled within the dome. The old man stood
Before the high tribunal, with a mien
Undaunted, and a god-like dignity.
His arms were calmly folded on his breast;
While the keen glances of his piercing eyes,
That still retained their wonted fire, were fixed
Upon his bold accusers, Anytus,
And Lycon, and Myletus; men who could
Enchain the mind with powers of rhetoric,
And hold the listening multitude, enchained,
Entranced, unconscious of their being; yet
Could not endure the searching gaze of him,
The sage philosopher, whose precepts were
As laws to Athens; and whom all revered,
Save the ambitious aspirants whose breasts
Were racked by envy. Motionless and calm,
As one who contemplates some pleasant theme,
He there remained, with lips that wore a smile,
Which danger rendered only doubly sweet.
His hair was parted from his lofty brow,
Where time had stamped its impress, and where thought
Had left its traces. Pity mildly beamed
In his expression, while the deep-aided solemn
Of wicked men unfolded to his view.

A stillness, solemn as the sepulchre's,
Fell strangely o'er the crowd, when the stern voice
Of the accusers died upon the ear.
Then did a thousand hearts throb painfully,
As the eye rested on the prisoner;
And every mind was eager for the words,
As they should fall like thunder from his lips,
Repelling the dark charges; but no sign
Of anger soil'd the calm serenity
That graced his features. Boldly then he drew
His mantle round him as he would depart;
Nor deigned an answer, deeming it unwise
For one whose life bore no reproach, to stand
On his defence with idle words, as if
There needed proof that Grecia's wisest son
Was guiltless. Placidly he turned towards
His breathless friends, and spoke kind soothing words;
Then to the judges uttered fearlessly
His thoughts; yet seeking not to influence
The angry passions, but to manifest
The courage springing from the consciousness
Of innocence, and show how tranquilly
The disciplined mind, familiar with the love
Of virtue, looks on death. Then he alone
Of all the crowd of listeners heard unmoved
The fatal sentence spoken; e'en the vile
Malicious orators, who there had vied
And strained each nerve to work upon the heart,
Could scarce conceal a shudder, when the voice,
Pronouncing death by poison, struck their ears.

A murmur rose among the multitude,
When the last ray of hope expired. The throng,
Touched by the scene, dispersed each to his home;
And as the shades of eve drew nigh, the streets,
And the wide squares deserted, echoed not
The rumbling of the chariot-wheel; no sounds
Of glee, or mingling voices, or the din
Of merry artizans at their toil were heard—
For Athens mourned!

Days passed. 'Twas early morn,
When at a prison-gate appeared a group,
Awaiting entrance. They were long-tried friends,
Apollodorus, Phædo, and the wife
Of Socrates, Xantippe, with her son,
Supported by the faithful Crito. Sad
And silent passed they in, when the huge gates
Were flung upon their hinges. Mid the gloom
Of the long corridors, that echoed sounds
Fearful and strange, the death-groans, and loud wail
Of the despairing wretches, came and died;
While, ever and anon, the clank of chains,
And the harsh grating of the portal bolts,
And the stern voice of passionate rebuke,

Disturbed the silence. So at length they came
To where the gray-haired captive was immured,
Within a cell of stone. The giant guard,
Armed as befits one whose rough duty 'tis
To hold bad men submissive, and to tame
The restive spirits, kept a needless watch,
With a strict eye, beside the massive doors.
The cheerful sage arose from his cold seat,
To meet the melancholy train with smiles
Of joyful welcoming, as he was wont,
When in far happier days, beneath some grove's
Delightful shade, they gathered to receive Instruction. His exhausted limbs scarce raised
The ponderous links that hung to them, and galled
The wasted flesh; yet no complaint or sigh
Or groan escaped him; not a transient cloud
Upon his brow betrayed the agony
That tortured him. He hid the cruel chain
Beneath his mantled folds, to spare those hearts
Already pierced too far. Xantippe fell
Upon his neck, and bathed it with her tears.
That moment wrung his breast, and something seen
There was of struggling with his stifled grief;
And to his eyes he raised a fettered hand,
And wiped away a tear; then bade his friends
Lead back the cherished object, that had made
His weakness known, and rendered him a child;
When every nerve should be well strung, and all
The vigor of his mind arrayed, to meet
Unshrinking the decrees of fate.

The day
Advanced, and Socrates steeped every heart
Into forgetfulness of sorrow, while
Discoursing of the soul's high destiny,
The glory and th' unspeakable joys of heaven,
Where it holds converse with the good and wise,
Of early time, who filled with their renown
All nations of the earth; the patriarchs,
And prophets, and the greatest kings, and all
The gifted ones whose spirits live in sweet Communion.

Eve drew nigh again; the sun
Had fallen far into the west, and shone
Pleasantly through the grated window-bars,
Reminding the illustrious prisoner
Of the sad hour of death. "Prepare the bowl,"
Said he to Crito, "while I gaze once more Upon ungrateful Athens." There it lay,
The far-famed city, with its splendid domes
And temples, and its rows of columns, tinged
By the last crimson rays. The streets were still
As midnight; scarce a sound was heard to break
The deep repose. The sage looked silently,
And traced the well-known avenues, and saw
The marble piles devoted to the gods,
And beautiful gardens, groves, and shady walks,
Familiar to his eyes, and breathed farewell
With a full heart; then turned away, and seized
The brimming bowl with a firm grasp, and drank
The poisonous fluid to the dregs. He stretched
His manacled limbs upon a couch and lay,
Conversing with his friends in lofty strains,
Till o'er him came a sense of weariness,
And agonized, his features lost their calm
Serenity, and as the venom worked
Its murderous end, exhausted nature with Convulsive throes gave o'er the struggle!

ORIGINAL TALES.

WHO'S THE THIEF? OR A WOMAN OUTWITTED!

SHE was alone—gazing from the window of her father's mansion on the Hudson. The moon was shining in, and lay in its silent pale beauty on the floor—and from that window such a scene! Moonlight, mountains, and a river in the lavish abundance of summer. What could be more beautiful? Quietly slept the bosom of the tranquil stream beneath the sky of that pleasant night—glimmering here with the yellow tremulous beams, deepening there into shadowy gloom, beneath the soft banks overhung with heavy foliage. Sometimes a steamboat ploughed by, with the steady repeated splash of its massive wheels, and the rushing sound of its bow breaking through the calm water—lights gleaming from its decks, and a voluminous train of firey smoke streaking the transparent air far in its track.

"Ah!" sighed Kate, "if I were only in that steamboat, going to New-York."

Then a sloop stole by—its white sail dimly beautiful in the soft atmosphere, and gliding like a spirit in bias through the shades of Elysium. As she watched it slowly lapsing along with the tide, the voice of a sailor, singing a rude but cheerful air, met her ear. Night gives a charm to the commonest sight and sound. A ruined hovel, which in the daytime looks filthy and repulsive, shows like a sweet painting beneath the moon; and voices which generally you would not have regarded, have a distinctness and a meaning, in the hush and repose of nature, that make them strange objects of interest and pleasure.

"I wish I were a sailor," Kate murmured. "I wish I were. To be out all the long summer nights on the river. To be a man—a free, proud man. Oh! I wish I were a man."

The sloop disappeared behind a projecting cliff, and the song sounded in the distance, fainter and fainter. Then it died away. Every thing was still but the cry of a whippoorwill from the opposite shore, and the answer of the katydid. As the musing and lonely girl looked in among the branches of a grove which crowned the summit of the hill on which the mansion stood, she saw the fireflies streaming along—their brilliant flashes reddening and fading and beaming up again, cheering the dark places with strange beautiful radiance.

"I wish I were a firefly," thought Kate. "How happy they are? They have no care—no restraint—no old aunts—how I hate aunts! Now there is aunt Sally—so spiteful—so—"

A distant roar and splash announced another steamboat. On it came—onward and onward—growing larger and louder—and suddenly a fine, soft, slow air burst from a band of music on board, and floated up to the ears of the sad watcher. The music ceased. She felt very strange. She was going to cry, when the tones of a flute, near the house, and evidently in the hands of a master, caught her attention. The air was breathed as if the soul of the player were in it. It was a little song she knew perfectly well. She had sung it a thousand times—"I love but thee."

"I declare," she said, "who can it be? Pa's gone away—besides, he could not play if he were here. Ma's in New-York, and she can't play either. It can't be John—and as for aunt Sally—hush—there it is again."

Again from the beach, under the hill beneath the house, came the same slow, sweet air—"I love but thee—I love but thee"—then a voice, better than a hundred flutes, sang the words. She sprang out—

"It's Edward!—Ah! Edward—and I know—I knew it was you," and her eagerly extended hands were seized by the new comer, a gentle, good-looking young man of twenty, in a manner the most expressive of joy at the meeting.

Kate was about seventeen, and just from boarding-school, having "finished her education." That is, she had a smatter of French, had read Telemachus, and knew a little Italian—just enough to sing in that melting language without embarrassment. She had read several books of history, a few standard poems, and "ever so many" novels, and knew how to paint flowers, make gilt-paper baskets, and draw maps. Then she could dance—oh! divinely—and sing sweetly, and play on the forte-piano magnificently—for a girl. That is what we call "finishing her education" now-a-days.

Ah, sir, but could she sew rapidly and neatly? Did she understand house-keeping? Was she a good arithmetician? Had she really cultivated a correct taste in reading? Was she cheerful and sensible and—

Heavens! what nonsense. Arithmetician! sewing! house-keeping! ha! ha! ha! why she was rich and fashionable, and, as I said before, had finished her education.

Her disposition, ay, that's every thing after all. Ignorance may be remedied—beauty will fade, or pall upon the eye—a plain appearance becomes dear when associated with an intelligent mind and a warm heart. Disposition is the main thing in a wife, and Kate's disposition was charming. So kind and sensitive, and so extremely affectionate. She was, in short, one of that numerous class of young ladies who "must have something to love." She told Edward so that very evening while they were walking in the moonlight path by the scented box.

"Well," replied Edward, "you have something to love. There is your father."

"Oh, yes, Edward, to be sure—I love pa, but—"

"Your ma, then,"

"Yes, certainly, but mother's away half the time."

"Well, there's the parrot."

"What! little Poll, Edward?"

"And the splendid horses."

"Nonsense."

"And John—that good old white-headed man who works in the garden."

"Yes, Edward, I do love old John; but I mean a different kind of love."

"Well, there's aunt Sally."

"Oh! you—"

and she nearly pushed him off a steep bank. With all her education she was rather a hoyden. He chased her around the green plot, and there is no knowing what might have ensued when the voice of aunt Sally was heard calling her name, and the glowing look of happiness faded from her face, and the pouting girl advanced towards the house with a pace as slow and reluctant as the step with which the school-boy creeps unwillingly to school.

I hate details as much as Kate hated aunts. Details, except on particular occasions, are excessively stupid. I am only giving the outline of a story. It is of no kind of consequence to the reader who all these people were, and whether they were "born of poor but honest parents." It is sufficient to say that these two young persons were very fond of each other, and were very much beloved by every one but aunt Sally, and that they had the kindest wishes for all the world except aunt Sally. This aunt Sally was an embittered old woman, of the worst possible disposition, yet with art enough to keep her brother, Mr. Stanley, and his wife, in ignorance of her real nature. Her own peace and happiness had been poisoned long since by her vanity, pride, and bad temper. She had, according to her own account, rejected a great many men, who ought to sing praises to fate for their escape. Wretched herself, it was the aim of her life to make others so. She looked black upon all the innocent amusements of life, was always fearing and complaining and doubting and preaching, always warning the young against cheerful recreations and natural impulses, breaking up every little circle of happiness with sneers and inuendos, and long lectures about nothing at all—bah! how I hate such women. Nothing can be more injudicious in parents than to commit the business of instruction to such hands. Their pupils, or victims, which is the same thing, will soon, from the mere force of association, look upon knowledge and prudence with disgust. Poor Kate had the misfortune to be under her charge; and especially since the absence of Mr. and Mrs. Stanley to the city on a short visit, had felt repugnance to her society. It was nothing but restraints and prohibitions. She could not step without breaking a rule. "Don't go down by the river," and "don't tread on the grass," and "don't pull the leaves from the box," and don't do this, and don't do that, had re-echoed in her ears so often and so dolefully that, fairly tired out, she had at last seated herself silently at the window where we first presented her to the reader. There the beauty of the night beguiled her weary thoughts, till the flute of Mr. Edward Lawton announced that the young gentleman for whom she had conceived an attachment as warm as her loathing of her aunt Sally was complete, had landed from one of the steamboats just from the city of New-York. It is pretty well settled that from that city in the most intolerable period of the summer heat every body goes; and Mr. Edward Lawton, availing himself of his intimacy with the family of the Stanleys, chose their residence as his temporary refuge from the various inconveniences of the town.

Well, here he was, and completely in love with the country and with Kate. They were old acquaintances, and I believe cousins; at all events I should think so, as he did sometimes at meeting and parting, for instance, good humoredly kiss her rosy cheek, without meeting any further reproof than a blush and a very slight struggle from her, and a "Come, come, Mr. Lawton, good by, you'll be too late for the boat," from that detestable aunt Sally.

Edward had seen Mr. Stanley in the city, and from him had received a note of five hundred dollars. This note was to be paid by the young man in case a certain gentleman should call before Mr. Stanley himself could return home. Dreaming not of the deep duplicity and wickedness which characterized the bad woman who had so artfully succeeded in winding herself into the confidence of Mr. and Mrs. Stanley, he, the morning subsequent to his arrival, placed the money in her hands. No witness was by.

"Please keep it," he said, "till Mr. Stanley comes back. I'm for a walk with Kate."

These walks with pretty women in the country are dangerous. I advise young people against them. There is something in the exercise that sends the blood through the veins with a livelier motion, and prepares them for the reception of soft impressions.

"How beautiful!" said Kate. She was looking at a rose-bud. "Beautiful, indeed!" echoed Edward. He was looking at her. "I love flowers," said Kate, "better than any thing in the world." "So do I," said Edward, "except—"

"What?"

"Yourself, dear Kate."

So much for summer rambles in the country.

They were very happy, very; in short, they were engaged to be married.

"I hate aunt Sally; do not tell her," said Edward.

"Oh no," replied Kate. "She is old, cross, and ugly. I hate her too. She is a bad, stupid old woman."

"Never mind her," said Edward; "but, dear Kate, no one sees us, no one hears us but heaven. Tell me you love me."

Her head reclined on his bosom.

But Edward was mistaken, as the young sometimes are. Some one, besides heaven, both heard and saw. It was aunt Sally. She listened; she shook with rage. She was like a serpent in the bush, with her small black eyes glistening. She vowed revenge. Back to her room she slunk, with a boiling bosom.

"I will blast them. They little think what is hanging over their heads," said this wicked woman.

Mr. Stanley was a good man, but one of those whom you can lead any where. Edward had been wild, reckless, and extravagant, and had been suspected of one habit, a dreadful one, viz. gambling. Before Mr. Stanley reached home Edward returned to the city, and having forgotten, in the happiness of Kate's soci-ty, that he had deposited the money with aunt Sally, wrote a note to Mr. Stanley on the subject, as follows:

"MY DEAR SIR—The five hundred dollars placed by you in my hands I gave to Mrs. Beaufort. Business suddenly recalled me to the city. I shall soon, I trust, see you again. Yours, &c."

Fate sometimes plays strange tricks. One of his associates three days after met him in the street. He was thinking of Kate.

"What, Ned, my boy," said his friend Walter, "how are you? Come in here with me."

"What, a billiard-room! No, no; I have sworn off."

"Ridiculous, come along; you need not play. Come, I have something to tell you;" and he almost dragged him in.

They were both first-rate players. It was in the evening, and the room was filling fast. One after another whom he knew came in, and in an hour he was strongly excited in the game. Cigars and wine followed. His blood was heated, his brain whirled; he betted, lost, quarreled. Then came the disgusting uproar of a tavern fight—the high passionate words and execrable oaths; the accusation, the retort; the lie, the blow; discord, fury, whirl, crash, broken windows and glass, and he lay at full length and almost senseless on the floor. In a few moments he found himself in the arms of a friend, and in the street.

It was a breathless moonlight night. The air was soft and refreshing on his hot and throbbing forehead; the heavens, all glorious with their myriads of stars, stretched high and still above his head. What a contrast their holy silence and order, their tranquil and sublime expanse, all pure and broad and serene, offered to the pestilential air of the confined, riotous room, loaded with smoke and the fumes of drunken revel, and echoing with execrations. Oh! what a contrast between the vile demoniac spirit of man and the sweetness of nature. There is surely some spell in a bright sky at night, which awes down the impotent fury of human passions. It stilled and hushed those of Edward. The heaving of his bosom subsided, he felt abashed, and hid his face and wept.

At this moment a gentleman stepped from the crowd. It was Stanley. His face seemed more "in sorrow than in anger," and yet wore a severe look of reproach, which made Edward recoil. He grasped him by the hand, and led him away to a solitary spot, where the shadow nearly concealed them from view.

"Edward Lawton," were his words, delivered in a deep and agitated tone, "you are a villain!"

The young man collected his senses in a moment. The insult went to his heart. He raised his fist to prostrate before him the slanderer of his honor, but a recollection stole upon him. The father of Kate. His hairs were white. Age claims reverence, which generous youth ever yields willingly—love more willingly still. He was about to speak—Stanley interrupted him. His manner was freezing.

"Yes, young sir, strike. I am an old man. Your father loved me. True, he is in his grave, but I could tell a story of his son, ever beloved by us both, which would almost move his bones in the coffin."

Edward was proud and haughty. He had perfectly recovered his composure, and drawing himself up, said,

"You are pleased to magnify a very ordinary case of imprudence, sir, into a heinous offence. Great as that offence may be, sir, it cannot, at least in my opinion, be as inexcusable or extraordinary as the manner in which you avail yourself of your age and station and other circumstances to debase my character and wound my feelings. You must allow me to assure you, sir, that there is no man living, except yourself, from whom I would hear such language with impunity."

"So young—so specious—yet so deep and subtle," rejoined Mr. Stanley. "Never have I before been so deceived. But come, sir," he added, sternly, "let us fling aside our masks and understand why we are met. I have ever taken you, Edward Lawton, for a young man, whatever might be your imprudence, of integrity and honor."

"And who," asked Edward, "dare assert that I am otherwise?"

"I do, sir. I charge you with gambling—with vile rioting in a filthy tavern—with drunkenness—and with robbery!"

"Mr. Stanley, for heaven's sake, are you mad?"

"Your duplicity, sir, can no longer avail you. The five hundred dollars which I rashly entrusted to your care, sir, has been risked and lost, most likely at that table where but now I stood an unobserved witness of your profligacy and disgrace."

Nothing is more like guilt than innocence when suddenly startled with accusations which appear supported by circumstances. The real criminal, prepared for these circumstances, meets them with composure and combats them with wary coolness and sagacity—but he who is charged unjustly, is shocked and bewildered, and knows not how to act. Edward had long since forgotten the incident of the money, and when thus astounded with a charge so dreadful, stammered forth an incoherent explanation, which only satisfied Stanley that the statement of Mrs. Sally Beaufort was correct.

"I am unaccustomed," at length said Edward, "to descend to defend myself from such a suspicion as you have conceived against me, but as I feel assured you must be laboring under some singular error, I must beg to know if you are supported in this matter by the assertion of Mrs. Beaufort?"

"She declares solemnly that you never placed any money in her hands. But, on the contrary, asserts that you hastened away soon after your arrival with unusual signs of agitation, and that she suspected from your manner that something was wrong. Your character in this city, too, she has taken the pains to inquire into, and finds you plunged in a circle of dissipated young men, and resorting to gambling as a means of excitement. I could not credit this. I was convinced that there must be some mistake. I even set off, as soon as my leisure permitted, to this city, to seek an interview with you, when I accidentally met you in the act of entering that disgusting scene of ribaldry and villany which you have just left. I entered with you. I watched your conduct—heard your profane oaths—saw you play for profit, each stake heavier than the preceding—until every thing conspired to make Mrs. Beaufort's suspicions mine. Now, sir, if you have done this black deed, confess it to me, and my lips shall be sealed for ever. If in a momentary excitement you have periled the money, led on by the idea of gain, and thus lost it without being able to replace it—tell me so, and the matter shall end at once."

"Mr. Stanley," said Edward, "your suspicions are not without plausibility, and I forgive you. But, mark me, Mrs. Beaufort is a dreadful woman, and you will one day discover her character. In the mean time let me ask if she is still at her usual residence?"

"She is."

"Will you then do me the favor to conceal from her that you and I have met. I assure you that I placed the money in her hands; but without any witness. If she is wicked enough to deny it, I must resort to stratagem. Something must be done—will you grant my request?"

"I will, and afford every facility for carrying your design into execution."

They parted. Edward conceived a plan to escape the dreadful consequences of the fraud, which he perceived Mrs. Beaufort had resolved to practise upon him. He accordingly went to a friend, stated the circumstance, and disclosed his plot. It was capital, but he wanted five hundred dollars to accomplish it, and his friend lent it. He immediately started for the residence of Stanley, and sought an interview with Mrs. Beaufort. She met him with cool deliberation. He had secretly requested the presence of a gentleman, who, apparently from accident, was in the apartment. Stanley was from home.

"My dear Mrs. Beaufort," said Edward, "there has been a great mistake between you and me. I stated to Mr. Stanley that I had left five hundred dollars with you for him, but, to my great astonishment, I find myself in error. Here is the bill, all the time in my own pocket-book."

The lady colored, stared, and seemed thunderstruck.

"Do me the favor, Mrs. Beaufort, to take this in charge for Mr. Stanley. It was the strangest of mistakes, certainly. I must be off, as I am hastening on a visit up the country."

Mrs. Beaufort took the money, bewildered. Edward left the room. Presently he came back. Mrs. Beaufort was alone.

"Now I think of it," said Edward again, "I will take this money myself."

The confusion of Mrs. Beaufort was great. She might have said this also, but then the witness. It was impossible, and she returned it.

"Now, madam," said the young man, "we shall see who's the dupe."

He instantly returned to the city, and commenced a suit against Mrs. Beaufort for five hundred dollars. His witness was ready to prove that he saw him place the money in her hands.

"Ay, sir, but I returned it," exclaimed the lady.

"Produce your witness," said Edward.

There was none.

"It is vain to defend the suit, madam," said the lawyer. "The money must be paid."

Mrs. Sarah Beaufort had no money, except one bill. It was produced with trembling, and a vague fear of some awful legal consequences. Stanley instantly recognized it, every thing was explained, and the young couple were married, "of course."

AGLÆ.

"Romance a baby
Fed on toils and sumache;
Come common sense
It turns yt syck at stomache."
Highgate Doggrel of 1640.

In a quartier of Paris occupied by people in middling, yet independent life, distinguished more for the comfort than the style of its inhabitants, lived an old avocat, Jean Billesse. After he had maintained a place of some consideration at the bar, amassed a handsome fortune, given a successive education of marionnette, nunnery and tour to his only and petted daughter Aglæ, he chose a dry and warm corner in Père la chaise, made his will, and died.

Aglæ, who succeeded to his neat town-house, and romantic villa near Melun, was just eighteen when her father died. She was slender to a fault, and one of those sylphed figures too frequently annexed to a pævish disposition. Her eye was a deep hazel, her cheek red, and her hair was tinted with that shade Venetians love so well, and which Titian has immortalized in his Flora. The English would perhaps have called it carrot, and the Canadians sorrel; it partook of both; and, without exciting the animadversions so usually heaped on red hair, accorded too well with her brilliant yet tender expression to let any one pass it without praise. Aglæ's glass told her she was pretty; Aglæ's schoolmates told her she was rich; Aglæ's father told her she was an idol. With all these incitements to be weak and ridiculous, Aglæ had a gentle heart and a well-lettered mind. Her heart was affectionate and constant, although the smooth tide of her affections would be ruffled now and then by those whimsies which attack young men and old. Her crying sin was romance. The romanesque was a tinge thrown on all her plans, life, pursuits. Like Don Quixote, she made every beggar a knight, and every chaumière a chateau. Exposed in St. Agnes to the amorous babble of the nuns, who mix so strangely the saint and sinner, she had her mind thoroughly imbued with romantic lore, and could tell an endless chain of historiettes of chevaliers sans peur et sans reproche, who released chained demoiselles and killed chimères. As she advanced in years, her mind left the old ages of the crusades and turned itself upon more Boccacian scenes. She built a thousand chateaux, (en Espagne), and peopled them with dukes and marquises. She loved to ponder over the portals of De Bernis, and used the Latin, which the pious nuns had intended for the missal, to translate the Georgics of Mars. Love was the theme of her thoughts, a nobleman their object; sometimes a castle, sometimes a cottage their habitation. She pulled flowers, braided wreaths, scribbled rhymes, and carved her name on fifty trees at Millefleurs.

At sixteen she made a tour with her father to London, Brussels, Vienna, and Rome. Strolling once on the Toro, she dropped her glove; a youth, with all the graces of twenty, picked it up and presented it to her. Agla dreamed of him. At Venice, while promenading in the Piazza di San Marco, with her father, by moonlight, she saw a light form meditating with folded arms on the brazen horses in front of the church. He turned. It was the same handsome stranger. She thought of him all the way to Paris. In her chamber she thought of him, and wrote two sonnets to his praise. "He must be a marquis, a duke, point moins," thought Agla. She sat in the balcony at her house, in La Rue Ney; she was serenaded. She took the host at Notre-dame; he was at her elbow, and drank of the same cup. She strolled on the banks of the Seine at Millefleurs. "Agla" was carved on two willows, in a neat Egyptian character. She entered an arbor of clematis; a knot of sweet rhymes hung at the entrance. She leaned her head upon her hand. Somebody knelt at her feet. She sighed; he sighed. She looked down; he looked up. It was the stranger.

The reader may imagine the converse which followed. It was impassioned and tearful.

"Then you are really not a marquis?"

"No, dearest, a plain student at law, named Gilbert Hauteux; and I love you better than if you were the dauphiness."

"And I love you better than I should the dauphin himself. Plain Hauteux. So much the sweeter. Ah me!"

Not a meeting of theirs was open. All was secret, moonlight, stolen. Every bank and bosquet was haunted with their strolls. Every loose stone covered a letter. Nougats were dropped all around the house, and guitars were strummed nightly beneath her casement. Had Hauteux asked her openly of old Bilese, Agla would have dismissed him. To marry with her dear father's consent, was the last thing to which Agla herself would have consented. An accepted lover and an approved match were her abomination. No, no; she must run away, be married, throw herself in unutterable anguish at her father's feet, and be forgiven. Agla loved nothing so well as a scene.

Every thing was prepared; the cabriolet engaged, the priest ready, the parting letter written, the rope-ladder swung to the balcony, the moon at its zenith, and Hauteux tuning his guitar in the garden-walk, when Jeanneton, the fille-de-chambre, rushed into the chambre à coucher of Agla, to say that Monsieur was dying, and wished to give his beloved Agla the parting blessing. Agla was just advancing to the balcony, in full dress for the elopement. How provoking! Why did her father take it into his head to die just then? She bit her lip, and would have stamped her little foot, but filial love rushed to her bosom, and she flew, with a light step and heavy heart, to her father's room. The saint père had just arrived. The holy oil had dried upon his lip:

"Agla, ma chère, chère fille! Nous nous venons encore! Jesus Christ gardes-tu, ma fille!"

The last sigh of Jean Bilese was breathed upon the burning cheek of his daughter.

The cabriolet was dismissed; the letter burned; the holy father was left to marry his missal; the moon went down, and Agla wept over her sorrows on the bosom of Hauteux.

Reason reigned a while, but romance again returned. The draperies were supplanted by hangings of black cloth, the horses were laden with black plumes and crape-knots, the coach was festooned with serge, the yacht in the river was decorated with a black streamer; the white hens were locked in their coops, and the black ones only ran at large; the house-dog, a most inveterate white, was chained in the cellar. The servants had express orders to cry an hour a day, and a large black banner floated from the peaked top of Millefleurs.

Agla had no one to oppose her marriage. What should she do? A marriage in form was a dull and stale affair; elope she must, and elope she did. A post took them to Italy. A sordid and ragged capuchin made them one in St. Marks at Venice, by the light of a single taper at the dead of night.

Her house was found in a complete embrouillement on her return. Placards had been displayed through Paris, offering rewards for the recovery of her body. The police had been overhauling divers bourgeois, and seduction, murder, little and big larceny, had been laid at the door of all her neighbors. Agla returned as Madame Hauteux, to hush the hubbub, and confined herself all the honeymoon for mere mortification.

Gilbert Hauteux was a clever man, in the English and American senses of the word. To gain Agla Bilese, whom he really and dearly loved, he had gratified her whim-whams, and submitted to fooleries which he despised. He had hoped that the earnest and fond attentions of a caro sposa would at last settle her varying and diseased mind, and render her fit to enjoy all those pleasures and rationalities which huddle so closely around the marriage-hearth. But he was sadly disappointed. He found himself possessed (five years after his marriage) of a town and country house, and a handsome fortune in the funds. To these his ambition and study had added a good name as a distinguished counsellor. He had two children, Mathilde and Elle. But his sorrow was keen when Agla, in her crazy whims, would run abroad in search of adventure, like a knight-errant, leaving her babes and household to his care. Agla was here, there, everywhere. Patronizing concerts, flirting at masquerades, driving unattended to the purlieus of Paris, sauntering through Versailles, or the Louvre, or shedding her most pathetic tears at the tomb of Abelard and Eloise. A favorite idea of hers, during the summer at Millefleurs, was to lie at length on the margin of a little stream that purled near the high-road to Paris; her white feet bare; her white shock-poodle held by a rose-colored ribbon; her flageolet (on which, with the harp, she excelled) lying near her. In this mode would she lie for hours, and peruse some of the high-wrought pictures of Goethe; or, like the Marie of Sterne, in his Voyage Sentimentale, make wood and rock resound to the plaintive echo of her pipe. Of this phantasy she was cured by seeing the equipages of la duchess de ceci, or la comtesse de cela drive by while the gay dames nodded and giggled from their coach-windows at the femme folle. A group of Savoyards, too, would stop and gape at her; and, after grinding their hurdygurdy, bawl out for their "trois sous." Agla sickened of this habit, and flew to some other equally absurd.

All the beau monde was ringing with the preparations for a masquerade to be given at chateau-jeune. The noblesse were all invited, and even royalty was to grace the fête. Cards were sent to the Honorable G. Hauteux and lady. Hauteux, of course, refused; his whole soul was in his children, law-books, and wife, when she stayed at home. He had no reason to be jealous of her; she had no cavaliere servente like all other Parisian wives; but still he saw her pining for state, excitement, novelty outré.—Though she had never, in appearance, ceased to love him, still he was well aware that the constant abrasion of their tastes would at last wear out patience and love itself. The evening before the masquerade Agla entered the nursery, and beheld Hauteux with a child on each knee, while a manly tear stood in his eye.

"Do not go," said Hauteux.

"Dear Gilbert," said she, "I would do almost anything to show how well I love you, but I cannot forego the masque."

Nothing was to be gained by words, and Agla, seating herself at her harp, soon lulled, with her sweet voice, her little ones to sleep.

The choice ralet of Hauteux was a queer German youth, who had lived nearly all his life in Paris. His name was Pappelbaum Kupferschmid, which is equivalent in good English to Poplar Coppersmith. He had large blue eyes, set wide apart in a rather vacant face. His nose had a most inveterate turn up, and his teeth were anything but Parisian. He was born, so he said, somewhere between Hamburg and Meidenschwartz. He was keen and knowing. He was frequently tête-à-tête with his master, and the servants said he decided all the law cases. He was extremely moral; attended matins and vespers regularly, and his only oath was "Poctelfeisch."

The night of the mask arrived. Agla, beautifully habited as a vagère Arcadienne, stepped into the coach alone, and soon found herself making sottises among the masquers in the salon. A splendid figure soon attracted the attention of all. He was gorgeously clad in velvet and jewels. Some whispered that it was the dauphin—others that the gay king of England had come over to attend the fête. Wherever he went he was the "cynosure of neighboring eyes."

How did Agla's heart leap for joy when she found herself to be the chosen object of this lion of the mask. He was ever at her side, and now and then a deep sigh showed that his jewels glittered over a cankered heart. Agla purposely led the way to where a delightful bower was lit by the moon, and the air cooled by spouting dolphins; at a distance embowered by wreaths and spires of lamps, the masquers were chattering in accordance with the brisk music. The stranger followed.

"Agla," said he, "I have loved you long and tenderly. Nay, turn not away, but hear me. I have watched you at Terni and Tivoli—I have knelt with you at St. Peter's—I have dreamed and prayed for you—I have loitered around you at Millefleurs, and have sighed, ah, how vainly, at the altar of San Marco. I am pining, dying for you, Agla. Your name is the last I breathe at night, and yours the first I pronounce at morn."

Agla did not withdraw her hand.

"I am," continued he, "Il principe de Flocio, and my palazzo is close upon the castle di Sant'angelo, at Rome. I have seen you walking with your cicisbeo in my gardens, and since I saw you my poor heart has known no rest. I have wealth, immense wealth. Gold, slaves, gardens, all are heaped upon me; but still I sigh; amid all the pleasures I have not Agla. You are married, (Agla trembled) but to whom? One who adores you, and is night and day at your feet? No, one whose whole soul is in his books, and cares not for her who should be his goddess, his idol. Let us away immediately. At the shrine of San Pietro we will be made one, and never, never part again, Agla."

So saying, he took her hand and led her quietly out of the tower. The moon was covered with black clouds, and the rain, which began to fall, soon sent the masquers huddling into the portico of the chateau. It was pitchy dark. Ah, foolish Agla, she yielded too easily! Her conductor led her by diverse dark and winding ways which no one could penetrate unaided by the clue of Ariadne. She felt herself lifted into a coach; the word was given, and the coach drove on in a tortuous direction, which seemed to puzzle Agla more and more. The lamps were few. There seemed no passing vehicles. Suddenly the coach stopped; she was handed out by the prince, and entered a dark vestibule. Romance was creeping off and reality creeping on. A woman took her hand and led her up stairs by a staircase so dark that she had to feel her way.

"Enter here, dearest Agla," said the prince, who followed behind, "and in two seconds I'll be with you." He left her, and the door was locked after him.

"Stay with me, woman," said Agla.

No one answered; the woman had preceded the prince. Her heart smote her. Repentance—bitter repentance, came too late.

"Where am I?" groaned she in bitterness of spirit; "oh, richly do I deserve this."

In moving about the room she felt a chair, a table, a harp. She touched it; a thrill of recollections rushed on her memory, and carried her back to her nursery, where Hauteux was awaiting her delayed return. A full hour passed, and no one came. The imagination of Agla had full play. She heard a slight breathing. She thought of her home, Hauteux, Mathilde, and Elle. The scalding tears rolled down her cheeks, and she swooned away.

On her recovery, how great was her surprise to find herself in the arms of Hauteux!

"Why Gilbert, dearest, how came you here? Have I been dreaming?—Have I been to the masque, or have I not? Why, this is my room, and that is my harp. Whose coach came I home in?"

"Your own."

"Who opened the door?"

"I, madam," said Jeanneton.

"And who—what is that prince?"

"I, ma'am," said Pappelbaum Kupferschmid, laying aside his mask, and showing his red nose, turned up to its fiercest angle.

"Oh, I am not half punished," said Agla, throwing herself again into the arms of Hauteux; and turning to where the sleeping Elle was lying in her cradle, "I shall never, never go to a masque again."

The romance of Agla ended here; she forewent the gold, slaves, and gardens of Il principe di Flocio, to find peace and happiness in her own home.

LITERARY NOTICES.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

"A HINT to a newly married pair." A neat octodecimo, replete with moral truths. Carey and Hart, Philadelphia.

The "Workingman's Companion." A valuable reprint, addressed to those who obtain a living by their labor. Same publishers.

The "Dramatic works of Shakspeare, with a Life of the Poet." Complete in one volume. One of the most beautiful editions ever issued from the American press. James Conner, New-York.

The "National Calendar, and Annals of the United States," for the current year. A convenient book of reference. Thompson and Homans, Washington.

The "Romance of History. Italy. Two vols. 12mo. By Charles MacFarlane." These agreeable sketches, in which are blended the charms of history and romance, are from the press of the Harpers, and will be found both useful and delightful to large classes of readers.

A "Series of Maps for a general Atlas. Compiled by D. H. Burr." Number two of this well-executed and desirable work is just out.

From the prolific press of Carey and Lea we have another number of "Dr. Lardner's Cabinet Cyclopædia." It embraces a treatise on the origin, progressive improvement, and present state of the silk manufacture. These enterprising publishers should be well remunerated for their efforts in placing within reach of the American reader these, and such other valuable works as are continually coming from their hands.

These gentlemen also deserve the thanks of the knights of the rod, line, and hook for their handsome edition of "Salmonia, or Days of Fly-fishing. By Sir H. Davy." It will be perused with a peculiar relish by the disciples of good old Izaak Walton.

Mrs. Somerville's "Preliminary Dissertation on the Mechanism of the Heavens," another of Carey and Lea's offerings, will also be gratefully received by young students. It is an interesting treatise on a subject calculated to purify and elevate the character of youth.

IN PRESS.

The brothers Harper announce the following works as nearly ready for publication:—"Coxe's Adventures on the Columbian River;" "Romance and Reality, a novel, by Miss Landon;" "The complete works of the late Robert Hall;" "The False Step and the Sisters, a novel;" "Lives of Early Navigators, viz. Drake, Cavendish, and Dampier;" "Memoirs of the Duchess D'Abbrantès, (Madame Junot);" "Lives of Female Sovereigns, by Mrs. Jameson;" and "Lives of Celebrated Travellers, by J. Augustus St. John."

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS FROM ENGLAND.

To the Editors of the New-York Mirror.

CITY OF THE CHOLERA.

Newcastle, Feb. 1. 1831.

THERE may yet be lurking in the breasts of some of the adult population of New-York wavering recollections—indistinct reminiscences of a "waif upon the world's wide common" who, under the signature of C. used, in times by-past, to "find in his heart to bestow all his tediousness" upon the readers of the Mirror, by transferring, week after week, one, two, or (inconsiderate sinner that he was!) three pages of matter from his head into the columns of that repository for stray mental commodities. Had this matter been pure and unalloyed, it would have been less material; but, as it was, the supply was disproportionate—unconscionable, ponderous:—enough to have crushed a monthly, much less a weekly, though, as the event proved, not weakly publication. In those days, too, this C. was a critic forsooth!—a spier out of histrionic faults and excellencies—a drawer of hair-breadth distinctions—an arraigner of the good taste of Barnes's contortions and Hilson's volubility—a questioner of the propriety of Barry's emphasis and Richings' habiliments and blank-verse delivery—a theatrical prater about the legitimate drama—a pragmatical stickler against irrationality in dramatic entertainments (as if the managers were going to throw away the best card in their pack)—an habitual user of the imperious, pompous, personal pronoun we, and I know not what; but he has learnt the beauty of humility since then—he administereth no more impertinent advice—he taketh up his pen seldom and layeth it down speedily, and regardeth the productions of his own brain divested of that feeling of paternity which enables a man to read his own works with an unction of which other people have no conception.

This C.—but why should I persist in these ambiguities? I would not now have troubled you with my present locality, or prated of my "whereabout," did I not happen to sojourn, or more properly reside (for my house is taken by the regular terms of the land, Candelmas, Martinmas, &c., a thing which, let me tell you, gives a sort of temporary stability and householding importance to a piece of fluctuating mortality like myself) in a place which has lately started into unenviable notoriety by being, at this time, the head-quarters of that intrusive friend of Malthus,* the cholera morbus. I was at first inclined to be sceptical concerning the actual presence of this unceremonious visitant, but was soon disagreeably satisfied that the arch-depopulator had fairly obtruded himself into the land of coals, and was engaged in carrying off the inhabitants thereof with considerable rapidity. The doctors, as might be expected, were and are engaged in active, though not effective, warfare with the monster; and, indeed, contrary to all precedent, they seem inclined to own that they know little or nothing about the matter. However, they are in great request; and both physicians for the temporary and immortal portions of the frail compound, man—M.D.s and D.D.s—at present pass current for a good deal above their average value in times of quietude. A course of Sangrado and other experiments are therefore being made upon the human body in those parts, which may eventually prove a great addition to medical science, and of vast importance to the world in general and posterity—a piece of consolation, however, which does not seem to make much impression upon the minds of the immediate sufferers, in consequence, as I am inclined to think, of its being too abstracted. Now understand me rightly, before I proceed further, I wish not to affect to make light of this, to say the least, very serious disease, much less to break heartless or irreverent jests on the misery it is undoubtedly occasioning; but there is a spirit of gloomy, incessant, and, I may say, monstrous exaggeration abroad upon the subject, which deserves only to be laughed at. The disorder is certainly very fatal; but I think it may safely be asserted, that the mortality occasioned by it in the districts it has visited in England, is little, if any more, than what is frequently caused, in the same districts and in the same space of time, by typhus and other malignant fevers.

The true reason of the immense quantity of insane gabble prevalent about this disorder, is its comparative novelty. Men make up their minds to die of good old-fashioned distempers that have the commendatory stamp of antiquity upon them—indeed, it would look like an affectation of singularity to object to such; but there is something abrupt—sudden—startling in this cholera, which, particularly to a methodical person, renders it peculiarly distasteful. It is out of the regular way of things—an innovation—an unpleasant exemplification of the disagreeable truth of moral scraps touching the brevity of life. It insists upon the shuffling "off this mortal coil" with undue precipitancy. Consumption dallies with its victims. They have many innocent pleasures and comforts—books and music and conversation—fields and flowers and running brooks—the fanning west wind and the balmy south to cool their feverish cheeks, and infuse a soft and calm delight into their withering forms—and, more than all, they have the added kindness of anxious friends and relatives, trying to crowd a life of love and watchful tenderness into the little time remaining, long after death has set his mark upon them. Even fever—scorching, parching fever has its changes, its lapses and relapses, its alternations of hope and fear, to checker the passage to the monotonous grave; and as for asthma, and others of that class, a man may be ill of them for forty years, and die of something else at last. But this cholera is peremptory—it snuffeth out life with small ceremony. There is no flickering of the spirit before it finally goeth down—an extinguisher is put upon the candle, and darkness ensueth on the instant. A man is seen opening his shop of a morning, gay, cheerful, and full of the ardor of business, and lo! before it is time to put up the shutters in the evening, he is buried!—"in-decently interred," without any of the solemn and appropriate garniture of the grave; but just as he died, in his daily, familiar clothes, with all their old worldly associations about them! This striketh a disagreeable chord. A snug, comfortable coat in which a man has enjoyed himself, "we know not how often," to be laid in the damp earth for the rascally worms to worm through and through!—there is an incongruity in it which is unsatisfactory. True, it fareth no worse than its master—but this mends not the matter. It still gives a shock to all our anticipatory ideas: the man was, as every fool or moralist could tell us, made eventually to be worm-eaten—the coat's destiny is contrary to all precedent. After this, the residue of the deceased's wardrobe, together with his furniture, is burnt and destroyed, his house washed out with hot lime, and not an inanimate thing belonging to him left for affection to treasure up or memory to linger over. These, and other concomitant circumstances, rather than any extraordinary mortality, has caused all the uncommon fear and perturbation about the cholera. Figures speak for themselves. The disease has been here four or five weeks—the population is forty-four thousand—number of cases five hundred and fifty—deaths since the commencement two hundred and twenty, so that any man who has a desire to compute the chances of his remaining upon the green earth may, by working this simple question, obtain a quotient ("which will be the answer") consolatory in the extreme.

The medical men here have behaved nobly, yet somewhat bombastically. They have acted like valiant doctors, but no praise short of the heroic appears to satisfy them; to obtain which, I opine, they have exaggerated the danger, seeing that their credit for valorous reputation was mainly contingent thereupon. There are, too, discrepancies in their conduct, which it would puzzle a plain individual to reconcile. "Nothing is worse than fear and alarm upon the subject," quoth they, "as predisposers—weakening, as they do, the mind, and consequently debilitating the body, and thus rendering it more susceptible of infection;" and then straightway do they voluntarily publish the worst features of the worst cases—appearance of the body at the point of death—post mortem examinations, and I know not what unhealthy horrors, in a style calculated to disorganize the most compact nervous system, and shake an average one to atoms. Besides, the inventory of symptoms is so numerous and complex, that an imaginative person is never without some one or other of them. A stout, honest friend of mine, who has no reason that I know of to be particularly apprehensive about his ulterior prospects, but who is, nevertheless, strongly attached to existence, happening the other day to walk some distance ungloved, in a keen, frosty wind, the cold naturally enough turned his finger-ends as blue as indigo. At any other time my companion would have warmed his hands and said nothing about it. Unluckily, however, he chanced to cast his eyes upon them, and started back horror-struck. "Blue under the nails, by heaven!" (a symptom):—instantly he felt (or fancied) the disease shooting through his frame; home he hastened—put off his clothes. "Now," says he, "I have just six hours to live!" tumbled into bed, and lay there in an agony of fear, a complete perspiration-distillery, until the doctor arrived and assured him that he was in perfect health. But there is no end to the ludicrous stories afloat; and I know not of anything that has been productive of more grave jesting and melancholy merriment than this same cholera.

Nevertheless, the hubbub about this affair will gradually pass away. At present it is a novelty; but certainly of all novelties of late years, the most decidedly unpopular. No one speaketh a good word for it. It is abused in the publicity of streets and the privacy of chambers—young and old—grave and gay—rich and poor join in a universal chorus of execration against the cholera; only there is a questionable sincerity visible in the lineaments of undertakers, coffin-makers, grave-diggers, sextons, and all those who live by death, that is, to say the least, suspicious. It is spoken of, too, in a spirit of indignant reprobation that savors more of hate than fear. And no wonder. It not only taketh the lives of some, but the "means whereby they live" of many. Business is wofully dull; and the probable duration of quarantine restrictions is a subject of intense conjecture. All enjoyments are curtailed by it. Even the theatre is shut, and the minds of play-goers deprived of all dramatic sustenance; while the bodies of the sum total of the community are recommended to be reduced and kept cool by the swallowing of panada, gruel, chicken, chicken-broth, (weakest of weaknesses) boiled barley, rice-pudding, and such like detestable simplicities; and the "dieting," as it is called, so abhorrent to all the common, natural feelings of man, is dignified with the name of a system—"the antiphlogistic" I think they style it, which is actually followed up by a few poor wretches so desperately enamored of life, that I verily believe they would be content to drag on for years and years a miserable and lingering existence even on water-gruel and dry toast.

But I must have done. Farewell! Believe not in the exaggerations of newspapers. There has been, and is, a good deal of individual alarm here, but not to such an extent as materially to affect the intercourse of society. Despite of death and dull business, things still hold on pretty much in their old worldly courses. There are still plenty of bright eyes and merry faces—"honest men and bonny lasses" to be met with; and eating and drinking—love and marriage—music and dancing, and similar physical and intellectual recreations are nearly as common as ever.

P.S. I certainly have no desire to overpraise the feeling and philanthropy of the people of this town; but I must do them the justice to declare that I believe they really speak with candor and sincerity when they say, that "if the cholera were only away from here, they do not care where the devil else it goes to." THE RETROSPECT—A RHAPSODY.

ANOTHER week has passed, with all its cares and toils, its hopes and joys and fears. The current of our life has reached another of those invisible, yet too apparent bounds, which man's invention has contrived to mark the rapid passage of his limited existence. What a world of uncertainties have become reality within that brief and irreclaimable period; how many possibilities have become impossible; how fearfully the vague and undefinable future has, within that little lapse, taken upon itself the fixed, unchangeable, immovable impress of the past! But seven days since, and all the powers of earth could neither give nor foretell certainly to the least important of the myriads of incidents, which, in that little space, have been incorporated with the unchangeable past; and now not all the powers of earth can recall or efface or alter one of them! The seal of eternity is set upon them. A moment since and all was darkness, wherein the slightest accident might have produced changes which human foresight and human sagacity would have toiled in vain to perceive, to accelerate, or to prevent; another moment, and there has been thought, or said, or done that which heaven and earth can never erase from the imperishable record of past time; of which no title can be changed, if the duration of the universe were dependent upon its accomplishment. A little while ago, and that upon which we now look back was apparently within our power, the subject of our hopes or fears; now it has gone from us forever, and hope and fear have become alike impotent over all within its compass; they have yielded up their claims upon it, and memory alone has dominion over all of good or evil that was unfolded to us by its passage.

Memory! mighty and mysterious memory! sole result of all our labors; is it for thee then that we give up our souls to care, and our mortal frames to labor and watchings and denial? Art thou the end of all ambition? Is it for thee that the student wastes his life in silence and solitude, consuming in the still seclusion of his closet, over the cold dull page of ancient but unforgotten lore, the hours that should be given to needful rest, the intellect that might move forward among its fellows, a thing of majesty and power and dominion, and the frame, whose energies from day to day, and in the late watches of the night, grow more and more feeble in the strong toil of the o'ermastering spirit? For thee he shuns the blessed light of the glorious sun, where he pours his flood of radiance upon the palm hill-side, and the flashing waters of the clear stream, and the grand forest, among whose old majestic branches and unsurpassable luxuriance of foliage, myriads of happy living things are darting about in the inconceivable excess of joy and beauty, which they gather in their thoughtless wisdom from the warmth and glory, he cares not to partake, but is content to barter for the reward which thou alone canst give. For thee the warrior dares to encounter the extremes of cold and heat, and pain and death, and gives up ease and the delights of home, and, more than these, the blessings of a gentle spirit; hardening his heart against every thing that is beneficent and godlike in his nature, and willing to become a destroyer of happiness, a shedder of the blood of his fellow-men, a messenger and minister of wrath and sorrow upon the beautiful earth, which God made for the habitation of peace and goodwill, and man has changed into a den of carnage, a waste of misery and anguish, an arena of mutual destruction. For thee, oh memory! we labor, turning aside from the pleasures that lie profusely scattered around us, and giving up our hearts and thoughts and powers to the acquisition of others, which yet in the very moment of acquisition must pass from our eager grasp, to be treasured up within the vast confines of thy eternal empire. Oh the shortsightedness of man, so fond to possess an unsubstantial nothing! Alas, the perversity of the human heart, that will look back upon the immutable past and forward only to objects which the past will shortly swallow up, forgetting the great and eternal future beyond the grave, wherein that past must be succeeded by happiness or misery, over which memory can exercise no power.

Yet, memory, it is good at times to cast a backward glance upon the ever-open pages of thy enduring volume! It is pleasant, though mournful, to turn awhile from the anxieties of the passing moment, and recall the images that lie slumbering there, and look upon ourselves as we were in former times, ere yet the world and its chilling influence, and the new pursuits and hopes and actions of later days had wrought within us the fearful change, which all must undergo who live beyond the sinless and happy period of childhood; the still more fearful change that comes with man's estate—and it is wisely and kindly ordered that innumerable causes shall have power to bring up before us the picture of what we were; voices in whose tones we recognize some trace of others long since hushed in death; scenes upon which we looked long, long ago, ere yet care and sorrow, and the blight of evil passions had dimmed in our worn hearts the brightness of that glad spirit which then glowed in our young eyes; faces that bear some faint mysterious resemblance to others long since mouldered into dust, which looked kindly upon us, when ours were smooth and ruddy, and bore no impress of that which we have since done and suffered; old familiar volumes, such as were at that time to our feeble and imperfect understandings, oracles, painfully comprehended and most devoutly believed, but which have long since given place to studies of deeper and graver import, and been yielded up to the dawning minds of another rising generation; these, and thousands more than these, have power over us at times; and, when that power is exerted, we live again the past, and feel almost as though the intervening waste that lies (alas, too truly) between that which was and that which is, were but a painful dream, from whose imagined sorrows we had been awakened by the soft radiance of the dawn's first beam, or the still gender morning kiss of a kind and beloved parent as of old, ere yet we had followed in childish grief and wonder the cold remains of that dear mother to the grave, in which, as we now feel, it would have been better for us also to have been laid.

Years, many, many, and sad years have passed over us since that time of almost perfect happiness; but memory is important within us, and we yield to her supremacy. We are again a boy. The earth is bright once more in the full gush of summer's noontide glory; the intercession of the kind old minister has gained for us a holiday from the sedate but not stern "master," whose care and whose delight it was to train up our youthful minds to wisdom; and with hearts lighter than the proudest monarch can ever know, we make our glad bows, ere yet the morning duties of the school are commenced, and rush forth—to be happy, after our own fashion, for a time. What a bursting forth of the very spirit of joy is in those merry shouts! The exuberance of our delight is almost at a loss to find utterance, and displays itself in a thousand varying forms: a solemn council is held, to determine upon the preferable mode of enjoyment; various games, which seem to have grown into disuse in these degenerate days, are proposed, discussed, and finally rejected, and there seems to be some reason to fear lest the period of emancipation should be wasted ere we can resolve upon the mode of its employment. At length, however, a ramble into the woods is unanimously adopted, and with shouts of uncontrollable mirth, we run and skip and dance away to the vast forest, through which flows the mighty river, (as it seemed to our young eyes,) upon whose banks we first beheld the light. Nut-trees are there, whose lofty branches cannot save the dainty treasure from the adventurous schoolboy's grasp; mandrakes, whose broad leaves, and lowly place of growth, afford no shelter from his eager eyes. The lovely blue of the summer sky is free from the smallest cloud, and the bright sun seems to pour down happiness with his beams upon our joyous bosoms, as yet untouched by care or sorrow. Within the clear waters of that gentle stream are myriads of silver-scaled creatures, for whom capture the extemporaneous and inartificial apparatus of the juvenile yet expert angler, afford ample means; the drowsy hum of the wild bee may oftentimes be heard, betraying to the joyous plunderers the neighborhood of stores, than which Hybla itself can yield none more sweet; the air is teeming with the thousand exquisite shapes and hues of insect life; and ever and anon, the wild dove, or the robin, or the shy quail, startled by the sound of our gleeful voices, springs from her covert, and darts hastily away, with the sudden rushing of her swift pinions, into the deeper recesses of the forest. Far above, in the clear bright heavens, the straggling crow gives forth her croaking note of gladness, as she wings her almost viewless way to the far distant corn-field; the merry chirp of the ground-squirrel is heard upon every side; and, at intervals, we are hushed in our gay discourses by the loud tap of the woodpecker, or the shrill cry of the blue-jay. Not a breath of wind is stirring amid the heavily-crowned branches; and as the sun ascends the empyrean, and approaches the topmost point of his bright career, we find the heat, even in that depth of shade, too strong for our youthful activity. In the greatness of our enjoyment, appetite and the hour of dinner are unheeded, and we stretch ourselves down at the feet of the huge beeches, silent and languid, yet oh how happy, to repose for a time from the toil of pleasure.

The scene changes; the enchantress, to whose power we have given up our mind, has waved her wand, and placed before us the picture of ourself at another and later period of our existence.

It is autumn; yet the forest trees still glory in their undiminished wealth of leaves, although brighter and more varied tints have come to supply the place of the universal green, which not long since proclaimed the newness of the rolling year. A narrow but rapid and winding stream gives forth the only sound that breaks the else entire silence of the grove through which it flows; the hour is noon, and the slanting sunbeams, although their direction indicates the season, yet descend upon the parched soil and the dried-up herbage with a power that too plainly declares the southern latitude of the spot upon which our eyes are fixed; no appearance of habitation is within sight, and the complete stillness of the hour, and the wild and uncultivated aspect of the scene around, proclaim that the individual upon whom we look has wandered far from the haunts of men. He is reclining upon a little knoll, formed by an abrupt bend of the swift but shallow current; his eyes fixed upon the stream, his arms folded upon his breast; and, youthful as he is, there is an air of seriousness, we had almost said of sadness, upon his calm forehead and his boyish features; an open book is lying on the earth beside him, and a noble hound, crouched at his feet, is looking into his face with an expression of anxiety, from which the observer might almost be tempted to believe that the sagacious animal was conscious of his master's disquietude. It is ourself.

HUMORS OF A YOUNG MAN ABOUT TOWN.

NUMBER FOUR.

THE OPENING OF SPRING IN NEW-YORK.

THE voice of spring is once more abroad throughout the land, and though in so capricious a climate as ours, where the barometer ranges as wildly as an ill-broken pointer—a snow-storm may ere to-morrow put Nature for a time beyond the call of Vertumnus—yet already is the gay appeal replied to from a thousand cheering sources. The mead-lark warbling skims the field, and in the woods the throstle and on the beach the robin-snipe whistle to the breeze. Myriads of mimic rivers are gurgling down from the hills and gleaming in threads of silver through the smoky thickets. The last year's leaves lie damp in the woods, and no longer rustle to the tread of him who seeks

"The wild flower peeping from their folds below."

The chirp of the ground-squirrel is heard along the fences, and the copper-head basking on the stone wall, and the milk-snake coiled lazily on the ant-hill tell that even the reptiles themselves are thawed out of their winter abodes.

Of those that delight in watching the seasons as they roll, they who may hear the carol of the blue-bird as it pecks the buds on the maple bough beneath their window, have a decided advantage over those who can only watch nature as she develops herself in a flower-pot, or revels in a bouquet upon some lovely bosom; and yet the city, with its formal alleys of brick, its rattling carts, and smoke of anthracite, is not without the "attractions of the season." How different an appearance, for instance, do the airy figures, whose gay bonnets and light-colored dresses already flutter in Broadway, give to that carnival promenade, from the sombre mantles that swept it but the other day? And the Park—that beautiful area which, though carved up like an apple-pie at a country inn, is still grateful in its green to the dust-vexed eye of the burgher!—What drawing-room, enlivened by the gay tracery of Brussels, or made noiseless to the step by the downy texture of Turkey, can boast of such a carpet? Even Wall-street, which seldom owns a brighter visitant than yellow doubloons, seems to acknowledge the presence of the rival sunbeams. The broker, as he crosses the street, poises himself on the curbstone to look at the blue sky above him, and delay the moment ere he must descend into his bilious laboratory. The merchant checks his gait, while hurrying on 'change, to sniff the air as it comes fresh from Brooklyn heights, unconscious of a "south ferry." The underwriter smirks along the pavement as if premiums were "being" distilled upon him from the favoring skies; and they, the Leviathans of this pecuniary deep, who have realized in a plum the fruit of years of toil, loiter under the old sycamores opposite the soda fountain, as if they could never tear themselves from these smiling realms of gold and good humor! Everywhere, indeed, do you see the effects of the disfranchisement from the chains of winter.

Here you may see the pale invalid, still afraid to discard his furred pelisse, stealing along the sunny side of the street, heedful of rude contact, and almost shrinking from the gay child that frolics by him; and, tottering on his track, the bowed form of some old pilgrim, who sallies from his easy chair to gulp a mouthful of the air his lungs, for the nonce, receive unfiltered through flannel; there you may detect the dyspeptic, doggedly pursuing his accustomed route, as if walking with Disease for a wager, and perhaps jostling the fragile form of the smiling consumptive, who hangs affectionately on some stout arm near him. Vain flitters round a yawning grave, unnoticed by the thousands who flaunt by them in all the insolence of health and worldly security!

Nor are sounds wanting to tell us here that the call of spring is abroad throughout the land; not to mention the twitter of the martins, as, like lawyers on a circuit, they perform their mazy gyrations around the bride well, there are a thousand tuneful noises which salute the ear with wondrous power. Though the sweep and the milkman are silent, and the rusk-boy hath not commenced his lay, when thou, fair reader, first sallicst out to glad the eyes and tire the fingers of shop-boys at Vandervoort's and Fountain's, yet other seasonable ejaculations supply their place; and the cry of "white wine," from the gray-headed Communipaw negro, who trundles a churn on a barrow before him, must at some time have reminded thee that buttermilk is an excellent cosmetic. And who that has achieved a score of years in this goodly city, is not familiar with the recitation of "Straw-aw-aw," pronounced by a once jetty, but now "a sable-silvered" singer, ensconced upon a moving stack, erst propelled by a Bucephalus, which time has turned into a Rosinante? Now the ear is regaled with the blithe carol of some young voice, as its owner warbles a variation to her "morning's practising," while ranging her hyacinths at the open window; and again it is set on edge by the tread-mill tones ground sharply from the machines of those foreign operatives, who rove the streets, as did their predecessors the Troubadours, the high-ways.

And now is it worth the while of him who is afflicted with "the nothing to do," to saunter along South-street, and see the lighters come in to the wharves with freights gathered from every shore that knows a keel—the rich tribute of many a clime to the enterprise of his native city; or, if tired of watching the small craft, as they ply to and fro upon the mincing waves, and regardless of the green slopes he may see across the hazy river reaching away toward Gowanus, let him at least observe the stirring "note of preparation" among the tall Indianmen, as about to sail they "Stand like greyhounds in the slips."

The Battery, however, at this season, begins to be the most attractive spot in this "fair city of the heart," as Byron calls that New-York of the old world, the pride of the Adriatic. There is no longer, to be sure, that shady hollow, which once gave this noted promenade the semblance of a hanging garden in summer, when at high noon its mattress of greensward was generally strown with sleeping Priapi, in the shape of a drunken sailor or two; our procustean corporation having levelled the arena up, at the same time that the observatory—so celebrated in the days of Salmagundi for the marvellous consumption of peanuts within its precincts—was levelled down. But Castle Garden, though it, too, seems to have had its day, so amply compensates for the want of both, that even the fastidious race of peanut-eaters—a remnant of which is now only occasionally seen in some solitary cruncher in the pit of the theatre—would readily have moved their household gods from "the flagstaff" thither. The Battery has also increased so in size of late years, that it is now as much more comely in appearance than formerly, as is the portly figure of an alderman to the yet maturing person of his assistant. Nature has now more breathing room there than twenty years since, and shows the effect of giving her fair play. The young willows have already begun to put on their "green and yellow melancholy" livery, and in a fortnight will supply chaplets enough for all the despairing lovers of the last season. Of the last season, we say, because whoever heard of a lover despairing in spring? There is hope in the shooting of every bud, and sympathy in the very air we breathe. Young hearts open with the unfolding of the flowers, and fondly as the skies which hang smiling over them, bright eyes beam around. Those cunning fellows the ancients were well aware of these things, and doubtless in their allegorical painting used to represent Vertumnus as stringing the bow of Cupid. Indeed, they had a variety of pretty conceits about Love and Spring, as the erudite reader well knows, though the following translation from Linkum Fidelius is probably new to him, learned as he is:

"Cupid," says that sage writer, first disinterred from oblivion in the instructive pages of Salmagundi, "Cupid was once upon a time entrusted by his mother to the care of the Four Seasons. Each of these beautiful maids was by turns to have charge of the urchin, and after trying the guardianship of all, he was to decide to which of the four he gave the preference. After they had all duly kissed and fondled the little fellow, just as other young ladies do, bless their affectionate souls, when they can catch a pretty boy, he was first entrusted to the care of smiling Spring. Snatching the boy from her sisters, the dew-lipped nymph first bathed him in an April shower, and then left him in a scarf of green, to gambol where he listed. Love was almost mad with spirits. The immersion had given such vigor to his frame, sport could not tire him, as he frolicked in the bright sunshine. His bow seemed to send farther than it was wont, and his arm was never fatigued with keeping it constantly employed. Hearts appeared to him more exposed and less impenetrable. They even invited the soft murder, and his quiver was almost exhausted by the number which presented themselves. At last, like other keen sportsmen, he became almost tired of bagging game which gave him no difficulty in bringing it down. Little Love was loth to pass out of the hands of Spring, when blue-eyed Summer took the god into her keeping. She bound his quiver to his back with a saffron-colored ribbon, and seasoned his bow in the warm sunbeams, until his infant arms could hardly draw it. Love then would wait until the dews of twilight relaxed the rigidity of the weapon, when one hour of extensive mischief would compensate him for a whole day of listless indolence.

"On one evening he would, in the country, waylay his victims upon some secluded walk through wood, or fell, or by the solitary shore, and then again, in town, he'd steal into some quiet circle seated around an open window, and, by the light of the moonbeams shining in, single out and kill his quarry. And all through June the little hunter thrived; but when the watering season set in, and he followed his game as it migrated to the Springs, the urchin was enraged to find that his shafts had there lost their power. Mirth foiled his aim at one time, and Dissipation, when he did make a wound, healed it instantly at another. He would have been in a fever with disappointment but for an afternoon's successful sport at a pick-nick, and some capital shots made on an aquatic party when he returned to town. And now the brunette Autumn took the boy. September, with its sluggish rains, was a damper to his spirits, until he chanced to find a pair of cousins shut up by a storm in a country-house. Love drove ennui beyond the doors, and pinned their hearts together. And soon in town the twanging of his bow was heard as he made one of many a riding party upon the clear October mornings. November's bleak winds put an end to these opportunities, but one Indian-summer's day at the close of it was worth a month to the young sportsman. Hearts were taken unexpectedly and at disadvantage, and Love floating about on the warm haze, did a world of mischief. Now, however, that cold, blonde Winter, boisterously, of a sudden, asserted her claim to the wardship of the little deity. At once his fingers became numb, and his bow so stiff that he with much ado could draw it; and the whimpering boy was carried into a family party and allowed to nestle by the fireside. Quickly warm and vigorous, he was bent on mischief; the first shot was made while he lurked in a lady's work-basket; and then hid in a piano, he poured his arrows, as the keys were raised by beautiful fingers, upon the by-standers who bent over the instrument. The next evening Love went to a ball, but, though many a bosom was sufficiently exposed, he failed to pierce any—except one during supper. Soon after, the boy did better at a waltzing party as well as making some good hits during a sleigh-ride; but one evening at a "Dorcas meeting," where Adonis Fitz Fulsome wound silk for the ladies, was worth all the rest to him.

Right glad was the boy when to the arms of gentle Spring once more he was surrendered up, with her he loved the most, to dwell. And it is said that though the little god asserts his power alike when tarrying with either of the sister Seasons, yet he has ever since delighted most in rambling with the youngest upon earth; and poets sing that mortals have most reason to fear his pranks when the sullen sway of Winter ceases, and with young Spring Love roves the fair earth over.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

THE managers of this establishment proceed from novelty to novelty, and from star to star, at a rapid pace. Mr. Sinclair and Mrs. Knight have both been warbling, in various operas, operettas and musical farces.

Mrs. Austin has appeared twice during the last week in Cinderella to Mr. Sinclair's Prince. Her reception was most enthusiastic; and, in addition to the usual encores of the Tyrolienne and finale, the good citizens caused a repetition, on both nights, of the slow movement of the first duet. We cannot say that we consider Mr. Sinclair's Prince on a par with that of Mr. Jones, although, in Masaniello, we prefer his execution of the more delicate passages, like those in "Behold how brightly breaks the morning." His voice, however, in the duet alluded to, certainly blends admirably with that of our prima donna.

Mr. Jones and Mrs. Austin have conveyed the glass-slipper to Philadelphia, for a few nights. Miss Hughes is at Boston.

The new opera of the White Lady is in active preparation. Among the music there is a spirited and unique finale to one of the acts, the subject of which consists of the sale of an estate at auction, with the eager and acrimonious bidding of various personages against each other. This business is so well understood, and so common in this emporium of trade, that a spirited musical version of it will doubtless prove an interesting and attractive novelty.

Another opera, in two acts, has been produced, the music by Auber. We were prevented from attending its first representation, but are enabled to add a notice from the pen of a correspondent, in whose judgment we place the utmost confidence:

Auber's opera La Fiancée, so admirably performed in this city, by the French company, some two seasons ago, is still fresh in the remembrance of the admirers of dramatic music. The impression made by Madame Paradol, with Messieurs. Letellier and Privat in the principal characters, was very strong, and deservedly so. A translation of this piece, as produced at Drury-lane theatre, was, on Friday last, brought out at the Park; and we have seldom witnessed a first representation with more pleasure. The cast, which we are old-fashioned enough at all times to regard in an opera as a principal ingredient, was extremely powerful. Barnes and Placide had both fine parts; and the latter gave as true a picture of an old man of the world, as ever we remember to have seen drawn by any artist. Mrs. Vernon, as a worn-out old flirt, in the character of a mareschande des modes, was excellent; the comic powers of this lady are of a high order. Mrs. Sharpe had little to do, but that little was done well. Mrs. Knight acted La Fiancée very prettily, and sung the music with good effect. The first duet, with Mr. Sinclair, was encored. If we were to particularize the best morceau in the opera, we should fix on a canon, or round for three voices, sung by Mrs. Knight, Mrs. Wallack, and Mr. Sinclair. An amateur, at our elbow, wished to have it repeated, and did his best to get an encore; but he could not move the sympathy of the gallery to aid his purpose. He supposed they were not satisfied of its claims to merit, as a scientific composition. The music of this production of Auber's, is more remarkable for simplicity of melody than anything else; if it have a fault, it is the character of the old French school which pervades it, and which, praise be to Boieldieu, Nicolo, Caraffa, and to Auber himself, is fast giving place to a better. The orchestral accompaniments are beautiful; some trivial alterations might, perhaps, be made in the arrangement for the clarionets and hautboys, by compression, but they are scarcely worthy of notice, certainly not of reprehension. Mr. Sinclair acted the part of a citizen-soldier, one of the national guard, and sung the favorite air Garde a vous. In future representations we think it would be an improvement to have the side-drum upon the stage instead of in the orchestra. The repertoire of the Park theatre has obtained a valuable addition in this light and pretty opera, and it will, doubtless, take its station, as a standing dish, or, as the French have it, a "pièce de resistance," with Boieldieu's John of Paris, Abon Hassan, &c. The stage manager deserves every praise for the arrangements both of this piece and the Maid of Judah. The band, which we have spoken of as extremely complete, lost none of their laurels. We should, however, have preferred hearing Auber's overture, or that of any other approved composer, rather than that noisy, unmeaning composition of Mr. Thomas Cooke, called the "Overture to the Chinese Sorcerer." We recommend the town to hear and see the National Guard. B.

THE AMERICAN THEATRE.

Blanchard is a sterling actor of the old school; quiet, natural, effective, and chaste—without grimace or buffoonery of any kind. He renders the text as it is set down for him, and there is a general propriety in all he says and does that is truly delightful. It has been remarked of him, and with great justice, that his services are not of the night but of the year—"like an old clerk, whom nobody thinks of, but who is as necessary to the house as the ledger, his virtue is only discovered after a life of servitude." Truly this theatre has a jewel in him, and his daughter, (Mrs. Hamblin, as we understand,) who has been scolded soundly for coaxing him across the Atlantic, deserves the thanks of the public, for so valuable an acquisition to the American stage. Everybody should see this rational and clever performer. We are prepossessed in favor of Mr. Blanchard by the modesty with which he advances his strong claims to attention. He has not been heralded to our shores by the usual flourish of drums and trumpets, and is not a star, although he possesses far more merit than many we could mention, who have speculated successfully on the credulity of brother Jonathan. We regard his appearance among us as a very agreeable surprise.

RICHMOND HILL.

We attended the representation of Rob Roy, the other evening. A "young gentleman" made his debut, as Francis Osbaldiston. He labored under the usual embarrassments of a first appearance, and betrayed great room for improvement as an actor; but one or two of his duets, and the song "My love is like the red, red rose," were warmly applauded. His voice is of no volume or power, but considerable sweetness, and he occasionally afforded evidence of natural taste aided by good teaching. We cannot pronounce definitely, on so slight an opportunity of judging of his merits, an opinion respecting the probabilities of his ultimate success. Mr. Pearson's Rob Roy was above mediocrity. His person is prepossessing, and he delivers himself with a free, easy gesticulation, and in a rich voice. His conception was intelligent, though not sufficiently strong and marked for the bold and powerful highland outlaw. He deserved the frequent applause he received. Helen MacGregor is far out of the sphere of Mrs. Duff's abilities; and Mr. Russel quite mistook the staid character of the Bailie. The "Dugald creature" was extremely well sustained. Major Galbraith should be consigned to one inspired with some respect for his audience. Mrs. Keppel's songs were encored.

The numerous friends of Mr. Maywood will be gratified to learn that he is engaged at the Park for a few nights. He will appear in the new play of "Hernani," sometime next week. A Philadelphia paper says, "in a certain line of characters he has no equal in this country. He is warmly respected in this community as a manager, a player, and a man." With his merits the New-York audience have long been acquainted, and for their sake, as well as from recollections of "auld lang syne," will, doubtless, receive him with substantial favor and a hearty welcome.

A manuscript copy of the new tragedy, by Mrs. Caroline Lee Hentz, called "Werdenberg, or the Forest League," has been submitted to our perusal. It is written in smooth verse, (an uncommon merit in these days of prize-tragedies,) and is well calculated for stage effect. It will, we learn, be produced at the Park theatre, under the direction of Mr. Pelby, who is to sustain the principal part. The scene is laid in Switzerland.

It is reported that the Chatham theatre is to be converted into a church.

The plan for a new theatre in Broadway appears to be in active operation.

Mr. Forrest has been playing in Philadelphia to crowded houses.

The Italian company are soon expected. We cannot answer the query of a correspondent as to the building they will occupy, not being aware that they have themselves decided that point.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE F. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, APRIL 7, 1832.

American Lake Poetry.—The path to a newspaper discussion, like that to other vice, lies down a declivity. We find ourselves reluctantly plunged into one from which, although of no serious nature, we cannot withdraw without a few observations. Our readers will remember some lines headed "a poetical portrait," and understood by many to be addressed to the author of an article in the last American Quarterly, which, several weeks ago, with an apology, we inserted. It must be also known that the conductor of the above-mentioned Review and of the Philadelphia National Gazette is one and the same person. The latter journal has favored us with a column of remonstrance on the subject, but full of intelligent remark and gentlemanly spirit. This, as well as paragraphs assuming the same tone in the United States Gazette, and one or two other journals, whose opinions we sincerely respect, and whose approbation we highly esteem, compels us to a direct reply; and therefore we now solicit indulgence.

We are charged with having admitted a lampoon against a certain soi-disant critic. We might, in reply, quote from the conductor of the Quarterly,

"The editor of the Review cannot hold himself responsible for all the matter admitted into it; he is not able to separate and exclude from every article all that he may not deem absolutely just and perfectly proper."

Or, we might turn to another sentence, from the same practised hand,

"The delinquents, it was understood, could be 'shamed and touched by ridicule alone'—by that which Pope had thus apostrophized,"

"Oh, sacred weapon, left for truth's defence,
Sole dread of folly, vice, and insolence."

Suppose a pedagogue, without either knowledge or a wish to promote the cause of education, should establish a school exclusively for pecuniary or other purposes, and beat the children, peradventure for malice against the parents; or a pilot should undertake to navigate a ship into port, without actually being familiar with the nature of the harbor; or a quack doctor should sell medicine on speculation, with the effects of which he was unacquainted, or which he knew to be deleterious, thus endangering health and life: if one of these, or any other species of charlatan, appears, impudently claiming public confidence, he becomes a legitimate theme for satire of the strongest and most efficacious kind—especially if, from any unaccountable cause, respectable people take him under their protection, and there is no law by which he can be removed from his station. In such case we, or our correspondent, should undertake, it is true, a repulsive, yet a necessary task, in tearing off the lion's skin, and exposing the disguised individual to merited ridicule. If the lines were too broad and personal, their author doubtless first satisfied himself that the object was an empiric in literature, upon whom a sly stroke of humor would have been thrown away; and who, as he had betrayed no partiality for either argument, delicacy, or moderation in his own article, would not have appreciated these qualities in that of another. If we were not ourselves assured of this, we should esteem the obnoxious lines more reprehensible than any of our friends have pronounced them. But, in order to express our meaning clearly, it will be necessary for us, however reluctantly, to glance at this "learned Theban's" review—the little fountain from which have flowed forth all these broad rivers of debate.

The article on Lake Poetry, instead of being a philosophical and instructive treatise, guiding public taste, and designating the errors into which the authors under consideration may have fallen, with the gentleness becoming a true critic and a gentleman, is a mere coarse tissue of unfounded and insolent sarcasms against both the individuals therein named. From beginning to end, it is clumsily written, containing several inconsistencies and some positive untruths. We are surprised that the editor of the Review should not have detected them, or does he suffer the efforts of such crude writers, to pass into his pages without examination? The pertness and bad feeling of the critic are almost immediately betrayed in an oblique insult to his authors, as if he knew he was perpetrating against them a wanton act of ill-nature and injustice, and commenced deprecating their resentment by abusing them in advance.

"Condemned to drudge, the meanest of the mean,
And furnish falsehoods for a magazine,"

He then abuses all (among whom, by the way, are the Southern and North American Reviews, and most of the very highest literary authorities of the United States) who have praised the poems which he proposes to destroy, and calls their friendship "pretended," and themselves "sciolous." Then he prates about "extinguishing impressions," and the shallowness of the poor foolish public, which is continually duped "into the purchase of two or three editions of the merest trash," and he leaves us to come naturally to the conclusion that it must have been this same unlucky stupidity in the public which left the writer's own elegant and didactic compositions in the shade, only rescued from oblivion by being peculiarly ridiculous.

The paragraph wherein the name of one of the gentlemen is repeated four times, with the sneering addition of "esquire," is replete with the very spirit of personality and taunting impertinence; and the same is continued in his remarks upon the poetry delivered before Brown University, in a style of intentional sarcasm, almost sufficient to excuse any species of reply.

What can be more absurd than his gravely arraigning the whole poetic talent of his brethren of New-England?

"Justice will not permit us," remarks this puissant Aristarchus, "to accord to them, in addition, that of poetical excellence."—"And if they don't like it," he adds, with a san: froid worthy of Napoleon, "we cannot help it." Of this piece of gratuitous acumen, he seems himself half afraid and ashamed, and ludicrously strives to palliate it by a specious jumble of awkward compliments to Webster's "grasp of intellect" and the "general good sense" of the "population." After yielding part of his previous ground, and observing that several of the New-England poets are not without talents, he says that they have "a species of cleverness," but "deformed" by a bad style, and he puts forth the following gracefully constructed sentence. The coulds are very euphonious in a critic who complains that Bryant's metre is rugged, awkward, and intolerable.

"How so many of the poets of the present day could have become so fascinated with a style of writing, which no effort of genius, not even the acknowledged talents of Wordsworth, its founder, assisted by all that partial reviewers, and laudatory editors in the interest of the booksellers could do for it, could ever make popular, is indeed a matter of surprise."

After another sneer at "our Percivals, our Willises, and our Bryants," he favors us with his opinion that Milton, Thomson,

Young, Pope, &c. are among the writers generally read! He then informs us that although they (Paradise Lost) are not exempt from the faults of the Lake poetry, yet they contain many great beauties! and moreover, that, "if we examine any much used copy of either of them, that may at random come into our hands, we shall uniformly find the passages which exhibit indications of being the most read, to be those that contain bursts of passion, natural and perspicuous description, or striking and sententious morality, expressed in free, flowing, and mellifluous verse; passages, in short, of true poetry," &c. (i. e. people like true poetry the best.) Well, this is certainly exceedingly new and astonishing! What an enviable power it must be to pour such valuable floods of literary light upon the minds of the poor benighted Americans! We are amused at the propriety with which, of all other writers, this one observes that poetry, which is merely "middling, should not be obtruded on the public;" however, his advice is assuredly deep, and calculated to help along the inferior race of poets to fame. He instructs the tyro, that if he possesses real genius he must "use it aright"—"draw from the resources of his own mind," not be an imitator, "let his thoughts and language flow spontaneously from himself;" then, when he has his subject "well selected," "strike his harp freely," and there will be no doubt of his producing strains which will command attention!

This reminds us of some of Miss Prudence Smith's valuable directions for "pastry and confectionary;" as, for example, to make "gooseberry-fool:"—"Stand your fruit, mixed with Lisbon sugar, in a jar, on a stove, with a gill of water; when soft, pulp it through a colander; then have ready a sufficiency of milk and cream, or in lieu of the latter an egg, boiled together, but cold before used; sweeten it well and stir the fruit gradually. Apples may be done in the same manner"—and so we presume may prose.

The critic next asserts that he will prove the poets no poets "by a reference to the works themselves;" but with his accustomed shallowness, he soon forgets his promise, and declares "we shall make no extracts from Bryant's volume!" Thus, on the mere strength of his own opinion, and avowedly without attempting to adduce any evidence of his assertions, he brands poems, which the whole United States have received with lively pleasure and praise, as commonplace and encumbered with verbosity, awkward and intolerable in style, and marked by instances of ruggedness, which, with another sneer, he presumes were either introduced from ignorance, or "with the sagacious view of keeping the reader awake!" This observation is elicited by an occasional line slightly breaking in upon the general smoothness of the measure, and which many have rather deemed a beauty. Whether it is so or not, it is certain that the greatest poets have not been careful to expunge all such trivial irregularities from their verse, and no critic, in condemning in so insolent a manner, so beautiful and popular a poet, has ventured to let the whole clumsy fabric of his hyper-criticism rest on the citation of a point so unimportant. He advances his empty opinion that Bryant has "little graphical power in depicting the appearances of nature." He ranks him among those who, "although they have not secured popularity and fame, have escaped contempt and neglect," and thinks him entitled to a place among the "sermonizing poets of the day."

He, however, maintains inadvertently, (and very naturally,) on the last page, "in spite of the sneers of Anacreon Moore," that Fadladeen was not such a fool as some people suppose! "A fellow feeling makes us wondrous kind."

The review is prodigally interspersed with assertions which have no foundation in truth. We deny that the American poets "have filled their compositions with epithets without meaning, and sentiment without pathos," that they are "careless, without case, and laborious without showing polish;" that "their labors have all been fruitless;" and that nature and common sense teach "rational men to despise them." The writer is either guilty of a falsehood, or betrays a gross ignorance of his subject, in saying that Mr. Bryant is an "author who has abundantly experienced the favor of the periodical press, without receiving that of the public."

Let us, in this place, notice an instance of the unfairness, we may repeat, the untruths, by which he seeks to attain his purpose of trampling down these two writers, independently of justice. He first quotes the following lines from the poem delivered before Brown University, depicting a boy under the influence of ambition:

"Unhealthful fires burn constant in his eye,
His lip grows restless, and its smile is curled
Half into scorn, till the bright fiery boy,
That was a daily blessing but to see,
His spirit was so bird-like, and so pure,
Is frozen in the very flush of youth
Into a cold, care-fretted, heartless man."

"Here," says the critic, "we have a fiery boy, with a bird-like spirit, frozen by a fire that burns constantly in his eye." Now, the poet does not say that the boy is "frozen by a fire that burns constantly in his eye." This is the wilful, and we must add, contemptible misconstruction of a reviewer maliciously bent on inflicting an injury by fair means or foul. It forms a satisfactory specimen of the spirit in which the whole article is written; and such a critic would meet no more than his just deserts if he were regularly lampooned through every press in the country.

It may be asked, must no one dare to criticize an author for fear of bringing down upon his head malediction and personal abuse? Just animadversion, however severe, we shall never oppose. It is only the shuffling, cunning, unfair system of false assertions, saucy sneers, and wanton misconstructions, like those we have just exposed, of which we complain, and for which the critic should be derided, and, if possible, abashed.

Although two wrongs do not make a right, the editor of the National Gazette could not have been more surprised at the doggerel in our columns than we were at such an article in the Review.

As for Pope, and the ribaldry which he suffered from his enemies, our opponent (if we must so term him) must be aware that the author of the Dunciad was not sparing of the rod when he met with backs which he thought demanded the scourge.

We stand here in the place of Mr. Willis, and no one must be surprised that we resist any unfair aggression from really respectable publications.

We shall be pleased to see the review in the National Gazette. The "bane and antidote" will both then be more broadly exposed to the public scrutiny.

As this consistent critic derides the difference between the writers whose merits he professes to canvass, and Milton, Thomson, &c. let him read over once more the elegant papers of Addison on criticism, and mark the "void immense" between them and his own; and, although he may be already too far gone to hope for modesty, he may not be too old for a lesson in discretion.

We have, more elaborately than we intended, skimmed through this worthless article for evidence that the writer himself was not a "true critic," nor entitled to the respect of one; but only a snarling and partial pretender—a retailer of nonsense—an inconsistent bungling writer, and as such not worthy the pains necessary to dissect his voluminous and heavy productions; he is clearly one of those alluded to by Pope, who are to be "touched and shamed by ridicule alone."

But, for our own sake, we freely confess that the lines which elicited the observations of the National Gazette, were out of place, as, however justly deserved, the ceremony of exposing the reviewer, in that way, is not within the plan of this paper, and may be unacceptable to a portion of our readers. The editor of the National Gazette advances many remarks which are generally correct, and in the abstract truth of which, of course, we coincide, although they are not strictly applicable to the present occasion. As, for instance, that the names of writers in reviews should not be cited either conjecturally or positively; that all mere retort is, more or less, unsuitable or unjust, "because it does not affect the original criticism, of which the force or the weakness must be intrinsic," &c. We acknowledge these to be but "the established courtesies of literary good breeding," which should not be overlooked; but we must add, in palliation, at least, if not in defence, that an individual who, like the writer of "American Lake Poetry," himself first violates, not only the courtesies and the decencies of literary good breeding, but the duty which one gentleman owes another, and especially which an author has a right to claim from every journalist noticing his productions, must not complain if those courtesies are not observed towards him. Of one of the volumes which he professes to review, and the author of which he insults because his pieces have been widely circulated, he selects the worst portions, as if they had been the best, instead of affording it a candid investigation.

"A true critic," says a standard author, "ought to dwell rather upon excellencies than imperfections, to discover the concealed beauties of a writer, and communicate to the world such things as are worth their observation. The most exquisite words, and finest strokes of an author, are those which very often appear the most doubtful and exceptionable to a man who wants a relish for polite learning; and they are these, which a sour undistinguishing critic generally attacks with the greatest violence. Tully observes, that it is very easy to brand or fix a mark upon what he calls verbum ardens, or, as it may be rendered into English, 'a glowing bold expression,' and to turn it into ridicule by a cold ill-natured criticism. A little wit is equally capable of exposing a beauty, and of aggravating a fault: and though such a treatment of an author naturally produces indignation in the mind of an understanding reader, it has however its effect among the generality of those whose hands it falls into, the rabble of mankind being very apt to think that every thing which is laughed at, with any mixture of wit, is ridiculous in itself."

In reference to the impropriety of our correspondent's replying personally, instead of analyzing the review at first, independent of the individual by whom it was written, we remark, that if the reviewer instead, for instance, of calling the poem "Parrhasius" "savage and disgusting," had candidly undertaken to prove that it was so, he might have been met in fair argument; but his lack-a-daisical rhodomontade about the horrors of the subject is ridiculous. He would, on the same principle, annihilate the greatest writers, poets, painters, and sculptors of either ancient or modern times. Not only West's magnificent pictures of "Christ healing the sick," and "Christ rejected," with numerous others of battle and death, would come under the same absurd denunciation, but the greatest works of antiquity would, according to this wonderfully tender-hearted sentimentalist, be consigned to oblivion. What is more awful than the Laocoon, the Dying Gladiator, Milo in the oak? Yet thus it is; and he who, with a diseased sensitiveness, shrinks from a poetical description, feels no hesitation in the attempt to crush the fame of a youthful writer. He must not wonder when he gives his mere opinions upon pieces which many sensible judges have highly lauded, that people inquire who and what he is; whether he is competent to the task he has assumed; whether his naked assertions will stand in the place of argument; whether his own talents, acquisitions, works are such as to entitle his decree to respect and credit. We ascertain this, to allow the public an opportunity of judging, allusions to his name, works, and general ability, become at least excusable, if not necessary.

The editor of the National Gazette says:

"An humble reviewer of the present day may be rather gratified and elated with it" (personal abuse) "when he can remind his revilers of the cases of Socrates, Demosthenes, Horace, Pope, Johnson," &c.

We pass over the natural contortions of every body's risible muscles at the ludicrous proximity of the Philadelphia critic to Demosthenes and Pope; but we must observe, without intending to violate any of "the established rules of literary good breeding," that he who justly exposes himself to opprobrium, either by handling in a clumsy manner, or perverting to a wrong purpose the power lodged in his hands as a critic, commits a crime against the author, and betrays the confidence of the public; and he must not expect to shelter himself from either the ridicule or the indignation due to arrogance, under the idea that the great geniuses of either ancient or modern times were enabled to bear up calmly against undeserved obloquy.

But, if we have gone too far in respect to the reviewer, we must acknowledge the moderation and courteous bearing throughout, of the editor of the National Gazette. He has conducted himself with a propriety which confirms our previous sentiments of respect. We acquiesce in the full force of the gentle and beautiful rebuke with which he takes leave of his subject.

The lines should have been excluded. He says truly, that a periodical like ours "should be without flaw or stain. It should reflect no false images; no distortions; no grimaces; no caricatures—nothing metretic or sardonic; but only the expression of sound and benignant sentiment, and the 'hues and colors' of chaste and elegant diction."

We may, however, add that a review should contain no evidence of prejudice, ill-nature, or passion; no wanton vituperation calculated to blight the fame or wound the feelings. The critic should be serious and instructive. He should guide and assist, not torture and insult his author. He should rather seek out beauties than faults, and deal kindly with the young and the inexperienced, whose reputation is probably dearer than life. If that reputation must be lowered, let him perform the task as a painful duty, not a brutal sport. He should aim at the skill and gentleness of the surgeon, who takes away a limb with the tenderest care, not the ferocity of a cannibal who rushes eagerly to feast on the flesh of his own species, glad at once to gloat his eyes and gorge his appetite.

As for the pack in cry after either of the gentlemen named in the flimsy (and rapidly becoming notorious) article on Lake Poetry, it is best, for the future, that they should be permitted to bark on. Indeed, we are not sure that in sweeping the whole set into Lethe a few years before their time, (always supposing such a difficult matter possible,) we should render any real service to the other party. A poor soul, says Æsop, once swimming across a stream, was greatly annoyed by a swarm of flies collected about him. A gentle swallow sporting in the air, flew down kindly, and offered to drive them away. "No, no," said Reynard, "leave them alone. They are now nearly filled. If you frighten them off, there will only come a fresh and more hungry swarm in their stead, and, in a short time, I shall not have a drop of blood left in my veins."

Parisian fashions.—For the information of our fashionable lady readers, we copy the following items from a French journal.

Musical parties have been very general in Paris during the last few weeks, and at these reunions, the coiffure Greque has been almost universally adopted. Nothing, indeed, could be more becoming to the female artistes, whose vocal talents have been under contribution on these occasions. The Greek head-dress, adorned with gold chains or rows of pearls, worn with a dress of green or ruby velvet, crossed on the bosom in antique folds, is a costume which cannot fail to set off a beautiful woman to advantage.

Turbans are much in favor; those composed of gauze, embroidered in gold or silver, have ends trimmed with fringe, which descend on one side. At the ball lately given by M. Perier, Madame V— wore a turban of cherry colored gauze, round which were twisted the long tresses of her beautiful fair hair; the ends, arranged in ringlet curls, descended from the crown of her head, where the turban was open. The front hair was divided in two bands, and on the centre of the forehead was a superb cameo. The turbans à la Moabite are exceedingly becoming to faces which are sufficiently youthful to dispense with hair on the forehead; for unless the hair be entirely concealed, this turban loses all its originality of effect. The Moabite turban is usually white, ornamented with gold or silver.

We lately observed a very pretty ball dress, composed of pink, moiré, trimmed at the top of the hem with a wreath embroidered in white silk. The corsage was surrounded by a double mantilla of blonde. The coiffure worn with this dress, consisted of a beret of pink velvet, adorned with two large white feathers, tipped with pink.

Among the newest artificial flowers, tulips, of various colors, have been introduced. They have a beautiful effect when tastefully disposed.

Gants à manchons are another novelty. These gloves have at top a wide trimming of fur, which may be turned over the hands like a muff.

Muffs of embroidered velvet and cashmere are much worn, though fur muffs decidedly predominate. A muff is occasionally formed of a long cashmere shawl, rolled up, with the palm leaves outside.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE MAN-KEEPER.

SIR WALTER SCOTT, in his Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border, has a note to one of the ballads, wherein the man-keeper is mentioned; and he supposes it to be some terrible animal, which, like the dragon, no longer exists. For once, however, this dreadful creature seems to have escaped his researches, the man-keeper being still in existence, although not possessing everywhere the wonderful properties he had formerly: it is no other than the common brown lizard, a well-known and harmless little reptile. In the Isle of Man it still preserves its ancient name, and is almost as much dreaded by the peasantry there at present as it was in days of yore on the borders. They suppose its bite to be very venomous; but they chiefly fear a propensity it has for walking down the throats of such luckless wights as fall asleep near its habitation. The only way to get rid of a lizard is to lie down by the side of a river, open the mouth wide, and pretend at the time to be asleep, when the thirsty animal, perceiving the vicinity of water, walks out of the mouth to quench its thirst, with the intention, however, of walking back again. The afflicted patient, on its absence, however, gladly avails himself of the opportunity of escaping. Such is the actual belief of the peasantry concerning this slandered and beautiful little creature; they fly at its approach with terror, and do not even dare to destroy it.

BOOKBINDING.

The elegant silk binding of some of the annuals is not a modern invention; and, indeed, in this branch of art we are far behind (in splendor, at least) the ages we are accustomed to associate with ideas of rudeness and barbarism. In the fourteenth century, when books were scarce, and therefore more valuable than at present, extraordinary pains were taken to render their outside dress both handsome and durable. Deer-skin and colored chamois, as well as silk, were the ordinary materials made use of by the rich; but frequently plates of ivory were substituted, richly sculptured, and sometimes chased copper, or even gold and silver, set with diamonds, rubies, and other precious stones. The boards were of wood instead of pasteboard, secured on the back of the volume with iron or brass nails; and if intended for ecclesiastical, or other libraries, an iron ring was added, for the purpose of fastening the important prisoner to its cell by an iron chain. Some of these tomes were three and four feet long, by two and three feet broad. Unfortunately, the insects which feed upon the learning of others—as we may be doing now—are produced as abundantly from this wooden cover as from ours; and all that could be gained by the laborious care of our ancestors, was to make the binding survive the book.

MUSICAL TEST OF THE FEMALE VOICE.

The influence of the temper upon tone deserves much consideration. Habits of querulousness, or ill nature, will communicate a catlike quality to the singing, as infallibly as they give a peculiar quality to the speaking voice. That there really exists amiable tones, is not an unfounded opinion. In the voice there is no deception; it is, to many, the index of the mind, denoting moral qualities; and it may be remarked, that the low, soft tones of gentle and amiable beings, whatever their musical endowments may be, seldom fail to please; besides which, the singing of ladies indicates the cultivation of their taste generally, and the embellishment of the mind. For an instant, compare the vulgarity of a ballad singer, her repulsive tone of voice, and hideous graces, to the manner of an equally uncultivated singer in good society; or watch the treatment of a pretty melody from the concert room, at the west end of London, until it reaches the ears from under the parlor window, and observe how it gains something new of vulgarity with every fresh degradation.

ARREST FOR DEBT.

Appears from the affidavits which are officially filed, that in two years and a half, seventy thousand persons have been arrested for debt in and about London, and the law expenses of which have amounted to upwards of half a million. In addition to which, probably quite as many more actions have been brought on unobtainable writs, for debts under twenty pounds, the costs on which must have been little less than another half million.

A GOOD GUN.

A country farmer told a friend of his, who had come from town for a few days' shooting, that he once had so excellent a gun that it went off immediately upon a thief coming into the house, although not charged. "How the deuce is that?" said his friend. "Why," replied the farmer, "because the thief carried it off; and, what was worse, before I had time to charge him with it."

EXTRACTS FROM A MODERN DICTIONARY.

Ancestry.—The boast of those who have nothing else to boast of.
Idol.—What many worship in their own shapes, who would be shocked at doing it in any others.
Jealousy.—Tormenting yourself for fear you should be tormented by another.
Knowledge.—A mole-hill removed from the mountain of our ignorance.
Martyr.—That which all faiths have produced in about equal proportions; so much easier is it to die for religion than to live for it.
Tongue.—A little horse, which is continually running away.
Melancholy.—Ingratitude to heaven.
Nonsense.—Generally applied to any sense that differs from our own.
Originality.—Undetected imitation.
Quack.—A man who only wants a diploma to make him a regular physician.
Saw.—A sort of dumb alderman, which gets through a great deal by the activity of its teeth.
Umbrella.—An article which, by the morality of society, you may steal from friend or foe, and which, for the same reason, you should not lend to either.

ORIGINAL MORAL TALES.

THE SEPARATION.

BY MRS. EMBURY.

"To be wroth with one we love,
Doth work like madness on the brain."

A NUMBER of morning visitors were assembled in the drawing-room of the fashionable Mrs. Dormer, and all warmly engaged in the discussion of some topic of the day, when the door was thrown open to admit the beautiful Mrs. Monckton.

"The very person we wished to see," exclaimed several voices. Mrs. Monckton smiled.

"I am happy to find myself so important an individual," said she; "but what rendered my presence so desirable at this moment?"

"Do, my dear madam, tell us all about that dreadful affair between Mr. Derville and his wife," said Miss Newall. "We have heard twenty different stories: I am sure I do not believe the half of them, but then one likes to know the truth of these things."

"Poor Mrs. Derville," said a very young lady, "how much she is to be pitied; they say she was very fond of her husband—what a cruel, heartless wretch he must be."

"Poor Mrs. Derville, indeed," exclaimed her aunt, a tall, thin spinster, whose green silk robe and chapeau fleuri, seemed a practical pun upon the poet's "green old age." "Poor Mrs. Derville! you had better save your pity, child, till you know where to bestow it; when married people quarrel, every body knows the wife is always the most to blame."

"Oh, no, my dear friend," cried Mrs. Wormton, "not always; but in this case we all know you are right. Mr. Derville found a letter, and—"

"You are quite mistaken," interrupted another, "it was Mrs. Derville who found a letter in her husband's pocket."

"My good friends," said Mrs. Monckton, "be so good as to tell me what you are all talking about, and I shall then be able to judge of the merits of the case. Mrs. Derville has been my bosom friend since childhood, and I must confess that it is as surprising as it is painful to hear her name uttered in the tone of ill-nature or contemptuous pity."

There was a calm and self-possessed dignity in Mrs. Monckton which belongs only to those who are elevated in mind as well as in rank, and which gave her a decided superiority over the "setters-up" and "pullers-down" of the fashionable world. Mrs. Newall immediately undertook to relate the story. She stated, upon the authority of her maid, that there had been a dreadful quarrel between Mr. and Mrs. Derville—that a letter had been found either from a gentleman to Mrs. Derville, or from Mr. Derville to a lady, she did not know which—that they had finally separated, and Mr. Derville had gone to England, intending to take up his abode there. These particulars were related with all the minuteness of ill-natured gossip, and the young lady finished with,

"Now do, my dear Mrs. Monckton, tell us all about it, for you know, if any one does."

Mrs. Monckton's beautiful lip was slightly curled, and there was a transient flush upon her usually pale cheek as she replied,

"I am truly sorry, ladies, to spoil so exquisite a story, and the more so as you seem to have wasted much time in discussing it, but I am compelled to assure you that you are all mistaken."

"Mistaken!" exclaimed several voices, "oh, impossible!"

"I am persuaded, my good friends," said Mrs. Monckton, "that it is difficult for you to disbelieve an evil report, but nevertheless I repeat that you are all in the wrong. Mr. Derville has been compelled to visit England on very pressing business, which will probably detain him in that country some years. I was present at their parting, and can assure you that there was nothing of anger mingled with their feelings."

"But, my dear madam, what induced him to set off in the middle of winter?"

"I have already told you that his business was of the most urgent nature."

"Yes, but the letter," said Miss Newall.

"The only letter I know anything about," said Mrs. Monckton, "was one which Mr. Derville left on his dressing-table, containing some directions respecting his affairs, which he feared might be forgotten in the agitation of parting."

"Why did Mrs. Derville not accompany her husband?" asked one.

"The inclemency of the season and the delicacy of her health are certainly sufficient to answer that question," replied the impatient Mrs. Monckton.

"Well, you really excel every one I ever knew for making the best of a bad story," said one of the disappointed coterie. "Pray, where is Mrs. Derville now?"

"In my house," said Mrs. Monckton, rising, "where she will be very glad to see her friends, and relate every particular of the dreadful quarrel which has excited so much sympathy: good morning, ladies."

"The conversation which ensued after Mrs. Monckton had retired, we need not repeat; but the feelings of that lady as she entered her carriage, were certainly any thing but enviable. She had heard her dearest friend calumniated, and she was conscious that in vindicating her she had stooped her proud spirit to a subterfuge, for it was but too certain that the leading particulars in the story were true."

Mrs. Monckton and Mrs. Derville had been friends from childhood, but nothing could be more unlike than their characters. Louisa Denton possessed fine talents—her judgment was wonderfully correct—her feelings, though strong, were by no means romantic, and she was altogether a high-minded, sensible, and elegant woman. Her friend, Alicia, was one of those rational creatures whose thoughts are all feelings, and whose affections are all passions. Her beauty, talents, and accomplishments were of the highest order, but she had never exercised her powers of reasoning. She was the prey of feeling and imagination; and while Louisa saw matters as they really were, Alicia looked through the telescope of fancy, and was, of course, perpetually wrong as to the relative proportion of every thing. The current of their after-life was consequently as different as their characters. When the young and beautiful Louisa Denton gave her hand to George Monckton, a plain, old-fashioned merchant, at least twenty years her senior, every one was astonished, but perhaps no one so painfully surprised as her friend Alicia.

"I always thought you of a cold temperament, Louisa," said she, as they sat arranging some bridal finery, the day before the marriage, "but I never before believed you to be mercenary."

"When you know the world better, Alicia, you will learn to judge less by appearances," was Louisa's reply. "I am capable," continued she, "of a warm and steady friendship, of a strong and lasting esteem; with such feelings I am about to become the wife of a man of amiable character, whose age gives him that experience which I do not possess, and whose wealth secures to me that rank in which I have been born and bred. As for that intense and idolizing affection which forms your beau-ideal of wedded bliss, I confess I do not expect, nay, do not wish to feel it. I am some years your senior, Alicia, and have seen much more of human nature, I am sure, than you—and, believe me, when I tell you that though such love may in a few rare instances bring happiness, it more frequently makes shipwreck of the fairest hopes."

Five years after Mrs. Monckton's marriage she had the satisfaction of seeing her friend united to one who promised to be all that even Alicia's imagination pictured. Derville was young, handsome, wealthy, possessed of considerable talent, and exquisite taste. He painted beautifully; his skill in music rendered him the envy of all the would-be serenaders of his acquaintance, and he had, moreover, that surest arrow for the heart, a sweet and finely-modulated voice. Possessing such attractions, it is no wonder that Alicia early exalted him into a model of perfection. She soon learned to love him with an intense and passionate affection, which allowed her to see no faults in his character, and blinded her even to the ordinary weaknesses of humanity. Thus, while she deemed herself only fulfilling the duty of a wife, she was storing up for herself the unutterable misery which inevitably awaits the heart that bows itself down to gods of earth.

It is no less strange than true, that in general the most unhappy marriages are those which are called love-matches. The intimate communion of married life is so different from the closest intimacy which can possibly exist before marriage, that there are always a thousand things to be learned by both parties. There are tastes and habits and opinions which were never discovered before, because the circumstances necessary to develop them could not possibly occur; and the more trivial these peculiarities are, the more dangerous will they be found to domestic peace, for those who are willing to make great sacrifices are seldom found capable of trifling ones. The very pride which enables them to endure the former, urges them to be unyielding in the latter.

It was not long before Alicia discovered that her husband was occasionally irritable. A hasty word would sometimes escape him, which, though repented of in the next moment, could not be recalled, and remained like a barbed arrow ranking in the heart of the astonished wife. Ignorant of human nature, she did not know that the true task of affection is forbearance. Wounded tenderness, as well as pride, naturally prompted a reply which could not fail to increase the irritable mood of the husband, and thus a trifling word, which, if allowed to pass without notice, would probably have been forgotten immediately, often gave rise to scenes of the deepest domestic misery. Affection even sharpened the weapons which they directed against each other, for had they loved less tenderly, they would certainly have felt less the bitter words which too often remained traced in letters of fire upon their hearts. All who have had any experience of domestic life will readily understand how slight may be the causes which dis sever hearts—too many have exclaimed in all the bitterness of wasted affection,

"Alas, how light a cause may move
Dissension between hearts that love,
Hearts that the world in vain has tried,
And sorrow but more closely tied,
—A look,
A word unkind or wrongly taken,
Oh, Love! that tempests never shook,
A breath, a touch like this has shaken."

In little more than a year after her marriage, Alicia saw herself on the brink of a separation from her husband. The circumstances which led to this were almost too trivial to be remembered. A slight difference of opinion—an angry word—a still more wounding rejoinder—and finally a half-uttered wish to be freed from domestic bondage on the part of the husband, and the ready answer dictated by the irritated pride and wounded tenderness of the wife—such were the causes which determined them to separate. That both repented of such a determination was very certain, but each was too proud to be the first to proffer a reconciliation; and hastily arranging his affairs, Derville took passage in a ship which was to sail for England in three days. What the unhappy wife suffered during those three days, can scarcely be conceived. Loving her husband with an intensity almost amounting to idolatry, yet thus about to be separated from him forever, she was upon the very verge of madness. Derville was either abroad or shut up in his study during the whole time that elapsed previous to his sailing, and though she often approached the door, her heart sunk within her as her hand touched the lock, and she dared not enter.

"No," said she to herself, as she retreated for the last time, "he will not leave me; he wishes to leave me, or he would not have seized the opportunity so readily; he loves me no more; he will be happier when he is no longer haunted by the presence of his miserable wife, and I will not solicit from his pity the sacrifice of his happiness."

Derville argued precisely in the same manner.

"She evidently loves me not," thought he, "or she would seek a reconciliation; she thinks she will be happier when separated from me; and, whatever may be my sufferings, she at least shall never be compelled to share them."

Thus, by a want of that confidence, so essential in married life, did these two unhappy beings consummate their own misery.

It was not until the very day on which Derville was to sail, that Mrs. Monckton was made acquainted with their situation. She had been absent from the city for some weeks, and, hastening, upon her return, to visit her beloved Alicia, found her thus plunged in the deepest misery. In vain that kind friend exerted herself to bring about an understanding between them. Matters had now proceeded too far; Derville would not even see his wife prior to his departure, lest he should involuntarily betray some weakness, and placing in the hands of Mrs. Monckton a paper, containing some directions relative to his private concerns, he left the house. As he half unconsciously turned his eye towards the window of his wife's apartment, he caught a glimpse of her face, as, bending forward, she was straining her tearful gaze upon his receding form; and the expression of agony which marked it almost compelled him to return, but she vanished from his view the instant her eyes met his, and subduing the bitter anguish of his own spirit, he went on.

As soon as Mrs. Monckton arrived home after the morning visit, which we have recorded in the commencement of our story, she repaired to the apartment of Mrs. Derville. Vexation at the ill-natured gossip which she had just heard, had induced her to form a project, which her better judgment would certainly have condemned. This was to give a large party, at which Alicia should be present, and thus silence the calumnies of the fashionable world. Without informing Alicia of the circumstances which led to this apparently unreasonable plan, she exerted all the influence which her strong mind possessed over the timid spirit of her friend, to obtain her acquiescence. But on this point Alicia was immovable; and it was only by convincing her that nothing else could hush the evil surmises of the world respecting her husband's sudden departure, that she was at last prevailed on to consent. The party took place about three weeks after Derville's departure. It was, as usual, a brilliant assemblage of beauty and fashion. There was the same dull round of dancing, singing, and eating, which makes a fashionable party so like that worst of all punishments—the treadmill; and amid the pale and jaded votaries of fashion, it was, perhaps, not very difficult for Alicia to seem the gay and cheerful creature she was wont to be. The very effort which she was compelled to make, lent a feverish glow to her cheek, and a burning light to her eye, which the superficial observer is ever ready to believe the manifestations of happiness; as if happiness, the calmest, most tranquil of all emotions, could betray itself in the restless glance and feverish cheek which belong only to unquiet excitement. But Mrs. Monckton's end was gained. The scandal-mongers of the fashionable world were silenced, though at the expense of years of suffering to the unhappy Alicia.

Mrs. Derville shortly after removed to lodgings in a small village near the city, and there, in an humble cottage, she spent her days in all the dull monotony of hopeless grief, unbroken except by the visits of her friend. During six months she endured the severest sufferings, both of mind and body, with a degree of patience that seemed almost like indifference when her trance of sorrow was broken by that most exquisite of all sensations—the newly-awakened feelings of a mother. A daughter,

"The child of love, though born in bitterness,
And nurtured in convulsion," fast aroused her from the state of hopeless apathy into which she had fallen, and as soon as her strength would permit, she poured forth the fulness of her heart in a letter to her husband, fraught with all the fervor of affection and penitence. Sure that he could not resist such an appeal, she awaited with restless anxiety the time which would restore her, forgiving and forgiven, to that idolized husband, and she anticipated with delight the moment when she should present to him the new claimant upon his tenderness.

Derville, in the mean time, without daring to ask information of her from any of his friends, had eagerly waited for any accidental tidings which might reach him, and one of the first letters which he received after his arrival in England, was from a young and hair-brained friend, containing an animated description of Mrs. Monckton's fiute, and painting in glowing colors the brilliancy and beauty of "the star of the evening, Mrs. Derville." This, though intended to flatter Derville, who was known to be very proud of his beautiful wife, almost drove him to madness. The agonized expression of Alicia's countenance when he last beheld it had never left his memory. He had pictured her in the loneliness of her solitary chamber, brooding over the recollections of past happiness, and yearning with a vain longing to look upon the face of him whom she had so loved; often, in the contemplation of such a portrait, had his heart been softened to almost child-like weakness; often had he felt that if she were only near him, he could have thrown himself at her feet, and prayed to be forgiven. But thus to behold her the life and ornament of a ball-room—his very soul sickened with disgust at the heartlessness of the woman who had once been the cherished wife of his bosom, and he sought for solace, or at least forgetfulness of his disappointment amid the gaiety and dissipation of London. To complete the chain of adverse circumstances, her letter was accidentally lost by the person to whose care she had entrusted it, and while Alicia was awaiting with almost heart-breaking anxiety the answer to her earnest appeal, he was cherishing feelings of the most intense bitterness against her who had not even condescended to inform him of so important an event as the birth of his child. A friend in America first acquainted him that he was a father.

Nearly three years had elapsed since Derville's residence in London, when one morning, among some letters just received from the post-office, he perceived one bearing all those uncouth marks and hieroglyphics so indicative of foreign letters. Upon opening it, to his great amazement he found it to be from Alicia, and recurring to the date, he discovered it to have been written more than two years before. It was, in fact, the identical letter in which Alicia had announced to him the birth of her child. A countryman on his way to town had picked up the letter which Alicia's messenger had dropped; seeing it directed to London, and thinking one ship as good as another, he had put it on board one bound for Smyrna, and thus after making almost the circuit of the world, it had finally reached its destination. Bitterly was Alicia avenged for all her sufferings. Every word, so filled with all the heart's eloquence, was like a dagger to the bosom of the unhappy husband. Remorse haunted him like a demon, and he was scarcely conscious of external objects until he found himself once more upon the waters.

It was late on a summer afternoon when Derville stopped at Mrs. Monckton's door to inquire the residence of Alicia. Heedless of the surprise which his sudden appearance excited, he mounted his horse, and was soon in sight of the humble habitation. Fearing to alarm her, he alighted and approached the house on foot. As he passed a window almost concealed by the clustering jasmine and sweet-briar, he heard a well known voice repeating portions of the Lord's prayer, while the lisping tones of an infant were heard at intervals as if attempting to utter the same sounds. Cautiously approaching the window he beheld the attenuated but still graceful form of Alicia bending over the bright-faced little creature who knelt before her in the attitude of prayer. He listened—the voice ceased for a moment, and then the mother, in tremulous tones dictated a petition for the dear father who was far away. Her voice faltered, and as the clear ringing tones of childhood were heard repeating the simple and fervent prayer, she burst into a flood of tears. The next moment her tears were falling upon the bosom of her husband.

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE WORKS OF THE REVEREND ROBERT HALL.

Of this author Dugald Stewart expressed his opinion in the following strong terms:—"He combines the beauties of Johnson, Addison, and Burke, without their imperfections," and he adds, "whoever wishes to see the English language in its perfection must read his writings."

Dr. Parr has also borne testimony in his favor. "Mr. Hall," he says, "like Bishop Taylor, has the eloquence of an orator, the fancy of a poet, the acuteness of a schoolman, the profoundness of a philosopher, and the piety of a saint."

The Harpers have very properly republished the writings of one eliciting such eulogies from such sources; and, from the intrinsic value of the collection, the talents of the gentleman under whose superintendence it was originally published in Great Britain, (Olinthus Gregory,) the celebrity of the writer of the memoir and sketch of his literary character annexed, (the Right Hon. Sir James Mackintosh,) and of the Rev. John Foster, by whom also we have a sketch of his character as a theologian and a preacher, with the additional interest conferred by the recent decease of the subject, we can assure the enterprising publishers that it will have an extensive and rapid sale.

They have yet only furnished the first volume, containing sermons, charges, &c. Volume second will soon follow, made up of tracts, political and miscellaneous; reviews and miscellaneous pieces. The third volume will comprise sermons from the author's own manuscripts, with a selection from his letters, &c. with the memoirs of his life. We are promised, in addition, an accurate and beautifully executed portrait.

MR. DAVIES'S TREATISE ON LINEAR PERSPECTIVE.

Whether the mind of the youthful student may find richer nutriment in Newton and Euclid than in Virgil and Homer, we cannot at present discuss; but it is certain that mathematical studies have been too little cultivated among us. We hail with pleasure, therefore, the appearance of a work from the Military Academy, West Point, on Shades and Shadows and Linear Perspective, by Charles Davies, professor of mathematics in that establishment. The subjects treated of in this essay will render it a welcome addition to the library of the architect and draftsman, as well as an admirable volume to place in the hands of the more advanced pupils in our various institutions of learning. It is rendered valuable by numerous neatly executed diagrams. The author, in a well-written preface, expresses his acknowledgments to the cadets for the interest they have taken in the work, and adds, "but for their liberality it could not have appeared." It is exceedingly creditable to Mr. Davies that so excellent a treatise should be the result of his leisure, and to the academy that it should derive its support from their patronage. As the only military school in America, and probably the best of any description, the public look to works emanating from it with more than ordinary interest and confidence, which the one now under consideration is not likely to disappoint.

The brothers Harper, by whom it is printed and published, have presented it in a form of unusual typographical beauty.

ENCYCLOPEDIA AMERICANA.

This admirable and almost universal dictionary continues in its successful course. People are beginning to look upon it generally as one of the most valuable and important works ever undertaken by American publishers, and one reflecting the highest credit on the judgment and enterprise of Carey and Lea. It is full of interest and instruction, a delightful work to read, and will be soon considered indispensable as a book of reference, and equally necessary to the old and the young. All boarding-schools should possess themselves of it, and place it in the hands of the students, as a kind of reading calculated at once to please and improve them. The innumerable notices of this publication unite in calling it an honor to the country. The ninth volume has appeared.

LEMPRIERE'S CLASSICAL DICTIONARY

Has been republished by W. E. Dean, of this city. The volume forms the seventh American edition, revised and corrected, and now for the first time divided, under separate heads, into three parts. Part first, Geography, Topography, &c.—Part second, History, Antiquity, &c.—Part third, Mythology. It is under the able direction of Lorenzo L. Da Ponte and John D. Ogilby. The design of the work is to present the results of Mr. Lempriere's industry, purified from those errors and blemishes which have been admitted into all previous editions.

NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW.

We have read the seventy-fifth number (for April) of this excellent work with great pleasure. The contents are—1. Spanish Devotional and Moral Poetry; 2. Authorship of Junius; 3. Audubon's Biography of Birds; 4. Life of Sebastian Cabot; 5. Indian Biography; 6. Sparks' Life of Gouverneur Morris; 7. Barber on Elocution; 8. Bryant's Poems; 9. North-Eastern Boundary. The review of Mr. Bryant's Poems, among many passages of high praise, contains the following:

"Others before him have sung the beauties of creation, and the greatness of God; but no one ever observed external things more closely, or transferred his impressions to paper in more vivid colors. A violet becomes, in his hands, a gem fit to be placed in an imperial diadem; a mountain leads his eyes to the canopy above. The woods, the hill, the flowers—whatever, in short, is his object, is brought before our eyes with a fidelity of delineation, and a brightness of coloring, which the actual pencil cannot rival. The picture is always finished to the minutest particular."

"If there be any thing within the whole compass of literature more delicate, more pure, more exquisitely sweet than this, (the Evening Wind,) it has not yet fallen under our observation; and this is not a solitary emanation of the spirit that produced it. The book abounds with verses of the same character."

"Mr. Bryant has taken the only proper way to answer the sneers of foreigners. Such works as his say more in favor of our country than all the appeals that were ever uttered by wounded national pride."

"The reader, on whom the solemnity and majesty of this hymn, (To the North Star,) make no impression, has no poetry in his soul."

"Bryant is an exception to the general rule. He has set up a high standard, and has reached it."

His poetry "will charm those for whom it was written—men of sound judgment and cultivated taste."

FAMILIAR LECTURES ON BOTANY.

Several months ago a work, from the pen of Mrs. Lincoln, under the above title, was published, and very deservedly praised by the critics. It ran through two editions, the last of which, consisting of three thousand copies, was sold almost immediately. We learn that a new and much improved edition will be published during the present month.

Another instructive work, from the same hand, is on the eve of publication by Richardson, Lord, and Holbrook, Boston. It will consist of a series of lectures, recently delivered to the pupils of the Troy Female Seminary, embracing a consideration of mental discipline, the various literary branches of female education, manners and accomplishments; the cultivation of moral and religious feelings, and a view of the peculiar trials, obligations, and duties of women. It is very certain that a treatise of this kind will promote the cause of female improvement, and we wish it every success. In noticing the undertaking, a correspondent, writing on the subject, remarks:

"I know of no work on a similar plan. Mrs. Chapone, Dr. Gregory, Hannah More, and many others, who have written for the sex, suppose no higher standard of female information than a superficial acquaintance with geography, history, grammar, and arithmetic. They never dreamed of young ladies entering with ardor into such studies as geometry, algebra, and mixed mathematics; of their reading the classics with fluency, comprehending the truths of natural science, and making chemical experiments. They had no conception that the moral essays of poetry, the criticism of Kaimes, Allison, and Burke; and the metaphysics of Locke and Reid, were to be grasped by female intellects; nay, commented on and criticized by pupils at a female seminary. But yet it is done, and that too without the least sacrifice of female softness and modesty. The feet may move as lightly in the dance, the hands may be equally skilful to touch the strings of the harp or keys of the piano, to guide the pencil or ply the needle, albeit the head shall have become inured to profound thinking; and if the intellectual powers assume a more elevated character, the emotions are not less deep and tender."

THE FINE ARTS.

PAINTING.

DUNLAP'S PICTURE OF CHRIST BEARING THE CROSS.

We present another extract from the manuscript lectures delivered by Mr. Dunlap, at the exhibition of his paintings in Clinton-hall:

"We have said that the historical painter is confined to such circumstances in the composition of his picture as are actually related by the historian, or may be supposed to be probable, and consistent with the facts recorded, or to flow naturally from them.

"The principal feature in this picture is of the last kind. It is nowhere said by the historian that Jesus sunk under the cross; yet the circumstance is not only probable, but seems necessarily to have taken place, as it accounts for what otherwise appears a discrepancy at first sight in the records given of the events of this period by the evangelists.

St. Matthew says—"After they had mocked him, they took the robe off him, and led him away to crucify him; and as they came out," that is, as I read it, as they were going out of the city, perhaps approaching the gate leading to Calvary, the place of execution, "they found a man of Cyrene, Simon by name, and him they compelled to bear his cross." Mark says the same, adding that "Simon was passing by, coming out of the country." Probably he had just entered the gate, and meeting the multitude, who were proceeding to Calvary, is astonished to find himself seized upon by the military order of the centurion. St. Luke gives the same account of the transaction, adding, "and there followed him a great multitude of people and of women, which also bewailed and lamented him." But St. John, who was present through the whole of this awful and eventful history, says, "And they took Jesus and led him away. And he bearing his cross, went forth unto a place called the place of the skulls." Thus, at first sight, it would appear from John that he bore his cross to the place of execution; but John, knowing that the other historians had recorded the seizing of Simon, omits it. They all agree that he was led forth bearing his cross, inasmuch as no other is mentioned for that office until they found "a man of Cyrene," who was entering the city, "coming out of the country," and the inference is, that "they compelled him to bear the cross, because Jesus sunk under it." We must remember that previously he had undergone the agony in the garden, the sleepless night, the buffeting and mocking and scourging; and that although the mental power was superior to all this, the physical must sink under it; and it appears that there was a predetermination that no miraculous power should be exerted.

The celebrated Jeremy Taylor says, "In some old figures we see our blessed Lord described at the time of bearing the cross, with a table appended to the fringe of his garment, set full of nails and pointed iron, for so sometimes they afflicted persons condemned to that kind of death." And St. Cyprian affirms, "That Christ did stick to the wood that he carried, being galled with the iron at his heels, and nailed even before his crucifixion." And Taylor supposes that the load was taken from him not in mercy, but to prolong life for the last torture; as in modern times wretches are cured of sickness to be delivered to a violent death, when adjudged to such by the law. The painter has assigned another motive, more consonant to humanity—a wish in the centurion to mitigate the sufferings of one so meek, resigned, and unoffending.

Taylor, however, supposes the incident here represented to have occurred; and Dr. Adam Clark expressly says, "It is likely he bore the cross part of the way, but being exhausted with the scourging and other cruel usage he had received, he was found unable to bear it alone;" he therefore concludes that Simon was seized to assist him.

It was the practice among the Romans to make criminals bear their cross to the place of execution; hence, as an illustration of the misery inflicted by vice, a Latin author says—"Every kind of wickedness produces its own particular torment, just as every malefactor, when he is brought forth to execution, carries his own cross."

THE DRAMA.

THE NEW-YORK STAGE, ETC.

PARK.—After an absence of several months Mr. Forrest returned to these boards on Monday evening, welcomed, as usual, by a crowded house and hearty acclamations. The piece selected for this occasion was Dr. Bird's popular tragedy of the Gladiators; a play which (as we felt assured it would on the perusal of the manuscript) has been received with decided marks of favor in nearly all the principal theatres of the Union. The character of Spartacus by Mr. Forrest, is a bold, striking, and masterly delineation, frequently exhibiting specimens of composition and acting of the first quality. We look with interest for the succeeding productions of Dr. Bird. His first effort has given him a wide reputation as a writer. Even in the closet it is found to possess sterling intrinsic merit, a praise not justly to be awarded to many modern compositions of the same nature. In the hands to which it has been fortunately committed on the stage, that merit is enhanced to a degree that fully sanctions the universal approbation with which it has been received.

In the new spectacle, called Traits of Napoleon, Placide discovers a curious resemblance to his great original. The dance, arranged by Mrs. Barrymore, is neat and pretty. The piece is quite well got up, and worth seeing once.

AMERICAN.—Mr. Blanchard is attracting much attention. Mr. Hamblin will, we hope, find him a profitable as he is certainly an admirable addition to his corps.

Miss Vincent, from Philadelphia, appeared on Monday evening, as Clari and Kate O'Brien. She is lavishly praised by all who witnessed her representations, and is certainly very promising.

RICHMOND-HILL.—This neat little summer establishment has been enriched by the acquisition of Miss Mary Duff, daughter of the celebrated actress who has for a long period delighted the American public. We were not present at her debut.

The following anonymous letter to Garrick may amuse the reader and furnish performers of the present day with a hint:

"I went the other night to see you perform the part of Hamlet, and do indeed think that you got a great deal of deserved applause. I doubt whether the famous Betterton did the part half so well the first time he attempted it. The character of Hamlet is no small test of a man's genius, where the action is inconsiderable, and the sentiment so prevailing and remarkable through the whole. I own that upon your first encounter with the ghost, I observed with some astonishment that it was a considerable time before you spoke. I beg of you, sir, to consider that these words,

"Angels and ministers of grace defend us," follow upon the first surprise, and are the immediate effects of it. I grant you that a little pause after that is highly proper, but to repeat them at the same time and in the same tone of voice with the speech,

"Be thou a spirit of health," &c.

is very improper, because they are by no means a part of that speech. You certainly kept the audience in a strange suspense, many of whom, I suppose, were afraid, as well as I, that you wanted the assistance of the prompter. There is one thing that I must mention, which I think has but a very ridiculous appearance, although it has been practised by every one that I have seen in that character; and it is this: when the ghost beckons Hamlet to follow him, he, enraged at Horatio for detaining him, draws his sword, and in that manner follows the ghost; presently he returns, Hamlet still following him, sword in hand, till the ghost says,

"I am thy father's spirit"

at which words Hamlet, with a very respectful bow, sheathes his sword; which is as much as to say, that if he had not been a ghost upon whom he could depend, he dare not have ventured to put up his sword. The absurdity of this custom is plain from the nature of spirits, and from what Marcellus a little before says, that 'it is as the air invulnerable.' I think it would be much better if Hamlet should at these words,

"By heaven! I'll make a ghost of him that lets me!"

only put his hand to his sword, and make an attempt to draw it. "I do not understand your leaving aside that beautiful part, his directions to the players: and unless it was an unskilful person that was conscious to himself that he could not keep up to the nicety of his own rules, I know no reason for it; but that I am sure you need not fear."

MUSIC.

LESSONS FOR THE SPANISH GUITAR.

Mr. S. Keene, teacher of the Spanish guitar, which is becoming quite popular in our fashionable circles, has completed a new series of lessons for that delightful instrument, consisting of the different positions. It is calculated for those already acquainted with the first principles of the art, and may be had of Mr. E. Riley.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

A FRAGMENT OF LINEN.

BY MRS. SIGOURNEY.

Would they swept cleaner! Here's a littering shred
Of linen left behind—a vile reproach
To all neat housewifery. Right glad am I
No nice old lady, trained in those good days
Of pudding-making, and of sampler-work,
And speckless sanctity of household care
Had happened in to spy thee. She, no doubt,
Keen looking, through her spectacles, would say,
"This comes of reading books:" or some spruce beau,
Essenced and lily-handed, had he chanced
To scan thy slight superficialities, 'twould be,
"This comes of writing poetry." Well, well!
Come forth, offender—hast thou ought to say?
Canst thou by merry thought, or quaint conceit
Repay the risk that I have run for thee?
Begin at Alpha, and resolve thyself
Into thine elements—the verdant stalk
And bright blue flower of flax, which erst outspread
That goodly land, where mighty Moses stretch'd
His rod miraculous. I see thy bloom
Soft stealing o'er our blest New-England vales—
But lo! the sturdy farmer with his flail
Breaketh thy bones un pitying—and his wife,
With kerchief'd head and eyes brimful of dust,
Thy slender nerves with hatchet-tooth divides.
—I hear of music, and behold!
The ruddy damsel singeth at her wheel,
While by her side the rustic lover sits,
And as he listeneth, secretly doth count
The bunch of skeins, which hanging on the wall
Increaseth, day by day. Perchance his thought,
(For men have deeper minds than women, sure!)
Is calculating what a thrifty wife
That fair-cheek'd girl will make, and how his shelves
Will bow beneath a weight of golden cheese
Made by her ample hand, while many a keg
And pot of butter to the market borne
Shall, transmigrated, flourish on his back,
A new thanksgiving coat!

Fain would I ask
Mine own New-England, for thine ancient wheel,
By sofa and piano quite displaced.
Why hast thou banish'd from thy parlor-hearths
That deep hygeian harp, whose magic ruled
Dyspepsia, as the minstrel-shepherd's skill
Exorcis'd Saul's ennui?

There was no need
In those old times of trim calisthenics,
And there was less of gadding, and far more
Of home-born, heart-felt comfort, rooted strong,
In industry, and bearing precious fruit
Which wealth could never purchase.

But come back,
Thou shred of linen! I did let thee drop
In my harangue, as wiser ones have lost
The thread of their discourse. What was thy lot
When the rough battery of the loom had stretch'd
And knit thy sinews, and the chemist sun
Thy brown complexion bleach'd? Methinks I trace
Some idiosyncrasy that marks thee out
A defunct pillow-case. Perchance the guest
To the best chamber usher'd, did admire
The snowy whiteness of thy freshen'd youth,
Stirring thy vanity, or some sweet babe
Pour its pure dream of innocence on thee.
Say, hast thou listen'd to the moan of pain
When there were none to comfort, or shrank back
From the dire tossings of the proud man's brow,
Or gathered from young beauty's restless sigh
An untold tale of love?

But why so mute!
Wilt tell no secrets—ha? Well, then go down
With all thy close lock'd hoard of curious lore;
In mystery and majesty go down
Into the paper-mill, and from its jaws
Stainless and smooth emerge. Happy shall be Such renovation, if on thy fair page
Wisdom and truth their hallowed lineaments
Stamp for posterity. So shall thine end
Be better than thy birth, and worthier bard
Thine apotheosis immortalize.

THE DYING WIFE.

Oh! tell me not of other days,
To-morrow hopes more bright,
My sun hath sunk, life's evening rays
For me are veiled in night;
So near to death's mysterious world I stand,
I feel the chillness of that shadowy land.

When roseate garlands round me lie,
Withering upon the earth,
In music's spell, in memory's sigh,
Or hall of festal mirth,
Its "still small voice" the warning spirit sends,
Farewell is in its murmur; farewell, friends!

Gentle and low the pensive sound,
Dream-like as windharp's moan,
'Tis blending with the air around,
And with love's fondest tone;
But when thy tender earnest eyes I see,
A weight is on my heart, how can I part with thee!

Far worse than death, my loved, my own!
In this sad hour intensely dear,
To leave thee, and to wing alone
My spirit-flight above this sphere;
Whose love unto my life a charm hath given,
A voiceless eloquence that breathed of heaven.

Dear is thy tenderness to me
In solitude and pain,
Star of my fond idolatry!
Clasp of life's golden chain!
Fold me, beloved, to thy faithful breast,
There let me softly sweetly sink to rest.

Fain would I linger yet with thee,
A seared leaf on the bough;
But vain the wish—e'en thou canst see
The death-dew on my brow;
Nature fast fades before my languid eye,
And angel visions beckon to the sky.

Then fare thee well! o'er life's dark wave
My fragile bark hath past;
Unheeded now the billows rave,
The harbor's gained at last:
Oh! blest affection guide thee to that shore,
Where the soul's cherished meet to part no more. G.

ON THE DEATH OF A FAVORITE CHILD.

BY JAMES NACK.

I loved thee—scarce a father's heart
Could prize thee more than mine;
For I believed it was thy part
To make me blessed with thine;
For out of many a lovely child
I've welcomed to my breast,
I thought, and in that thought I smiled,
Thou wouldst repay me best!

But I have lost thee—and I share
The grief thy parents know—
Yet shall I not to murmur dare,
For God hath struck the blow!
Though I could wish, my dearest one,
That I were not denied
Again to gaze thy face upon,
Which soon the grave must hide!

But fetter'd to a bed of pain,
I may not seek thy bier;
And never shall I see again
That face so fair and dear!
Nay—let me hope thy sinless brow
Again shall bless mine eye,
Thy countenance, an angel's now,
I yet may see on high!

Thy soul shall live eternally,
Though death thy form destroy—
And if our tears must flow for thee,
They should be tears of joy!
It should affection's sorrow calm
To know that thou art blest,
For thou art gone, my little lamb,
To the good Shepherd's breast!

My sweetest one, thou didst appear
Unto mine eyes of love,
A little cherub even here—
But what art thou above?
With heaven's own infant cherubim,
'Tis thine to hover nigh
The throne of God, and worship Him
In songs that never die.

And while thy golden harp is strung
To Him who saved thy soul,
How sweetly from thy infant tongue
The heavenly anthems roll!
Oh! what of all that earth contains
Could buy thee from the bliss
In which thy ransomed spirit reigns,
To such a world as this!

Oh! may thy parents, though they mourn,
Repine not at the rod,
Assured their darling child is borne
To her best parent—God!
And oh, may those they yet possess,
To comfort them combine,
By filial love and tenderness,
And innocence like thine!

LETTERS FROM PARIS.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF EUROPE.

NUMBER ELEVEN.

Foyetier—the Thracian Gladiator—Mademoiselle Mars—Dr. Franklin's residence in Paris—Annual ball for the poor.

I HAD the pleasure to-day of being introduced to the young sculptor FOYETIER, the author of the new statue on the terrace of the Tuileries. Aside from his genius, he is interesting from a circumstance connected with his early history. He was a herd-driver in one of the provinces, and amused himself in his leisure moments with the carving of rude images, which he sold for a sous or two on market-days in the provincial town. The celebrated Dr. Gall fell in with him accidentally, and felt of his head, en passant. The bump was there which contains his present greatness, and the phrenologist took upon himself the risk of his education in the arts. He is now the first sculptor, beyond all competition, in France. His "Spartacus," the Thracian gladiator, is the admiration of Paris. It stands in front of the palace, in the most conspicuous part of the regal gardens, and there are hundreds of people about the pedestal at all hours of the day. The gladiator has broken his chain, and stands with his weapon in his hand, every muscle and feature breathing action, his body thrown back, and his right foot planted powerfully for a spring. It is a gallant thing. One's blood stirs to look at it. I think that Forrest (however well he may be playing now in the new tragedy, of which I see so much in the papers) would get from it even a more intense conception of the gladiator. If I had written such a play, I would make the voyage of the Atlantic to see the character thus bodied out.

Foyetier is a young man, I should think about thirty. He is small, very plain in appearance; but he has a rapid, earnest eye, and a mouth of singular suavity of expression. I liked him extremely. His celebrity seems not to have trenched a step on the nature of his character. His genius is every where allowed, and he works for the king altogether, his majesty bespeaking every thing he attempts, even in the model; but he is certainly, of all geniuses, one of the most modest.

The celebrated MARS has come out from her retirement once more, and commenced an engagement at the Theatre Franois. I went a short time since to see her play in Tartuffe. This stage is the home of the true French drama. Here Talma played when he and Mademoiselle Mars were the delight of Napoleon and of France. I have had few gratifications greater than that of seeing this splendid woman re-appear in the place where she won her brilliant reputation. The play, too, was Moliere's, and it was here that it was first performed. Altogether, it was like something plucked back from history; a renewal, as in a magic mirror, of glories gone by.

I could scarce believe my eyes when she appeared as the "wife of Argon." She looked about twenty-five. Her step was light and graceful; her voice was as unlike that of a woman of sixty as could well be imagined; sweet, clear, and under a control which gives her a power of expression I never had conceived before; her mouth had the definite, firm play of youth; her teeth (though the dentist might do that) were white and perfect; and her eyes can have lost none of their fire, I am sure. I never saw so quiet a player. Her gestures were just perceptible, no more; and yet they were done so exquisitely at the right moment—so unconsciously, as if she had not meant them, that they were more forcible than even the language itself. She repeatedly drew a low murmur of delight from the whole house with a single play of expression across her face, while the other characters were speaking, or by a slight movement of her fingers, in pantomimic astonishment or vexation. It was really something new to me. I had never before seen a first-rate female player in comedy. Leontine Fay is inimitable in tragedy; but, if there is any comparison between them, it is that this beautiful young creature overpowers the heart with her nature, while Mademoiselle Mars satisfies the uttermost demand of the judgment with her art.

I yesterday visited the house occupied by FRANKLIN while he was in France. It is one of the most beautiful country residences in the neighborhood of Paris, standing on the elevated ground of Passy, and overlooking the whole city on one side, and the valley of the Seine for a long distance toward Versailles on the other. The house is otherwise celebrated. Madame de Genlis lived there while the present king was her pupil; and Louis the Fifteenth occupied it six months for the country air, while under the infliction of the gout—its neighborhood to the palace probably rendering it preferable to the more distant chateaux of St. Cloud or Versailles. Its occupants would seem to have been various enough, without the addition of a lieutenant-general of the British army, whose hospitality makes it delightful at present. The lightning-rod which was raised by Franklin, and which was the first conductor used in France, is still standing. The gardens are large, and form a sort of terrace, with the house on the front edge. It must be one of the sweetest places in the world in summer.

The great annual ball for the poor was given at the Academie Royale, a few nights since. This is attended by the king and royal family, and is ordinarily the most splendid affair of the season. It is managed by twenty or thirty lady-patronesses, who have the control of the tickets; and, though by no means exclusive, it is kept within very respectable limits; and, if one is content to float with the tide, and forego dancing, is an unusually comfortable and well-behaved spectacle.

I went with a large party at the early hour of eight. We fell into the train of carriages, advancing slowly between files of dragons, and stood before the door in our turn in the course of an hour. The staircases were complete orangeries, with immense mirrors at every turn, and soldiers on guard, and servants in livery, from top to bottom. The long saloon, lighted by ten chandeliers, was dressed and hung with wreaths as a receiving room; and passing on through the spacious lobbies, which were changed into groves of pines and exotics, we entered upon the grand scene. The coup d'œil would have astonished Aladdin. The theatre, which is the largest in Paris, and gorgeously built and ornamented, was thrown into one vast ball-room, ascending gradually from the centre to platforms raised at either end, one of which was occupied by the throne and seats for the king's family and suite. The four rows of boxes were crowded with ladies, and the house presented, from the floor to the paradis, one glittering and waving wall of dress, jewelry, and feathers. An orchestra of near a hundred musicians occupied the centre of the hall; and on either side of them swept by the long countless multitudes of people, drest with a union of taste and show; while, instead of the black coats which darken the complexion of a party in a republican country, every other gentleman was in a gay uniform; and polytechnic scholars, with their scarlet-faced coats, officers of the "National Guard" and the "line," gentlemen of the king's household, and foreign ministers, and attachés, presented a variety of color and splendor which nothing could exceed.

The theatre itself was not altered, except by the platform occupied by the king; it is sufficiently splendid as it stands; but the stage, whose area is much larger than that of the pit, was hung in rich drapery as a vast tent, and garnished to profusion with flags and arms. Along the sides, on a level with the lower row of boxes, extended galleries of crimson velvet, festooned with flowers. These were filled with ladies, and completed a circle about the house of beauty and magnificence, of which the king and his dazzling suite formed the corona. Chandeliers were hung close together from one end of the hall to the other. I commenced counting them once or twice, but some bright face flitting by in the dance interrupted me. An English girl near me counted fifty-five, and I think there must have been more. The blaze of light was almost painful. The air glittered, and the fine grain of the most delicate complexions was distinctly visible. It is impossible to describe the effect of so much light and space and music crowded into one spectacle. The vastness of the hall, so long that the best sight could not distinguish a figure at the opposite extremity, and so high as to absorb and mellow the vibration of a hundred instruments—the gorgeous sweep of splendor from one platform to the other, absolutely drowning the eye in a sea of gay colors, nodding feathers, jewelry, and military equipment—the delicious music, the strange faces, dresses, and tongues, (one half of the multitude at least being foreigners,) the presence of the king, and the gallant show of uniforms in his conspicuous suite, combined to make up a scene more than sufficiently astonishing. I felt the whole night the smothering consciousness of senses too narrow—eyes, ears, language—all too limited for the demand made upon them.

The king did not arrive till after ten. He entered by a silken curtain in the rear of the platform, on which seats were placed for his family. The "Vive le Roi" was not so hearty as to drown the music, but his majesty bowed some twenty times very graciously, and the good-hearted queen curtsied, and kept a smile on her excessively plain face, till I felt the muscles of my own ache for her. King Philip looks anxious. By the remarks of the French people about me when he entered, he has reason for it. I observed that the polytechnic scholars all turned their backs upon him; and one exceedingly handsome, spirited-looking boy, standing just at my side, muttered a "sacré!" and bit his lip, with a very revolutionary air, at the continuance of the acclamation. His majesty came down, and walked through the hall about midnight. His eldest son, the duke of Orleans, a handsome, unoffending-looking youth of eighteen, followed him, gazing round upon the crowd with his mouth open, and looking very much annoyed at his part of the pageant. The young duke has a good figure, and is certainly a very beautiful dancer. His mouth is loose and weak, and his eyes are as opaque as agates. He wore the uniform of the Garde Nationale, which does not become him. In ordinary gentleman's dress he is a very authentic copy of a Bond-street dandy, and looks as little like a Frenchman as most of Stultz's subjects. He danced all the evening, and selected, very popularly, decidedly the most vulgar women in the room, looking all the while as one who had been petted by the finest women in France, (Leontine Fay among the number,) might be supposed to look under such an infliction. The king's second son, the duke of Nemours, pursued the same policy. He has a brighter face than his brother, with hair almost white, and dances extremely well. The second daughter is also much prettier than the eldest. On the whole, the king's family is a very plain, though a very amiable one, and the people seem attached to them.

These general descriptions are, after all, very vague. Here I have written half a sheet with a picture in my mind of which you are getting no semblable idea. Language is a mere skeleton of such things. The Academie Royale should be borne over the water like the chapel of Loretto, and set down in Broadway with all its lights, music, and people to give you half a notion of the "Bal en faveur des Pauvres." And so it is with every thing except the little histories of one's own personal atmosphere, and that is the reason why egotism should be held virtuous in a traveler, and the reason why one cannot study Europe at home.

After getting our American party places, I abandoned myself to the strongest current, and went in search of "lions." The first face that arrested my eye was that of the DUCHESS D'ISTRIA, a woman celebrated here for her extraordinary personal beauty.

Directly opposite this lovely duchess, in the other stage-box sat DONNA MARIA, the young Queen of Portugal, surrounded by her relatives. The ex-empress, her mother, was on her right, her grandmother on her left, and behind her some half-dozen of her Portuguese cousins. She is a little girl of twelve or fourteen, with a fat, heavy face, and a remarkably pampered, sleepy look. She was dressed like an old woman, and gaped incessantly the whole evening. The box was a perfect blaze of diamonds. I never before realized the beauty of these splendid stones. The necks, heads, arms, and waists of the ladies royal were all streaming with light. The necklace of the empress mother particularly flashed on the eye in every part of the house. By the unceasing exclamations of the women, it was an unusually brilliant show, even here. The little Donna has a fine, well rounded chin; and when she smiled in return to the king's bow, I thought I could see more than a child's character in the expression of her mouth. I should think a year or two of mental uneasiness might let out a look of intelligence through her heavy features. She is likely to have it, I think, with the doubtful fortunes that seem to beset her.

I met DON PEDRO often in society before his departure upon his expedition. He is a short, well-made man, of great personal accomplishment, and a very bad expression, rather aggravated by an unfortunate cutaneous eruption. The first time I saw him, I was induced to ask who he was, from the apparent coldness and dislike with which he was treated by a lady whose beauty had strongly arrested my attention. He sat by her on a sofa in a very crowded party, and seemed to be saying something very earnestly, which made the lady's Spanish eyes flash fire, and brought a curl of very positive anger upon a pair of the loveliest lips imaginable. She was a slender, aristocratic-looking creature, and dressed most magnificently. After glancing at them a minute or two, I made up my mind that, from the authenticity of his dress and appointments, he was an Englishman, and that she was some French lady of rank whom he was particularly annoying with his addresses. On inquiry, the gentleman proved to be Don Pedro, and the lady the COUNTESS DE LOURLE, his sister! I have often met her since, and never without wondering how two of the same family could look so utterly unlike each other. The Count de Lourle called the Adonis of Paris. He is certainly a very splendid fellow, and justifies the romantic admiration of his wife, who married him clandestinely, giving him her left hand in the ceremony, as is the etiquette, they say, when a princess marries below her rank. One cannot help looking with great interest on a beautiful creature like this, who has broken away from the imposing fetters of a royal sphere, to follow the dictates of natural feeling. It does not occur so often in Europe that one may not sentimentalize about it without the charge of affectation.

To return to the ball. The king bowed himself out a little after midnight, and with him departed most of the fat people, and all the little girls. This made room enough to dance, and the French set themselves at it in good earnest. I wandered about for an hour or two; after wearying my imagination quite out in speculating on the characters and rank of people whom I never saw before and shall probably never see again, I mounted to the paradis to take a last look down upon the splendid scene, and made my exit. I should be quite content never to go to such a ball again, though it was by far the most splendid scene of the kind I ever saw.

SKETCHES BY A BRIEFLESS LAWYER.

TROVER.

I THINK it was during the second month of my clerkship that a woman bounced into our office, with a disordered and torn dress, her hair in confusion, and her face covered with scratches, from which the blood was flowing profusely. Making her way up to me, she asked where was my boss? I answered her with all the dignity I could assume, that the gentleman with whom I studied had a moment before left the office. "I can't wait," said she, "I must have justice done me immediately, and if the boss is not in, perhaps you can see me righted." I told her I should be happy to afford her any assistance in my power, and asked her to give me a statement of her case.

I should despair of conveying to the reader any idea of the manner or words in which she imparted to me the history of her wrongs, and will, therefore, merely record the substance of her complaint, as I now recollect it.

It appeared that Mrs. Murphy, (or widow Murphy, as she called herself,) with two unmarried sisters, occupied the second floor of a two-story house in —. The first floor of the same building was tenanted by a Miss Wilkie, a hale, stout spinster, of some thirty-five years of age. The widow Murphy and Miss Wilkie both followed the ancient and honorable profession of clothes-washing. To the proper and skilful performance of their professional duties, a supply of rain-water was indispensable. It was in procuring this supply that a series of unhappy discussions between the widow Murphy and Miss Wilkie had their origin. Both parties laid claim to the rain-water which fell from the roof of the house they occupied.

Miss Wilkie rested her claim on the ground that she hired the most important part of the building, paid the highest rent, and that the extremity of the gutter from which the water issued was on her premises.

On the other hand the widow Murphy contended, that inasmuch as the roof was the immediate covering of that portion of the house inhabited by her, and was, in fact, a very important part of her division of the tenement, she had an undoubted right to all the water that fell on it. She admitted the justice of that portion of the claim of Miss Wilkie, which was founded on the water's issuing on her premises, but rendered it of little consequence by the following procedure.

The widow Murphy gained access to her apartments on the second floor by means of stairs, which ran up on the outside of the house. At the top of them, and in front of the door, was a platform, of some five or six feet square, from which the wooden gutter running down the side of the house was easily reached. To this platform the widow Murphy determined to convey the water. She accordingly bored a hole in the gutter, opposite the head of the stairs, and having filled up the passage below the hole, she inserted a small tin pipe, by which she conveyed the water to a tub on her platform. This brought matters to a crisis. As soon as Miss Wilkie discovered that the supply of water had been cut off by her co-tenant, she made an attack upon her premises, with the intention of redressing herself by force. The rencontre took place over the tub at the head of the stairs. The widow was about yielding, when her maiden sisters came up as a reinforcement, and the redoubtable Miss Wilkie was driven down stairs. But, though vanquished by superior numbers, she carried off in her retreat some of the spoils of the enemy. In the heat of the conflict a gold ring, of the value of twelve shillings, had slipped from the finger of the widow, which her adversary had secured. For this ring we brought our action to trial.

I will pass over the intervening details to our appearance in court. Behold me, then, in that retail dispensary of the law, a justice's court. At the head of a long table sat the justice, a very grave, judicious-looking personage: on one side was the defendant, with her counsel, who was also a young student at law; and the other was occupied by myself. The widow had a seat at my right, and on my left and in the rear, forming, with my client, a semicircle around me, were her two maiden sisters. On opening my cause to the jury, I gave them a brief statement of the facts above detailed, and then proceeded to examine my witnesses. They were the two sisters of my client, who swore to the loss of the ring, and the manner in which the defendant got possession of it. Here (in technical phrase) I rested. The counsel for the defendant then rose, and applied to the court for a nonsuit, on the ground that I had not proved a demand of the ring; and proceeded in a very long argument to show that the action could not be maintained until after a demand and refusal of the defendant to restore the property. For a moment I was quite confounded, and called up a witness to prove the demand of the ring. This, after I had once rested, the court would not permit. I then, having in some measure recovered from my consternation, asserted that a demand was unnecessary, that the fact of the forcible taking, which we had shown, was of itself sufficient evidence of a refusal. This led to a long reply from my opponent, who maintained, in the first place, that the taking was not forcible; that the ring came into the possession of the defendant while she was making a lawful attempt to get possession of her property. Then came up the question of the ownership of the rain-water. He contended that the gutter ought to be considered in the light of a natural or ancient water-course. In the eye of the law it made no difference whether there was a continual flow of water, or whether, like all small streams, the gutter was subject to the extremes of drought and freshets. "He presumed his learned brother was too well versed in the principles of the common law, not to be aware that a stream could not be diverted from its natural and accustomed channel. The rain-water had flowed through the whole length of the gutter since the erection of the house, and it would be a most flagrant violation of the great principle before alluded to, if the occupant of the upper part of it was allowed to change the course of the water, and by that means deprive the other tenant of the use of it. The ownership of the water being thus, as he conceived, settled, there was no doubt but that his client was justifiable in her attempt to get possession of it. If, in this attempt, the ring accidentally came into her possession, it was no forcible taking, and a demand of it was necessary to the maintenance of a suit.

I admitted, in answer, the correctness of the ground taken by my learned brother, but begged leave to call his attention to another established principle of the common law.

Although it was well settled that no person could turn a stream from its natural channel, if by so doing he affected its course on the property of those dwelling further down; yet he had an undoubted right to use the water, and give it any course he pleased on his own premises, provided, that on reaching the possessions of another, it resumed its ordinary channel. In this case, the widow Murphy had no desire to divert the water from its accustomed course; she merely wished to use her right of using it while on her premises, after which she intended to return it to its natural course down the gutter. If she had not done so, the defendant had her remedy in an action of nuisance; and any attempt at redress by force was illegal, and a breach of the peace. The defendant having obtained possession of the ring, under such circumstances, I submitted to the court to say whether it was necessary to prove a demand.

The justice declined giving any decision, but said that he would submit the question to the jury; and the defendant, having no other defence, the cause was committed to them, with the single remark from the court, that they were the judges of law and fact, and it was for them to say whether, under all the circumstances, the plaintiff ought to recover.

After an absence of about two days, they brought in a verdict for the plaintiff, with costs. M.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

ONE OF THE COGNOSCENTI.

In every country village there is a class of stanch old fellows, who have the whole weight of public affairs on their own shoulders. They are sure to be at all the raisings or bees, funerals and marriages; at the town meetings and the religious meetings; and show their rough gray heads on the little front benches at church on Sundays; are leading members of the "temperance society," and the "society for the suppression of vice;" the trustees of the academy; judges of the courts; generals and colonels in the militia; head men at elections, often members of the legislature, and sometimes of congress. If the reader has ever been at Washington, he has noted them; generally great square-shouldered countrymen; their hands hardened with agricultural labors, their faces embrowned with exposure to the open air and sun; honest, simple-minded, strong-hearted farmers, in unfashionable coats and linsey-woolsey trowsers, who speak good common sense in bad grammar; call creature, crittur, and only shave and change their linen twice a week. The stranger sometimes smiles when they get up in the senate or the house, to answer some smooth, white-handed, graceful emigrant from the city; his manner and dress tinctured with drawing-room elegance, and his sentences turned off melodiously with unexceptionable accent and studied correctness. But, ere the speaker has finished, the auditors, gradually awakened to interest and respect, find themselves under the influence of a healthy and powerful mind, which, without pausing on the way to display graceful attitudes or little rhetorical accomplishments, carries them along boldly and confidently to the conclusion. Among these are occasionally men of vigorous, natural minds, who afterwards get to be great committee-men, secretaries of the departments, and other high government officers; while most, either unambitious, or not endowed with talents much above mediocrity, go back to their ploughs and barnyards, to their front seats in the meeting-house, and their walk through the potato-patch, where, with their arms leaning on the rail-fence, they survey their grain, pigs, and poultry, respectable and contented men.

In the city there is a similar set of persons, most of whom rise a little above the level of the common herd. But here they branch out into various kinds. There are the political, for example—exceedingly sagacious young men, who can tell you whether a bill will pass the house, before any body else knows it has been introduced, and how much the administration are in the minority or the majority in the senate. They tell you across the table what Mr. Clay said in 1816, and ask you to compare it with what he said in 1820; and offer to bet five to one that some particular person will be president in 1840. They are so full of tariff talk, Cherokee talk, &c.; such layers down of worn-out political maxims, that when they have got you in company, making you look like a fool, while saying "yes, sir," and "certainly, sir," to things that you know nothing about, and talking you to death almost with the driest and most repulsive of all subjects, you wish for an earthquake, or that the house would take fire, so that you might seem frightened and get loose. They are important persons at ward meetings, and have their names in the paper as chairmen and secretaries.

Another class to which I refer is, in my estimation, much higher than either of the others. The reader has, probably, often met their name in the daily journals; for when any one wishes to impress the public mind with an opinion, they invariably give them as authority. Every body respects them. It is they who give a tone to fashion, who permit an actor to pass to fame and fortune, or strip from him the patronage of all but the rabble, who pronounce decisive opinions on an opera long before it is produced, and say what a picture will be before it is painted, and who carry in their minds the immutable standard of perfection upon every possible subject. They are alluded to by editors and authors, under various denominations. They are those correspondents, upon whose taste and judgment "the most implicit confidence may be reposed;" the gentlemen "well known to the literary world;" the writer "whose genius has long been established on both sides of the Atlantic;" the "persons who know;" the "literati," the "dilettanti," or the "cognoscenti." Ah, if the public knew what they do, how they would stare! Things which the simple common race of men and women live and die without ever dreaming of, are with them ordinary topics of conversation. They know what passes behind the scenes of the theatres, how accounts stand between publishers and authors; they know of newspapers which boast of their "extensive and rapidly increasing patronage," yet which are absolutely dying for want of support. If they durst tell the secrets of their profession, in how many ways the public are deceived, &c.; but no, there is a kind of free-masonry about them. If people want to know, they must watch for stray words, casual fragments of opinions, the inuendos which fall accidentally from their lips, and put them together, to be published and commented on at leisure.

There are certainly numerous advantages attached to this pro-

ciety. It is such a high feeling to know more than other folks—to see people going about their business, like fools, full of opinions which are totally unfounded—to feel that your words are weighed and noted like something of extraordinary value, to be preserved for the essence of truth which they are supposed to contain. It is gratifying to the inherent vanity of human nature. It gives a man pleasant subjects for secret reflection. It allays the feverish thirst for superiority, with which we are all infected in a greater or less degree. One of your real cognoscenti is the most self-satisfied of all beings that walk this round earth—and not the less so from the fact that his gratification flows from a source different from that of all other men's pleasure—the one springing from the beauties, the other from the faults of an exhibition. The claims of these gentlemen to respect arise from the circumstance that they have been extensive travelers, and observed the first-rate specimens of every art and science. Painting, sculpture, music, dancing, acting, scenery, female beauty, architecture, splendor of every description—no common man can talk to them if they please to open a conversation on him. They look at him—they pity him. Their expression throws cold water on his flaming raptures. He shuts his lips instantly—or if he presumes to utter any sentiment, it is only "I wish I could travel."

But you must not undervalue the cognoscenti, Mr. Reader. This superiority is not assumed. All things are estimated by comparison. They are men of sense and actual observation. They have really seen that which they profess to have seen; and as they would inevitably be charged with affectation should they express true opinions freely on ordinary occasions, they generally hold their tongues, and only appear thus obliquely, as above mentioned, in the columns of newspapers, or in confidence to particular friends.

The world must, however, be warned against a set of pretenders, who pass under their name without their knowledge and experience. Although these are the most ignorant and audacious varlets that ever imposed on the credulity of the unsuspecting, yet they frequently succeed in gaining credit from those who are as ignorant, without being as immodest, as themselves. They are clearly the most disagreeable, pernicious, troublesome, impertinent, disgusting creatures out of the penitentiary. Real genius is often timid, sensitive, and doubtful about its own creations. It puts them forth with fear and hesitation—it writhes beneath a word of ridicule, and perhaps never ventures again to trust its powers. A blundering dunce may thus deride the effort of one infinitely his superior, and gain the laugh on his side. Yet society is full of these annoyances, as nothing is easier than to pass for a critic and a judge with the general mass of mankind who have no time to examine for themselves. A few cant phrases, on various subjects, an assumption of the manner of true critics—these used properly, and with a sufficient degree of impudence, which often passes current for knowledge, are stock enough to set one up in this mean and disgraceful character.

These foolish persons, who, with the aid of a little paltry slang, undertake to settle questions which they are utterly incompetent to comprehend, may generally be detected as imposters, by the insolence with which they lay down their opinions, and their loud unmeaning jangle of a few sounding terms; while, in a man of true knowledge and taste, there will be marked a modesty and reserve, even upon subjects with which every one allows him to be peculiarly acquainted. There are large numbers of these ridiculous imitators about town, who are unconsciously exposing their shoulders to the lash of the satirist. They are men who fall into raptures about certain pieces of music, or other specimen of art which some great person has executed or admired; while the most exquisite evidence of power from an obscure artist, of which, perhaps, some one from whom they generally take their opinions has disapproved, is regarded with a "bah," which is the grossest of all affectation. Every age and country has abounded with these cheats on a small scale, whose assumption of superior acumen is so disgusting, and so often betrayed, that persons of unquestionable ability are ashamed to speak before a stranger. One of these conceited gentry was once walking with Handel, when a band of music began playing an air. The fellow, thinking to pass himself off as a critic upon the great composer, covered his ears with his hands, and exclaimed, "That music is horrible stuff." "It may be horrible stuff," replied Handel, "but it is mine!"

One of the most ludicrous artifices by which the persons I have described attempt to attract notice, and distinguish themselves from the vulgar crowd, is selecting something—an old picture, for example, which has not the slightest value, and placing it somewhere (perhaps in the exact position least calculated to enhance whatever appearance of merit it may really possess) and thus being nearly overcome by their feelings of wonder and admiration. People who stand by, are as much struck with admiration of the man as he is with the picture, and with just as little reason.

For my own part, dear reader, let me warn you not only against these smattering acquirements in any art; but as you regard the simple pleasures of life and your general cheerfulness, beware how you become even one of the real cognoscenti. I was once in great danger of setting up in that character, but was prevented by the deliberate conviction that however I might increase my fame, I should proportionally mar my happiness. I made this discovery by closely observing a friend, who happened to be one of the cognoscenti, of the most unequivocal attainments and sagacity. I was originally led to watch the operations of his mind from a desire of being initiated into the mysteries of his superiority over all others that I might in time become like him. One day I attended an exhibition of the academy of arts, where, among the paintings, all of which had imparted to me the most sincere and delightful feelings of admiration, I selected one as the most charming and strikingly beautiful. It was a lovely cottage-scene, with trees and a lake, and a sweet careless girl, with a pretty child, looking down into the water.

The examination of this piece threw me into a gentle and agreeable excitement. I called my friend, anxious that he should participate in my pleasure.

"Oh!" exclaimed I, "if you will be charmed, look at that. Is it not delicious?"

As he gazed at it, his face was drawn up into an expression of disgust, instead of admiration.

"What that?" he exclaimed, in a tone of surprise; "why that's not pretty!"

"Isn't it?"

"Why, bless your simple soul, no. It's dreadful—it's shameful."

"Is it?"

"Yes, it's atrocious. It sets my teeth on edge."

"Does it?"

"Certainly. Why, my dear fellow, only look at that shadow—that cloud: the perspective is bad—the drawing is bad—the colors are not laid on well—there is no relief—it is not finished. But come here, I'll show you a picture that you may admire without fear."

I followed him. He pointed out a dark, dingy-looking daub, which seemed to be a bunch of grapes and some flowers. I might have gone there forty thousand times and never dreamed it was so beautiful. I began thenceforward to be careful how I admired pictures. At last I perfected my judgment to such a degree that I could pass through the room of an artist with an even pulse and a cold heart. One day I leaned against a pillar, regarding a new painting: a number of ladies and gentlemen gradually gathered around it also. They appeared animated with the most lively pleasure. Bursts of admiration and delight continually came from their lips. Indeed they formed a group of perfect happiness. I alone was silent and contemptuous—disgusted with the painting, disgusted with them for praising it. "Look at that shadow," thought I, "look at that perspective. It is painted by a New-Yorker. It is most probable that some of the rules of the art are violated. Who would consent to receive gratification from a piece where the rules of the art are perhaps violated in the most gross manner? It is a grand thing to be a critic."

We went one evening to see a new opera. The music inspired me. I forgot to criticize—I forgot my friend—I forgot I was one of the cognoscenti—I gave myself up to the enchantment of the admirable exhibition.

In the paroxysm of my rapture I felt a hand on my shoulder. It belonged to my friend the critic. He seemed horror-struck at something.

"For heaven's sake," whispered he, "let us go."

I complied, thinking he had met with some accident.

"What is the matter?" asked I.

"Let us escape from this stuff," said he. "They are making dreadful work with this opera. I have seen it in Paris, in Italy, in London. Mrs. — left out a cadence which I came on purpose to hear. I would not expose myself to a similar disappointment for the world. It makes me nervous. It sets my teeth on edge."

We rode out together one summer morning. I never saw the country look so fresh and lovely. I remarked it.

"Ah, my dear fellow," said he, with a melancholy air, "it may do for you, but it's wretched stuff for me. I have been in Switzerland. I have seen the blue peaks and green valleys of Germany. I have rode on the banks of the Rhine, and sailed by moonlight through Venice. Every thing here appears dim and repulsive. It sets my teeth on edge."

I found the latter expression was frequently used by my friend. Every thing he saw in his own country—every thing he heard set his "teeth on edge"—he never derived amusement from any thing, except now and then a rare old relic which no one else cared to look at. He was always moping and pining and wishing. Nothing pleased him. He could not meet any thing good, but it was infinitely excelled by something he had seen before, and would probably never meet again. I was thoroughly cured of my ambition to become one of the cognoscenti. SEDLEY.

THE RETURN HOME.

"That is a pleasant land, no doubt,
To which all return who travel out."

It is astonishing how "circumstances alter cases," in themselves unchanged. I have seen Sandy Hook from the deck of a steamboat, when the ocean without, and the bay within reflected a cloudless summer sky from their motionless surface; the water was one broad expanse of crystal; the heavens a clear canopy of "glittering blue;" and the brighter faces around composed of gay and joyous a circle of kindred spirits, as the heart of a poet could desire. Sandy Hook then was sandy enough; a desert waste, scorched by a parching sun, and ornamented with some three or four forlorn looking excrescences, denominated light-houses and beacons; but, when I approached this despised headland from the sea, after a long absence and a tempestuous voyage, I thought it one of the fairest spots upon earth. When one has endured a long acquaintance with winds and waves, fluttering sails and rolling spars, the eye looks eagerly for some stationary object on which it can "dwell and be at rest;" and when this object is gained, and along with it comes the reflection that this barren spot, desolate as it is, is a portion of "native land," that it means and represents HOME, who can wonder that the heart should bound with joy at approaching it, and the eye haply glisten with a tear at beholding what it has so often noted without any conscious emotion.

If Sandy Hook, destitute it is true of intrinsic beauty, looked so fair, it is needless to estimate the similar improvement of other localities surrounding the bay, and terminating with the appropriate climax of this goodly city. Suffice, every thing that I saw appeared to have been touched by some magic pencil, and shone forth in all the fascination of enchantment.

That New-York is a noble city, no American has yet to learn; that it is a beautiful city, will readily be conceded by all who have once seen it; but how noble and how beautiful no one but the privileged traveler can tell. An acquaintance with some of the far-famed European cities is necessary to a full appreciation of the comforts and elegancies of those of America. It is by comparison we judge all things; and comparison will teach an American not only how to value the blessings of his birthright, but how justly he may pride himself on the excellence of his country's institutions.

The natural air of surrounding objects is the first pleasing impression I felt on entering the city. Houses and streets, men and horses, all have, once again, their respective and appropriate characters and appearance. The rattling of carts comes to the ear with the charm, and I could almost say the sweetness, of music; "the thoughts of other days" are associated with the shrill reverberations, and they speak as truly of home, as the welcome and greeting of the friends to whom I am hastening. Coeval with this satisfaction of return, springs up the proud consciousness of having been "abroad." I defy any one to describe the exquisite complacency with which the traveler first hears the sound of his footsteps on his native pavements, and swells with the overpowering thought, now, at least, I am a thing to be stared at: I have been to Europe; I have seen a whale; I speak French. Then comes the thought of sundry "great ones," who were wont to look down upon me. Thank fortune, a man who has traveled is not so easily looked down. The haughty nod, the cloudy good-morning, are most charmingly modified by the "mellowing hand of time;" and he who once condescended a mere cold smile of recognition, will now dislocate an elbow when I meet him, and want to know all about Paris; nay, she who once endured a morning call, will now be happy of my company at any time, drown me in young hyson and gunpowder, and "wish that heaven" had made her such a man.

One advantage of long absence is the nice demonstration the return affords of the regard and disregard of friends. The "friend indeed" will meet you with open arms; that is to say, both hands, (hands with hearts in them); and the bright glow of pleasure that sparkles from the eyes, and irradiates the countenance, is not to be imitated by hypocrisy, nor mistaken for a lukewarm emotion. From this superlative degree down to the "cut direct" the grades of declension are manifest to the casual observer; and if he will be at the pains to remember his men, he can know precisely how to estimate every individual of his acquaintance. In the course of this investigation he will find a score of Mr. Such-a-ones, totally unconscious of the event of his absence; and it is quite distressing to burst upon a man with the full cry of "glad to see you," who stares with the honest stupidity of an ass at your extraordinary energy in exchanging the civilities of the day. Such fellows are a great bore, and it is well to be on the look-out for them. A discreet man will neither evince nor feel much chagrin at these occasional cool receptions; but he must entertain a gentlemanly disgust at such supercilious or senseless reserve; while he is justly astonished that the fact of his dwelling twelve months (more or less) in a foreign land is among the somethings which his quondam friends have not yet discovered.

I have often joined the hue and cry against our worthy corporation on the score of "dirty streets;" and many a time have wished the power to inhumane an alderman, boots and spurs, in a mountain of mud; but I now beg pardon of the whole board for my precipitancy. After wading for a season through the sinuosities of Paris, it would be mere affectation to complain of those of New-York; they are as clean as an "arcade," and fragrant as a "bazaar." This, to be sure, is comparative. There are, at times, undue portions of mud in the middle of the streets—but that it is not the place for ladies and gentlemen: horses and asses are the only sufferers, and why should human nature fight their battle? If any cavalier tells me looks are a desideratum, I can tell him the luxury of our side-walks, balanced against any appearances, is neither more nor less than "Hyperion to a satyr;" and I can further tell him, that if he ever comes under the happy necessity of paying quatre sous four times a-day for clean boots in Paris, or happens to be run down by a cabriolet, because foot passengers have no exclusive privilege in the highways of that metropolis, he will look upon looks as very little to the purpose; and, in passing, declare it a most essential abomination that the lords of the creation, in any part of the world, are compelled to walk on the same stones with cattle, and take a somewhat desperate chance of broken bones into the bargain.

The mere comforts of side-walks, however, and the comparative cleanliness of our streets, are not sufficiently momentous to call forth a long dissertation. But the fair embellishment of those walks in the placid loveliness of a spring morning, deserves a volume of "immortal verse." Under ordinary circumstances there is enough of witchery in the fashion and elegance of Broadway to turn a commonplace brain; but oh! after tedious months of absence—months passed in a clime producing no female loveliness but such as glows on her canvas, or breathes in her marble—who can tell the revivifying and enchanting power of those sunny smiles, heightened and beautified tenfold beyond their original sweetness by the magic force of contrast and transition? It is a holiday, a very feast to the imagination, to be thus restored to the scene of past days, and find it not only unfaded but improved; and I can truly say, that all the fascinating splendors of the French capital and its environs did not inspire me with such a thrill of pleasure as my last stroll in this noble promenade—a street unequalled, as I believe, by any street of any other city on the globe. Such a stroll is not so much to tell of as a visit to the magnificent, the indescribable Versailles; but, for a man who loves his home as I do, it is, after all, more to enjoy.

It is extremely gratifying to me to find my own countrywomen so superior in point of personal appearance, as well as of intellect, to the boasted beauties of France; and, did I feel myself quite competent to the pleasurable task of pronouncing their eulogium, I would take this opportunity of blazoning it to the four winds. But I have seen too many luckless wights concentrate their whole genius on some favorite topic, and yet mistake the ridiculous for the sublime in the essay. I will avoid the catastrophe by avoiding the experiment.

Unhappily, there is an end to perfection here below. Pretty, intelligent, and almost altogether charming as our ladies are, they will wear "fashionable bonnets." Concerning this fashion as a fashion, I beg to remark it is a creature of their own production; it never originated in a foreign land; and how much soever they may flatter themselves with the hope of imitating a people, who, with all their faults, have exquisite tastes in dress, they may be assured a French lady would no more deform herself with such a shapeless monstrosity, than "exchange her humanity with a baboon." The extreme of the Paris fashion is the extreme of neatness—no Dunstable can be more so—and if our fair ladies could be induced to believe, could be brought to realize how much more becoming it is, they would evince, in that particular, a good judgment, of which, in late days, no gentleman ever accused them.

I have met no old acquaintance with more pleasure than our noble city-hall. This fine edifice has frequently "felt the lash" of criticism, yet there it stands as proudly as ever. A thousand soi-disant connoisseurs have enlightened the world with the detail of its barbarisms; but, until they agree in their opinions, I shall venture to believe that among the splendid piles of France, although there are many of greater extent, not one of equal beauty is to be found in that very nursery and school of architecture—of course, I refer to the exterior. The palace and gallery of the Louvre are the finest of the old specimens, the Bourse of the new; but, in my humble judgment, our city-hall, in intrinsic elegance, is as superior to either as St. Paul's church to St. George's. In fact, in regard to this and various other subjects, it may be said in few words—for I am exceeding my proposed limit—the presumption, so very prevalent, that European productions are, as a matter of course, superior to our own, is totally false. America enjoys, far more than any other nation, the blessings of liberty, plenty, and peace. The social virtues, with their whole train of domestic comforts and enjoyments are, comparatively, no where else to be found. I would advise any one to visit Europe, and assure him of a rich treat to curiosity, imagination, and taste; but, in the midst of all, he will draw comparisons favorable to his own land; his journey will supply a subject of contemplation and converse in after days, and he will, doubtless, find great pleasure in relating his adventures, around the winter's fireside; but, in despite of all, he will pronounce the day of his return home the happiest day of his life. CASSIO.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE P. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, APRIL 14, 1832.

Editor's study.—In looking back through the files of our paper, we find this department has been devoted generally to such subjects as might, with propriety, become the theme of conversation in an ordinary family circle. This may be adduced by some as a cause of complaint. We, however, never intended any thing else, as we are excluded from more important matters from the fact that they are treated upon under other heads. Books, theatres, painting, sculpture, music have their separate places, and so with new intelligence of almost every kind. Our sphere here, then, is consequently very confined, and we fear the appetite of lovers of the marvelous, and readers who require the excitement of interesting narratives, will turn dissatisfied from the simple and homely meal which we prepare for them. But we have thought that even the commonplace occurrences of society—the trivial follies—the every-day vices or virtues, or peculiarities passing immediately around us, might occasionally furnish a sketch not wholly without its use. Indeed, there appears to us a large list of local questions to be discussed, or tastes to be reformed, or opinions to be expressed, which could not very properly be wrought into a tale, or disclosed in a poem, yet which, if altogether beneath the notice of a writer; and, we have judged through so many a circuitous story manufactured for the purpose of illustrating a moral which we and every body knew before, that we have grown rather callous to the appeals of authors, and are apt to wish that if a man has anything to say, he would say it at once. Perhaps we are, more than others, steeled against the literary artifices with which our brethren sometimes seek to wind themselves into our hearts, in order to give us good advice, from the fact that it is our trade to read and to analyze them. Habit effectually blunts the edge of the finest feelings, and experience proves much to be false and hollow which at first seemed real. There is a vast deal of quackery in the business of authorship; and the superfluous sentences written in the best of novels merely to fill up—what a fine volume they would form published separately! Mr. Bulwer has a great deal of it even in the last and best of his compositions. Eugene Aram should be half cut out. There is a chapter about a cat which occupies an undue space, unless, as we began to suspect, he was a nobleman in disguise. We think an idea expressed in clear, sententious language, must be, to intelligent people, in most cases, more acceptable than a story written to prove it. We do not require all the thoughts of a man, but the results of his thoughts. It is this combination of simplicity and solidity which makes the essays of Addison, Steele and their associates so charming. They relate a fine incident in the briefest and plainest way to illustrate or add force to a train of observations; and you see they are more careful to give the reader real and forcible ideas, than to show what fine authors they are. Their strong, sensible minds were not afraid to select even the most slight foibles of the day as themes of satire, nor the most humble virtues as objects of description and eulogy. They sought no meretricious lustre from fine scenes and romantic feelings, but went boldly and firmly along the road of common life, painting what they saw. It is not that we dare cope with these learned and accomplished essayists that their names have been hinted at here, but simply that we have them for authorities in selecting our subjects, and that we wish they were more read by the young of the present day. A study of their pages would chasten the taste and sharpen and elevate the understanding, and half the authors of this time would either give up the ghost, or adapt their efforts to a higher and a purer standard. Indeed, we think the public will soon be surfeited with the gaudy and superficial banquets spread for them, sometimes by literary men worthy of nobler undertakings. This must be the work of time, assisted by criticism, not blind and angry, but rational and uniform.

Among the follies of the present day which a correspondent thinks call for notice, is one peculiar to our fair readers. We allude to the style of dress prevailing throughout the circles of fashion and beauty. There is room for a fine taste in this particular. Nothing can be more pleasant to observe than the quality of a chaste mind, visible in a lady's apparel. We do not exactly speak of economy, (although fathers and husbands might bear us out in a little disquisition even upon such an impertinent subject,) for elegance and even costliness may be indulged, without infringing upon that simplicity which in woman is so graceful and modest. If we could but impress it upon our fair and lovely readers how much this same simplicity enhances both beauty and virtue, we should not deem these lines vainly written. We admit the letter of Mr. Akerley, in the sentiments of which we fully concur, as a substitute for further remarks of our own.

"MESSRS. EDITORS—I am a gentleman of independent fortune, who have been long on the look out for a wife. Women, therefore, old and young, have been the objects of my particular study, and I flatter myself that I have made many observations upon them, too true to be lost to the world. I have acquired the faculty of reading a character upon a slight acquaintance, and from circumstances which might escape the notice of other men. I shall not trouble you with all the results of my experience, but simply confine myself at present to one subject, which, the more I have considered it, has the more grown upon me in importance. I wish you would, therefore, favor me with a corner in your journal, that I may inform my fair friends that in all the countries through which I have traveled—and I have been something of a wanderer in my day—I never knew ladies whose dress in the street was more conspicuous than that of my countrywomen. It is observed by foreigners as well as myself, and will, I trust, be amended by those among the reigning beauties whose example gives a tone to the fashions of society. I assure you, gentlemen, it is a marked difference between the American and English ladies. Those among the latter of the highest rank study a greater simplicity and reserve in public. No lady should seek to attract attention in the street. Instead of courting the broad gaze of the common crowd, how much more becoming it would be to avoid it. I have sincerely grieved to behold a beautiful girl flashing and rustling with silks and jewelry and feathers and flowers, passing by the steps of a public hotel, where gentlemen from all parts of the world were congregated at the windows and on the steps, to feast their eyes on charms which blushed not under their glances. I notice that even little girls are sometimes loaded with finery, and sent forth as if on purpose to dazzle the multitude, and to fill their own innocent minds with affectation and vanity. Pray, gentlemen, awaken the attention of mothers, husbands, and fathers to this, and remind them how much more fascinating female loveliness appears, when retiring, like a half-opened bud, from the eye of the stranger, than when thus obtruded boldly before every gaze. I have not found a wife yet, being afraid that ladies who dress so splendidly in the street will never be contented companions at home. Your obedient servant, EDMUND AKERLEY."

MESSRS. EDITORS—As happiness often depends on trifles, don't think me impertinent in warning your female readers against being deluded by the appearance of the weather to leave their plants out all night. There have been thousands of dollars worth destroyed in this way by the caprices of this slowly-moving Spring, who seems to be quite successfully imitating the blustering and freezing manners of Winter. I have always found pleasure in cherishing a few sprigs of geranium, &c. They are beautiful ornaments to a house, agreeable companions, and answer as relics of the country and the summer to amuse me frequently with pleasant recollections. A treacherous sunset and mild evening caused me to expose them in the garden till the sound of the snow and sleet beating against the windows the next morning gave me too late notice of their danger. Hoping to cause a greater attention in others, I send you this, as I perceive in some of the truly elegant houses in Broadway numerous embellishments of this kind. In one window, particularly, in the upper part of that street, there has been a large and superb flower blooming amidst leaves of a lively and grateful verdure through all the bleakness and tempests of the winter. Pray excuse the trouble I give you, as it is solely for the preservation of these tasteful decorations. Very respectfully, your obedient servant, LAWRIE TODD.

GENTLEMEN—As a portion of your miscellany is devoted to arts and sciences, please inform me why looking up at the light sky or sun makes one sneeze? When I am shaved my barber sets me opposite a large square window. The light comes glaring in upon my eyes, causing me to agitate myself with these little tremendous convulsions, to which Milton (I believe) likens an earthquake. John came near cutting off my nose the other day, I gave such a sudden twist just as his razor was smoothing my upper lip. Could not some of the quarterly reviews take up this subject, as I am told they have resolved, in secret conclave, not to criticize any more poetry? While on the subject of sneezing and (the mention of the reviews reminds me to add) gaping, let me beg you to say something excessively severe against a class of fellows who, just as you are in the acmé of that equivocal agony preceding a sneeze, or abandoned almost irrevocably to the luxury of a gape, shout forth boo, or slap your shoulders, or place their hand across your mouth, and then burst forth into a horse-laugh at the sight of your distress and disappointment. Beshrew such pert knaves and witlings! I never forgive a man who interrupts me in a yawn, although there be those who will exclaim, "Thank you, sir," or after a sneeze, "Heaven bless you, sir," and similar trifling allusions to you, which make you conspicuous to the company, and turn the laugh against you without any real fault on your part. Pray satirize these fellows, Messrs. Editors, and oblige your obedient servant and constant reader, SAM SLEEPY.

DEAR SIRS—You will pardon the illegibility of this manuscript when I assure you that although I am a bachelor, well off in pecuniary matters, I am at this moment shivering with cold for want of fuel wherewith to make a fire. I occupy a room which contains a grate that will not burn wood, and although I have ordered coal a week ago, and paid for it too, enormously, yet the merchant tells me I cannot be supplied yet. They say there is coal enough within a hundred or two miles of this city to supply the whole world for centuries, yet here we are, the poor, trembling inhabitants, suffering for want of a bushel, or compelled to pay for it a price so exorbitant as to occasion general astonishment. Does not this state of things argue a wonderful degree of sagacity in our population? Some say the coal-merchants have been speculating, others that the canals are frozen so as to prevent the transportation, and others that too much coal was laid in last winter by the merchants, who lost the interest of their money for several months. I do not pretend to judge, only I think it a strange matter that a whole city should sit by cold hearths or comply with extortionary demands, to keep a few individuals from "losing the interest of their money." Yours, &c. ZERO.

GENTLEMEN—I wish somebody would ascertain the names of the corporation members whose business it is to see the streets cleaned, or tell us whether the odium of the shameful neglect on this point rests on the street-inspector. Is it an established impossibility to have our streets as carefully cleaned as those of Philadelphia and Boston? or how long must we walk in mud and dust before some effectual plan is accomplished on the subject? By the way, what has become of the talk about water? X.

MR. MIRROR—The whole city was, a year or two ago, flung into quite an excitement respecting a magnificent illuminated clock to be erected in the city-hall cupola. Several flaming descriptions appeared, instigating the public mind to glorious anticipations of the augmenting grandeur of our great and growing country, when lo! the matter turns out to be no more than an ordinary clock, and at night the gaping stranger from the country, who, peradventure, came to "York" on purpose to see so great a phenomenon, finds himself grievously disappointed. This reminds one of the story in Knickerbocker, of a fat and enterprising Dutchman, who took a start and ran three miles to jump over a hill, but on coming to it, being very tired, sat down to rest himself, and then walked round it. Your obedient servant, TEMPUS.

MESSRS. EDITORS—I am a married man, and that I am "tis true 'tis pity, and pity 'tis 'tis true." Please to let my wife Dorothea know thus publicly what I have too tender a heart to tell her myself at present, that from this time henceforward I shall do my best to extinguish every spark of affection, towards her, remaining in my bosom. Conceive what a tedious thing it is (to say nothing of wounded feelings) to be united to one who lets you see every moment of the twenty-four which you spend in her society, that she is totally cool and indifferent towards you. Even so is my once-loved Dorothea. To prevent her doing any thing, it is sufficient for me to request her to do it. She has no desire to accompany me in my visits abroad, and discovers no gratification when I stay with her at home. She never allows that I do any thing well. She continually accuses me of blunders and stupidity, and, if you will take her word, I cannot close a blind, or poke the fire as it should be done. She never quarrels with me, but uniformly expresses herself towards me in short contemptuous exclamations or cool silence, by which I am at length convinced that she loves me not. Let her be informed by this, that we shall hereafter be equal. Love can only be kept alive by a reciprocation of sentiment. By itself it dies away, like an unrequited fire, and once extinguished, can seldom be revived. Yours, R.

Here is another, of so opposite a character to the above, that we look upon them as quite a singular coincidence:

GENTLEMEN—The complaint I am about to make is, I know, of a very odd nature. Some of your readers may take a hint from it; therefore I trust you will not refuse it admission. It relates to my wife Susan, in whom I can only discover one blemish; yet that one is of such serious importance, as often to give us many unhappy moments. Perhaps you will smile when I assure you, that what I have to charge her with is loving me too much. She doats upon me with an unreasonable strength and ardor of affection. She is never satisfied when I am out of her sight. She must perpetually monopolize all my words, looks, and actions. My absence, no matter how necessary to my business, she regards as a heavy calamity, the annunciation of which never fails to overcloud her face with shadows, and sometimes to fill her eyes with tears. When I am going to spend the evening out, under circumstances which must prevent her being my companion, I am compelled to use as much tender artifice in breaking to her such a dreadful event, as if I had to tell her of the loss of my fortune, or the death of some dear friend. At dinner I have to stop eating, to give her a kiss; and if I accidentally sit with my back towards her a minute, she pouts, says my affection is cooling, and wishes for the times that are past! She turns pale when I receive a letter directed in a small hand; and almost fainted yesterday morning on finding in my drawer a piece of blue riband, which she thought I cherished for the sake of some other object of affection. Pray, Mr. Editors, what is to be done in such a dilemma? If you cannot tell, please print this, that newly-married wives may be more careful. Your obedient servant, R. D.

One of the most important and best founded complaints alleged by foreigners of discrimination against us Americans, is that we eat with our knives. We regret to confess that their anathemas on this point of domestic economy are but too well deserved; but we must ascribe it to the fact that we have only two, or at most, three pronged forks, with which persons too fastidious on nice points of etiquette must be excluded from many delicacies. A communication on this weighty matter will be found below. We sincerely commiserate the dilemma of the writer, and tell him for his consolation, that the efficacious fork with six prongs is gradually creeping into use, so that he may soon eat whatever is set before him without violating any rule of good breeding.

MESSRS. EDITORS—I have been rather a traveler, and take it upon myself to say that my opinions on fashionable subjects are not to be disputed. Since I arrived in this city from town—from London, I mean—I have been exceedingly annoyed by the obtrusion before me, every day at table, by the waiter, of an instrument of an odd construction as a companion to the knife. On inquiring what it was, he was pleased to call it a fork. I found it quite impossible to make my meal with it as I could wish, and to use the knife for any other purpose than cutting, is quite out of the question. I was yesterday occupied till my arm ached in ineffectual efforts to convey a few beans on this instrument to my mouth, and obliged at last to give up in despair. An account which you printed lately of an attempt to poison General Washington mentions that he took up some peas on his knife. This proceeding must have greatly injured his reputation in the eyes of all genteel persons. Pray, beg your fellow-citizens in their future purchases to have an eye upon my remarks. Yours, DON WHISKERANDOS.

The following, although without signature, is evidently from a schoolmaster.

MESSRS. EDITORS—I have sometimes known you gentlemen complain of the drudgery to which you are exposed, and assure people very gravely that you have more to test your patience than others. I have no doubt your profession, as well as that of all other men, is subject to various disadvantages, but these are apt on certain occasions to be overrated. Permit me to beg that you will read with attention the annexed affecting display of the evils attendant on the avocations of another class of society. It is copied from one of the British papers:

Schoolmaster—Noah had three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth, who was the father of Shem, Ham, and Japheth? (Boys silent.) You cannot tell. Well, now let's try again. You know Mr. Sparkes who lives over the way? Boys—Oh, yes, sir, yes, sir. Schoolmaster—Silence there. Now then, Mr. Sparkes has three sons, Tom, Jack, and Harry—who was the father of Tom, Jack, and Harry? Boys—Mr. Sparkes. Schoolmaster—That's right! very good boys indeed! Now then—Noah had three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth—who was the father of Shem, Ham, and Japheth? Boys—Mr. Sparkes.

GENTLEMEN—Will you please ask the common council when the Hall of Record is to be completed. Sub rosa, Messrs. Editors, don't you think these gentlemen wonderful fellows for business? Yours in haste, RAPID.

Allegretto grazioso.

I've seen and kiss'd that crim-son lip, With ho-nied smiles o'er-flow-ing; Enchant-ed watch'd the op'-ning rose, Up-on thy soft cheek glow-ing: Nor e-ver deem'd thy beau-ty's spell A pu-rer charm could bor-row; But, oh! I had not then be-held Thy part-ing look of sor-row, But, oh! I had not then be-held thy part-ing look, thy part-ing look, thy part-ing look of sor-row

SECOND VERSE.

Although in nature's garland gay,
A thousand hues betwining,
Can one surpass the snow-white flow'r,
Through dew-drops meekly shining:
Dear maid, thine eye may prove less blue,
Thy beauty fade to-morrow;
But, oh! my heart can ne'er forget
Thy parting look of sorrow,
But, oh! my heart can ne'er forget
Thy parting look, thy parting look,
Thy parting look of sorrow.

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

HUMILITY AND PERSEVERANCE.

A FABLE.

FROM the side of a mountain there flowed forth a little rivulet. Its voice was scarcely heard amid the rustling of the leaves and grass around, and its shallow and narrow stream might be overlooked by the traveler. This brook, although so small, was inspired with a proud spirit, and murmured against the decree of Providence, which had cast its lot so lowly.

"I wish I were a cloud, to roll all day through the heavens, painted so beautifully, as those lovely shapes are colored, and never descending again in showers; or, at least, I wish I were a broad river, performing some useful duty in the world. Shame on my weak waves and unregarded bubbling. I might as well have never been, as to be thus puny, insignificant, and useless."

When the brook had thus complained, a beautiful tall flower, that bent over its bosom, replied,

"Thou art in error, brook. Puny and insignificant thou mayest be; useless thou art not, for I owe half my beauty, perhaps my life, to thy refreshing waters. The plants adjacent to thee are greener and richer than the others. The Creator has given thee a duty, which, though humble, thou must not neglect. Besides, who knows what may be thy future destiny? Flow on, I beseech thee."

The brook heard the rebuke, and danced along its way more cheerfully. On and on it went, growing broader and broader. By and by other rivulets poured their crystal waters into it, and swelled its deepening bosom, in which already began to appear the fairy creatures of the wave, darting about joyfully, and glistening in the sun. As its channel grew wider and wider, and yet other branches came gliding into it, the stream began to assume the importance of a river, and boats were lanch'd on it, and it rolled on in a meandering course through a teeming country, freshening whatever it touched, and giving the whole scene a new character of beauty.

As it moved on now in majesty and pride, the sound of its gently-heaving billows formed itself into the following words:

"At the outset of life, however humble we may seem, fate may have in store for us great and unexpected opportunities of doing good and of being great. In the hope of these we should ever pass on without despair or doubt, trusting that perseverance will bring in its own reward. How little I dreamed when I first sprang on my course what purposes I was destined to fulfil! What happy beings were to owe their bliss to me! What lofty trees, what velvet meadows, what golden harvests were to hail my career! Let not the meek and lowly despair: heaven will supply them with noble inducements to virtue."

ORIGINAL POETRY.

BYRON IN THE CERTOSA CEMETERY.

BY MRS. EMERY.

"I found such a pretty epitaph, or rather two; one was—'Martini'—Implora pace! The other—'Lucretia Piccini. Implora eterna quiete! That was all; but it appears to me that these two or three words comprise and compress all that can be said on the subject. They contain doubt, hope, and humility. Let me have the 'implora pace!' and nothing else, for my epitaph."—Letter of Byron to Mr. Hopper in 1819.

"Implora pace!"—'tis the cry
Of some meek child of want and care,
Whose life has been a long, long sigh,
A weary struggle with despair.
"Implora pace!"—'tis the prayer
Low breathed from forth a contrite heart,
When turning from the things that are,
Through death's dark shadows to depart.

"Implora pace!"—hark the groan,
Burst from the quivering lip of one
Who proudly stands on earth alone,
Mid many stars the only sun.
He bends above the lowly tomb,
Dark thoughts have dimmed his flashing eye;
His brow wears sorrow's heaviest gloom,
While burst this agonizing cry:

"Implora pace!"—I have quaffed
From pleasure's wine-cup maddening high,
But never in the maddening draught
Was found the peace for which I sigh.
In love, earth's best deceit, I sought
The rest for which my bosom pined;
With bliss, deep bliss, the dream was fraught,
Its madness still remains behind."

"Implora pace!"—I have run,
With speed unslackened, glory's race;
In the world's wondering sight have won
Its bays my boyish brow to grace;
My name is heard from every tongue,
My words on every heart impressed;
Ye fame brings not my spirit rest.

"Implora pace!"—I have tried
All that earth knows of joy and pain,
Its bliss, its woe, its hopes, its pride,
All, all alike are worse than vain.
Withered and old in heart I stand
Upon the brink of death's dark wave;
And hope, ay hope, no better land
Awaits the soul beyond the wave.

"Implora pace!"—all I seek
Is rest—my soul's eternal rest—
Thou mouldering clay beneath me, speak!
Say, will death satisfy my quest?
Thou canst not tell—I dare not think;
Childlike at phantom forms I quake,
Yet fain of death's dark stream would drink,
My feverish spirit's thirst to slake.

ORIGINAL MORAL TALES.

THE SICK STUDENT.

FROM A DIARY.

"Look at me. Why, the winds sigh through my bones, and children jeer me; and the boughs that wave and whisper loosely in the summer air, shake their green leaves in mockery, as to say 'These are the longer livers.'"—PROCTOR.

MONDAY, JUNE.—Every day forces upon me a stronger conviction that my existence is almost at an end. I am thin and pale and weak, and my nerves are in a frightful state. The slightest agitation makes me tremble. My mind is also harassed. Certain circumstances haunt me like demons. I am continually oppressed with a dark sense of danger and hopelessness. I cannot depict the prostrating power of this thought, when it has become perpetual. When I am alone at night it affects me the most. I often wish my task was done.

WEDNESDAY.—I overheard a conversation last night, which affected me strongly. I had been in the early part of the evening complaining of the tooth-ache, and had received a visit from a physician. When he took his leave I followed him down stairs, without being observed, to ask him a question, when this brief colloquy arrested me on the steps:

"Well, doctor," said my friend, "can you do any thing for his teeth?"

"Nothing," was the reply.

"They are decaying very rapidly. They will not last long." There was a moment's pause. Then the cold voice again. "They'll last long enough for his use. They're poor, white, sickly things, and have the true consumptive look."

"Do you think him so ill?"

"I think he may last the summer, but the first cold will sweep him off."

"And traveling, doctor, would not that have some effect?"

"Well, I don't know; perhaps yes. A summer voyage, and a winter or two in the south of France, might assist him in lingering out; but it would be only a reprieve. He must die soon."

Then the street-door opened.

"Ah! it's a fine mild evening."

"You'll have a pleasant walk, doctor?"

"Very. Good night."

"Good night."

The door was closed. I stole back to my room, breathless, not with terror, but with the intense nature of the feelings and thoughts which were concentrated and crowded together in that moment. "He must die." The words rang in my ears. I looked down at my long white fingers. I listened to the beating of my heart, and thought how certainly they must soon be mouldered and still. Strange as it may seem, a feeling of delight and exhilaration crept over me. A spirit of calm defiance against all the miseries which had weighed me down in the dust. Life to me had been no friend, death was no enemy. I stood upon the awful edge of a sublime precipice, from which I was not to be hurled with violence and horror, but I was about to glide off like an eagle, floating on expanded wings, leaving anguish and despair behind. I went to the window. The stars were shining, and the serene blue sky was but delicately stained with a few transparent clouds, which floated like fairy barks on the azure tide. I had been fascinated with the study of astronomy, and there was not a planet, and scarcely a star, which was not familiar to me, and enriched in my gaze with some pure and happy association. At certain periods of my life I had consulted them with that kind of capricious and feigned superstition in which sanguine and solitary young people sometimes indulge. Some, too, were hallowed by their connection with particular events, which I had watched with persons dear to me, which had been the themes of my contemplation in times of health and hope. There they were, all bright in their immortal beauty, and all these I was to leave, to leave them with all their lucid glory—forever. Others would gaze on them when the grass should be growing over my cold, dead bosom. The universal hush and mellow lustre of night would come down again on the breathing earth; the rich flowers would burst again from their verdant mass of leaves; and the lulling murmur of waters would charm the lonely wood. Everything I admired, everything I loved—I must be torn from all—then I was overcome, and I wept.

A new feeling grew up in me, opening to my mind like the dawning of morn. A new existence—endless, careless! There is nothing so stupendous as the thought of a hereafter. The tears ceased coursing each other down my cheeks. I was lost, bewildered in wonder. Its exciting nature took from me the power of further reflection, and I slept. The last idea in my mind was that I had the consumption—and even when my heavy eyelids closed and slumber sealed them, the same dark consciousness went into my wild vague dreams. I wandered through pathless wilds with an arrow in my side; often striving to extract it, but in vain. Then I came to a fair city. The crowd were everywhere seeking pleasure in the gayest trifles. How cold and strange it all seemed to me. Now I was in the theatre. Now in the dance. Then in the sunny promenade, listening to laughter and music—but always the arrow was in my side, and I had no voice to crave assistance, or make known my awful situation. Then a lovely child, one dear to me in my waking moments, came to me and kissed me, and offered to relieve my suffering by drawing out the fatal dart, but a monstrous, gigantic serpent seized her even from my side, and enveloped her tender form in his loathsome green folds. I cannot go on, although it was but a dream, nor dwell on the sight from which I fled—and wherever I fled, the dragon pursuing me, and my convulsive, yet fruitless exertions to fasten doors after me, which would open and leave me exposed. I awoke, and wiped the cold drops from my forehead.

SATURDAY.—I have been reading to day. How calm I am! Can it result from philosophy? I could spend an existence in reading. My impressions are almost as vivid as reality. To sit in a still room with the summer morning air breathing in upon my forehead gently—what can life afford better? All human passions can be called up in me by a book. By it I am metamorphosed into a different being. But this moment I really deemed myself a healthy, vigorous man. I had become the character I was perusing, when the sight of my skeleton hand shocked me, and recalled my wandering imagination. I no longer feel pleasure in the prospect of death. At first it was a novelty—but I have become too familiar with it. I shrink and tremble. Even now a cold shuddering ran over my frame. I would give the world for health. Compared with it, what is fame? What is money? What the possession of beauty or power? I start when I reflect sometimes that to gain each of these, men have flung it away. Grant me but health, fortune, I ask no more. No matter in what lowly station my lot may be cast. No matter how blighted my fame—how poor—how insignificant. All are unworthy a thought to him who can stride free and strong over the green fields, and simply breathe the air of heaven. Free me from disease, and wreck me on a deserted island. I would live on fruits and lie all day in the sun—I would herd with the beasts and be happy in the joy of physical strength—I would be a dunce—an idiot—anything but the dying wretch I am. The thought is too dreadful for endurance.

MONDAY.—The doctor said I might be cured by a voyage. I have been striving to raise the means necessary to go to France. It is impossible. Because I am poor I must die. Some around me waste thousands on the most worthless pleasures. Oh, mysterious world!

TUESDAY.—I learned to-day that but for this disease I might have obtained a most lucrative situation with—

TUESDAY.—It is two weeks since I wrote last in this book. I have been confined to my bed, but am better—much better. My pains are mostly gone, and my spirits much raised. Oh, if I should recover, after all!

THURSDAY.—I am in fine glee to-day. My health is rapidly improving. What a stupid fellow is that doctor who said I must die. To be sure I must die—so must we all—but I hope for many a bright year yet. I took a little walk this morning. How strangely beautiful every thing looks out doors. I never was so happy. The sun warmed my chilled blood. I only want a little care and exercise to be a well man.

FRIDAY.—Still on the recovery. Indeed, I am getting quite hearty again. How kind every body in the house is to me. I am continually receiving little relishes and flowers as presents. How delightful! I certainly regret to leave these excellent people, but I am resolved to spend the next winter at the south.

I called in the dentist to-day. What a curious fellow he is. Why did he refuse to file my teeth?

MONDAY.—Every pain is passing away. I rambled yesterday through a little garden and wood at the seat of my friend, whither he had conveyed me in a carriage. It was delightful to feel the perceptible return of vigor and health. I inhaled the breath of the flowers. I reposed beneath the shady trees. I sat by the murmuring stream, and looked down into its transparent depths. How beautiful—how wonderfully and exquisitely beautiful—how beautiful all nature is, could men but spare time from the common interests and low passions of life to regard it as it deserves. When any one can so far overcome these influences as to give up his soul to the contemplation of nature, he becomes a poet, a painter, an orator—something great, pure, glowing, and elevated—something full of living fire and glory—and why may not I be one? I will—I will. Temperance shall, hereafter, be my aim to insure my health. I will brace up these great and growing energies which I feel stirring within me. I will no more despond, but cope with those who have gone before me in a track of brightness, and whose works have made them immortal. What would Burns have been if, instead of being abandoned to the drifting currents of adversity, like a wrecked ship tossed on the bleak sea, he had been in early youth placed in a counting-house, where mere business had occupied all his time? He would have been lost to the world; and so thousands must be because they do not strive—they do not seek to labor up the dazzling steep, but are content to repose in inglorious indolence at the base. I will breathe out the fire that is in me. My future years shall be—

Here the student dropped his journal, being seized with a cough, which left him a corse.

It is an awful, and yet a consoling symptom of the dreadful disease of which he fell the victim, that exactly in proportion as the sufferer approaches the crisis, he deems himself retreating from the fatal brink. I watched the gleaming up of his spirit, and listened to his confident plans for the future with the most peculiarly melancholy emotions. Often I nearly resolved to reveal to him the certainty of his almost immediate dissolution. But it seemed like a ruthless sacrilege to break with a word the deceitful but soothing spell which now kept him constantly peaceful and happy. Besides, since nature had given it to him, why should I take it away? If death, the loathed monster, approached with his hideous features covered, why should I tear off the veil and disclose the sight of horror?

For a long time his face had assumed an expression of unusual intellectuality. The brightness of his eyes reminded me of the fine description by Proctor:

"Look in my eye, and mark how true the tale
I've told you. On its glassy surface lies Death, my Sylvestra. It is nature's last
And beautiful effort to bequeath a fire
To that bright ball on which the spirit sate
Through life; and looked out, in its various moods,
Of gentleness and joy, and love and hope,
And gained this frail flesh credit in the world.
It is the channel of the soul; its glance
Draws and reveals that subtle power that doth
Redeem us from our gross mortality."

I followed my poor friend to the grave, one soft summer afternoon, with a heavy heart, and have since perused this little picture of his latest visions with a sad pleasure. If, as the reader follows them to their last dreary termination, he is induced to examine his own calculations for the future, my melancholy task will not have been accomplished in vain.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

BRIEF NOTICES OF DISTINGUISHED WRITERS.

JONSON AND SHAKESPEARE.

THERE is no mental recreation so agreeable to me, as that arising from indulging in those reveries of abstraction, to which all minds are more or less subject. I love that state of mind when our reflection passes without effort, without even volition, from one object to another, presenting

A generation of still breeding thoughts, and offering in each some food for cogitation. This is a true relaxation of the mental faculties. If the mind be free from all subjects, it suffers ennui; if it be strongly bent towards any study, it becomes wearied; but when released from all engrossing points, and "like a chartered libertine," free to roam where it pleases, then it recruits its faculties by enjoyment, and re-animates its spirit wearied by its wonted pursuits. Like the knights of old, I abandon the vessel to the stream, and float through gorgeous scenes and lovely places, careless whither I am hurried, until at last the enchantment becomes broken, and I awaken to the every-day occupations of life. It is pleasing

"to float
Like Pyrrho, in a sea of speculation," and to observe the fleecy doubts of the imagination clouding the pure empyrean of reason, and then again to behold them dissipated and driven far away. It is when the mind reposes in this luxurious state of feeling that it can most strongly realize the beauty of the splendid lines of "rare old Ben."

"Wake, fantasy, from thy cave of cloud
And spread thy purple wings
Now all thy colors are allowed
And various forms of things
Create of airy thoughts a stream,
It must have blood, and nought of phlegm,
And let it like an odor rise,
To all the senses here;
And fall like sleep upon our eyes,
And music in our ear."

This splendid apostrophe having been suggested to my mind by the train of thought I was indulging in, it diverted it for a few moments to its comparatively forgotten author. His name awakens at once the idea of no common poet, and such indeed he was; but while every one esteems him such, his works languish in obscurity, except when some heart with fancy warm hunts up the old volumes to gloat upon their neglected charms, or when some lecturer or reviewer recurs to them in his historical sketches, and finding no contemporary Europeans of much celebrity, draws them from their dusty repositories, to "close the wall up with our English dead."

Some account for this comparative neglect by the supposition that the superior effulgence of Shakspeare engrosses such an amount of admiration, that none is left for the minor satellites, whose "ineffectual fire" pales in his beams. But it may be doubted whether Jonson would have been better known had Shakspeare never lived, and whether on the contrary the light of Shakspeare's reputation has not served to elucidate that of his contemporaries, by spreading such a radiant atmosphere around them, that we see clearly and distinctly objects which had else escaped observation. Jonson's, though a great was not an original genius. He was a finished scholar, and a polished wit; but it was the perfection of the finish and the brilliancy of the polish, and not the intrinsic superiority of his mind that attracted attention. If we compare the scenes of the authors we have mentioned, which to us are the most similar, namely, the separation or adieu between Romeo and Juliet, in Shakspeare, and Ovid and Julia, in Jonson, we shall at once perceive wherein the dissimilarity consists, and in what particulars the bard of Avon is super-eminent. The ardent expressions of the Capulet and Montague, their touching exclamations, their spirit-melting softness, seem to spring from hearts overflowing with grief and tenderness. But the aspiring poet and his noble mistress about to be forever banished from each other, dilate upon their affliction with such heartless ingenuity and such labored similes, that it appears rather a ceremonial strife than the mutual outbreathing of two lovesick souls bidding each other an eternal farewell. With the former it is an impulse, with the latter an endeavor. To avail ourselves of a strained metaphor, the words of Romeo and Juliet bubble up from their hearts like the free fountains of the wilderness, while those of the others seem drawn from some artificial reservoir, merely to supply the ordinary purposes of life. Jonson was all art, say the commentators, Shakspeare all nature. Truth lies concealed in the assertion, but the assertion itself is not altogether true. In some of his lyric pieces, Jonson comes as near the natural flow, the "cursosa felicitas" of Horace, as any poet in the range of our literature, while Shakspeare, in his sonnets, sinks as near to the low flats of mediocrity as a bard of any genius possibly could. Allowing then that Jonson was deficient in nature, but excelled in art, may we not yield something to the supposition that the drama was not his proper sphere, and that in adapting himself to the prevailing and overbearing taste of the age in which he lived, he sacrificed his fame to his popularity? Jonson's characters are individuals, Shakspeare's represent species. Sometimes we discover persons resembling the former, but can always find those akin to the latter, for while Jonson delineated peculiar traits, Shakspeare sketched the general characteristics. A person may be a poet in the full extent of the term: he may have an eye for the beauties of nature, a conception of sublimity and a happy mode of expression, but still be only fitted for some particular species of poetry; for lyric, the epic, or the dramatic. What, for instance, would Milton have made of Hamlet or Othello, or Shakspeare of Paradise Lost? Thus, we think Jonson much mistook his province when he entered upon the drama. The strength of his genius certainly prevents him from appearing contemptible, but its peculiar nature debars him from reaching excellence. No person can be an universal poet, and although Jonson's "Every Man in his Humor," "Epicene and Sejanus" are far above mediocrity, and the former redolent with wit, yet each one of them considered as a whole, is deficient. Probably not one in a hundred readers peruses them, and of a hundred readers of them I believe not more than the same proportion ever recurs to them a second time. Probably Voltaire was as universal an author as ever existed, yet who from its reputation was ever tempted to wade through his Henriade, or from their interest to re-peruse his tragedies?—Admiring Jonson as we do, we pity the perverseness or the weakness which led him into such an uncongenial path. Milton, following the minor amatory poets of the times of James and Charles I. would not fashion his genius to the model, but produced a poem, that stands, like a mighty tree, among the stunted productions around. Present penury and neglect might await him; but he was content to suffer every thing, knowing, in the words of Lord Camden, "that the price of his poem was immortality, and that posterity would pay it." But Jonson, yielding to a current that he could not master, borne away by a taste that he was not proficient in, shipwrecked his golden hopes forever, and now suffers that neglect that he incurred without justly meriting it. The world has a sharp and a true judgment, and never forgets that which is worthy of its retention. After a few generations, it corrects the errors into which false taste, or any other cause may have led it, rejects the spurious, and preserves the true genius; for of all the standard works in any language, there are none which are not sterling, and so of all which have passed into oblivion, I believe there are none that suffer an altogether unjust neglect.

LITERARY NOTICES.

CAREY AND LEA'S ENCYCLOPEDIA AMERICANA.

We transfer the annexed article into our columns from the ninth volume of the Encyclopædia Americana, partly from its intrinsic interest, and partly as a method of again attracting the attention of our readers to the work itself. The laborious efforts of Carey and Lea in preparing it for the American press, will, we trust, be amply requited. To the sterling merits of this publication we have no where heard a dissenting voice. There are in the following account one or two errors, but almost too trivial to detain the reader with an enumeration.

THE CITY OF NEW-YORK.

New-York, the largest and most populous city in the United States, lies in the state of that name, and is situated at the junction of the Hudson and East rivers, at the head of the bay of New-York, and about sixteen miles from the Atlantic ocean, in latitude 40° 42' N., 74° 1' 8" W. longitude, from Greenwich, England; and 2° 54' 23" E. from the city of Washington. It stands on an island formed by the two rivers just named, and a small river called Haerlem, which connects them. The length of this island is about fifteen miles, from south to north, and its average breadth about one mile and a half. It is separated, on the north, from the continent, by Haerlem river, which is crossed by several bridges; from New Jersey, on the west, by Hudson river; from Long Island, on the east, by the East river; and from Staten Island, on the south, by the bay or harbor. According to Van der Donck, who published a history of the New Netherlands, at Amsterdam, in 1656, Hudson river was the English name of the great river coming from the north; but the Dutch "called it Mauritius, after Prince Maurice, who then presided over the government of Holland." The Indian name of the island was Manhattan; the Dutch called the city Nieuw Amsterdam; and the English changed it to the name which it still retains. The same writer gives us the following description of the bay of New-York:—"The bay on which Staten Island is situated is the most celebrated, because the East and North rivers flow into it—rivers, a particular description of which will be presently given, together with a number of kills, gats, and creeks, some of which resemble small rivers, and are navigable, as Raritan kill, kill Van Kull, Nieuvesink, &c. This bay is also so formed as to render it safe from all boisterous winds, and a thousand ships of burthen may harbor in it within the land. The entrance into the bay is extensive, and is accompanied with but little danger to those who have once gone, or have been taught the passage. If persons are so inclined, and the wind fair, they may in one tide proceed from sea to the city of New Amsterdam, which lies five (Dutch) miles from the ocean, and that when deeply laden, with an easy sail, and by ships of the greatest burthen."—The following is the depth of water over the bar, as furnished by the pilot of the United States ship Boston, which passed it in June, 1830, with the wind from the westward:

Carried over the bar.....	26 ft. 6 in.
Tide had fallen.....	1 6—37 0.

The whole island of New-York constitutes one county, which is governed by the city charter, and divided into fifteen wards, each equally represented in the common council, and each electing its own municipal officers. Members of congress and assembly are elected by the whole people, and whoever has the highest number of votes is chosen, whether that number constitutes a majority of the whole or not. The common council sits, and the courts are held in the city-hall, a handsome marble building, finely situated in an extensive park. There is, perhaps, no place in the world where the municipal authority exercises such despotic sway over the property of the citizen, in opening, leveling, widening streets and other alterations and improvements. It is not an uncommon case for property to be assessed, for one or other of these purposes, for more than it is worth; and the only privilege accorded to the owner is that of abandoning it to the corporation, and paying the rest out of his own pocket. Under this system it cannot, however, be denied, that New-York has advanced in beauty and improvements almost beyond example. The population, in 1697, was four thousand three hundred and two; in 1756, thirteen thousand and forty; in 1790, thirty-three thousand and thirty-one; in 1800 sixty thousand four hundred and eighty-nine; in 1810, ninety-six thousand three hundred and seventy-three; in 1820, one hundred and twenty-three thousand seven hundred and six; in 1825, one hundred and sixty-six thousand and eighty-six; and, in 1830, two hundred and seven thousand and twenty-one. In 1769, in a holy contested election of four days, the number of votes taken was one thousand five hundred and fifteen; of the voters, nine hundred and seventeen were freeholders: in 1830, the number of votes for members of congress was upwards of twenty-one thousand; the proportion of freeholders not known, as property is no longer the basis of representation. The revenue of the city, in 1830, was one million thirty-six thousand nine hundred and thirty dollars; the expenditure, one million thirty-three thousand four hundred and nineteen; and the debt, seven hundred and seventy-four thousand four hundred and fifty-five. In the same year the revenue collected at the custom-house was twenty-one million seven hundred and fifty-six thousand seven hundred and nine dollars; the foreign tonnage entering the port, four hundred and fifty thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight tons; the arrivals from foreign ports, one thousand five hundred and ten, of which one thousand three hundred and sixty-six were American. The number of coasting vessels frequenting the port is almost incalculable. For 1810, the assessment of real and personal property was one hundred and twenty-five million two hundred and eighty-eight thousand five hundred and eighteen dollars; in 1824, the number of deaths was four thousand three hundred and forty-one; in 1825, five thousand and eighteen. The proportion of births to deaths is not known as it ought to be, in order to draw any useful practical conclusions from this subject. Of these deaths, one sixth were from consumptions. The greatest number of deaths, in 1824, was in the month of August, the smallest in December. In 1825, the greatest mortality was in July, and the smallest in April. The air of New-York is keen and cold in winter, partly owing to its being entirely surrounded by water, which freezes more or less during that season. The spring is generally lingering and backward, owing to the great prevalence of chilly easterly winds, coming directly from the sea; but the summer is less oppressive than in Philadelphia and Baltimore, and the autumn, for the most part, very pleasant. During the heats of summer, the Battery and Castle-garden afford a never-failing source of coolness, and a prospect equally refreshing and delightful. The nights are almost always rendered comfortable, even in the hottest weather, by the sea breezes, the influence of which is felt very sensibly. On the whole, the climate is not unfavorable to health or long life, except to persons inclined to consumption. To them it is highly dangerous. The water in the lower part of the city is brackish. Columbia college is at present the only institution of the kind in New-York. It is finely situated, on an open square, ornamented with majestic trees; and the standard of classical education is supposed to be higher than in most of the colleges of the United States. The faculty consists of a president, a professor of moral philosophy, rhetoric, belles-lettres, and political economy, a professor of Greek and Latin, a Jay professor of ditto, a professor of natural and experimental philosophy and chemistry, a professor of mathematics, analytical mechanics, and physical astronomy, a professor of law, a professor of the Italian language and literature, and a professor of the French language and literature. The number of students is about one hundred. There is a grammar school connected with the college. It was founded by royal charter in 1754, which has been frequently confirmed, with occasional alterations, by the legislature of the state. Columbia college possesses an estate valued at four hundred thousand dollars. The university of the city of New-York is an institution recently established, chartered by the legislature in February 1831. It is projected on the broad and liberal scale of the universities on the continent of Europe, and promises to be of great advantage to the literature of our country. Its funds have been raised by the subscriptions of liberal individuals. It is governed by a council of thirty-two members, chosen by the subscribers, together with the mayor and four members of the common council of the city. A large amount of money has been raised for its endowment; but none of its officers are yet chosen, except the president, secretary, and treasurer of the council, and the chancellor of the university. There are numerous schools of all kinds in the city, in which all classes and colors may be accommodated; so that it is not too much to say that the means of obtaining such an education as is essential to the ordinary occupations and pursuits of life, are within the reach of all who will exert themselves to make use of them. There are upwards of one hundred churches in the city, of almost every denomination of believers. Of these, some are of a handsome order of architecture, and splendidly ornamented within. The portico in front of the church of the Ascension, in Canal-street, would do honor to any city. It is chaste and classical in the highest degree. The disposition of the people of New-York is very liberal towards the endowment and support of religious establishments, bible and missionary societies, &c. Of all the churches of the United States, Trinity church is the best endowed. It is restricted, by its charter, to an actual revenue of five thousand pounds sterling a year, and has been obliged to alienate a vast property in the city, in order to keep within bounds. But for this, its revenue would probably have amounted to six, perhaps ten times the sum to which it is restricted by charter. The nature of this work does not admit of particularizing the different charitable institutions and societies for the relief of human misery. It is sufficient to say, that there is scarcely a want or infirmity to which our nature is exposed that has not a resource in some one of these institutions, which are supported either by public munificence or private charity. Neither is New-York behind her neighbors in the number of her literary and scientific institutions, although her almost exclusively commercial pursuits might furnish some apology if she were. The most ancient of these, it is believed, is the society library, founded in 1754, and containing upwards of twenty-two thousand volumes; the historical society, incorporated in 1809, and which has collected and preserved a vast number of records, appertaining to the early history of the United States, and the state of New-York particularly. It is to be regretted that the society has languished for want of funds: this circumstance, it is believed, has prevented its giving to the world many of these interesting memorials of old times. It seems now, however, on the point of a revival to usefulness, owing, in no small degree, to the activity and exertions of Mr. John Delafield, the present treasurer. The lyceum of natural history has been very successful in the pursuit of its objects, and its collections and publications do it great honor. The Clinton-hall association is an incorporation for the promotion of literature, science, and the arts, which has but lately attained to an existence which it is hoped will be prosperous; and the mercantile library association can hardly fail of being eminently useful, if properly conducted. There are two academies of the fine arts in New-York—the American and the National—the former supported by amateurs, the latter composed of artists, with a few exceptions. It is hoped and expected they will do something towards the advancement of the great objects of their original formation. In 1827, the returns made, according to law, to the comptroller of the state, made the total of banking capital in New-York amount to fifteen million nine hundred and sixty thousand four hundred and three dollars. Since that period, several new banks have been chartered, adding largely to this sum. The number of insurance companies is upwards of forty. There is no city in the United States, perhaps in the world, which possesses greater advantages of situation than New-York, both for external and internal commerce. These advantages have been improved by a vast line of canals connected with the Hudson, and concentrating the produce of an immense region on its bosom, all of which at length finds its way to the great mart of domestic and foreign trade. It is here that merchants and traders resort from all quarters; from the shores of the Atlantic, the confines of the lakes, and the banks of the Mississippi, with a certainty that they can dispose of their own produce, and supply themselves with every article they require. It is here, too, that strangers and travellers congregate, as the place of departure to every part of the world, attracted by the facilities offering themselves at regular stated periods. It may serve to give some idea of these to state that there are opportunities by regular packets to Liverpool four times a month: to Havre three times; to London twice; to Hull, Greenock, Belfast, Carthage, Vera Cruz, Charleston, Savannah, New Orleans, Mobile, Washington, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, and, indeed, to almost every place of note in the United States, in lines of vessels, sailing at stated times, which may be relied upon with almost perfect certainty. The advantageous situation of New-York naturally inclines the inhabitants to commercial pursuits; but of late years large capitals have been invested in manufactures, which are daily becoming objects of attention. But the probability is, that it will long remain in a great degree a central point for the commerce of the United States. That part of the coast of America which comprehends the state of New-York, was first discovered by Sebastian Cabot, who was employed by Henry the Seventh of England, in 1497. But he made no attempts at landing, or forming settlements, contenting himself with claiming the country for his sovereign, by right of discovery. In 1608, Henry Hudson, an Englishman, acting under a commission from the king of England, entered the bay of New-York, and sailed up the river as far as latitude 43° north. The English writers maintain that he was employed by their government, and that he sold the country thus discovered to the Dutch, without authority. The Dutch writers, on the contrary, maintain that he was in the service of the Dutch East India Company at the time. Be this as it may, the English made no opposition for some time to the settlement of the country by the Dutch. The right of the English was, however, in some measure recognised, by the Dutch applying for, and receiving permission from James the First, in 1620, "to build some cottages on Hudson's river, for the convenience of their vessels engaged in trade with Brazil." Under this license they settled a colony, to which they gave the name of the New Netherlands. Various disputes about boundaries, &c. occurred, for several years afterwards, between the English, the Dutch, and the Swedes; but these are no longer subjects of interest. The first buildings erected in New-York, were in 1621, near the junction of the East and North rivers, about Whitehall and Broad-street, and Coenties and Old slips. The first Dutch governor was Wouter Van Twiller, in 1629, who was succeeded by William Kieft, whose successor was Peter Stuyvesant, the last of the Dutch governors. King Charles the First having made complaints of the encroachments of the Dutch on New England, the states-general declared the settlement of New Netherlands "to be only a private undertaking of the West India Company of Amsterdam." The twelfth of March, 1664, Charles the Second granted to his brother James, Duke of York, "all Mattawacks, now Long Island, all Hudson's river, and all the lands from the west side of Connecticut river to the east side of the Delaware bay, together with the royalties and rights of government." The duke sold that part of the grant which comprehends New Jersey, and the remainder, which comprehended the present state of New-York, was retained by him, and so called in honor of the proprietor. The possession was guaranteed to him by the states-general, by the treaty of Breda, in 1667. Previous to this, however, in 1664, the New Netherlands was taken by the English. In 1673, it was retaken by the Dutch, and in 1674, on the ninth of February, it again fell into the hands of the English, and so remained until the revolution. In 1683 the first colonial legislature was convened in New-York. In 1765, a congress of deputies from the colonial assemblies met at the same place to consult about grievances. In 1770, the liberty pole, which had been set up by the citizens, was cut down by the soldiers, and a new one erected, secured with iron. About the same time the assembly gave great offence by voting five thousand dollars for the supply of the king's troops quartered in the colony. On this occasion an address was published "To the betrayed inhabitants of the city of New-York," signed "A Son of Liberty," which the assembly pronounced a "false, seditious, and infamous libel." Captain, afterwards General McDougall, was brought before the chief-justice as the publisher, refused to give bail, was committed to prison, and afterwards admitted to bail. He was ordered before the bar of the assembly at their next meeting, refused to ask pardon, was committed to prison for contempt, and there remained until the assembly was prorogued, in 1771. About the middle of December, 1773, seventeen chests of tea, which had been brought to the city from a tea-ship lying at Sandy Hook, were seized by the citizens, and thrown into the river. In the year 1775, the assembly of the province met in New-York, and renounced all concern in the proceedings of the congress that convened at Philadelphia the preceding year, declining choosing members to the new one. At the same time they petitioned the king, in their own names, for a redress of grievances; remonstrated in behalf of the people of Massachusetts; and concluded by disavowing all ideas of independence. This course gave great offence to the popular party, denominated the sons of liberty, who called a meeting, March sixth, which eventuated in an appeal to force, in which the Tories were put to flight by the sons of liberty, armed with hoop-poles; and the scale from that moment turned in favor of the popular party, under Captain Sears, or King Sears, as he was familiarly called. On receipt of the news of the affair at Lexington, Sears, in conjunction with captain, afterwards General Lamb, called a meeting, in which it was resolved that the custom-house should be closed. A committee of one hundred persons was appointed to preserve order in the city, and an association entered into to stand by the continental congress. But the citizens were far from being united. There was a strong party among the more wealthy, which only awaited an opportunity to thwart these measures. Captain Sears, who had been ordered, by the convention appointed to direct the affairs of the colony, to remove the cannon from the battery, succeeded in his object, though fired upon by the Asia, seventy-four, which lay off in the river. The conduct of the citizens of New-York not being quite agreeable to the sons of liberty, Captain Sears advised General Washington to send a body of troops to secure the city; but the general could not spare them. General Lee, however, by the assistance of Governor Trumbull of Connecticut, collected a body of twelve hundred militia for the purpose. Being detained at Stamford, he sent a part of these on under the command of Captain Sears, and followed soon after. The inhabitants were greatly alarmed at their arrival, the British naval commandant having declared that he would fire the city if any continental troops entered it. To this Lee answered, "that if the man-of-war should set one house on fire in consequence of his coming, he would chain a hundred of their friends together by the neck, and make the house their funeral pile." The seventeenth of March, the British having evacuated Boston, Washington dispatched General Heath, with five regiments, and shortly afterwards followed, with nearly all his army, to New-York. After the defeat of the Americans on Long Island, and the masterly retreat of Washington across the East river, he was obliged, by a series of operations on the part of the enemy, to retreat across Haerlem river to the continent. This left the city at the mercy of the British, who accordingly took forcible possession, which they retained until the twenty-fifth of November, 1783, when they finally evacuated it. The day has ever since been commemorated by a military procession and public rejoicings. The fourth of December following, Washington took leave of the officers of the army, at Francis's hotel. Calling for a glass of wine, he thus addressed them:—"With a heart full of love and gratitude, I now take leave of you, devoutly wishing that your latter days may be as prosperous and happy as your former have been glorious and honorable." The ceremony was in the highest degree affecting, and few of the officers could refrain from tears. In 1789, the first congress, under the new constitution, met at New-York, and Washington was sworn into the office of president of the United States, by Chancellor Livingston. From this period, the city, which, at the time of its surrender by the British, was estimated to contain little more than twenty thousand people, has continued to advance in wealth and numbers, with a pace as steady as it has been rapid. Its history is a continuation of prosperity, only occasionally arrested or disturbed by those inevitable evils which every where, at times, cross the path of life; and its future prospects, like its past history, furnish abundant reasons for its inhabitants to be thankful to Providence.

WILLIAMS'S REGISTER.

This valuable work for the year 1832, is just published, greatly improved. It furnishes a mass of information, indispensable to nearly every business-man, on about two hundred different subjects connected with this state, and the United States, and contains, in addition, a number of beautifully executed wood engravings, by Mason, Anderson, and others.

THE FAMILY LIBRARY.

The thirtieth number of this universally popular work, published by the brothers Harper, consists of the "Lives and Voyages of Early Navigators, with a History of the Buccaneers," with steel plates of Drake, Cavendish, and Dampier. It furnishes accounts of a most interesting nature of these celebrated men.

TRANSLATED POETRY.

THE original of this poem, according to the statement of the French gentleman to whom the translator is indebted for the copy he has made use of, was written at Paris some years ago, but the vigilance of the police prevented its circulation. Whatever might have been the consequence of the circulation of the original in France at the time it was written, the present publication of the translation cannot be supposed to have any other object or effect than to give the reader some idea of a highly-spirited poem, which might otherwise be altogether lost to the world, as it is uncertain whether a proper time for the publication of the original will ever arrive.

LE FILS DE L'HOMME.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH BY JAMES MACK.

March forward! march forward!
Ye children of France!
The voice of your country
Commands your advance!
March forward, exclaiming,
In triumph and joy,
"Down! down with the Bourbons!
And up with our Boy!"

The boy of our worship,
The son of the man
Who marshaled our fathers
In victory's van!
That son let us follow,
Acclaiming in joy,
"Down! down with the Bourbons!
And up with our Boy!"

How great was the glory
Napoleon wrought!
How great the dishonor
The Bourbons have brought!
The pride of our country
'Tis theirs to destroy;
Then down with the Bourbons,
And up with our Boy!

The sun of our glory
Napoleon gave;
That sun for a moment
Has set in his grave;
But forth shall burst on us,
While shouting in joy,
"Down! down with the Bourbons!
And up with our Boy!"

The hosts of the stranger
Our tyrants shall aid,
But we have before us
The conqueror's shade;
The power of his presence
Shall thousands destroy—
Then down with the Bourbons!
And up with our Boy!

That boy is our brother—
His father was proud
To call us his children,
As oft was avowed;
Then on with your brother,
His foes to destroy—
Down! down with the Bourbons
And up with our Boy!

LETTERS FROM PARIS.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF EUROPE.

NUMBER TWELVE.

Place Louis XV.—Panoramic view of Paris—a Literary Club Dinner—the guests—the president—the exiled Poles, &c.

I HAVE spent the day in a long stroll. The wind blew warm and delicious from the south this morning, and the temptation to abandon lessons and lectures was irresistible. Taking the Arc de l'Etoile as my extreme point, I yielded to all the leisurely hindrances of shop-windows, beggars, book-stalls, and views by the way. Among the specimen-cards in an engraver's window I was amused at finding, in the latest Parisian fashion, "HUSEIN-PASHA, Dey d'Algiers."

These delightful Tuileries! We rambled through them, (I had met a friend and countryman, and enticed him into my idle plans for the day,) and amused ourselves with the never-failing beauty and grace of the French children for an hour. On the inner terrace we stopped to look at the beautiful hotel of Prince Polignac, facing the Tuileries, on the opposite bank. By the side of this exquisite little model of a palace stands the superb commencement of Napoleon's ministerial hotel, breathing of his glorious conception in every line of its ruins. It is astonishing what a godlike impress that man left upon all he touched!

Every third or fourth child in the gardens was dressed in the full uniform of the National Guard—helmet, sword, epaulettes, and all. They are ludicrous little caricatures, of course, but it inoculates them with love of the corps, and it would be better if that were synonymous with a love of liberal principles. The Garde Nationale are supposed to be more than half "Carlists" at this moment.

We passed out by the guarded gate of the Tuileries to the Place Louis XV. This square is a most beautiful spot, as a centre of unequalled views, and yet a piece of earth so foully polluted with human blood probably does not exist on the face of the globe. It divides the Tuileries from the Champs Elysées, and ranges of course in the long broad avenue of two miles, stretching between the king's palace and the Arc de l'Etoile. It is but a list of names to write down the particular objects to be seen in such a view, but it commands, at the extremities of its radii, the most princely edifices, seen from hence with the most advantageous foregrounds of space and avenue, and softened by distance into the misty and unbroken surface of engraving. The king's palace is on one hand, Napoleon's Arch, at a distance of nearly two miles on the other, Prince Talleyrand's regal dwelling behind, with the church of Madeline seen through the Rue Royale, while before you, to the south, lies a picture of profuse splendor; the broad Seine, spanned by bridges that are the admiration of Europe, and crowded by specimens of architectural magnificence; the chamber of deputies, and the Palais Bourbon, (approached by the Pont Louis XVI with its gigantic statues and simple majesty of structure,) and, rising over all, the grand dome of the "Invalides," which Napoleon gilded, to divert the minds of his subjects from his lost battle, and which Peter the Great admired more than all Paris beside. What a place for a man to stand, with but one bosom to feel and one tongue to express his wonder!

And yet of what that should make a spot of earth sink to perdition, has it not been the theatre? Here was beheaded the unfortunate Louis XVI., his wife, Marie Antoinette, his kinsman, Philip duke of Orleans, and his sister Elizabeth; and here were guillotined the intrepid Charlotte Corday, the deputy Brissot, and twenty of his colleagues, and all the victims of the revolution of 1793, to the amount of two thousand eight hundred! and here Robespierre and his cursed crew met at last with their insufficient retribution; and, as if it were destined to be the very blood-spot of the earth, here the fireworks, (which were celebrating the marriage of the same Louis that was afterwards brought hither to the scaffold,) exploded, and killed fourteen hundred persons! It has been the scene, also, of several minor tragedies not worth mentioning in such a connection. Were I a Bourbon, and as unpopular as king Philip I. at this moment, the view of the Place Louis XV from my palace windows would very much disturb the beauty of the perspective. Without an equivoque, I should look with a very ominous dissatisfaction on the "Elysian fields" that lie beyond.

We loitered slowly on to the Barrier Neuilly, just outside of which, and right before the city gates, stands the Triumphal Arch. It has the stamp of Napoleon—simple grandeur. The broad avenue from the Tuileries swells slowly up to it for two miles, and the view of Paris at its foot, even, is superb. We ascended to the unfinished roof, a hundred and thirty-five feet from the ground, and saw the whole of the mighty capital of France at a coup d'œil. Churches, palaces, gardens; buildings heaped upon buildings clear over the edge of the horizon, where the spires of the city in which you stand are scarcely visible for the distance.

I dined a short time since, with the editors of the Revue Encyclopedique at their monthly reunion. This is a sort of club dinner, to which the eminent contributors of the review invite once a month all the strangers of distinction who happen to be in Paris. I owed my invitation probably to the circumstance of my living with Dr. Howe, who is considered the organ of American principles here, and whose force of character has given him a degree of respect and prominence not often attained by foreigners. It was the most remarkable party, by far, that I had ever seen. There were nearly a hundred guests, twenty or thirty of whom were distinguished Poles, lately arrived from Warsaw. Generals Romarino and Langermann were placed beside the president, and another general, whose name is as difficult to remember as his face is to forget, and who is famous for having been the last on the field, sat next to the head seat. Near him were General Bernard and Dr. Bowring, with Sir Sidney Smith, covered with orders, from every quarter of the world, and the President of Colombia. After the usual courses of a French dinner, the president, Mons. Julien, a venerable man, with snow-white hair, addressed the company. He expressed his pleasure at the meeting, with the usual courtesies of welcome, and in the fervent manner of the old school of French politeness; and then, pausing a little, and lowering his voice, with a very touching cadence, he looked around to the Poles, and began to speak of their country. Every movement was instantly hushed about the table—the guests leaned forward, some of them half rising in their earnestness to hear; the old man's voice trembled, and sunk lower; the Poles dropped their heads upon their bosoms, and the whole company were strongly affected. His manner suddenly changed at this moment, in a degree that would have seemed too dramatic, if the strong excitement had not sustained him. He spoke indignantly of the Russian barbarity towards Poland—assured the exiles of the strong sympathy felt by the great mass of the French people in their cause, and expressed his confident belief that the struggle was not yet done, and the time was near when, with France at her back, Poland would rise and be free. He closed, amidst tumultuous acclamation, and all the Poles near him kissed the old man, after the French manner, upon both his cheeks.

This speech was followed by several others, much to the same effect. Dr. Bowring replied handsomely, in French, to some compliment paid to his efforts on the "question of reform," in England. Cesar Moreau, the great schemist, and founder of the Academie d'Industrie, said a few very revolutionary things quite emphatically, rolling his fine visionary-looking eyes about as if he saw the "shadows cast before" of coming events; and then rose a speaker, whom I shall never forget—he was a young Polish noble, of about nineteen, whose extreme personal beauty and enthusiastic expression of countenance had particularly arrested my attention in the drawing-room, before dinner. His person was slender and graceful—his eye and mouth full of beauty and fire, and his manner had a quiet native superiority, that would have distinguished him any where. He had behaved very gallantly in the struggle, and some allusion had been made to him in one of the addresses. He rose modestly, and half unwillingly, and acknowledged the kind wishes for his country in language of great elegance. He then went on to speak of the misfortunes of Poland, and soon warmed into eloquence of the most vivid earnestness and power. I never was more moved by a speaker—he seemed perfectly unconscious of every thing but the recollections of his subject. His eyes swam with tears, and flashed with indignation alternately, and his refined spirited mouth assumed a play of varied expression, which, could it have been arrested, would have made a sculptor immortal. I can hardly write extravagantly of him, for all present were as much excited as myself. One ceases to wonder at the desperate character of the attempt to redeem the liberty of a land when he sees such specimens of its people. I have seen hundreds of Poles, of all classes, in Paris, and I have not yet met with a face of even common dullness among them.

You have seen by the papers, I presume, that a body of several thousand Poles fled from Warsaw, after the defeat, and took refuge in the northern forests of Prussia. They gave up their arms under an assurance from the king that they should have all the rights of Prussian subjects. He found it politic afterwards to recall his protection, and ordered them back to Poland. They refused to go, and were surrounded by a detachment of his army, and the orders given to fire upon them. The soldiers refused, and the Poles, taking advantage of the sympathy of the army, broke through the ranks, and escaped to the forest, where, at the last news, they were armed with clubs, and determined to defend themselves to the last. The consequence of a return to Poland would be, of course, an immediate exile to Siberia. The Polish committee, American and French, with General Lafayette at their head, have appropriated a great part of their funds to the relief of this body, and our countryman, Dr. Howe, has undertaken the dangerous and difficult task of carrying it to them. He left Paris for Brussels, with letters from the Polish generals, and advices from Lafayette to all Polish committees upon his route, that they should put all their funds into his hands. He is a gallant fellow, and will succeed if any one can; but he certainly runs great hazard. God prosper him!

AMERICAN NAVY.

Since the last war, the growth and improvement of our navy has kept pace with our national prosperity. We could now put to sea, in a few months, with a dozen ships of the line—the most spacious, efficient, best, and most beautiful construction that ever traversed the ocean. This is not merely an American conceit, but an admitted fact in Europe, where our models are studiously copied. In the United States, a maximum and uniform calibre of cannon has been lately determined on and adopted. Instead of the variety of length, form and calibre still used in other navies, and almost equal to the Great Michael with her "bassils, mynards, haggles, culverings, flings, falcons, double dogs, and pestilent serpents," our ships offer flush and uniform decks, sheers free from hills, hollows, and excrescences, and complete unbroken batteries.

THE KEEPER OF THE PRISON-SHIP JERSEY.

"But he, the favorite, the flower,
Most cherished since his natal hour,
His mother's image in his face,
The infant love of all his race,
His martyred father's dearest thought,
My latest care, for whom I sought
To board my life, that his might be Less wretched now, and one day free;
He, too, who yet had held untired
A spirit natural or inspired—
He, too, was struck, and day by day,
Was withered on the stalk away."

AMONGST the number of perishing creatures immured in that vilest of prisons, the old ship Jersey, were two persons whose appearance and manners excited a feeling of deep interest in the minds of all around them—both as it respected their present situation and the fate which awaited them. They were brothers, bearing the name of —. I shall call it Vernor. The one, a man of about twenty-seven years, strong and vigorous in his frame, and possessing a mind buoyant with energy and enthusiasm. The other was still a youth of, at most, not more than nineteen, although tall and well-informed. His face was fair and beautiful, while the rising of his features and the down upon his chin proclaimed his approach to manhood. His disposition was full of gaiety and sweetness, and, like the lark, did he carol for several mornings after his imprisonment, protesting that the enemy should not rejoice in a conquest over his spirits. Yet, afterwards, when reclining upon the shoulder of his brother—their faces nearly meeting—with such fondness would he talk of their kind mother—then hastily dash the tear from the corner of his eye-lid, and smilingly chide the elder for his melancholy, who would reply with a look full of anxiety,

"Dear Frank, did the weight of misfortune fall on me alone, I could bear it with heroism—but you are not fitted for this abode—so tenderly reared, so little accustomed to privations. As for me, I have been long inured to fatigues and hardships. So early did I bid adieu to my home, that I left you yet a child, smiling in the lap of an indulgent mother. Oh, would to heaven that you were still the same! Scarcely has that mother recovered from the shock occasioned by the death of our poor father, when, alas, she is doomed to feel the pain of a second trial, which in its effects may prove but little less torturing."

"The delights of home, and the tenderness of my mother are ever present to my memory," replied Frank, with feeling; "they serve to light up this region of misery and gloom—to give a cordial warmth to the cold and nauseous vapors around us; they sweeten my cup of bitterness—feed the cravings of my appetite, and change the dying groans of my companions in captivity into scarcely audible murmurs, while sleep conveys me to the arms of the guardian of my infancy, and the sharer and soother of my early cares—I revel in all the luxuries of home—fold my brother to my heart, and welcome him to liberty and light! The social board is spread and laden for our comfort, and a mother's smile invites us to partake—when I awake to hunger and the depths of a dungeon!"

A sigh from the oldest was the only reply to this lively description of fantasies—and after closing their arms about each other, they sunk into silence.

Day after day the morning broke and the evening closed upon their sufferings! Even mercy was withheld from the wretched prisoners in their latest extremities; and each rising sun saw heaps of human corpses, blackened by pestilence and famine, borne up to the deck of the Jersey, to be interred in one common shallow-scooped grave upon the heights of Brooklyn—their bones to whiten there beneath a score of winter snows, unnoticed, unhonored!

Still, each day the younger of the Vernors would sing his song, and try to deck his countenance with cheerfulness—but in vain! His attempts became less and less effectual; and the smile that was wont to irradiate his features, like an expiring light, cast only an uncertain gleam: a strain of melancholy mingled with his song till at last it ceased.

"The poor bird," observed he, one morning, upon finding that his voice had failed him, "although confined to his cage, may sing if well fed and cared for; but the imprisoned starveling, however sweet his note, can feel but little relish for song."

Sad indeed were the inroads that cruelty and oppression had made on the spirits of the youth, while a death-like paleness had taken the place of the rosy bloom which he had brought to the prison.

He, too, was fully sensible of the change, and with a forced smile would say to his brother, as he folded his coat about his wasted form, "If hunger feeds so fast, George, I fear there will be left but a scanty meal for the worms to revel on."

"Alas, my dear Frank," replied Vernor, "speak not of your death—the thought drives me to madness. Mother's life hangs upon yours. She demands of you to sustain yourself under the evil star that reigns over us—bear up yet awhile, my dear boy, with cheerfulness, and we may ere long possess the power and opportunity of punishing our oppressors."

But poor Frank Vernor—the load of oppression was even then too tightly strained upon him—a painful tear swelled in his eye, and he mentally cursed the fate inflicted upon him by the tyrant foe, as he yielded his soul to hopelessness and despair. A few days after, his eyes became languid, and the hectic flush upon his cheek spoke the feverish pulse, which his anxious brother observed with the deepest concern, and while he endeavored to support his wasting form and drooping spirits by tender and consoling words, he perceived that little hope remained for the life of the youth unless he were immediately liberated from confinement, and his disease treated with skill and attention.

Two days more elapsed of severe trial, when a fatal delirium seized his brain, and the soothing of his brother could only restrain him from violence. At length his frenzy subsided, and languor and weakness ensued—cold chills, attended with sensations of intense pain, and the clammy dews of death were upon his forehead.

The night, with all its horrors, had closed around the wretched victims—had shrouded their prison in darkness, and all was silent, except now and then the groan of a dying man—or a half-suppressed murmur of suffering—or the sound of a solitary footstep in the apartment. Young Vernor had clasped his dying brother in his arms, and had bared his own warm bosom to pillow the sufferer's head. Thus a few moments' slumber beguiled that portion of his sad hour—and when he awoke he was quite rational, and perfectly sensible of his approaching dissolution.

"I am going, George," he said, "tell our dear—"
Mother, he would have added, but the overpowering word swelled at his heart, and died away upon his quivering lips.

"I know, my dearest Francis, all that you would have me say," cried the agonized brother, "but do not bid me despair of your life—for, alas, we must not part so, my brother! Oh, should you die, what words of consolation could I convey to our poor mother—what tidings that would not kill her?"

"Say that I loved her—that I revered her with my latest recollection—and that we will assuredly meet in heaven, where virtue finds a rich reward, and where the wretched prisoner is free! Say, too, that even amid the pains and dread of death, I feel a consolation in the thought that it is for my country I perish. We cannot all hope to live to enjoy the blessings that liberty will give—but we leave them as a sacred inheritance to the rising generation—may they guard with care that which we shall so dearly have purchased! And now, brother, a draught of cold water that I may die quietly."

Here he raised his exhausted head, and held forth his hand as if to receive it.

"You shall have it," replied the unhappy Vernor, as he arose, and laying his brother gently along the floor, he quickly ascended to the entrance of the prison, to ask water of the keeper. It was some time before he received any reply to his repeated knocks and calls. At length the keeper appeared, and harshly inquired the cause of the disturbance at so improper an hour.

"My brother is dying," answered Vernor; "in the name of heaven let me have some water that he may slake his thirst."

"He must wait till morning—it is not our custom to open to the prisoners after night fall—so go your ways and let us have no more noise," was the surly reply.

"But, God of mercy! you surely will not refuse me the water? He will die before the morning!"

"Then he will not need it long," answered the keeper coldly; as he turned away—and muttering that he would not break through his rules to save a hundred of their lives, he left the agonized Vernor to grope his way back as well as he could.

As he turned to descend, his attention was arrested by sounds of riotous mirth issuing from a distant part of the ship, which seemed to mock his sufferings, and convey a double stab to his grievously wounded heart.

When he reached the spot where his brother lay, and had raised him in his arms, he perceived that the youth's reason was again bewildered.

"Never mind the water, George," he said, "the purest streams are before me; I shall soon overtake them;" and he endeavored to moisten his parched lips with his tongue, which Vernor perceiving by the sound, burst into tears.

"Is this my mother?" said the dying lad. "Are these her tears that mingle with the cold dews on my forehead? Is that her warm breath that I feel upon my cheek? Oh, give me your hand, mother!" and snatching that of his brother he pressed it fondly to his lips. "Go—get a light that I may behold her," he added, and attempted to rise. "If you love me, George, get me a light," he repeated, "that I may see your faces before I die."

The half-distracted Vernor could no longer resist his entreaties, and therefore laying him gently down, he made a second attempt to awaken a sense of feeling in the breast of the obdurate keeper, who demanded with a terrible oath, who it was that dared to disturb his repose.

"My good fellow," said Vernor, in a voice of entreaty and conciliation, "I have come in search of a light. My brother is dying—and it is a dreary thing to be near so dear an object and to be unable to look upon his features. He, too, asks it of you as a precious gift."

"Down—down, you foul rebel! I tell you it cannot be done."

"What—not at the request of a dying man?"

"No. Let him die—a rebel deserves no better fate. Away, I say, go back to your berth, and give me no more trouble."

"A single inch of candle only, I pray you for heaven's sake!" cried Vernor, subdued by affliction.

"I tell you again that you cannot have a light! Begone!" and the cruel keeper hastened from the iron-grated partition that separated him from his wretched prisoner.

"Heaven grant me patience!" cried Vernor, as he descended the steps to the prison, his brain burning with revenge, and his heart surcharged with the most painful feelings.

He returned once more to his brother, and seating himself beside him, placed the cold and dying head upon his aching breast, and by fond caresses and words of the sweetest affection sought to soothe away the pangs of disappointment, and to soften the anguish of the last sad moments of the youth, which were now fast approaching. After a few struggles, a few agonizing sighs, he breathed the name of his mother and expired.

"Alas! and is it over? Be gracious, holy heaven, and receive to thyself that pure essence which but now breathed in this cold form—animated the kindest of hearts! Farewell, sweet flower! Thou hast been rudely torn asunder—a fell blight has destroyed thee in the bud! No friend will deck thy bier—no prayer will hallow thy grave!"

Vernor laid the body down in an agony of grief, and breathing an oath of vengeance, fell upon the neck of his ill-starred brother.

The second day after the battle of York Town, (that memorable event which put a period to our long protracted war) late in the afternoon, a young volunteer of the American corps was moving along the ravine in front of the town, when his attention was attracted by the groans, as it were, of a dying creature. Upon searching around he perceived a soldier, wounded and expiring, lying in a hole, or rather a chasm in the ground, which had been broken up. The young man raised the head of the poor fellow, and placed it in an easier and more natural position, and so that he could distinguish the features of the face, which was distorted and livid from suffering and exposure. The volunteer gazed for a moment upon its lineaments, and then recoiled back with horror. A bitter pang shot through his heart! He could not be mistaken—it was the keeper of the prison-ship Jersey!

"Ah, God!" he cried, as he threw himself upon his knees on the earth, "avert my hatred, and let me now return good for evil! Already have I revenged thy death, my brother! fully avenged it! Yea, more than a hundred of the enemy have these hands slain to thy manes on the battle-field! Then pass in peace, beloved shade!"

He arose, and once more approached the wretch, whose groans had become dreadfully audible. It would seem as if he had not only heard and understood, but had also felt the impressive language pronounced by the agitated Vernor, for, amidst the agonies of death, his eyes rolled as if in search of the being he had injured.

"What would you have me do for you, miserable man?" cried Vernor.

"Pardon my offence, and give me a drink that I may not die a thousand deaths. Two whole days have I lain in this pit sorely wounded; and in the posture you found me, and no creature was there to bring me aid or comfort. Many have passed by, but none perceived or heard me—and now, alas, it is too late."

Vernor, moved to pity by this appeal, attempted to raise him from the chasm, but found it impossible; he was too closely wedged in, and his wounds were in a state of putrefaction, while the sufferings of his body could be exceeded only by his overlaid conscience, which feared to meet the death it but too justly merited.

Vernor hastened to a spring, and taking water in a gourd, bore it back to the unhappy man that he might drink ere he died. When it met his lips, his eyes glared wildly upon Vernor, and pushing the water from him, he cried,

"Alas, I cannot swallow it—God's punishment is just!" and, in writhing and torture he soon after expired.

FASHIONABLE FRIENDSHIP.

SCENE—Palm's Restaurateur—a half-dozen Italians, Spaniards, and Frenchmen taking chocolate, and gibbering aloud—at one table sits a merchant, sipping his coffee most sonorously; at another a German is smacking his lips over a goblet of kirschenwasser; and a dandy trying to drink a glass of maraschino in the prettiest way possible, while ever and anon he casts his eye, with a self-satisfied air, into one of the numerous glasses that surround the salon. The German is Baron Von Bumble, and the dandy is Vavasour Mulrick, Esq. son of the late Obed Mulrick, ex-chandler, who died and left his son a cool plumb. This is safely secured, while the interest allows the hopeful young gentleman to keep the finest rooms in the city-hotel, drive a quidquid wagon, and exhibit every day a clear pair of white kids on the pavé at the regular hour of one. It is said that he was exceedingly amiable, promising, and sensible, until he unfortunately came in possession of his money, when his brain was completely turned, and he became lost in the highway to Dandyland. The German rose, and bade "Gute nacht." After he had gone, Mulrick turned his eye lazily around, and his lip slightly curled as he saw that no addressable person was present, so dividing his attention between the reflection of his diamonds in the opposite mirror, and a lazy criticism on the whiteness of the marble pillars, he appeared as if awaiting some person with whom he had made an appointment.

Soon after the door opened, and a young man, with an amiable face, made still more expressive by a pair of large deep-blue eyes, entered. He was dressed with all the mode and taste of Mulrick, without that je ne sais quoi of puppyism, which leaked out in all the said gentleman's actions. There was a melancholy cast upon his features, which seemed as if moulded to a continual smile. This was Robert Unwin.

Mulrick.—Well, Bob, you are punctual to vulgarity. But what's the matter with you? Has Mary proved cruel? Have the cues and balls been running counter? Is Pelham spavined? Have you been caricatured? Tell me, my dear fellow; you are a friend, and if I have a morsel of consolation in my disposition, I will banish every sorrow you can conjure up.

Unwin.—Then you do feel a friendship for me, Mulrick? You will stand by me—

Mulrick.—Steadfast, steadfast, Unwin; no change shall move me, and we will die the same good friends we have always lived. Use me as you would yourself. My time, breath, purse, horses, all as if they were your own.

Unwin.—I have something to make me unhappy; though still I have not one half the reason to complain that many poor fellows have, and I will not be down-hearted. You must sleep with me to-night, Mulrick, I have something to tell you. As we go down along we will leave word at the hotel, that you will not be at home; and you must make yourself as comfortable as possible. It's a great misfortune to be penniless, Mulrick. Supposing I have—

Mulrick.—Oh, a truce to these suppositions; a man of your blood and money should never be chop-fallen; besides, you know, Unwin, a penniless man (excuse the pun) is always sans sous-ci.

Unwin.—Semper laetus, Vavasour; I hope it will always last. What's the news?

Mulrick.—Peter Muddleigh's new stanhope is smashed to splinters by a Broadway omnibus. The Lincoxs are affronted at not receiving invitations to the Almacks. S—H— has refused Nick L—. That puppy Glebitz, the Londoner, has accused Tom Curric of cheating at cards, and has refused a challenge. Paul Villy has joined the church, out of pure sorrow for the marriage of Lily Primrose. There is a misunderstanding between Mrs. X—and her mother, about settlements; and Bill Grundy is engaged to Miss F—. Kate V—, the parvenue, has cut Gus Siphthorp, the other parvenue, dead, dead, dead. They say J—H—and his wife quarrel; and that—

Unwin.—Take breath, Vavasour, your words go upon a railway; I rather think that Palmo has spiritualized his maraschino, for I never saw you so free and easy.

Mulrick.—Happiness opens the month, as the sun does an oyster. I am happy, perfectly happy. No debts, no losses; lucky at faro, and out of love. By the way, how is Mary, your little queen?

Unwin.—Tush.

Mulrick.—Why, Unwin, you must have been born at Delphos, for I never heard such pythian responses. You have been to see Chabert, perhaps, and are initiated into the secrets of Pandemonium? By the way, did you hear that Chabert and Mademoiselle Proserpine had had a liaison; and that Pluto, in rage, had invented a new species of sulphur to "fry men's souls;" and that Chabert, having found no species of Siberian cabbage to nullify this new fire, had sent for a recipe from Georgia; and that Mr. Van P—is to fix the letter? Do you know that Boston is in tears at the absence of Mrs. —, and a memorial is "being made" to pray for her return? — is desperate; — has grown savage; and — threatens to blow senate, congress, and cabinet sky high, unless they cease session, and send home their queen. Why don't you laugh, Bob? To use a borrowed joke, you are as down in the mouth as the roots of my tongue. Still mum? Do you think me unworthy your confidence? There is something which depresses you, and still you will not tell your bosom friend?

Unwin.—You shall know all soon; too soon, perhaps, Mulrick. It is a great, indeed my greatest consolation, to know that I have one person to cling to, happen what may.

After this conversation they gathered the ample folds of their cloaks about them, and were soon walking toward Beekman-street, where Unwin resided. On their way they encountered Jack Hiddlewell, in his purple riding-coat and gilt spurs. He bowed distantly to Unwin, but greeted Mulrick with all the cordiality of a ten-year friend; after a few civilities, a little scandal, and a few compliments, he passed on.

Mulrick.—How's this? I thought you and Jack Hiddlewell were intimate friends?

Unwin.—So we were. He is also a distant connexion of mine. When the piers go, the bridge must drop. Jack Hiddlewell has a very fashionable reason for declining my acquaintance.

Mulrick.—What, an affair of gallantry?

Unwin.—No, a better one, which you shall know anon.

Mulrick.—This is truly mysterious; it is only the second time that I ever met the gentleman, and he greets me with all the familiarity of an old friend.

After dropping in at the city-hotel, and fortifying themselves with a sip of Willard's extra-extra peach-brandy punch, they set sail again for Beekman-street.

An half hour found them in the chamber of Unwin, each in a dressing-gown and cloth slippers. A dosamytos was wasting itself in precious perfume from each mouth, and the latter end of a wax candle was lighting the room, as a small genius does the world.

Mulrick began to hum Sprague's address to his cigar, when his cadenza volante was broken by a deep sigh from Unwin.

Mulrick.—Come, Bob; tell me what has happened?

Unwin.—Well, Vavasour, I will tell you all. You know my father, the well-respected John Unwin, left me at his death a clear three thousand per annum; better than this, he left me a good name, and gave me a good education. I have lived always respectably, and have never in my life passed an hour in self-reproach; you have always given me credit for an amiable disposition; I believe, nay I hope, I may assert without vanity that I have it. I made many friends, and have those around me who, I believe, esteem me more for myself than my money, or even what little talent I may possess. They have all professed the strongest regard for me; and among them all, there is not one to whom I can turn with better trust and better satisfaction than yourself. You have a good heart, a clear head, an even temper, and (forgive me) a spice of vanity.

Mulrick.—Well, Bob, conclude the exordium, and I'll forgive your charge of vanity. Tell me, now, the primum mobile of the matter in hand?

Unwin.—Those fifty thousand dollars, the groundwork of my sinecure, the bower anchor of many of my visionary plans, the hard-earned money of my deceased father, are gone, scot and lot. One-half was invested in Windsor funds, ten thousand in a cargo to Palermo, ten more vested in the hands of Checkplate & Co., London, and five was the cost of that little mansion in the Bowery, which I have given rent-free to my old schoolmate and friend of hard fortune, John Livy. The Windsor funds have gone to the deuce; the Ariel sunk in the straits of Messina; John Livy has been burned out; and a lawsuit, held against me by Checkplate & Co., was last night, by some cursed conniving of the British litigants, decided against me. If out of all the pelf I held so sure I save one thousand hard dollars, I am a richer man than I hope to be. I am young, but penniless. Mary Hauton, hearing of my losses, sent me to-day a dismissal, with her father's sanction. I have sold all my jewels and equipage to satisfy the demands of my landlady, laundress, and tailor. I am destitute, and almost friendless. Now is the time, dear Vavasour, to show your generosity. I ask not your money, I mean to earn my living. I only ask that regard which I value so much, and which shall cheer me while using my hands in that unusual occupation, gaining a livelihood. You may be sorry for my poverty, but you shall respect my pride. You know now the reason of my melancholy, and why Jack Hiddlewell cut me.

Mulrick.—Well, Unwin, I am really sorry for you. I do feel for you from the bottom of my heart. I am in a great deal of anguish, I assure you. I would do anything in the world to assist you, but my income is limited to ten thousand a year, and I find it very, very difficult to make both ends meet. You may use my name, Mr. Unwin, and I will not see you suffer; (throwing off his slippers and drawing on his boots;) indeed I won't. I have a great, very great sympathy (taking off the dressing-gown) for fellow-mortals in distress. I gave a starving schoolmate a dollar the other day, and a ten dollar bill to a country relation; (putting on his cloak;) I do think I have a good soul, sans doute; we shall meet, now then, and I will always bow to you, I will.

Unwin.—What does this mean? Won't you stay all night?

Mulrick.—Oh no, I only meant to sit an hour or so. I must meet Tom Curricule at a rub of billiards, precisely at ten; can your servant call me a coach?

Unwin.—I have no servant. I will call you one.

Mulrick.—Oh no, no; I will walk, thank you; it is only to Warren-street. Good night, Mr. Unwin. I should be happy to see you sometimes, chez moi. There's a shilling for your cigars. Bon soir.

Unwin stood aghast as the door closed behind the retreating form of Mulrick. He took up the proffered shilling, and tossed it into the fire; and, contemptuously exclaiming, "I'm ruined," went to bed with the heart-ache.

Soon after appeared the marriage of Vavasour Mulrick, Esq. to Mary, only daughter of Martin Hauton, Esq. V. U. V.

SKETCHES BY A BRIEFLESS LAWYER.

UNCERTAINTY OF THE LAW.

It is a truth, with which my professional experience very soon made me acquainted, that a modest man in the clash and jostle of life is very likely to be trampled on. I have had occasion to regret this in a thousand instances. The very members of the profession seem so well convinced of it, that when they enter their offices they are at once metamorphosed. They get infected with the consciousness of power; they are supported by the "great image of authority." That natural ingenuousness and courteous feeling, so graceful in the domestic circle, are laid aside, and when you enter a lawyer's office or a court of justice, you are breathing the atmosphere of suspicion and insult. Beware what you say, for your words are watched:

"Set in a note-book, learn'd, and cona'd by rote,
To cast into your teeth."

The most ordinary and insignificant trifle, which every body who knows any thing of the affair, or of you, can see meant nothing, and might have occurred in the same way to themselves, is tortured out of shape, and made to teem with the most exaggerated and enormous conclusions; so that a court, which professes to be the place of all other places where the essence of truth is to be extracted, is sometimes the scene of the strangest mistakes; where characters appear in the most false lights; where impudence and malice wear with impunity the mask of virtue, and the trembling of innocence is mistaken for the agitation of guilt. It is here where the members of our profession are most powerfully tempted to violate every moral duty. Their keen sagacity, springing from experience; their knowledge of every turn and winding of the law; their presence of mind and practised cunning, with which they can at a glance comprehend all the advantages of which the nature of their case will admit, all give them an immense influence over their opposing party, so that unless the latter come to the conflict equally supported by professional ability, their innocence would be no defence whatever.

The trial is one of mental strength, and the weaker individual must but too frequently be borne down and crushed, like a victim beneath the wheels of the juggernaut. But many wronged persons are strangers to this fact; are foreigners, perhaps, totally unacquainted with the usages of our country; or are poor, and consequently being unable to pay for assistance, so indispensably requisite, are compelled to submit in silence.

I have seen examples in this way of the most distressing nature. I have had my feelings harrowed, without being able to furnish a remedy, or even to offer aid, for they came to my notice generally after the evil was perpetrated. I did on one occasion apply to the counsellor, who had been most instrumental in one of these cruel triumphs of law over justice. He told me, superciliously, that the people had their remedy; that is, they could institute a counter suit, or seek redress at a higher tribunal. The courts were free to all. Alas! the individual in whose behalf I had made this futile exertion, was poor and unfortunate. To gain redress, funds were requisite. It would be a heavy tax on his time, which was perseveringly devoted to the support of a large family of children, and the effort might eventually prove a failure. I, too, was poor and young. I could not presume to cope with the matured knowledge and genius of his antagonist. The poor old white-headed man asked me, with tears in his eyes, if there was no hope. I cannot define the pain and humiliation with which I told him there was none. He was perfectly overcome. I thought his old heart would break. It is at such moments that my wishes for great eminence in my profession are most vivid. Fame in the abstract, or the acquisition of wealth, are, it is true, inducements, but of a more remote kind. It is the sight of tears flowing for wrongs unredressed; an aged head bent down in anguish by oppression; a child robbed of its right, in the face of the day, through a quibble; the fame of a pure woman blighted:—these (and they are what we are often compelled to endure) are what make me burn for knowledge and eloquence. I would risk my life sometimes for the high gratification of standing forth in such a cause, and hurling the bolt at the haughty heads of men, whom nature has made bad, and accident powerful. But these are the dreams of the young: dreams, alas! too soon chilled and dispersed by time. But for me, I question whether there is, in all the multiplicity of human feelings, one more difficult to endure in calm silence than that with which a young and lively mind yields to an inexorable necessity of witnessing a direct act of oppression, which cannot be redressed. But as we grow old and wise, (for wisdom seems to consist in caring for no one but ourselves,) we learn to shake our heads, shrug our shoulders, and say, "It is the way of the world."

A lawyer may sometimes find a coloring over an incident totally foreign from the truth. I once saw this forcibly illustrated. I happened to be reading the calendar in court, when I observed the title of a suit in which was the name of a particular friend of mine as defendant in a case of trespass. I remained to hear the trial. It was very brief, and there was but little of a defence.

The counsel for the plaintiff was a learned and an eloquent man, skilled in all the chicanery of the law from his earliest youth. He was of an advanced age, and a deportment which discovered a disposition temperate and benevolent. I think before he commenced speaking, the jury had received a prejudice against the other party. He opened the case. His client, he said, was a female, alone in the world, an unprotected, friendless woman. She had been induced to occupy a house as tenant in common with a gentleman and his family, whose cruel conduct had given rise to the present action. The defendant was a monster. He had been guilty of the most dreadful cruelty towards her in many respects, and had at last attacked her in a fury, placed her in danger of her life, and rendered it indispensable for her to apply to a tribunal of her country for protection and redress. All this was very strange to me. What! my little friend, Tom Regent, a monster? I knew him for one of the best fellows in existence. A witness was called. It was the servant of the plaintiff; a low, insolent, intemperate creature, who swore to any thing. The counsel employed by the defendant was a giddy, ignorant, conceited, young man, who knew nothing of his profession. He had no witness. He made a long speech about nothing, and the jury found heavy damages against him. I was thunderstruck, and went to see my friend immediately. He still resided in the same house with the plaintiff, and when I rang at the door it was opened by a woman about six feet in height. I had no sooner mentioned the name of my friend than she burst into such a torrent of abuse against both him and me, that I began to be in terror for my bones.

"You are a beggar," she exclaimed, flourishing her brawny arm in the air, and keeping me at a most respectful distance, "you are a disreputable beggar; a mean, poor, filthy wretch, or you would never call on such a vagabond. I'll let you know who I am. I am the mistress of this house. I'll crush the wretches. Oh! the villains."

So saying she slammed the door in my face, and I heard her voice, as she mounted the stairs, shrieking, "I'll show the wretches law."

Dear reader, this was the identical defenceless, friendless female, a romantic description of whose distress and weakness had in the morning in court nearly drawn tears from my eyes. I found my friend, who told me she had conducted herself in the same way through the whole affair, only that she took care to conceal the violence of her disposition whenever a witness was present, and thus deprived him of defence.

I thought for some time I should take good care not to meddle with any "unfortunate, defenceless, unprotected women."

THE DRAMA.

DRAMATIC IMPROBABILITIES.

I HAPPENED some time ago to attend a theatrical representation, by a company of itinerant performers, who had been quite importunate in their demands on the patronage of the public. The play advertised in the bills being Richard the Third, the gentleman who personated the Duke of Gloster delivered his opening speech,

"Now is the winter of our discontent
Made glorious summer by the son of York."

A voice from the audience interrupted him, pointing out the error. The duke came forward, with a low bow, and explained. He was "perfectly aware," he said, "that, by Shakspeare, the line was written

"Made glorious summer by the son of York,"

but," he added, "when he played it here, he always said New-York, to compliment the country."

His odd ideas of civility occasioned a general smile, which the deformed usurper took in very ill part; but I could not help thinking he was not more ludicrous than many of his brethren further advanced in the profession. The incident insensibly led my mind on to a recollection of the innumerable little inconsistencies and impossibilities which I have seen pass on the stage, without exciting any attention in the audience, who have, from long habit, I suppose, become familiarized with their occurrence, and thus completely overlook their folly. This strikes me more forcibly from the circumstance that I am not a frequenter of the theatres, and look upon the violations of common sense, (as well as of decency, which I have occasionally remarked there,) as complete novelties.

The other night, in a spirit-stirring opera, one young man was stabbed to the heart, in the early part of the evening, under aggravated circumstances, while performing his duty. As I was pitying his sad calamity, and entering (as my custom is) into several apposite and sentimental reflections on the subject, I was rather puzzled by the sight of the dead man in a new uniform, marching in high spirits at the head of the enemy's army! "Why, the cunning rascal!" thought I to myself; "he only feigned to die, and has deserted for a commission! That is the way of the world."

I cannot say I pitied him in the least when he received the contents of at least a dozen muskets in his bosom, besides more wounds than Cesar, from the daggers of the enemy; for I thought it no more than his treachery merited; but, I must say, that I was greatly astonished in the next scene to behold my friend officiating at a banquet, and very effectually, too, considering he had been twice murdered in the last hour. He was killed again towards the end of the piece; but I saw his face afterwards through a hole in one of the columns, giving a brother actor the cue. I think they called him Durey, a clever little fellow, highly appreciated as a prompter.

I do not know any thing more amusing than to see a regular stage hero or heroine, read or write a letter. When they open one, purporting to contain a long story, they peruse the whole three pages at half a glance, gaining by intuition a knowledge of all the details before any other human being could get further than "dear sir." Nothing can exceed their rapidity in reading it, except their despatch in answering it. Such people would be invaluable in a counting-house.

Besides these useful faculties, stage-players possess numerous others, which seem the peculiar gifts of fortune. They can hear footsteps, for instance, long before they approach; and that, too, by cataracts and in tempests; and I have known a sharp-eyed fellow make no ceremony of seeing through a wall, with a distinctness that cannot be too highly commended. There is one gentleman who, in this particular, really deserves well of the audience. He was the other evening enjoying himself in the idea that his uncle was in a foreign country, when he suddenly started up, looking at a closed door, clasping his hands together, and exclaiming, "Gracious heavens, my uncle!" after which the door opened, and his uncle made his appearance. The person who sustained the same part on a subsequent occasion, however, rather outdid him. When he clasped his hands together, and cried, "Gracious heavens, my uncle!" he looked steadily to the right side of the room, while his uncle was coming on from the left. By this means he had an opportunity of giving a second start, much more natural than the first, and thereby got a round of applause.

The characters on the stage are different, in a great many other respects, from those every-day people whom we meet with in real life. A gentleman in the outer world, when he is really intent on glory, and resolved to contribute all in his power towards gaining a battle, generally falls to work forthwith, and stands his chance with the rest of being knocked on the head, run through the body, or shot down. Theatrical warriors are not always in such a hurry. It has often struck me, that Richard the Third was rather getting out of the scrape, in the last scene of that play, when he leaves the noise of the battle at a distance, and comes in alone, notwithstanding his bragging that there must be six Richmonds in the field, five of whom he has just slain. But in this he merely follows the fashion of his companions, as I have several times remarked a prodigiously valorous hero, on the eve of an engagement, shouting out "victory or death!" so fiercely, that I thought the enemy had better keep an eye on their own affairs; but, instead of following his soldiers into the midst of the conflict, according to their expectation as well as mine, he would stay behind and sing a song, sometimes with an encore, eaving his army to get along by themselves. It is astonishing, too, what respect a general often receives in the very fury and lash of a fight. You shall hear at one moment all the horrid din of war; but, on the next, when the general begins to speak, the drummers and trumpeters on both sides drop their instruments; the parties remain silent; the dying cease to groan, till the speech is spoken, after which the awful confusion is renewed more dreadfully than ever. This example in good breeding is very properly adopted by the elements; as you may observe the sky always undrers in the right place, and stops until the hero before the audience has finished delivering his opinions upon any subject. I must confess here, however, that notwithstanding the usual raise the wind gets for swiftness, I have known it to be a little fiercer its time; as, for example, a short period since, as a lady in an old castle was sitting up very late for her lover, she broke in upon a dead silence with the exclamation, "Bless my soul, how the wind blows!" or something more elegantly expressed, but to the same effect, whereupon the wind, as if it had forgotten its art before, and intended then to make up in energy for its want of punctuality, commenced blowing such a sudden and boisterous blast, accompanied by the washing of rain, as drew from the house several manifestations of delight.

There is a young gentleman in one of the theatres often set to personate robbers, who, I think, deserves the thanks of the human race, for having greatly improved upon and mollified the manners of that wicked profession. They used to be extremely rough and brutal in their address; but, in his hands, they have a mildness of demeanor, and a general grace, very interesting. It never fails to soften me with an agreeable surprise when he comes on as that one of the murderers in Macbeth, who tells the tyrant,

"I am one, my liege,
Whom the vile blows and buffets of the world
Have so incensed, that I am reckless what
I do, to spite the world."

While delivering this amiable confession, he is so careful to turn his toes out, and step like a gentleman, that you cannot help thinking the poor cut-throat was brought up in good society, and could dance very prettily, if he only had a mind. The same original taste which metamorphoses his assassins into such decent fellows, makes him play servants like heroes. I am certain if my cotman should enter to announce company with such a majesty of stride, or hand me a letter, or a cup of coffee, with such an elegant flourish, I should set him down for some great nobleman in disguise, and if I had a daughter, she should be looked to.

There is one point for which the subordinate members of our dramatic companies in this city have never been sufficiently appreciated. I mean the wonderful success with which they have disciplined themselves in the practice of the stoical philosophy. We have numerous anecdotes of ancient worthies, who met the most appalling reverses of fortune with composure; but my opinion is, that our supernumeraries could, as the saying is, beat them and five them ten. With what a noble tranquillity they pass through a revolution, or an earthquake; and how some of the ladies hold up their dress from the dust, while flying from the eruption of Mount Vesuvius. The assassination of a man, the falling of a castle, or even the rising of a ghost or two, has no more effect on their even nerves than if they were so many statues. So careless, indeed, are they of those influences which affect other men, that when the French army, in a late spectacle, were climbing Mount St. Bernard, where, if there is any truth in appearances, the thermometer must have been ten degrees below zero, the guide, after having stamped his feet and breathed on his finger ends, sat down on a piece of ice, and took off his hat while he ate his dinner. But this is nothing to the boldness of a thief, who crept one night into the house of a rich burgher; and, when once fairly in, instead of taking what he came for, stopped to make a speech, in which he regretted exceedingly that he had not been able to hit upon some better expedient for raising the wind, in a tone of voice loud enough to have awakened even a New-York watchman.

I have several other observations to make on this subject, which, as I do not write long articles, I shall postpone for some future communication. I mean to attend the theatre occasionally hereafter, and let the public know what is going on. In this I acknowledge two objects, being at once desirous of amusing the reader, and purifying theatricals from certain blemishes which have long remained in them unnoticed. I am sorry to observe there are some things as offensive to delicacy as contrary to reason; when I next witness any of these I promise the public to note them down, for special reprobation.

SEDLEY.

THE NEW-YORK STAGE, ETC.

PARK.—As divers inquiries have been made of us touching the forthcoming opera announced at the Park theatre, we have taken the trouble to procure information on the subject from the gentleman who is adapting the music, through whose politeness we have been favored with an inspection of the full score, and acquainted with the intended arrangements of the musical department. The following is a short account of the piece:

Monsieur Scribe, whose prolific pen has produced more dramas than that of any other man of the present day, which has well entitled him to the name he bears, wrote the opera called "La Dame Blanche, opera comique, en trois actes, mis en musique par L. Boieldieu, Chevalier de l'Ordre royal de la Legion d'Honneur, membre de l'Institut, premier Compositeur de la chambre de M. l'Altesse Royale Madame Duchesse de Berry," and heaven knows what else. Monsieur Scribe has taken the idea of a lady in white, from Sir Walter Scott's white lady, and has made a decent drama, which Boieldieu has immortalized by setting to very delightful music. The French are exceedingly partial to Sir Walter Scott, and Les Ecosais; out of compliment to one or the other, we presume, they have made Weber's Der Freischütz a Scotch piece, and turned the most legitimate of all German devils, Zamiel, into a breechless Highland bogle, and called him Robin des Bois!

The White Lady, and the Castle of Avenel, are retained in the opera, but having so far complimented Sir Walter, he proceeds to lay the scene in Scotland, in the year 1759, and he has thereon worked up a drama, which Howard Payne has closely translated for Covent Garden theatre.

Scribe's drama has been adhered to in the forthcoming opera, as far as Boieldieu's music is concerned; the situations and the sentiments are the same, and every care has been taken to render the music justice; but, in addition, as in Cinderella, much has been introduced. The spirit of Avenel appears, and the works of Auber, Rossini, and Weber furnish the music for fairies; and those deficiencies which the idiom of the languages, and the different taste of the audiences, render unavoidable, are supplied in the same way—it remains to be seen how successfully, and for that of course we reserve ourselves. Suffice it to say, that all the chief morceaux of Boieldieu are retained; the three finales to the three several acts are translated without a note being changed, or the meaning of a word altered; and the celebrated auction scene is rendered exactly note for note, and word for word, according to the French score. The piece is under the direction of Mr. Barry, and Mr. Evers is employed in the scenic department. The band will be increased, and a harpist, Mr. Trust, has been engaged; in short, if the piece is produced with the care and attention for which the reputation of those under whose care it makes its appearance, ought to be a sufficient guarantee, the public may reasonably expect a rich musical treat. The chorus at the Park is stronger and better at the present moment than it ever has been previously; the band is admirable; and when we add that Mrs. Austin is the prima donna, Jones the tenore; and that Mrs. Sharpe, Messrs. Placide, Thorne and Richings have all prominent parts, we must consider the programme as very inviting; indeed, the introduction of such a classical composition to our boards is an event of importance to amateurs, and forms a feature, even in this age of musical improvement.

Among the attractions produced at this theatre, during Mr. Maywood's engagement, is the tragic drama of Hernani, adapted from the French by Kenney. It was received with decided marks of approbation, and is the same piece which, several years ago, created such a lively sensation in Paris. That city was deluged with Hernani shawls, Hernani hats, &c. Mr. Maywood's able personation of the principal part, Don Leon, sealed its popularity with the audience.

Mr. Forrest closed his very successful engagement on Wednesday evening.

AMERICAN.—Every body praises Miss Vincent and Mr. Blanchard. The former has succeeded surprisingly. She is young, gay, pretty, and graceful, full of life, and evidently gifted with that natural intelligence and power which study may improve, but can never bestow. Her debut before a New-York audience is said to have been her twelfth appearance on any stage, and as such must be considered an unusual pledge of future excellence. With her material she requires care not yet to attempt too much. Her action discovers (the usual fault of inexperience) an occasional exuberance, which her good sense will, doubtless, soon see the necessity of subduing. Good acting consists comparatively but little in gestures; those which are undertaken certainly cannot be too graceful and appropriate; but the genius of the performer may better display itself in the face and reading. The most impressive and affecting points we have seen executed on the stage were done almost without the motion of a limb. As a vocalist, also, nature has been liberal to her; but there is a fault in the management of her voice, which may be easily corrected with proper instruction; at least the attempt should be made. We advance these observations in the most friendly spirit, as we have rarely been so favorably impressed with the early efforts of any performer. Mr. Blanchard is increasing the number of his friends. The affairs of this house altogether wear a promising aspect.

RICHMOND-HILL.—This seems to be a season fertile in charming young actresses. Among these Miss Mary Duff will not be overlooked, by those on whom a most promising person and a pleasing style of playing can make any impression.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE F. MORRIS, THEODORE S. PAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, APRIL 21, 1832.

New novel.—The author of the "Dutchman's Fireside" has another novel in the press. The scene is laid at first in Virginia, and subsequently in Kentucky. The almost unprecedented favor with which the last has been received in Great Britain and France, as well as in this country, will undoubtedly ensure to the present work an immediate sale. Every one knows the graphic power of the writer in depicting American scenes, characters, and events. This gives his productions an additional currency, and is acknowledged by the foreign critics as peculiarly fresh and charming. He was among the first to strike out upon a track which even yet is but too little trodden. The various circumstances attending the establishment and wonderful growth of a nation, separated from European influences, and which have modified our character and manners, and made us different from every other people, afford a deep mine of materials, which, in the hands of such a terse and sterling writer, proves of rich value. A translation of the "Dutchman's Fireside" has appeared in France, under the title of "Le Coin-de-feu de l'Hollandais," and is in favor with the French critics. The forthcoming story may be soon expected from the press of the Harpers, who have lately turned more of their attention to domestic compositions, instead of occupying themselves, as heretofore, almost entirely with foreign reprints. For this they deserve all praise, especially when, as on the present occasion, they present the country with the productions of its best writers.

Feline sagacity.—De la Croix relates the following almost incredible instance of sagacity in a cat, which, even under the receiver of an air pump, discovered the means of escaping a death that appeared to all present inevitable. "I once saw," said he, "a lecturer upon experimental philosophy place a cat under the glass receiver of an air pump, for the purpose of demonstrating that very certain fact, that life cannot be supported without air and respiration. The lecturer had already made several strokes with the piston, in order to exhaust the receiver of its air, when the animal, that had begun to feel herself very uncomfortable in the rarefied atmosphere, was fortunate enough to discover the source from whence her uneasiness proceeded. She placed her paw upon the hole through which the air escaped, and thus prevented any more from passing out of the receiver. All the exertions of the officer were now unavailing; in vain he drew the piston; the cat's paw effectually prevented its operation. Hoping to effect his purpose, he let air again into the receiver, which, as soon as the cat perceived, she withdrew her paw from the aperture; but when he attempted to exhaust the receiver, she applied her paw as before. All the spectators clapped their hands in admiration of the wonderful sagacity of the animal, and the lecturer found himself under the necessity of liberating her, and substituting another in her place, that possessed less penetration, and enabled him to exhibit the cruel experiment."

Lamp glasses.—To prevent the cracking of lamp glasses, by a sudden expansion of heat, an effectual remedy is found in running a point of a diamond along the base of the tube. By this solution of continuity, it is relieved from the violence produced by the sudden effects of the heat. A glazier can best perform the operation with the diamond.

Oregon Territory.—A resolution was lately passed by the house of representatives, requesting the president to inform that body "whether possession has been taken of any part of the territory of the United States on the Pacific Ocean by the subjects of any foreign power," to which he replies, under date of the second inst. that there is no satisfactory information on this subject now in the possession of the executive, and that none is likely to be obtained, except by a mission set on foot for the express purpose, which would be attended with "very considerable expense."

Vulgar ridicule.—To turn delicate and beautiful sentiments or expressions into ridicule, is the easiest, and, at the same time the meanest task an author can descend to. It discovers only the superiority of a ruffian, in mere brute force, over the tender weakness of a woman, although her looks and her entreaties, which have no sway over his rough unpolished breast, might bring a hero to her feet. Some people think feeling is effeminate, and find a kind of manliness in being callous to the various surrounding influences. It is a most mistaken opinion. No one need be ashamed of the sensibilities of human nature—of sympathy, of pity, of horror against cruelty, or attraction towards virtue, grace, and beauty. This yieldingness of the soul, proves only that it is fresh and pure—that it is alive to those impressions which lead to noble action, and by which heaven intended that it should be affected; that it is not yet worn out and hacknied by common-place thoughts. The boasted stoical philosophy of the ancients teems with distorted and unnatural precepts.

Flirts.—"I shall be at home next Sunday," said a young girl, desirous of keeping in her train a country lad, who began to find out that he was rather jilted. "So shall I," was the reply.

A disinterested hint.—The editor of a country newspaper gives the public a broad hint in the annexed paragraph:

"It is not simply by a numerous subscription list that a paper is to be supported, and the interests of a town promoted, but by a generous and general habit of advertising in its columns. It is this which gives support to a paper, and character to a town. But suppose a paper to be printed here, week after week, and month after month, and not a solitary trader of the town to announce in its columns a willingness to dispose of merchandise, what would be the inference out of town? Surely there are no traders and no merchandise here."

Journal of a Naturalist.—This amusing work is worthy of the general praise with which it has been received. We are indebted to it for the two first paragraphs on our last page.

Obituary.—The late decease of Mr. John Hone has drawn forth numerous tributes in praise of his enlarged and liberal mind, his keen sagacity, and great benevolence of disposition. We cannot omit the opportunity of uniting our sympathy with that of the wide circle of friends by whom his death is deeply lamented throughout the Union. His high standing in society was entirely owing to his intrinsic goodness and ability; and his many virtues and acknowledged talents justly rendered him the pride of an extensive family connexion.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE BUTCHER-BIRD.

THE great shrike, or butcher-bird, breeds annually near my dwelling. It is one of our late birds of passage, but its arrival is soon made known to us by its croaking, unmusical voice, from the summit of some tree. Its nest is large and ill-concealed; and during the season of incubation the male bird is particularly vigilant and uneasy at any approach towards his sitting mate, though often by his clamoring anxiety he betrays it and her to every bird-nesting boy. The female, when the eggs are hatched, unites her vociferations with those of the male, and facilitates the detection of the brood. Both parents are very assiduous in their attentions to their offspring, feeding them long after they have left the nest; for the young appear to be heavy, inactive birds, and little able to capture the winged insects, that constitute their principal food. I could never observe that this bird destroyed others smaller than itself, or even fed upon flesh. I have hung up dead young birds, and even parts of them, near their nests; but never found that they were touched by the shrike. Yet it appears that it must be a butcher too; and that the name "lanius," bestowed on it by Gesner two hundred and fifty years ago, was not lightly given. My neighbor's gamekeeper kills it as a bird of prey; and tells me he has known it draw the weak young pheasants through the bars of the breeding-coops; and others have assured me that they have killed them when banqueting on the carcass of some little bird they had captured. All small birds have an antipathy to the shrike, betray anger, and utter the moan of danger, when it approaches their nest. I have often heard this signal of distress, and, cautiously approaching to learn the cause, have frequently found that this butcher-bird occasioned it. They will mob, attack, and drive it away, as they do the owl, as if fully acquainted with its plundering propensities. Linnæus attached to it the trivial epithet "excubitor" a sentinel; a very apposite appellation, as this bird seldom conceals itself in a bush, but sits perched upon some upper spray, or in an open situation, heedful of danger, or watching for its prey. This shrike must be most mischievously inclined, if not a predatory bird. May twenty-third—A pair of robins have young ones in a bank near my dwelling: the anxiety and vociferation of the poor things have three times this day called my attention to the cause of their distress, and each time have I seen this bird watching near the place, or stealing away upon my approach; and then the tumult of the parents subsided; but had they not experienced injury, or been aware that it was meditated, all this terror and outcry would not have been excited.

ANIMAL LIFE.

Of the natural duration of animal life it is, from many circumstances, difficult to form an accurate statement, the wild creatures being in a great measure removed from observation, and those in a condition of domestication being seldom permitted to live as long as their bodily strength will allow. Herbivorous animals probably live longer than carnivorous ones, vegetable food being most easily obtainable in all seasons in a regular and requisite supply; whereas animals that subsist on flesh, or by the capture of prey, are necessitated at one period to pine without food, and at another, are gorged with superfluity: and when the bodily powers of rapacious creatures become impaired, existence is difficult to support, and gradually ceases; but with herbivorous animals in the same condition, supply is not equally precarious, or wholly denied. Yet it is probable that few animals in a perfectly wild state live to a natural extinction of life. In a state of domestication, the small number of carnivorous creatures about us are sheltered, and fed with care, seldom are in want of proper food, and at times are permitted to await a gradual decay, continuing as long as nature permits; and by such attentions, many have attained to a great age; but this is rather an artificial than a natural existence. Our herbivorous animals, being kept mostly for profit, are seldom allowed to remain beyond approaching age; and when its advances trench upon our emoluments by diminishing the supply of utility, we remove them. The uses of the horse, though time may reduce them, are often protracted; and our gratitude for past services, or interest in what remains, prompts us to support his life by prepared food, of easy digestion, or requiring little mastication, and he certainly by such means attains to a longevity probably beyond the contingencies of nature. I have still a favorite pony—for she has been a faithful and able performer of all the duties required of her in my service for upwards of two-and-twenty years—and, though now above five-and-twenty years of age, retains all her powers perfectly, without any diminution or symptom of decrepitude; the fineness of limb, brilliancy of eye, and ardor of spirit, are those of the colt, and though treated with no remarkable care, she has never been disabled by the illness of a day, or sickened by the drench of the farrier. With birds, it is probably the same as with other creatures; and the eagle, the raven, the parrot, &c. in a domestic state, attain great longevity; and though we suppose them naturally tenacious of life, yet, in a really wild state, they would probably expire before the period which they attain when under our attention and care. And this is much the case with man, who probably outlives most other creatures; for though excess may often shorten, and disease or misfortune terminate his days, yet, naturally, he is a long-lived animal. His "threescore years and ten" are often prolonged by constitutional strength, and by the cares, the loves, the charities of human nature. As the decay of his powers awakens solicitude, duty and affection increase their attentions, and the spark of life only expires when the material is exhausted.

A FABLE.

A thistle happened to spring up very near to a sensitive plant. The former, observing the extreme bashfulness and delicacy of the latter, thus addressed her:

"My good neighbor, why are you so modest and reserved, as to withdraw your leaves from the approach of strangers? Take example and advice from me; if I liked not their familiarity I would make them keep their distance, nor should any saucy finger provoke me unavenged."

"Our tempers and qualities," replied the sensitive plant, "are widely different. I have neither the ability nor inclination to give offence; you, it seems, are not destitute of either. My desire is to live peaceably in the station wherein I am placed; and though my humility may cause me a moment's uneasiness, it tends on the whole to preserve my tranquillity and safety. The case is otherwise with you, whose irritable temper and revengeful disposition will probably be the cause of your destruction."

While they were thus arguing the point, the gardener came with his little spaddle in order to lighten the earth round the stem of the sensitive plant, but perceiving the thistle, he thrust his instrument through the root of it, and directly tossed it out of the garden.

MADAME MARS.

A great deal has been written about Madame Mars, the celebrated French actress. I remember an anecdote of her which I have never seen printed. She had, in the course of her representations, made some allusion against the king, which was exceedingly offensive to the audience, who insisted on her repeating the words "long live the king." After a considerable disturbance, she found the performance could not proceed unless she complied, and coming forward in a manner full of the arch grace peculiar to herself, she succeeded in gaining a moment's silence, and said—

"You wish, gentlemen, that I should say, 'long live the king,' well, then, I have said it." This equivocal repartee was received in good humor, and gained her thunders of applause.

BREVITIES OF NAPOLEON.

Opinion makes men brave—nature forms them intrepid. What is called the law of nature is made up simply of two things—self-interest and reason.

To be a great man requires only courage enough to support adversity.

Every thing is easy, if you follow the current of opinion: a shallow bark neither wants canvas nor oars to glide down the stream.

Nothing is more imperious than weakness, when it fancies itself upheld by strength; some weak people, on the contrary, are sensible of their weakness, and are able to make a good use of it.

On a reverse of fortune we always respect those who have respected themselves in prosperity.

That would be a most singular book in which no falsehood could be detected.

THE GIGANTIC BOOK.

The following is copied from the Globe into the London Literary Gazette:—"The largest book that ever went to press will appear next year in London. It will be entitled 'The Pantheon of English Heroes.' Every page will be twenty-four feet high by twelve broad, and the letters half a foot long. It has been necessary to construct a machine expressly for the fabrication of the paper. This gigantic work will be printed by means of a steam-engine, and instead of black ink, gold varnish will be used. Only one hundred copies will be struck off, intended as the ornaments of the principal English libraries."

LIBERAL TRANSLATION.

A youngster just from college being asked what was the Latin for ma-hog-an-y, answered, Mecus porcus et ego.

TO MY HARP.

HARP of the mournful strings!
I cannot tune my numbers ev'n to thee!
There has a deep and sluggish lethargy
Crept o'er my spirit's wings.
Some incubus is on them—whence its birth,
I know not; but it bears them down to earth.

My thoughts no longer soar
To Fancy's regions, when the mists of gloom
Gather in shadows o'er them, to relume
Their dying light once more.
Chain'd, as by magic, to one "wildring dream,
They powerless lie, without ev'n hope's faint beam.

Canst thou not break the spell,
Once potent lyre, and bid them rise again?
Is there no chord, I may not touch in vain,
Where song was wont to dwell?
Awake, awake once more thy siren art,
Give back thy distant echoes to my heart.

Flow o'er the silent hour;
For crowded thoughts lie dark and heavily
Upon my mind—their weight oppresses me
With an unusual power.
Let me cast off their galling bondage now,
And only to thy master-spirit bow.

Harp of the mournful strings!
Thou hast a charm in every music-tone,
A soothing spell for every bright dream frown,
Giving to sorrow wings.
Friend of my better days, I turn to thee,
As the lone star, o'er life's dark destiny.

All other lights depart,
Or prove but treach'rous guides to happiness;
Luring through dangers to some strange excess
Of feeling in the heart.
Kindling awhile a wild and scorching fire,
Over the sear'd hope's ruins to expire.

But thou, my harp, so long
Companion of my thoughts, canst change at will
The thronging memories, on thy chords that thrill,
Till yielding to thy song,
The past flings back a mild and soften'd glow,
Divested of its bitterness and wo.

Forsake me not, my lyre!
I seek not fame in thy rude minstrelsy,
Not in ambition do I ask of thee
My numbers to inspire.
But thou canst bring relief, and teach my heart
How, with its idle dreams and hopes, to part. ESTELLE.

POVERTY AND WEALTH.

If wealth is full of pleasures, it is also full of danger. I should wish my son to possess riches, but not until after he had suffered poverty. A man can best examine the real naked features of human nature from a low hovel or beneath a humble dress. He will then make a thousand wonderful discoveries, which are secrets to one bred up in luxury. He will detect the worthlessness of much that is showy, and find greatness of soul and beautiful displays of virtue and talent where he least expected. The flatterer pulls off his mask when he comes into his presence. The virtues of the meek and the good shine out to his eyes with their true lustre. The deceits, the hollow show, and all the artificial appearances which are kept up before the powerful, are laid aside for the humble, who see them in their real shapes and color. The former resembles a spectator in the boxes of the theatre during a representation; the latter a wanderer behind the scenes, who beholds the performers in their actual characters. Wealth exercises several bad influences upon young men. It deprives them of the stimulus to severe application, and crowds their path with temptations to pleasure. How many strong intellects must have lain idle thus, like laborers in the sunshine, their work undone because their wants were supplied. How many more noble characters, who are now seen through past history like beacon lights over a sea, would have gone down to obscurity undistinguished, but that want urged them onward to exertions, in the course of which their talents were developed and their integrity brought to the test. Plutarch relates that when Mark Antony was in adversity, he voluntarily yielded to the severest toils and privations to which the meanest of his troops were subjected, and discovered so many noble qualities, that had we seen no more of his life, we might justly set him down as a great and virtuous hero; but when the tide of fortune again turned in his favor, he became again enervated, licentious, and cruel, so that he now appears one of the most degraded of men.

To the conclusion which we naturally draw from this occurrence, there are doubtless numerous exceptions. The rich are not necessarily bad, or the poor great, but we speak only of the influences of the two circumstances of being.

George and Thomas were friends at school. Both were young, clear-headed, and good-humored, neither being remarkable for any quality of person or mind. They were just like other boys, having nothing in their bearing to indicate whether they were to turn out corsairs, poets, or orators. If there was observable in them any thing worthy of remark, it was the general similarity of their tastes, minds, and dispositions. They were both satisfied to beat the hoop, fly the kite, and spin the top without wearing out their school-books by any unnecessary application, for both would rather have their ears boxed than study a lesson.

I sometimes think what a strange sight it would be if we could actually behold, over the crowds of human beings forever shifting around us, the influences by which their lives are, or are to be guided. How interesting this would be in a group of school-boys, who, while playing in their unconscious innocence and carelessness together, are each one already entangled inevitably, inextricably in some viewless destiny which shall, in time, with irresistible power, draw on his young and feeble footsteps—perhaps to misery and perdition, perhaps to greatness and glory. To the eyes of one so gifted, how would Bonaparte have looked in his boyish shape? What gleaming light—what dark gloom would have by turns attended on his infant steps? But these are idle speculations.

The two boys at school were early handed over to the different influences which colored their future career, and these were not long in becoming perceptible in their conduct and character.—George and Thomas were placed at school by their parents at about the same period. Thomas was brought by his mother. The carriage door was opened by a livery footman, who helped the young master down the steps with particular care, paying him at the same time the most respectful deference.

"I have brought you my boy, Master Thomas, Mr. Robertson," said the fond parent to the conductor of the academy, while her eyes glistened with maternal affection. "I have brought you my boy, and I shall leave him in your care, I hope, for several years."

"We will do all we can to repay your confidence, Mrs. Green. What are your particular wishes respecting his studies? Will you have them selected with a view to any particular profession?"

"Why, my dear sir, it has pleased Providence to endow us with an ample fortune, and he is our only hope; of course, we wish him to receive the education of a gentleman; but it is not probable he will ever have to work for his living."

"Then, I suppose, a thorough English course of lessons. Let him be well grounded in rhetoric, mathematics, and—"

"Oh, my dear sir, no. There is no use of his straining his tender mind with such hard studies. Make a gentleman of him, but not a pedagogue, (I beg your pardon, sir.)"

Mr. Robertson smiled and bowed.

"If there was the slightest possibility of his ever having to earn his own bread, it would alter the case; but you know, my dear sir, there must be a difference between poor people and rich."

"He must learn music then, I suppose," said Mr. Robertson?

"Oh, music! certainly, divine music. I wish him to read it at sight. You will find a guitar among his things; and I wish you to see particularly that he practises. You know that keeps him busy, and does not hurt his eyes. See," she added affectionately, placing her hand, glittering with jewels, beneath the youngster's chin, and pushing back the hair from his forehead, "dear little fellow, his eyes are already very, very weak."

"Do you wish him to study any of the classical languages, madam?"

"Who? what?" said Mrs. Green, looking up.

"Latin and Greek, madam. Or should you prefer Spanish and French?"

"Should you like to study Latin and Greek and Spanish and French, my dear Tom, or any of the other classical languages?"

The boy sulked a little, put his finger in his mouth, and looked down on the floor. The mother kissed him again.

"Dear little, sweet little fellow; do just what you like with him, Mr. Robertson; only never punish him, if you please; he is very tender dispositioned, and can't bear to be whipped; and of all things don't let him study nights, and make him attend to his music and dancing; and I wish very much to have him study Italian, it's so useful in singing. Pray, my dear, stand up straight, and be a good boy, and behave like a gentleman; and here's some money for you, my dear, and you shall often come home and see us."

So saying, although the tears were in her eyes, (for mothers are still mothers, whether learned or unlearned,) she smiled graciously on Mr. Robertson; kissed little Tom again and again; went away a few steps, came back exclaiming, "the dear, dear little dear," kissed him again, and disappeared. The boy was conducted among his companions, in due form, and soon began to be interested in the sports.

A short time afterwards a man, dressed in a plain gray suit, with a cane, and feet dusty from an apparently long walk, stopped before the door of the academy. He held by the hand a little boy. The new comers entered, and the elder addressed himself to Mr. Robertson, with whom he had been previously acquainted, with the brevity of a man of business.

"My son, Master George Steele, sir. I wish to place him at your school. His trunk will be here immediately from the neighboring town, where the stage left us."

The conversation usual on such occasions then ensued. Inquiries into the boy's age, tastes, capacities, &c. were made and satisfied, and the directions of the parent given respecting the course of study to be pursued.

"Above all things," said Mr. Steele, "let him form habits of strictly moral conduct and of severe industry, and subject himself to the discipline of the school without a murmur. If he does not like the place he may quit it, but while in it he must make no disturbance of any kind, but treat every one with respect. He will have to fight his own way through the world. I have been unfortunate, and have nothing whatever to leave him but a good education. If he is worth any thing, this will be sufficient; if he is idle and irresolute, he will sink into poverty and neglect. Remember, George, what you learn here will be your only fortune. At an expense which I can scarcely sustain, I furnish you with this opportunity of obtaining credit in the world. For all else that makes man respectable and happy, you must depend upon yourself."

They shook hands and parted, and so the two boys commenced their education.

The next important era in the lives of these young gentlemen, was the period of their quitting school. It was five years after the preceding circumstances, and they were both about sixteen years of age. It happened that at the same time there was a general examination in the academy, and the various attainments of George and Thomas were thereby disclosed. The latter showed to advantage in nothing except a declamation, recited with a considerable flourish of theatrical elegance, and a translation from the Italian, for which he received a medal. George, on the contrary, discovered a pervading knowledge in all the necessary branches. He excited some astonishment by the rapidity and ease with which he replied to the casual interrogatories of several men of science, who chanced to be present, in arithmetic, algebra, and the mathematics. Two essays from his pen, on law and political economy, were listened to with attention and interest; and in geography, astronomy, and the various other ordinary departments of learning, he appeared perfectly at home.

The parents of both boys attended this exhibition of their knowledge, and both were pleased.

"Come, Tom," said the mamma, kissing her darling, "good-by to books and school forever, and now for pleasure."

"Come, George," said Mr. Steele, shaking the modest boy by the hand, while a quiet smile of pride and pleasure stole over his features, "come, my boy, so far you have done well. I am satisfied with you. I am more than satisfied. I am proud of you. But," he added, checking himself, "my dear boy, you must not fall into the error that your education is complete. You have things to learn yet of which you have no idea. Do not be vain of what you have acquired. Although I am praising your past exertions, I praise you more for what I expect you to do than for what you have done."

"I know, father," replied George, "it would be foolish in me to be proud, for I recollect having read the other day that Sir Isaac Newton said, even of all his knowledge, that it seemed no more than a pebble is to the ocean."

"Right, George, right, my son, perfectly right; so now let us return home, and teach you business and the world. All that you have learned here is but as weapons, which must now be used."

"But, father, Tom says he has finished his education."

"No man's education is finished till he is in his grave," said the father.

And so the boys started in life.

We will imagine, if the reader pleases, that another period of five years has elapsed. The schoolboys have now grown up to manhood, both inspired in all their actions with the precepts of their parents. The one, that he would "never have to work for his living," the other, that "for all that makes man respectable and happy he must depend upon himself."

At the age of twenty-one, George was taken into partnership with the house which for five years he had served with the purest integrity and the most unremitting care. While he devoted an ample portion of his time to the necessities of his avocation, he still found leisure occasionally to run through a book, keeping alive his taste and amusing his fancy. He had reviewed his school studies with great profit. His more matured understanding and experience let in light upon many passages which were before dark to him. Sometimes, indeed, he sighed, as he beheld the fine equipages around him, and wished heaven had blessed him with a fortune; but again he felt that he was exempted from many temptations which surround the path of those more prosperous. His necessities had drilled him into a severe system of economy and habits of abstemiousness, by which means his health remained firm and his mind cheerful, so that when the rewards of his unceasing labors began to flow in upon him, he was prepared to avail himself of them to the best advantage.

While this gradual but steady improvement was working in the situation of George, Thomas was leading a life of pleasure. He had grown up into an elegant looking young man, of great taste in points of fashion. His will was law touching the cut of a coat or the shape of a beaver; and a woman might fall in love with him desperately till he opened his mouth, when his first sentiment would break the spell. How had he spent his life? What had he studied? What had he thought? What did he know? What could he do? He was a proficient in horse-flesh. He could drive a tandem superbly. You could not touch him at billiards, and his dress was always exact and perfect; but his mind was uncultivated and so was his heart. He was prodigal, not generous; and he had never known friendship, because he had never felt want.

He was once trying a pair of splendid bays before a gig, on a pleasant summer afternoon. The long train of gay promenaders on either side of Broadway looked, admired, envied. No one ever appeared better while driving. You might take him for Pelham.

A foot passenger, plainly but neatly dressed, paused in the middle of the street to give him way. It was George. They had seldom met since their school-days, but nevertheless recognized each other, and bowed. George was carrying a large book under his arm.

"What a fool is that plodding fellow," said Tom, as he quickened the pace of his horses with a resounding crack of the whip. "How I hate a bookworm. Step, you rascals!"

"How finely Tom looks," thought George. "I almost envy him those superb horses; but no matter."

They both passed on; one to Cato's, to spend afternoon and evening in smoking, drinking, and carousal; the other to his humble home, to drink in with secret delight rich draughts of instruction from a work of genius.

At this period I happened to be well acquainted with them, and had the opportunity of watching the different degrees of happiness produced, on the one hand by industry, intelligent study, and moderation in all life's pleasures, and on the other by luxury and idleness.

I caught Thomas one day alone. He seemed sad and even thoughtful—a strange thing for him.

"Well, Tom, what's the matter?"

He yawned, and stretched his limbs.

"Really, I don't know, but I am wretchedly dull and stupid."

"How can you be dull with every thing delightful at your command, you who hold the key to every avenue of pleasure?"

"Well," he yawned again, "what you say is very true. I don't know how it is, but I am fairly tired out. I can't contrive to get rid of my time."

"Have you nothing to do?"

"Nothing; positively nothing."

"It's a fine day, why not walk?"

"I'm tired of walking. I hate walking. I never enjoyed a walk in my life. Riding has grown tedious, and sailing is horrid."

"Suppose you try reading?"

"Oh, dreadful! I could no more sit down and read a book than I could fly. I did drag through Waverley, but I was asleep, fast asleep, when I got to Jenis. I can't read. I've lost the relish. My mind wanders away over a thousand objects. I must have excitement, or I am miserable. The day to me is like a long, unpleasant journey; I am always tired to death before I get to the end. Oh, if some one would invent a method of passing away the time!"

I bade him good by, and left him, again yawning and stretching his limbs.

Some time afterwards I had occasion to spend an evening with George. I reproved him for not having visited me.

"I blame myself," he said, "but I have scarcely leisure to visit any one. My time is occupied continually. I never get through business till late in the afternoon, and sometimes in the evening; and as every prospect of my prosperity in the world depends upon my care and attention at the counting-room, I am very industrious, I assure you."

"Are you not afraid," I asked, "that a too severe application will warp your mind, and injure your health?"

"Oh no, I am prudent enough to avoid that. I have a most cheerful succession of employments, each in some way uniting pleasure with utility. The only difficulty I have is to get time for them all. The more I apply myself in this way, the more pleasure I take in applying myself. The most melancholy reflection I have is that, knowing as I do how short life is, the weakness of my body compels me to devote so much of it to sleep, or I regret that fortune has not placed in my hands the means to study with less interruption, to educate myself according to a higher standard, to travel, and thus obtain a wider field of observation."

About a year had elapsed when the elegant Mr. Tom Green suddenly abandoned all his old haunts about town, left off smoking, drinking, and swearing, cut off his mustachios and whiskers, and made the following soliloquy to the moon one night, as he was returning from an evening visit to Henrietta B—.

"She is poor, but I have money. I love her, and it will be a noble action to choose such a creature, from no motive more selfish than admiration. How surprised and delighted she will be when she receives my offer—when she is raised from her humble and quiet sphere to my splendor and fashion. I think I ought to marry. I think I will marry her—I will marry her."

Having settled the matter thus to his satisfaction, he entered his home, and went to bed. The next day he wrote her and her father a letter.

"The old gentleman will be out of his wits with joy," said he, as he pressed down the seal upon the yielding wax.

The next morning the servant brought a letter. He reached out his hand, with the most self-complaisant feeling imaginable.

"Poor little thing! Let us see how passion looks in the pretty periods of the charming Henrietta."

He read, with a start, and sudden change of countenance—

"Deepest regret—highest estimation—valuable as a friend"—Great heavens! "Painful necessity of declining."

He swore a round oath of horror and astonishment at an event so totally unexpected. How a man with a hundred thousand dollars, and such a person, could be refused by a quiet, modest little girl like Henrietta B—, was beyond his conception. But he was not a man to die of love.

"There are others as good as she, and not quite so particular, so, John, saddle Surry, and bring him to the door immediately. Fly, you scoundrel!"

A few weeks afterwards, Mr. George Steele's marriage with Henrietta B— was announced in the daily prints.

"Saddle Surry, John; quick, you rascal," said Mr. Tom Green, when he read the paragraph.

I have one more picture to show of each. Years passed on. One day a gentleman stepped from a gig, which had stopped before the door of an elegant mansion, and inquired for Mr. Green.

"How is he to-day?" asked the doctor of the nurse.

"Worse, sir, much worse; his pains are excessive. He is peevish and disagreeable to his best friends."

"Ay, ay," observed the physician, "the gout is a dreadful complaint."

As he spoke he entered the chamber where the poor invalid sat, writhing with the anguish of his excruciating disease, which had been brought on by inaction and high living. His face was bloated and flushed, and exhibited symptoms of excessive agony.

We break away abruptly from so unpleasant a scene, and stand for a moment within the halls of congress. A deeply interesting question engages their attention, and a speaker rises. It is George. His words carry conviction to every heart. The murmur of acquiescence and approbation runs round among the crowd. He obtains the object for which he has exerted himself, and his name is full of honor.

This is but a simple sketch, Messrs. Editors, but it is founded on real life; and if I have attempted to introduce no startling incident or marvellous character, more strongly to arrest the reader's attention, it is because I have adhered closely to the true career of two of my friends, one of whom has been ruined by affluence, the other elevated by poverty.

SKETCHES BY A BRIEFLESS LAWYER.

MY FIRST SUIT

Was in the court of love. At one and twenty I was an old practitioner there; and when I had taken my admission as an attorney at law, experience certainly gave me a claim to the degree of counsellor in matters of the heart. The years of my clerkship were not entirely given to Coke and Blackstone. I mingled poetry with law, and sentiment with the study of feudal tenures. In short, I now shrewdly suspect that when I became of age, and added esquire to my name, I was a superficial lawyer, and a male coquet. I had frittered away my best feelings in casual attachments, which were formed in society, and rarely endured a fortnight, and I began, at length, to fear that I should never love a woman as I wished to love a wife. But my time had not yet come. I wish I could put on paper my impressions of E— H—. I cannot think of a single feature of her person or character sufficiently prominent for me to seize upon, and by a few touches give an idea of her. Her figure was too short, her eyes too small, her nose too long; and I might proceed, and point out an imperfection in every feature and limb, and yet the combination of them all, produced one of the most lovely females I ever knew. Her person, though short, was exquisitely formed; her small eyes were so sparkling and intelligent, that I preferred them to all the "soft, black, mild blue," or "gloriously rolling orbs" I ever saw; and even her nose, if it had been shorter by a hair's breadth than it was, would have spoiled her face. If there was any fault in her character, it was that, in the strict sense of the term, it was too perfect. She possessed too few of the foibles and hardly enough of the weakness of her sex. I cannot think of a single thing that she ever said or did, during my acquaintance with her, that was improper, or which she could have wished unspoken or undone.

I do not now recollect whether it was a poet or a lawyer that said,
"Great streams from little fountains flow, Tall oaks from little acorns grow;"

but I know that the trite sentiment contained in this rhyme was verified in my case. The most trifling occurrence imaginable first checked me in my giddy thoughtless career, and directed my attention to E— H—. I was introduced to her at a party at her own house, by a young lady who took me with her, that we might continue there a flirtation in which we were engaged. Written mottoes, or sentiments selected from the productions of different authors, were introduced in the course of the evening; and one, containing a couplet from one of those beautiful and highly poetical episodes, occasionally to be met with in Don Juan, was playfully handed to me by my fair hostess. The selection happened to be from a passage that I particularly admired, and on receiving it I repeated, in continuation, the remainder of the sentence. I found that it was one with which she also was very much pleased. I do not recollect precisely how it happened, but during the conversation which ensued about the works of Byron and other poets, I gradually divested myself of the affectations of speech and manner I had adopted in society, and at the close of a somewhat protracted tele-a-tele, found that I had been speaking very naturally and sincerely of my tastes and feelings.

I should be repeating more than a "twice-told tale," were I to describe the gradual ripening of the partiality, with which I regarded Miss H— after our first interview, into love. Every incident of my acquaintance with her is still fresh in my recollection. When the lapse of years, and the pursuits of active life, have dampened the warm and enthusiastic feelings of youth, and the cares, hopes and fears of manhood have exercised their full influence over the heart, and left it seared with disappointment, and dead to the generous feelings which flowed with the warm blood of earlier life, the recollections of that period, and the pursuits which then engrossed the mind, recur to us in the glow and brilliancy of youthful coloring. They alone, when the occupations of manhood, and ambition, with its maddening influence, have passed away and are forgotten, retain their influence. Such, at least, is the vividness with which the occurrences of this period of my life are brought back to me, even after many years, that I am incapable of continuing the relation of them in the light tone in which I commenced.

It has been said that love cannot exist without encouragement; but I loved not only without it, but almost without hope. That perfect propriety of manner and speech, to which I have before alluded, as one of the characteristics of Miss H— prevented a discovery whether my feelings were reciprocated until I had openly declared them. This I could not do. The truth must come out—I was too poor to support a wife; and until I could have placed Miss H— in a situation equal in comfort and elegance to that which she then occupied, I felt that I should have acted dishonorably in seeking her hand. She was possessed of a very considerable fortune. I had but my profession, into the practice of which I was then about entering. Upon my success in it, which years alone could determine, depended not only the possibility of my forming any connexion, but even my subsistence in life. Such was my situation, and such (when I thought) were my reflections on it; yet, with a strange infatuation, I still lingered near Miss H—, without any definite object; without acknowledging to myself that I sought her love, yet daily becoming more and more fascinated.

I was at length rescued from utter imbecility by the workings of what had hitherto been my master passion. I know not whether I should say I have been blessed or cursed by a continued and burning ambition. It has been productive of more misery to me, than all the misfortunes of my life. It has pallied the enjoyments of the present by hopes and aspirations for the future. It has been with me at all times and in all places. In its ragings it has driven me from the amusements of my youth, from the spell of wit and beauty, and from the converse of the learned and wise; from the former by telling me that my time was wasting; from the latter, by mortifying comparisons between them and myself, and the still more mortifying conviction that I was as yet nothing. The struggle between these two passions, so opposite in their character, and so powerful in their influence over the mind, was long and fierce. Ambition for a period triumphed. I tore myself from the presence of the being I loved; and with a heart which, though bereaved of every softer feeling, was still filled with aspirations for distinction and power, I sought their gratification in professional advancement. I commenced the practice of the law, and by devoting myself ardently and diligently to professional duties, and to the attainment of legal knowledge, partially succeeded in driving from my mind the remembrance of my love.

My life, from this passage in it, took a different and a darker hue: its romance was at an end. I felt my heart withering with the hopes which had heretofore given to existence its charm; the chills of reality soon froze up the warm current of social affections, and the selfishness of the world, and the common ties of a common life usurped the places which before had been given to power and holier feelings. But at times the current of ambition was at a stand. The desire of power and fame was extinct; and a vision which had before, at intervals, "few and far between," flitted through my mind, would be present. It was of domestic happiness, of reciprocated love, of affections won and cherished. A bright form would be present in it, and a countenance which had always been turned towards me in kindness, would then be leaning with love, and its glance would rest upon a "briefless lawyer."

M.

MATRIMONIAL FELICITY.

"For know, Iago,
But that I love the gentle Desdemona,
I would not my unhoused free condition
Put into circumscription and confine
For the sea's worth."

I really do not know any thing more serious than getting married, unless it be getting hanged, and yet, many pretend to consider it as an excellent joke, which, merely to mention, is enough to set a whole company into a titter. This, it is true, is more peculiar to the younger portion of humanity, and those who have not put their free condition "into circumscription and confine," as I have observed, that the married people laugh much less, when the subject is started, than the rest. As for the young single ladies and gentlemen, matrimony is quite a standing theme of ridicule with them, and when they behold an individual on the eve of entering into that happy state, they take credit to themselves if they don't laugh in his face. The two sexes also, I have observed, have different methods of expressing their interest on these occasions; the female rather blushing and smirking when the discourse turns towards it, the male letting their feelings escape in little brisk repartees, and popping opinions which have got to be common property, and indispensable at a wedding. Their usual flashes of wit are apt to be replied to by the fairer portion of the company; so that there are many "keen encounters," very agreeable for a quiet lover of humor like myself to listen to. I happened, but a few days ago, to be present at a charming connubial festivity, where, when the impressive ceremony was over, the general sombre cast began to give place to lively bursts of mirth, and a great deal was said by the bridesmaids, and the groomsmen, which I should be pleased to lay before the faithful readers of the Mirror, if it were possible to arrest the shifting scene, and fix it on the page. I could not help laughing, however, at the discomfiture of a beau, in an attempt to get the upper hand of a sweet young girl, who, from her modest downcast eyes, and unpresuming demeanor, he doubtless thought a fair butt for his shafts of wit.

"Do you know what I was thinking of all the time during the ceremony?" asked he.

"No, sir—what?"

"Why, I was blessing my stars that I was not the bridegroom."

"And I suppose the bride was doing the same thing," rejoined his fair antagonist.

I am a great admirer of wit in women, where, as in the present instance, it is only used to repel aggressions.

It has been my fate to witness a large number of marriages, and to have officiated at many, in the capacity of groomsmen, a station I must add very awkward for a plain man. It is but holding the torch for our happy friends to enter into the heavenly tenement of Hymen, the gates of which close immediately, leaving us on the outside; but whether or not this is a misfortune, people may not all agree. Surgeons, in medical colleges, find dissecting a body to be one of the most efficacious modes of instruction; and by exhibiting the organization of the human frame, and the various circumstances which cause disease and death, fling a valuable light upon the minds of those whose business it is to effect a cure. I think that much good might be effected, on the same principle, by any one who would trace the history of two hearts, from the glow and agitation of early love, to the coolness and quiet into which that portion of the man and woman is apt to sink after marriage.

I was talking with a friend of mine, who has been fortunate enough to live in a state of wedded bliss for about fifteen years. Fifteen years—that's a very long time. A man might change much in fifteen years. He told me he had kept a little journal, from the first moment he saw Juliana until a year after they were indissolubly united in the tenderest bonds, when, from some cause, which he did not state, he stopped it, and has never had time to resume it.

He handed me the manuscript, one afternoon, in a hurried manner, when the companion of his prosperity and sharer of all his woes, had quitted the room for a moment.

"For heaven's sake," said he, in a whisper, and looking round him in a hurried manner, with some appearance of alarm—"for heaven's sake, don't let my wife see it, or there'll be the devil to pay."

She entered at the moment, and I could not help smiling at the suddenness with which the doating husband changed his attitude and expression, from that of alarm and haste, to perfect placidity and innocent indifference. It must have required a vast practice to reduce his nerves to such a pliability; and if it had not been for the meek and submissive deportment of Mrs. —, I should almost have concluded that her husband was in the dilemma which Byron ascribed to the mates of all intellectual wives.

"Say, oh ye lords of ladies intellectual,
And answer truly—have they not hen-pecked you all?"

I have drawn upon the diary of the husband and lover pretty freely, but if not too copiously for the wish of the reader, my friend, I am assured, will excuse me.

June, Wednesday, 1816.—Every body is talking to me about Juliana—telling me to beware of her eyes; that there is death in her smile, and all that. I should like to see this proud beauty.

Saturday.—Well, I have seen Juliana, and she is infinitely more beautiful and bewitching than I had conceived. What a head for a picture!—what thrilling eyes! Did you ever see such lips?—and, heavens, her voice, like the Æolian harp, which—but I am interrupted.

July, Tuesday.—Rode with Juliana.

Wednesday.—Walked in the morning before breakfast with Juliana.

Thursday.—Walked in the evening through the grove, with Juliana—moonlight. Mem.—Remember the little turn in the lane as long as I live.

Friday.—Spent the afternoon reading to Juliana, afterwards took a walk; need I say with whom?

Saturday.—Dreamed all night of Juliana.

Sunday.—Went to church with Juliana. Walked on the Battery—a spot which from this time shall be ever sacred to the purest and sweetest recollections.

Wednesday.—I was too much agitated yesterday to write—too excited—too exquisitely happy. On Monday evening we sat together on the sofa, and to my surprise and delight alone. Alone, oh, word sweet to lover's ears. Oh, could we be for ever alone! Oh, could we have "some dear little isle of our own," and there spend existence in wandering about together. I squeezed her hand; I reminded her of the little turn in the lane—and—we are to be married. What fools men are for living single. Why, I could be happy only conversing with her. "With thee, conversing, I forget all time," as John Milton says. By the way, one thing for which I love Milton so is his pure pictures of connubial happiness. And yet they say, Mrs. Milton cut up some capers, and that they actually separated. I'll not believe it.

August, Monday.—We have been married two weeks. I have not spent an evening from home—how charming! domestic peace. All we want now is a cat. I wish Juliana loved music though.

September, Monday.—I never knew business so dull as it is at present. L. & M. have failed, and the Communipaw Granite Rock Bank has broke. Alas, what are the hopes of man!

October, Tuesday.—Mrs. B.—is really a charming woman; but it's devilish dull at home. Yet I dare not go out for fear of her displeasure. I caught it last night, I think, for staying over my time. "By the Lord, Hal," she made me open my eyes. I believe in that story about Mrs. Milton. I should like to know what John did to bring him into trouble. How he must have laughed when he wrote that about "wedded bliss." Poor fellow!

June, 1817. Wednesday.—There is something very ludicrous in the common hum-drum, matrimonial conversations.—Fancy me ready to go to the counting-room soon after breakfast, wife says—

"What will you have for dinner to-day, my dear? I want some money for marketing."

"Well, dear, I don't know. Suppose we have steak and onions?"

"We had steak and onions yesterday, my dear."

"Well, then, my dear, a leg of mutton."

"Shall we have a wedding, my dear?"

"Yes, my dear."

Then there are other subjects which do not terminate so amicably.

"My dear."

"Well, my dear."

"I have taken board for you at Communipaw. I wish you to stay a month there with little Bob."

"My dear—"

"Yes, my dear, it's so much cheaper."

"But, my dear—"

"But, my dear, I have already taken board, so there is no use in saying any thing about it."

AMERICAN ANECDOTES.

CAPTAIN PETER POWERS AND HIS WIFE.

The first settlers of Hollis, on the southern borders of New Hampshire, were Captain Peter Powers and Anna, his wife, who made a settlement in the wilderness in 1731. Their trials were oftentimes very great—and the dangers and hardships to which they were sometimes exposed, may be learnt from the following anecdote, derived by the writer from the adventurous female who is the subject of it. It was originally communicated for the Historical Collections published in Concord, New Hampshire, but appeared in the Journal at Plymouth, after the former work was discontinued.

WHEN this couple first pitched their tent in Hollis, which was a little north-west of the present meeting-house in that town, the traces of which are still visible, their nearest neighbor lived in the eastern part of Dunstable, New Hampshire, a distance, probably at this time, of ten miles, and could not be made at that period much less than twelve, as they had no road but a single track, and spotted trees for their guide. This journey could not be made in the summer season without fording the Nashua, which was done at a place a little south-east of a small island, visible at the left as you now pass the bridge leading from Hollis to Dunstable, Massachusetts; and here the river was fordable only when the streams were low. Of course, the lonely adventurers made their visits but seldom, and never with a view to be absent from their habitations during the night, as they were then the parents of two children, whom they were necessitated to leave at home in a cabin surrounded with Indians. Indeed, seldom, if ever, did both parents leave their children and perform this route in company. Now it happened on a summer's morning in the month of August, that the wife, Anna, found it necessary for her to visit her neighbor, and mounting at an early hour, a fine Narraganset, a faithful and tried companion in adventures, the river was soon forded, and the whole distance was made long ere it was high noon. The interview was such as characterized the first settlers in this new country, where warmth of affection more than supplied the place of a thousand ceremonies, and a sense of dependence prompted to the discharge of kinder offices than mere refinement would recognize as obligatory on her. The hours passed swiftly away—they lived fast—they ate, they drank, they talked much, and blessed God and their king. Nor did a single occurrence tend to interrupt their festivity until about three past meridian, when all were suddenly aroused by a distant, though heavy discharge of heaven's artillery. All rushed to the door to witness the aspect of the elements, when lo! it was most threatening and appalling. Nature all around slept, or seemed to be awed into a death-like silence. Not a leaf moved but when the foundations of the earth responded to the voice of heaven. Already from north to south, the whole western horizon was mantled in black, and the gathering tempest moved forward as slowly and sublimely as though fully conscious of its power to deride all resistance. Not until this moment did anxious concern possess the breast of Anna for the objects of her affections, whom she had left in that lone, dear cell. In a kind of momentary distraction, she demanded that Narraganset should be panned, for she must return to her family that afternoon, whatever might be the consequences to herself. She had rather brave the tempest returning, than endure her foreboding with her sheltered friends. But a sudden change in the elements did more to dissuade her from so rash an attempt than the entreaties and expostulations of her friends. From an apparent calm, nature now awoke and seemed to be rushing into ruin. As though the north called unto the south, and the west unto the east, the four winds came on to the conflict. Clouds were driven hither and thither in angry velocity, and all seemed to be propelled in directions counter to each other. The tempest soon burst upon them, and on the whole adjacent country, in an unparalleled torrent. Nothing was heard but the crack or roll of thunder, and the roar of winds and waters—nothing seen but the successive blaze of lightning—Intenvere poli, et crebris micat ignibus aether. The said Anna lived until rising somewhat of ninety years, and could remember distinctly, perhaps eighty-five years, but in all this time she never witnessed such a scene, nor could she relate anything which seemed to raise such sublimity of feeling in her mind as this.

The tempest lay upon them with unabated force several hours, nor did it appear to spend itself until the sun was just sinking below the horizon, when it broke in upon drowned nature in all its smiles, and reflected its golden beams upon the black cloud at the east, in the most enchanting manner. This was the moment for Anna to renew her resolve of returning to her family that night, and contrary to all reasoning and persuasions, she instantly put it in execution. She mounted her horse, and bidding adieu to her friends, she entered the twelve-mile forest just as the sun took his leave of her. She calculated upon a serene and star-light evening, and the extraordinary instinct of her beast, as well as her experience in the way and at the fords. But in regard to the former she was wholly disappointed. The wind soon shifted and rolled the same cloud back again, the rain recommenced as the night set in, and the wind ceased. At that season of the year the time of twilight was short; the earth being warm and moistened, evaporation was rapid, and a dense fog arose which soon obstructed vision, and long before she arrived at the fords she was enveloped in total darkness. Her only guide now was her faithful Narraganset, and the beasts of the forest her companions. She however made the best of the circumstances. She entered into conversation with her mare, as was her custom when riding alone, and when her beast stopped suddenly, tossed up her head and snorted at some wild animal crossing the track before her as was supposed, Anna would exhort her to possess courage, assuring her "that nothing could harm her, for the beasts were mere cowards in the presence of a brave horse," &c. After this manner the long way to the ford was passed over in Egyptian darkness; nor had the thought once occurred to Anna that so considerable a river as now rolled before her would be materially affected by a thunder storm of a few hours; whereas, so great was the fall of water in this time, that the river, although wide at this place, was bank full, and swept on in great rapidity. Nor could the rushing of the waters be heard by reason of the rain still pouring upon the forest around her. She therefore determined to give the rein to her experienced beast, believing that she would keep the ford and land her on the opposite shore at the proper place. The horse entered the stream as soon as at the bank, and in a moment lost her foothold of terra firma, and was plunging in the waves at a full swim. Such, however, was Anna's presence of mind, that she made no exertion to rein her beast, but endeavored simply to retain her seat, which was now under water, whilst the waves beat with violence against her waist. The faithful animal made for the opposite shore, but so strong was the current, that she was either carried below the ford, or in her exertions to resist it, she overacted and ascended above it, where at one sweep of her fore feet she struck upon a rock in the bed of the river, which suddenly raised her somewhat from the water forward, but she as soon plunged again, for the rock was cleared the second sweep. This plunge was so deep that Anna was borne from her pannel by the gravity of the water; but pitching forward, she seized Narraganset's mane, as she rose, nor did she quit her grasp until they were both safely landed on the happy shore. Adjusting her clothes, she remounted, and soon found that her beast was in her accustomed track, and in little more than one hour she alighted at the door of her peaceful cabin, where, by her well known signal, she broke the slumbers of her husband and babes, and upon entering, related in no purer gratitude, or greater joy, than they experienced in hearing the result of that adventurous night!

LETTERS FROM PARIS.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF EUROPE.

NUMBER THIRTEEN.

The Gambling houses of Paris.

I ACCEPTED last night from a French gentleman, of high standing, a polite offer of introduction to one of the exclusive gambling clubs of Paris. With the understanding, of course, that it was only as a spectator, my friend, whom I had met at a dinner party, dispatched a note from the table, announcing to the temporary master of ceremonies his intention of presenting me. We went at eleven, in full dress. I was surprised at the entrance with the splendor of the establishment—gilt balustrades, marble staircases, crowds of servants in full livery, and all the formal announcement of a court. Passing through several ante-chambers, a heavy folding-door was thrown open, and we were received by one of the noblest looking men I have seen in France, Count—. I was put immediately at my ease by his dignified and kind politeness; and after a little conversation in English, which he spoke fluently, the entrance of some other person led me at liberty to observe at my leisure. Every thing about me had the impress of the studied taste of high life. The lavish and yet soft disposition of light, the harmony of color in the rich hangings and furniture, the quiet manners and subdued tones of conversation, the respectful deference of the servants, and the simplicity of the slight entertainment, would have convinced me, without my Asmodeus, that I was in no every-day atmosphere. Conversation proceeded for an hour, while the members came dropping in from their evening engagements, and a little after twelve a glass door was thrown open, and we passed from the reception-room to the spacious suite of apartments intended for play. One or two of the gentlemen entered the side-rooms for billiards and cards, but the majority closed about the table of hazard in the central hall. I had never conceived so beautiful an apartment. It can be described in two words, columns and mirrors. There was nothing else between the exquisitely painted ceiling and the floor. The form was circular, and the wall was laid with glass, interrupted only with pairs of Corinthian pillars, with their rich capitals reflected and re-reflected innumerable. It seemed like a hall of colonnades of illimitable extent—the multiplication of the mirrors into each other was so endless and illusive. I felt an unconquerable disposition to abandon myself to a waking reverie of pleasure; and as soon as the attention of the company was perfectly engrossed by the silent occupation before them, I sank upon a sofa, and gave my senses up for a while to the fascination of the scene. My eye was intoxicated. As far as my sight could penetrate, stretched apparently interminable halls, carpeted with crimson, and studded with graceful columns and groups of courtly figures, forming altogether, with its extent and beauty, and in the subdued and skilfully managed light, a picture that, if real, would be one of unsurpassable splendor. I quite forgot my curiosity to see the game. I had merely observed, when my companion reminded me of the arrival of my own appointed hour for departure, that, whatever was lost or won, the rustling bills were passed from one to the other with a quiet and imperturbable politeness, that betrayed no sign either of chagrin or triumph; though, from the fact that the transfers were in paper only, the stakes must have been any thing but trifling. Refusing a polite invitation to partake of the supper, always in waiting, we took leave about two hours after midnight.

As we drove from the court, my companion suggested to me, that since we were out at so late an hour, we might as well look in for a moment at the more accessible "hells," and, pulling the cordons, he ordered to "Frascati's." This, you know of course, is the fashionable place of ruin, and here the heroes of all novels, and the rakes of all comedies, mar or make their fortunes. An evening dress, and the look of a gentleman, are the only required passport. A servant in attendance took our hats and canes, and we walked in without ceremony. It was a different scene from the former. Four large rooms, plainly but handsomely furnished, opened into each other, three of which were devoted to play, and crowded with players. Elegantly dressed women, some of them with high pretensions to French beauty, sat and stood at the table, watching their own stakes in the rapid games with fixed attention. The majority of the gentlemen were English. The table was very large, marked as usual with the lines and figures of the game, and each person playing had a small rake in his hand, with which he drew towards him his proportion of the winnings. I was disappointed at the first glance in the faces. There was very little of the high-bred courtesy I had seen at the club-house, but there was no very striking exhibition of feeling, and, I should think, in any but an extreme case, the whispering silence and general quietness of the room would repress it. After watching the variations of luck awhile, however, I selected one or two pretty desperate losers, and a young Frenchman, who was a large winner, and confined my observation to them only. Among the former was a girl of about eighteen; a mild, quiet looking creature, with her hair curling long on her neck, and hands childishly small and white, who lost invariably. Two piles of five-franc-pieces, and a small heap of gold, lay on the table beside her; and I watched her till she laid the last coin upon the losing color. She bore it very well. By the eagerness with which, at every turn of the last card, she closed her hand upon the rake which she held, it was evident that her hopes were high; but when her last piece was drawn in to the bank, she threw up her little fingers with a playful desperation, and commenced conversation even gaily with a gentleman who stood leaning over her chair. The young Frenchman continued almost as invariably to win. He was excessively handsome; but there was a cold, profligate, unvarying hardness of expression in his face, that made me dislike him. The spectators drew gradually about his chair; and one or two of the women, who seemed to know him well, selected a color for him occasionally, or borrowed of him and staked for themselves. We left him winning. The other players were mostly English, and very uninteresting in their exhibition of disappointment. My companion told me that there would be more desperate playing towards morning, but I had become disgusted with the cold selfish faces of the scene, and felt no interest sufficient to detain me.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

FROM THE NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

TOO EARLY.

PEOPLE talk about this fallacy and that fallacy, but of all the fallacies in the world there is not one that equals that prodigious prejudice that has for some hundreds of years been running in favor of getting up early. I could show by a thousand reasons, that instead of such a practice being praiseworthy, it rather gives token of a want of that syllogistical clear-headedness which enables a man to look thoroughly, and at once, to the bottom of a subject. "And mind you get up early, my dear," cries Mrs. Tomkins to her eldest born, just as he is on the point of quitting his native village for the great world—"mind you get up early, for it is so unwholesome to lie in bed of a morning." Foolish matron! never was so great a mistake pronounced with so grave a countenance.

"But why, sir, why?" exclaims Mrs. Tomkins, or some one of my readers for her. Now, for my own part, I am very considerably the friend of a system that is daily gaining strength in this admirable world, of making assertion not only stand in the place of, but actually take precedence of all argument; and I would therefore protest with Shakespeare's fat knight against giving any reason "on compulsion;" but that, in this case, the other side happens to have the start of me on the ground of assertion, and I must, therefore, content myself with having the whole of the argument on mine.

So now for the "why, sir, why?"

The "why" consists in these five reasons. It is unwholesome, it is unsafe, it is uncomfortable, it is impolitic, it is unwise.

First—it is unwholesome. I once had a great-grandfather—the last of our family that was ever so foolish as to indulge in what he used to call the luxury of early rising—and what was the consequence? That nature one day summoned him to pay for the luxury, by bestowing on him such an admixture of cold and catarrh as carried him in one week to his grave. And how could it be otherwise? If, from your comfortable bed-room window you chance to observe some unfortunate wretch whose cruel destiny compels him to quit his wholesome couch for the crude morning air and its drizzle-tailed dew, you first see him striving, as it were, to shrink within himself in the hopes of avoiding the raw atmosphere that salutes him on every side, and then—all escape, in spite of his ingenuity, proving fruitless—you next perceive him suddenly struck with a sort of ague-fit that dances him along, groaning and grumbling, at the rate of seven miles an hour, while his teeth chatter and jar against each other at a still more rapid pace. And after all, what is his remedy? He has none, till the day has marched on, and the sun has nearly approached his highest elevation: then he feels himself a little relieved from the swamp in which he has been buried, and he begins to find out that his clothes hang about him damp and dreary, like a lady's handkerchief that has undergone the ordeal by water through a five-act tragedy in the dog-days: he lifts up his leg, and resting it against a stile, surveys with rueful countenance the streamy drops that trickle from it, till a deep and dangerous puddle is formed beneath; while thus he gazes, he calls to mind how he has seen a washer-woman handle a sheet, and he longs to try and wring his leg, that he may have one limb dry at least: or "with curious busy eye" he carries his reflections yet further, and quitting the survey of his leg for that of his general condition, he sorrowfully petitions heaven to send some Brobdignadian housemaid that way, that she may take him up in her brawny arms, and twirl the moisture from him as an English wench twirled her mop. And this is what my poor great-grandfather used to call the luxury of early rising! Well, well, he paid a dear penalty for his mistake; so let us hope that he is by this time in another and a better world, and never gets up till half-past nine.

Second—it is unsafe. And here, again, let me refer to the example-giving career of my great-grandfather. Three times within the last two years of his early rising, the consequence of his being abroad at such unseasonable hours, was his being attacked by highwaymen. The first time he was sauntering along Hornsey-lane long before any decent person (except himself) was stirring, when he suddenly perceived the muzzle of a horse-pistol immediately under his nose, while as suddenly he heard, "Stand, and deliver!" growled in his ear by as rugged a descendant of Blackbeard as Hockley-in-the-Hole ever produced; my great-grandfather, satisfied with one glance, ran for it, and when he got home, had the satisfaction of finding that the bullet, which had been sent whizzing after him, had only carried off an inch and a half of his pig-tail, and about a quarter of the collar of his coat. The second occasion of his being attacked was in the neighborhood of Hounslow heath, and from that clerk of St. Nicholas he water and three parts mud, and vigorously kicking his way through slime and duck-weed to the opposite bank. His third adventure of this description was on the banks of the Lea river; but by this time my great-grandfather had learned prudence; and, therefore, instead of running, or swimming, or being shot, he peaceably resigned his valuables, "on demand," to the amount of three shillings and twopence-halfpenny of the current coin of the realm, an old tobacco-stopper, a silver tooth-pick, and a penknife with only half a blade to it. Let, then, the rising generation take warning by these mishaps that followed my great-grandfather's early hours, and particularly remember that of all highwaymen those that are in practice about five in the morning are the most dangerous—and for this simple reason—that they have had bad luck through the night, and are beginning to get sulky.

Third—it is uncomfortable. Are you a bachelor, my excellent reader? If you are, I grant you a pause * * * * just so much, to bring back to your recollection the mistake that you probably once in your life have made—not oftener, I can well believe you—of coming down to your snug apartment before your usual time. Oh! the powers of patience, what a reception there awaited you! Chairs in threefold confusion—the sad remains of a foregone supper—the ashes of defunct cigars overlaying sofa, table, and floor—and the smoke of the aforesaid defunct still hanging like a heavy vapor in the atmosphere of the apartment! Or, is the honest gentleman that is now honoring this paper with his perusal, happy enough to be married? If so, I trust for his own sake, as well as that of his amiable lady, that he keeps good hours, both by morning as well as by night. I trust, said I? Nay, I am sure! and therefore the observation that I am now going to make is hypothetical—not practical—something thrown out for the abstract consideration of my married reader—not for his censure. Let us, for the sake of argument, suppose a wedded gentleman so in love with wrong-headedness as to forestall the household economy by quitting his bed when none but chimney-sweepers, milkmen, and housemaids have honest licence to be stirring.—What does he take by his motion, as a lawyer would say? He tries one apartment, from which he is driven by the cloud of dust, that the busy broom is raising; he seeks another, where he is greeted by the fire-iron-rattle of the scullery-maid, who hates to work—even at lighting a fire—without some sort of music as an accompaniment; he attempts a third, which appears to offer a mock repose, if that can be called even so much as mock repose, where all the windows are set open to a mizzly north-easter, where all in the neighborhood of the fire-grate is vacuity and dreariness, but where the ear-drum is well nigh cracked at intervals—anything but "few and far between"—with shrill or blustering vociferations of that sundry assortment which classes under the general appellation of "London cries."

Fourth. It is impolitic.—This assertion is nearly self-evident, and hardly requires a word to be said in its support; for all mankind, through all ages, have agreed that the really prudent man is he who steers the middle course, neither diverging too much to the right hand nor to the left, or, in this instance, neither going to bed too late, nor getting up too early. This is the judicious lie-a-bed's doctrine; nor only his doctrine, but his practice too; and, like Green's "jolly church-parson," he will never be found priding himself on holding that equable balance which bringeth the wise man's conclusion—

"If you pity your soul, I pray listen to neither—
The first is in error, the last a deceiver:
That ours is the true church, the sense of our tribe is,
And surely in medio tutissimus ibis."

I never was more convinced of the truth of this principle than on hearing a ludicrous anecdote that some years ago happened to a friend of my own. Dick Lambert had but one hobby in the world, and that was angling:—winter, spring, summer, autumn—hail, rain, blow, snow—if Dick could but spare the time (and often, indeed, when he could not spare it,) away he would trudge, with a walking-stick rod in his hand, and a large basket slung over his shoulder, in pursuit of his favorite pastime. At the time of which I am speaking, he had been obliged, on account of Mrs. Lambert's state of health, to take a cottage for her at the pretty village of Carshalton; and, shortly after, he was fortunate enough so to arrange his own affairs in town, that he was able to promise himself a six weeks' residence at his new country abode. Every one who knows Carshalton knows that there is a delightful little trout stream running through it as clear as crystal, and as richly stored with Dick's speckled prey as the heart of angler could desire; and it therefore need be no matter of wonder when I tell that every morning regularly, at four o'clock, Dick was stirring before the sun, and might be seen through the first break of the morning wending his way to the brook. Now if ever there was a simple-hearted fellow in this world, it was Dick Lambert; and, as the prejudice goes, if ever there was a simple sport in this world, it is angling. Yet, with all this simplicity on his side, Dick's bad (early) hours brought him into suspicion. Fortune so willed it, that next door to Dick's cottage lived the very Paul Pry of the place. For the first week or two, when no one but sick Mrs. Lambert and her maid were the inmates of the newly-occupied cottage, Mr. Paul thought it rather odd that, with all his watchfulness, he could scarcely ever see any one come in or go out of the cottage; and, just as his curiosity began to be whetted by this circumstance, Dick's daily morning egress met his observant eye. Mr. Paul thought it very odd that, every morning before day-break he should hear the cottage-door bang to; and when that circumstance primed him to quit his comfortable bed, and peep through the casement, he thought it still more odd that he should always see one solitary man stealing through the scarcely-dissi-it, "how unfortunate! This billet is from the ministerial whipper-in, and he says that I am wanted at the house without a moment's delay, as the division is expected to come on directly. How very unfortunate!"

"Pray don't stand on any ceremony with me," quoth Purvis.

"How very good you are!" said my lord; "just like your respected father! But, at all events, I can do something for you. My carriage is at the door, can I set you down anywhere?"

"Nowhere, thank your lordship; I have—ahem!—I have several friends in this neighborhood; so I will not detain your lordship." And then, after a thousand flowery excuses, his lordship allowed his guest to withdraw—dinnerless—and more and more convinced of the evil of being "too early."

But, still, there was the evening to be got rid of. What should he do with it? Ha! a lucky thought! He would go to the theatre—whither, indeed, he had predestined himself when his lordship's invitation was found by him at the Swan-with-two-necks.

As he trudged down Oxford-street, he stopped at his old ally—a pastry cook's; and while they were putting half-a-dozen Bath buns into paper for him, he took an opportunity of reading the playbills—"Doors open at half-past six—performance to begin at seven."

"Very well," cried he to himself, "now in this there can be no mistake—for I have often read of the house being crowded with the first rush, and of people waiting for hours before the doors opened: so, egad, I will hurry there with my best speed, that I may secure a good place."

By dint of a smart Yorkshire, rattling pace, he contrived to arrive at Drury-lane by six o'clock; and, as he had heard that it was to the pit that all the critics and good judges went, he resolved to go there too, in the hope of picking up some valuable remarks to go hand in hand with the play. But when he arrived at the pit door, there was scarcely a soul to be seen that appeared to be waiting for admission. There was something very odd in this! He had expected to see hundreds, and there was not a score. What could it all mean? It was certainly the pit-door, for he saw the words written up; it was certainly Drury-lane, for he had made his acquaintance with it in the morning, as a prelude to his visit in the evening. Then what could the present desertion portend? The play of "Pizarro," and the afterpiece of the "Miller and his Men," ought, in his opinion, to have attracted half London: they must be popular, for he had heard of both of them nearly as long as he could remember. What, then, could it all mean? He looked about for some congenial face that might win him into addressing a stranger, for the purpose of obtaining an explanation; but he saw none that looked sufficiently promising: there was no one there on the lines of whose countenance seemed to be written, "I can pity and feel for the ignorance of a Yorkshireman." While he was in this state of hesitation, a beautifully-dressed young gentleman of amazingly insinuating address approached him.

"I beg your pardon, sir," said the new comer, "you seem to be a stranger; perhaps you have lost your party."

"No, sir," quoth Purvis, "I have no party to lose; but, perhaps, you will be so good as to inform me—"

His further utterance was interrupted by the stranger jolting suddenly against him in such a manner as to bring the sharp point of his elbow full into the pit of the Yorkshireman's stomach, the natural result of which was so sudden a dismission of the vital air from his interior, that his speech of inquiry came to a conclusion perforce; and he stood, gasping like a fish when, in lieu of water, it has nothing but the thin atmosphere to draw in; while his new acquaintance hastily pronounced,

"Ten thousand pardons, sir; this infernal piece of orange peel nearly threw me off my legs. Ah! egad, there goes Will! Will Smith! Will Smith! Pray excuse me—a particular friend. I must follow him!" and away shot Mr. Purvis's new acquaintance with a rapidity that was really delectable to behold.

While this quiet little scene had been passing between these two, the pit-lobby had been gradually filling; and, a moment after the disappearance of Will Smith's friend, Purvis heard a gruff voice at no great distance from him exclaim, "Take care of your pockets, ladies and gentlemen!"

"Good heavens!—Pockets!—My watch!" quoth the Yorkshire gentleman; and, as he spoke, he pressed his hand on his fob. Alas! it was all "flat and unprofitable." Will Smith's particular friend had ejected the timepiece at the same moment that he had ejected the breath from Master Henry Purvis's body.

But there might yet be time to save it; and, at the thought, Mr. Purvis rushed forth, to the infinite detriment of an old lady and gentleman who were just entering the door; and as he ran along, hardly knowing which way he went, he belowed "stop thief," at the loudest height of his stentorian lungs.

The cry of "stop thief" once raised in London, and no man shall tell where it may end. A thousand echoes seemed to rise in answer to Mr. Purvis's shout. Drury-lane, Russell-street, Vinegar-yard, Bridges-street, Covent-garden market, Bow-street, and Broad-court all rang in unison, and nothing was heard but "stop thief! stop thief! stop thief!" while scores, guilty and guiltless, were to be seen running in every direction. As to our hero, he followed the direction of his genius at the height of his speed; and, just as he turned into Hart-street, he began to think that he caught a glimpse of the gentleman who had absconded with his watch. Desirable thought! and at its coming again, he roared more lustily, "stop thief!" Yes, it certainly was the runaway whom he had in sight; he presses on him—he nearly reaches him—the pursued turns abruptly into a narrow court—Mr. Purvis turns after him, confident that at length he has caught him; when, lo! he finds himself caught full in a policeman's arms.

After puffing half a minute for breath enough to speak—"There he goes!" quoth Mr. Purvis.

"Never mind him, my lively," said the policeman; "I have caught you, and that is something: so just please to walk yourself along with me to the station-house."

"But I haven't got the watch," puffed Mr. Purvis.

"That remains to be seen," replied the man in blue, with 131 on his collar; "so just come along, will you?"

"What, without the thief?"

"Come, come, master," quoth the officer, "this won't do. I don't think any one that looks in your face will say that we are without the thief."

Mr. Purvis finding that all remonstrance was vain, accompanied his custos to the station-house, where he was treated with a detail of his own loss before he was allowed to say a word for himself. At length, when there seemed to be a slight cessation in the plot, he managed to be heard thus far.

"But it is I, gentlemen, that have lost the watch, after all."

"Ha! ha! ha!" laughed the inspector, "that's pretty well, however. I'll tell you what, my fine fellow, if the tribe of pick-pockets should ever elect a king, and impudence should be the qualification, you'll carry the day against the field—I'll pound it."

"Say what you will," exclaimed our hero, "it is I that have lost the watch; but as I see what sort of justice I am to have here, I beg to wish you good night."

"Not so fast—not so fast, my worthy," cried the inspector; "you've got to be searched yet; and, when that's over, we've a delightfully comfortable black-hole for you, where you may pass the night free gratis, for nothing."

Master Henry Purvis was pretty nearly at the height of despair at this announcement, when his good stars seemed for once to predominate. The constable, whose warning voice in the pit-lobby had reminded him to see whether his property was safe, just at this moment entered the station-house, and confirmed his statement that he was the robber, not the robber—upon which Master Henry Purvis was graciously permitted to take his departure. He did not, however, go without vowing ten thousand vengeance for the scurrilous manner in which he had been treated.

"I wonder you should complain," said the constable who stood his friend.

"What!" cried Purvis, "have I not been taken up as the thief?"

"That shows our vigilance."

"Have I not been threatened with the black hole?"

"That shows our determination."

"Was I not told that I looked like a thief?"

"That shows our penetration."

"And have I not been robbed of my watch?"

"Oh, sir, as to that," quoth the constable, "what can gentlemen expect if they come too early to the theatre!"

This last reply quite silenced Master Henry Purvis. He had been a day in town, and, quite satisfied with the experiment, he resolved to return to Yorkshire by the next morning's coach. Dinner-less, Lord Spanker-less, watch-less, Drury-lane-less, the events of that single day gave occupation to his thoughts for many, many months; and, indeed, to the very end of his life it was one of his most constant resolutions—that nothing in the whole world should ever again tempt him to be "too early."

A MODERN TIMON.

There is at present an extraordinary character existing in the French capital, who divides the public attention with Louis Philippe, the Poles, and the heroes of July. He is named Chodruc-Duclos, and his description and history are as follows:—He is a modern Timon. His dress consists of a few miserable rags; and his beard, which has not been trimmed for many years, reaches to his middle. Every evening he walks round the Palais Royal, offering, in the meanness of his attire, a strange contrast to the magnificence and splendor of that celebrated place. Yet this specimen of wretchedness was, in former times, a leader of fashion—a man celebrated for his multifarious accomplishments, remarkable for his beauty, and no less renowned as a first-rate exquisite! The history of Chodruc-Duclos offers, even in this age of wonders and strange events, one of the most striking examples of the caprices of fortune. He is a man of family, and was the heir to a handsome estate. In his early life he was recherche to a proverb in his exquisitism. He was a good musician and dancer, and an adept in the use of arms. He made himself famous at Bordeaux by an adventure at the theatre. A lady having been insulted in his presence, he lifted the offender in his arms, and threw him from the first tier of boxes into the pit. He fought many duels, and killed one of his antagonists. He was the intimate friend of the ex-minister Peyronnet, to whom, on more than one occasion, he was of essential service. In early life they were inseparable companions, and made sundry vows of eternal friendship. During the supremacy of Buonaparte, Duclos proved himself one of the most strenuous partisans of the exiled family. In the advancement of their cause he exposed himself to the greatest peril, besides expending upon it every franc of his large fortune. On the return of Louis XVIII. to the throne of France, he, with many others, presented himself to receive the reward of his services and fidelity to the royal cause. His claims, however, were disregarded, or the offers made were such as he considered totally inadequate to his merit. Disappointed and indignant, he withdrew from court. The accession of Peyronnet to power revived his hopes. He waited on his former friend, but his mission was one of those with which men in power are very willing to dispense. Peyronnet received the bosom friend of his youth in a most statesmanlike manner, and, on receiving a hint from his visitor that his wants were most pressing, magnanimously presented him with two hundred francs (eight pounds.) From that moment his life has been an enigma. No one can tell who provides for his subsistence, since, so far from ever asking alms, he is never known to speak a word. His sole occupation appears to be to perambulate the splendid galleries of the Palais Royal. He has twice been taken before the tribunals, on a charge of outraging public decency by his insufficient attire; but he was not subjected to any punishment, and he still continues to parade his rags and misfortunes. He expends two francs per day; and his landlady, the owner of a miserable tenth-rate inn, declared, on his trial, that he is so punctual that he will not allow a day to pass without paying the said sum. Trifling as the pittance is, it afforded matter for speculation how Duclos could procure it, since it is notorious that every sous of his property had been spent. It is surmised by some that a small pension is allowed him by the lady whom he protected at the theatre of Bordeaux.

LORD BYRON'S LETTER TO A YOUNG AUTHOR.

The editors of the London Athenæum remark, that through the kindness of a friend they have been enabled to publish the following "original letter from Lord Byron to a young author, on the receipt of a little volume dedicated to his lordship." The letter is worded so tersely, kindly, and sensibly, that it would be an act of injustice to the character of the noble poet not to put it in evidence, at the world's great trial. The young author of 1814, grown older and wiser now, has done with torturing the English language into verse and ruining booksellers; and he only regrets that the noble poet did not live to see, that the object of his advice had common sense enough to withdraw himself from the splendid hunt of poetry, before his brains were wholly dashed out through bad riding.

February 20, 1814.

"SIR—My absence from London till within these last few days, and business since, have hitherto prevented my acknowledgment of the volume I have lately received, and the inscription which it contains, for both of which I beg leave to return you my thanks, and best wishes for the success of the book and its author. The poem itself, as the work of a young man, is creditable to your talents, and promises better for future efforts than any which I can now recollect. Whether you intend to pursue your poetical career, I do not know, and can have no right to inquire—but, in whatever channel your abilities are directed, I think it will be your own fault if they do not eventually lead to distinction. Happiness must of course depend upon conduct—and even fame itself would be but a poor compensation for self-reproach. You will excuse me for talking to a man perhaps not many years my junior, with these grave airs of seniority; but though I cannot claim much advantage in that respect, it was my lot to be thrown very early upon the world—to mix a good deal in it in more climates than one—and to purchase experience which would probably have been of greater service to any one than myself. But my business with you is in your capacity of author, and to that I will confine myself.

"The first thing a young writer must expect, and yet can least of all suffer, is criticism. I did not bear it—a few years, and many changes, have since passed over my head, and my reflections on that subject are attended with regret. I find, on dispassionate comparison, my own revenge more than the provocation warranted. It is true, I was very young—that might be an excuse to those I attacked—but to me it is none: the best reply to all objections is to write better—and if your enemies will not then do you justice, the world will. On the other hand, you should not be discouraged—to be opposed, is not to be vanquished, though a timid mind is apt to mistake every scratch for a mortal wound. There is a saying of Dr. Johnson's, which it is as well to remember, that 'no man was ever written down except by himself.' I sincerely hope that you will meet with as few obstacles as yourself can desire—but if you should, you will find that they are to be stepped over; to kick them down is the first resolve of a young and fiery spirit—a pleasant thing enough at the time—but not so afterwards: on this point I speak of a man's own reflections—what others think or say, is a secondary consideration—at least, it has been so with me, but will not answer as a general maxim: he who would make his way in the world, must let the world believe that it was made for him, and accommodate himself to the minutest observance of its regulations. I beg once more to thank you for your pleasing present, and have the honor to be your obliged and very obedient servant,

BYRON."

THE DRAMA.

THE NEW-YORK STAGE, ETC.

FORREST has been the leading attraction at the Park, drawing crowded and fashionable houses. His Othello, with Maywood's Iago, brought upwards of seventeen hundred dollars. Opera is again taking its turn. Jones and Miss Hughes have re-appeared in Masaniello. The tragedy of Werdenberg, introducing Mr. Pelby as the hero, has been brought out. Miss Vincent, at the American theatre, has gained unusual favor. That really delightful actor, Blanchard, is rapidly becoming one of the most popular, as he is certainly one of the most sensible and chaste of all our comic performers. We have witnessed, with great pleasure, the exertions of Mrs. Duff and her pretty and naïve daughter, at the Richmond-hill.

A party of gentlemen gave a dinner, at the Boston exchange, last week, to Mr. Sinclair, of the theatre, as a testimony of their respect for his private worth and professional talents.

LITERARY NOTICES.

ROSS COX'S ADVENTURES ON THE COLUMBIA RIVER.

THIS is one of the most interesting works which the Harpers have published for months. It comprehends an account of a six years' residence on the western side of the Rocky Mountains, among various tribes of Indians, of whom little or nothing was previously known. Indeed the whole region over which the author, Ross Cox, wended his protracted journey, has been almost like an undiscovered country to the world; and, as he affirms in the preface, of a great portion we have been in entire ignorance. Our readers will acquiesce with us in the opinion, that narratives of this kind may claim nearly the highest rank among all species of delightful composition. Novels amuse for a time, and poetry elevates the imagination, but here the mind is accumulating actual experience in the world of reality. We commend the work to attention.

RENWICK'S ELEMENTS OF MECHANICS.

The author of this useful volume, which is just from the press of Carey and Lea, is well known and highly respected as professor of natural philosophy and chemistry in Columbia College. We had lately the pleasing duty of welcoming to the scientific department of our literature, an able treatise on "Linear Perspective," by Mr. Davis, professor of mathematics at West Point, and we congratulate ourselves on the laudable disposition thus evinced by competent individuals to furnish the world with the results of their experience. It is not only new and original discoveries or ideas upon these subjects which we may expect from authors who have been engaged in institutions of learning, but also simplified arrangements of facts, adapted to the immediate wants of the pupil. We therefore look upon the present work as stamped with a double value; and for the accuracy of its details, the name of the compiler is an ample pledge.

THE CHAMELEON.

We are indebted to an unknown friend in Scotland for the gift of a very beautifully printed volume, thus entitled, printed by Longman & Co., London. From the fact that it is a second edition, we may presume it to be popular in the old country. It is ornamented with a prettily executed plate of Rolandseck and Frauenworth, by W. Miller, and is made up of numerous short articles, in poetry and prose, of a light and amusing character, on very tempting subjects, some of which are handled with much ingenuity.

FROM A LATE NUMBER OF THE LONDON ATHENÆUM.

Poems by William Cullen Bryant, an American Poet. Edited by Washington Irving. London, 1832. Andrews.

We have done our best to make English readers acquainted with the literature of America, and among other works which we thought especially deserving our attention, were the poems of Bryant, reviewed some months since in our paper. It was, therefore, with no common feeling of satisfaction, that we received this beautiful volume, in which his scattered treasures are collected and recommended to the attention of Englishmen, by one whose name and fame are dear to them as the honored of their own country. We have only room, at this last hour, for the dedication—next week we shall cull our samples.

"TO SAMUEL ROGERS, ESQ.

"MY DEAR SIR—During an intimacy of some years standing, I have uniformly remarked a liberal interest on your part in the rising character and fortunes of my country, and a kind disposition to promote the success of American talent, whether engaged in literature or the arts. I am induced, therefore, as a tribute of gratitude, as well as a general testimonial of respect and friendship, to lay before you the present volume, in which, for the first time, are collected together the fugitive productions of one of our living poets, whose writings are deservedly popular throughout the United States.

"Many of these poems have appeared at various times in periodical publications; and some of them, I am aware, have met your eye, and received the stamp of your approbation. They could scarcely fail to do so, characterized as they are by a purity of moral, an elevation and refinement of thought, and a terseness and elegance of diction, congenial to the bent of your own genius and to your cultivated taste. They appear to me to belong to the best school of English poetry, and to be entitled to rank among the highest of their class.

"The British public has already expressed its delight at the graphic descriptions of American scenery and wild woodland characters, contained in the works of our national novelist, Cooper. The same keen eye and fresh feeling for nature, the same indigenous style of thinking and local peculiarity of imagery, which give such novelty and interest to the pages of that gifted writer, will be found to characterize this volume, condensed into a narrower compass and sublimated into poetry.

"The descriptive writings of Mr. Bryant are essentially American. They transport us into the depths of the solemn primeval forest—to the shores of the lonely lake—the banks of the wild nameless stream, or the brow of the rocky upland, rising like a promontory from amidst a wide ocean of foliage; while they shed around us the glories of a climate, fierce in its extremes, but splendid in all its vicissitudes. His close observation of the phenomena of nature, and the graphic felicity of his details, prevent his descriptions from ever becoming general and common-place; while he has the gift of shedding over them a pensive grace, that blends them all into harmony, and of clothing them with moral associations that make them speak to the heart. Neither, I am convinced, will it be the least of his merits in your eyes, that his writings are imbued with the independent spirit, and the buoyant aspirations incident to a youthful, a free, and a rising country.

"It is not my intention, however, to enter into any critical comments on these poems, but merely to introduce them, through your sanction, to the British public. They must then depend for success on their own merits; though I cannot help flattering myself that they will be received as pure gems, which, though produced in a foreign clime, are worthy of being carefully preserved in the common treasury of the language. I am, my dear sir, ever most faithfully yours,
WASHINGTON IRVING.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE P. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, APRIL 28, 1832.

Editor's study.—Our correspondent, "Philo Johnson," wishes to be informed whether the Americans speak generally with as much accuracy as the English. We agree with him in the affirmative, though rather from the testimony of others than from our own observation. We question whether any people in the world can boast a more uniformly correct pronunciation than the inhabitants of the United States. Although our country comprehends such a vast space, the traveler will distinguish by no means the same diversity of speech which may be discerned in passing through other nations, yet there are, notwithstanding, several instances, even in the first circles, of inelegant exceptions. Some arise from a want of proper familiarity with standard authorities, others from the desire to exhibit a superior grace and accuracy in their elocution. One delivers his words with a too deliberate execution of each particular syllable, which, however it may enhance the distinctness, greatly diminishes the grace and ease of conversation. There is a difference to be observed between an orator addressing a crowded assembly, and a gentleman speaking to his friend or a private company. Some in a parlor, and treating upon trifles, ape the profound gravity of a tragedian. We have heard a person of this kind declare, "I will thank you, madam, for another cup of tea," with as much effort at theatrical elegance, as if he were about to swallow poison instead of hyson; and another observe, he was "fond of tripe," with a solemn dignity of expression, rolling the r off his tongue in such a manner, that a foreigner, unacquainted with our language, might naturally conclude something very serious was going on. But this, although a fault among colloquists, is preferable to the practice which we must allow to be prevalent here, of giving words, however properly accented, a certain turn of an ungraceful character. There is a class of words to which this observation particularly applies, but we are scarcely able to make the reader understand by letters those precise distinctions of sound which we would here illustrate. In the proper manner of giving such words as ensue, suit, &c. there will be audible to an attentive ear a slight softening of the v, bringing it nearer to the same letter in unite. Our mother tongue contains many words of the same character, wherein there is room for a scholar to discriminate nicely between the two extremes. We have now in our recollection a highly accomplished lady, whose remarks are generally so full of intelligence and wit, that it is painful to hear them marred by so trivial a defect. She tells you that the doors of evening had scarcely fallen from the skoi when the koind gurl, at whose soote she had undertaken the journey, began to grow afraid of being pursood; but she knoo nobody was there, although she was pootly well prepared to endoore every thing that could ensoo, from a principle of dooty. She says she cannot abide a doolist, although last Toosday she saw one in the street for the just time.

Our fair friend is not at all singular in this way of speaking. It may be remarked continually in the most polished individuals of both sexes.

We are acquainted with another of equal attainments, who, a short period since, had her attention directed to this point, and consequently has fallen into the opposite extreme, which, of the two, we think more offensive. The one seems the result of carelessness, but the other of affectation. She tells her friends that Se-usan is a sensible ge-irl, and a se-uperlative singer; that there is extraordinary ne-use from England arrived last Choosday, but of a jubious character. She thinks one who fights a jewel is more to be pitied than blamed, as no gentleman can enjure an insult. She was one day at dinner going on in these displays of her newly acquired colloquial graces, when she created a general smile, which even courtesy could not disguise, by asking the servant to help her to "a little se-oup." We must also protest against those innovations on settled points of orthoepy, which occasionally appear among fashionable people, as if to make the barrier between them and the profanum vulgus more obvious and impassable. It is to such classes, as well as to the pulpit, the bar, and the stage, that we look for models in the art of speaking correctly; and they should be especially cautious not to lead astray, from any idle affectation, those who appeal to them as examples. We heard a lawyer in court the other day make the i in pirate rhyme with y in lyric, and a high-bred lady asking for Bee-ron's poems.

True elegance of pronunciation, like that of dress, consists in a modest simplicity. This is a safer guide than mere dictionary knowledge. We knew a poor pedant, who never opened his lips without saying something outrageously ludicrous, or pronouncing his words in a way that set every one laughing, yet the fellow could quote some lexicographer for whatever he said. We therefore deem the dictionary not the only thing to be studied, but also the usages of the persons with whom we associate, so that we may not appear, at every sentence, to rebuke their ignorance, or expose our own.

As it is the misfortune of our language that the pronunciation of many words is not regulated by any rule, but is entirely arbitrary, it becomes necessary for him who would speak at once with ease, grace, and correctness, to study in early youth the forms of expressions and modes of pronunciation prevalent in the polite world, as books cannot instruct him concerning those faint lights and shades of speech, to which we have alluded above.

It is certainly much to be regretted that the English tongue is infested with such a variety of authorities on dubious points, and that the construction of many words is so excessively awkward. A schoolboy is punished one day for not speaking according to the orthography, and the next day for the contrary error. Such intricate words as clough, trough, usquebaugh, turkoids, qualm, &c. are a disgrace to the vocabulary, and have a vast deal to answer for, touching hasty bursts of disapprobation from young French gentlemen and other foreigners, who undertake to learn our vernacular. We recommend all cavaliers at the pronunciations of their friends to examine their dictionaries before they express their opinions, as the contradictions among the learned compilers, from Jameson to Webster, are very palpable and consolatory to ambitious colloquists caught tripping. We lately heard a horse-laugh brought to a very abrupt termination, by a reference to Walker. We may add, in conclusion, that a few words mispronounced weigh but little against the good sense sometimes conveyed by them, and that he who watches, for the purpose of ridiculing the casual peculiarities of speech which may be detected more or less in every man, discovers a more intimate acquaintance with Webster than with Chesterfield, and is more learned in words than in politeness.

Old jokes.—The London Athenæum presents its readers weekly with a collection of bon mots, gathered from every source.—Nearly all the jokes are familiar to most people, and the following, in particular, may claim more praise for their antiquity than their wit; but originality in these trifles is difficult of attainment.

An irritable man went to visit a sick friend and asked him concerning his health. The patient was so ill that he could not reply; whereupon the other, in a rage, said, "I hope that I may soon fall sick, and then I will not answer you when you visit me."

A speculative gentleman, wishing to teach his horse to do without food, starved him to death. "I had a great loss," said he, "for just as he learned to live without eating he died."

A curious inquirer, desirous to know how he looked when asleep sat with closed eyes before a mirror.

A young man told his friend, that he dreamed that he had struck his foot against a sharp nail. "Why, then, do you sleep without your shoes?" was the reply.

A robust countryman meeting a physician, ran to hide behind a wall; being asked the cause, he replied, "it is so long since I have been sick, that I am ashamed to look a physician in the face."

A gentleman had a cask of American wine, from which his servant stole a large quantity. When the master perceived the deficiency, he diligently inspected the top of the cask, but could find no trace of an opening. "Look if there be not a hole in the bottom," said a bystander. "Blockhead," he replied, "do you not see that the deficiency is at the top, and not at the bottom?"

A young man meeting an acquaintance, said, "I heard that you were dead." "But," says the other, "you see me alive." "I do not know how that may be," replied he; "you are a notorious liar, but my informant was a person of credit."

During a storm, the passengers of a vessel that appeared in danger, seized different implements to aid them in swimming, and one of the number selected for that purpose the anchor.

One of twin-brothers died; a fellow, meeting the survivor, asked "Which is it, you or your brother that's dead?"

A man whose son was dead, seeing a crowd assembled to witness the funeral, said, "I am ashamed to bring my little son into such a numerous assembly."

The son of a fond father, when going to war, promised to bring home the head of one of the enemy. His parent replied, "I should be glad to see you come home without a head, provided you come home safe."

A man wrote to his friend in Greece, begging him to purchase books. From negligence or avarice, he neglected to execute the commission; but fearing that his correspondent might be offended, he exclaimed, when next they met, "My dear friend, I never got the letter that you wrote me about the books."

A wittol, a barber, and a bald-headed man traveled together. Losing their way, they were forced to sleep in the open air; and, to avert danger, it was agreed to keep watch by turns. The lot first fell on the barber, who, for amusement, shaved the fool's head while he slept; he then woke him, and the fool, raising his hand to scratch his head, exclaimed, "Here's a pretty mistake, rascal!—you have waked the bald-headed man instead of me."

A citizen, seeing some sparrows in a tree, went beneath and shook it, holding out his hand to catch them as they fell.

I AM TWINING.

A GERMAN AIR—ARRANGED FOR THE SPANISH GUITAR, AND PRESENTED TO THE NEW-YORK MIRROR, BY S. KEENE.

I am twin-ing, I am twin-ing The flow-ers of the sea; They are pin-ing, they are pin-ing For sweet-ness from thee.

Oh! breathe o'er them light-ly, 'Twill make them more rare; Oh! gaze on them bright-ly, 'Twill make them more fair.

I am twin-ing, I am twin-ing The flow-ers of the sea; They are pin-ing, they are pin-ing For sweet-ness from thee.

SECOND VERSE.

They were sleeping—they were sleeping,
With the dews on the plain;
They are weeping—they are weeping
For home, love, again;
Then take them, and cherish
The flowers of the sea;
They never can perish
Whilst treasured by thee.

EXTRACT FROM PAULDING'S AZURE HOSE.—Mr. Lightfoot Lee was particular in boiling his eggs, which he was accustomed to say required more discretion than any other branch of the great art of cookery. The preparations for this critical affair were always made with due solemnity. First, Mr. Lee sat with his watch in his hand, and the parlor door, as well as all the other doors down to the kitchen, wide open. At the parlor door stood Juba, his oldest, most confidential servant. At the end of the hall leading to the kitchen, stood Pomp the coachman; at the foot of the kitchen stairs stood Benjamin the footman; and Dolly, the cook, was watching the skillet. "It boils," cried Dolly; "It boils," said Benjamin; "It boils," said Pompey the great; and "It boils," echoed Juba, prince of Numidia. "Put them in," said Mr. Lee; "Put them in," said Juba; "Put them in," said Pomp; and "Put them in," cried Dolly, as she dropt the eggs into the skillet. Exactly a minute and a half afterwards, by his stop watch, Mr. Lee called out "Done;" and done was repeated from mouth to mouth as before. The perfection of the whole process consisted in Dolly's whipping out the eggs in half a second from the last echo of the critical "done." In this manner the eggs were always boiled to his entire satisfaction.

HOW TO BE SAFE.—"Doctor," said a patient, "about five years ago, after reading over the prescription of a distinguished friend of temperance, whom ill health had obliged him to consult, 'Doctor, do you think that a little spirits, now and then, would hurt me very much?'" "Why, no, sir," answered the doctor, deliberately; "I do not know that a little—now and then—would hurt you very much; but, sir, if you don't take any, it won't hurt you at all."

INTERESTING ANECDOTE.—In the debate on the removal of Washington's remains, in the house of representatives, Mr. Howard, of Maryland, related the following interesting historical anecdote: "When the British fleet was passing up the Potomac, with hostile intent, during the late war, the commander directed that when he arrived opposite Mount Vernon, he should be informed of the fact. When he was told that the ship was passing the tomb of Washington, the officers assembled upon deck, and passed by uncovered and in silence."

THE STREAM OF LIFE.

BY MOORE.

Smoothly flowing through verdant vales,
Gentle river, thy current runs;
Sheltered safe from winter gales,
Shaded cool from summer suns.
Thus our youth's sweet moments glide,
Fenced with flowery shelter round;
No rude tempest wakes the tide,
All its path is fairy ground.
But, fair river, the day will come,
When, woo'd by whisp'ring groves in vain,
Thou'lt leave those banks—thy shaded home,
To mingle with the stormy main.
And thou, sweet youth, too soon wilt pass
Into the world's unsheltered sea,
Where, once thy wave hath mixed, alas!
All hope of peace is lost for thee.

A PRINTER'S EXTREMITIES.—The editor of a western newspaper says—"the printer wants grain, pork, tallow, candles, whiskey, linens, bees' wax, wood, and anything else that he can eat."

EXCESS OF JOY.—A poor woman in a French provincial town, lately gained about forty thousand francs in the lottery, and, at the moment she received the money, died through excess of joy.

A SLEEPY HAT.—"Is't your hat sleepy?" inquired a little urchin, of a gentleman with a shocking bad one on. "No—why?" inquired the gentleman. "Why, because I think it's a long time since it had a nap," was the answer.

THE WAY TO DISPERSE A MOB.—The Boston Post has discovered an infallible remedy to disperse a mob. It consists merely in carrying round a contribution-box.

HORSE-JOCKEY WIT.—"I say, old chap," said a London cockney to a coachman, "will you let us have a drive?" "Well, what will you stand?" "A tanner," (a sixpence.) "Done," said the driver. The young fellow mounted the box, and strove in vain to flog the jaded nags into a trot. At length he spied a little place where the skin was rubbed off, and he touched them on the spot skilfully with the end of the lash. They went off at a brisk pace. "I say!" said the driver, "pull up, and give me the reins, my fine fellow. I don't stand that, I can tell you, sir. That's a little bit I keeps for myself when I wants to show off."

HOOK AND HATCHETT.—Theodore Hook lately dined with Mr. Hatchett. "Ah, my dear fellow," said his host, deprecatingly, "I am sorry to say that you will not get to-day such a dinner as our friend Tom Moore gave us." "Certainly not," replied Hook; "from a Hatchett one can expect nothing but a chop."

A GRAND AFFAIR.—A masked ball was given at the Russian court on the first of January last, which was attended by thirty thousand persons. Notwithstanding the number assembled, the greatest order prevailed throughout.

THE GARRICK CLUB.—A discussion recently took place at this famous London club of wits, respecting the jewels of a fashionable actress; several gentlemen asserting them to be real, and, consequently, of enormous value. The poet Campbell, having been silent during the conversation, was at length applied to for his opinion. "I had rather say nothing about it," said Mr. C. "for it is plain that either the diamonds or the lady must be good for nothing."

SPECIMEN OF A MALTHUSIAN.

FROM THE COMIC ANNUAL.

My dear, do pull the bell.
And pull it well.
And send those noisy children all up stairs,
Now playing here like bears.
You George and William, go into the grounds,
Charles, James, and Bob are there—and take your string,
Drive horses, or fly kites, or any thing,
You're quite enough to play at hare and hounds—
You little Mary, and Caroline, and Poll,
Take each your doll,
And go, my dears, into the two back pair,
Your sister Margaret's there—
Harriet and Grace, thank God, are both at school,
And as far off as Pouty Pool—
I want to read, but really can't get on;
Let the four twins, Mark, Matthew, Luke, and John,
Go—to their nursery—go—I never can Enjoy my Malthus among such a clan!

ORIGINAL MORAL TALES.

THE FATHER'S LESSON.

"I AM sick of human nature already," said Frederick St. John to his father. "Every day's experience teaches me that mankind are villains, with but few exceptions."

"In which honorable minority," replied his father, "Mr. Frederick St. John ranks himself, of course."

"Most assuredly I do. If I were so low-minded, so base—so—(I have no words to express my horror and contempt for them) as nearly every one around me, I should, I positively believe, put an end to my existence."

"No," said the parent, "if you were base-minded, like them, your estimation of meanness would be different, and you would be contented to live on any terms."

"Never."

"I tell you, Fred, you are but a youth and know little of the world. There are doubtless an ample sufficiency of rascals about us, but they form only a small part of human nature which you speak of so decisively. You are not competent to comprehend all the influences which have made them what they are."

"But, sir, I know what I am."

"I am not so sure of that, Fred. I hope no dreadful experience will ever undeceive you. You know what you wish to be—not what you are."

"But, my dear sir, by taking such a view of my character as you seem to have of it, I am reduced in my own estimation to a level with the very persons I despise. You deprive me of pride, which is at once my support and my reward."

"If I would diminish your pride," replied Mr. St. John, "it is to supply its place with modesty and watchfulness, which, if not so agreeable, are at least more safe and useful qualities. A young man setting out in life is like the navigator of a ship whose way lies over dangerous seas. It is good for him to be fully aware of the perils which he must encounter, and that others as wise and well-conditioned as himself have gone down into the deep."

"But surely, my father, you do not deem me capable of submitting to the degradations and committing the crimes which mark the beings about me?"

"I know, Frederick, that nature has gifted you with a clear understanding and an affectionate heart. Your hopes are high—your passions warm—your feelings pure; but you are yet young, and cannot conjecture how these may change when you shall have gone farther on in the dark world. You cannot tell to what withering influences you may hereafter be subjected. You know not what sophistry may corrupt your principles, what temptations may overcome your virtue. Now I trust your piety is strong, and your views of right and wrong just and noble. Yet beware how you trust too implicitly even to these. What tree stands so lofty, but it may be blasted by thunder? What river leaps from its source so pure and clear, but other streams may flow into its bosom and soil its sweet waters?"

"There are some things," rejoined the youth, after a pause, "which I am certain I could not bear. Some misfortunes—some crimes. I could not bear a disappointment in love—or a blow—or the recollection of a criminal action. I could not, for example, exist if I had killed a man. Shame and remorse would sink me into the earth. I could not dwell with a tainted reputation. I could not perpetrate a cruelty, even to save my life. I could not—"

"Hold," interrupted the father, "you have said already too much. Each word you speak is a dagger to my soul."

"My father!"

"Look not so surprised, my son. I will relate to you my history. You have sometimes remarked that I am not a happy man."

"I have, my father. Often I have felt my very heart cold to watch the livid paleness pass over your face even in the midst of the gayest scenes. I have mourned secretly over the certainty that you were miserable."

"You have judged me rightly, boy. I am miserable. Life is a load to me, like the cross and the crown of thorns which one better than man bore in his last mortal time. You have now arrived at years of reason. You are enthusiastic and inexperienced. I love you better than myself. For your sake I will relate briefly my own life. May it prove a lesson to you—may it be a light to your feet in the darkness through which the career of man but too often leads. Listen, Frederick, and hereafter, instead of boasting of your virtue, watch over it in silence, but with a never-sleeping care."

"When I was of your age I was sanguine and joyous like you. Nothing would satisfy me but a place among the highest and the best. I was proud and haughty, and confident in my own powers and my own honor. I regarded nature with a universal love; and you will not suspect me of vanity in adding that my face and person were as commanding and beautiful as my mind was gifted and my ambition aspiring. I had always been educated in the midst of careful and affectionate friends, and the general submission which I was accustomed to meet in all my desires from every one around me, had, perhaps, given my disposition a slight despotism and tyrannical turn. I was impatient of every difficulty and contradiction; and although when I loved at all it was with a deep tenderness, yet my bursts of passion were irresistible. I lost my self-command, and was ready to plunge into any—the most desperate deed. Alas! alas! how time has subdued me. I can scarcely yet realize whether I myself am changed, or whether the revolution is in the surrounding objects. However it may be, my fiery hopes, and passions are all extinguished. I live no more for myself, but for others, and shall welcome the moment wished for so oft, which shall lay me in the grave."

"I lived till the age of twenty without knowing the passion of love. I even laughed and scoffed at it. I deemed it implied something unmanly in the character to bow down thus before a pair of eyes, or the sound of a voice, or the fascination of a smile. I branded it as a delusion, and that is one among the very few of my early opinions which I retain still. If there is any thing actually so high and irresistible in the charm of a female, why do not all men go mad for her? Why, but from a species of delirium, should I thrill beneath the looks of a girl who gazes at another without vibrating a chord of his feeling, unless, peradventure, precisely contrary to that with which I regard her? A man shall put an end to his existence for the love of a fair creature, whom her daily associates regard with the most absolute indifference. It is a dream—this love—a wild fever—a vain thirst after a bliss which the object of your affection suggests to you, but cannot supply you with: gratifying it, cures it; for marry, and it is gone. Friendship supplies its place, of a higher kind, it is true, but still only friendship. What husband suffers the vague but delicious aspirations of the lover? The latter feels the thin delight of years condensed into one intense bliss at the sound of her voice. The former sits with her till time hangs heavy on his hands, and he is obliged to resort to ordinary means to pass it away. Ay, love is a brief enchantment—a sweet, but dangerous disease. Beware of it, boy. Whatever it may be, at this period I felt it. I, who had esteemed myself above so idle a feeling, passed the night in sleepless anxiety and the day in pining care for the enticement of a soft young face. Adeline was her name. She was rich, and great above my sphere. I loved her deeply without her suspecting it. I mistook her natural benevolence of disposition for attachment. I saw not that the same remembered smile which she bestowed on me was equally the gift of others. I only knew that she had smiled on me. My wildness and my pride were alike forgotten, and one day when we were alone, I knelt down to her and poured out my soul with the lowliness of a slave. The fallen angels in Paradise Lost, who sprang upon the trees in the place of eternal desolation to gorge on their tempting fruit, and found them ashes, could not have been more struck with amazement and horror than was I at the manner in which my suit was received—the surprise—the merriment, which her sweet soul strove to disguise—but in vain—the utter indifference and contempt lurking out under the usual protestations of friendship. They were enough to drive any lover to despair—but on one like me—proud and haughty to fierceness—revengeful, although I knew it not—and vain when I thought I was only noble—they came with a dark and deadening power that might have quailed the heart of an evil spirit. It made mine reckless. I cannot express how the recollection of that moment would intrude upon my better hours like a ghost, and make me, like Macbeth, fling away the cup of joy. My temper became gradually embittered, my whole mind overshadowed. With such principles as mine were then, you may ask me why I still lived on? It was for revenge. Not against her person or her fame. I would not have injured her for the value of a thousand worlds. But I sought to show her that he whom she had rejected with scorn was a higher being than she dreamed of. I panted to place on my brow some glorious wreath of honor. I wished to fill a wide space in the world's favor, that she might say with regret, "I knew him not." Then I would that she might behold me contented and happy with another. That reflection might go into her mind how much I despised myself for what I had done, and how pleased I was that fate had denied me my wish. For this I married your mother. Think, Frederick, with what a struggle I, who had learned to think love so sacred, submitted tamely to be spurned by one and to take to my bosom another who was to me but one of the million."

"At all events," said I, "she who has trusted her happiness in my hands shall not be disappointed. I will watch over her with all the care of love, though without its real devotion."

"As I said this I stood by a house famous for gambling, and a friend beckoned me in. I was weary of myself, and complied without any intention of becoming involved in the game. From a mere shame of refusing so trifling a favor as my companion requested of me, I pledged money to a small amount, and lost."

"I will play," said I, "till I win back my own, and no longer."

"I left the room at midnight—a bankrupt."

"The winner quarreled with me when we settled his demands. He was a powerfully formed man—a professed boxer, and practised duelling, and I soon discovered, in addition, a noted sharper. In the rage of a moment I struck him. He knocked me down as easily as if I had been a child. I challenged him—we fought."

"I will break your right arm," he said; "but if you persevere, I will kill you."

"His exquisite skill enabled him to keep his word. I went home with a fractured limb."

"When I recovered, I had resolved to watch my opportunity, and end his life. To be trampled on with such utter impunity, was more than I could bear. I forgot the divine precepts of my religion. I forgot the ordinary feelings of humanity and honor, which would have led me to make any sacrifice of personal inclination, rather than plunge my wife, whom I had already rendered poor and helpless, yet further into distress and degradation. I even went so far as to fix upon the hour, when, in the face of day my insults were to be righted, and my infuriated passions satiated by a gory revenge. Yes, my son," continued the narrator, with a face of ashy hue, while the son sat shuddering by his side, and hanging on his accents with fearful interest, "your father would have been a murderer, and might have perished on the gallows, but for the gracious interference of heaven. A fever seized me. I was confined many months 'at death's door.' It would be needless to explain the reflections which then passed through my mind. When I recovered, I was an altered man. I had been too near the chilly grave for passion. I shuddered at the escape I had made, and in relating it to you, I expect so dreadful a recollection will, in some degree, quell your self-confidence, as well as alter your opinion of the world. It may teach you the important lesson, that the good as well as the bad, are in danger, and that no man must ever sleep on his post."

THE ADOPTED CHILD.

At the close of one of those mild days of late autumn, which, in New England, are the loveliest of the year, the setting sun, seen only as a spot of brilliant red, through the transparency of a long line of purple mist, shed its light over trees of many colors, and on some, whose less lasting foliage lay scattered beneath them. Under one of these, on a high bank, which shelved precipitously down to the road, stood a girl of about eight years of age, engaged in gathering ripe chestnuts from among the shrivelled leaves, and the innumerable sharp coverings, which lay, now that their rough guardianship was over, with their velvet linings turned outwards.

A good-natured looking boy, somewhat older, was earnestly expostulating from the road below—"Amy, you must go home; see, it is almost dark," and, as if to add force to remonstrance, he began to ascend the steep bank where she stood.

A voice from the tree subjoined—"I think so too, cousin Amy, and I shall not shake any more nuts for you. I am coming down."

The child raised her head suddenly, and darting to the bank, gave her brother an impulse which rendered his descent very rapid, while a sharp chestnut burr, thrown upwards into the tree, intimated to the last speaker that his remark was not agreeable.

"For shame, Amy," said the fallen hero, as soon as he could stand upright; "there is a gentleman coming, who has seen your conduct."

The rustling of leaves, and the quick step of a horse, verified his words, and drew the rude girl from curiosity again to the edge of the bank. A stranger, of highly respectable appearance, rode under the spot unmolested, till an impudent "there!" from her brother, inspired in Amy a noble emulation for new deeds of daring. The apron, which she had firmly grasped, was suddenly lowered, and its prickly contents rested on the head and shoulders of the unfortunate rider, or buried themselves in the long mane of the steed. The gentleman reined his startled horse, bowed politely, then, with a somewhat sarcastic smile said, "Can you tell me, polite young lady, in which of yonder houses Mr. Atherton lives?"

Amy instantly retreated—George looked up in dismay, when the elder boy sprang from the tree, and in a very respectful and obliging manner complied with the request.

"Now, Amy, here is a fine business," said George, as soon as the horseman was out of hearing, "this is our rich uncle, whom father has been expecting. Come, you had best go home now, this is sport enough for one evening."

The three walked on in silence, till Amy, taking a handful of chestnuts from the basket which her cousin carried, offered them to George, looking up from beneath her bonnet with a very arch expression, as she said, "Don't tell mother."

The good-hearted boy could not resist the appeal, and bursting into a loud laugh, in which Henry joined, he promised silence. They soon reached their humble dwelling, which they found in a bustle, from the recent arrival. Neither commands nor entreaties could force Amy into the presence of her new relative till the hour of evening prayers, when the family were all expected to assemble.

Herbert Atherton was a man of about forty; ill health and foreign residence made him appear even older. He was small, but well-formed. His person evidently received great attention from himself, though it could hardly command it from others. His dress (alas, for manliness, when that is the most noticeable object in one's appearance) was neat in the extreme, and had an air of fashion and polished refinement. His sallow countenance was enlivened by piercing black eyes; and his smiles, though not pleasant, revealed a row of brilliant teeth. Amy gained all this information, as she sat, during the whole of family worship, with her large eyes fixed on him; she noticed too, that he was evidently uninterested in the service, and, as she afterwards expressed it to her brother, "looked as if he had never learned to sit still in prayer-time." The new uncle had also been forming his opinion of her, for he was a man of keen observation. Her elder sisters interested him little; they were active, tidy country girls; comely, but not attractive. But he had seen a specimen of the childish Amy, which showed character, and he now discovered that she possessed rare external beauty. "What a perfect creature she might be made!" was the result at which he arrived, just as the family were dispersing. He longed to form an acquaintance with the beautiful sprite, but she vanished from the room.

As he wandered the next morning about the limited enclosures of the humble farm, he saw Amy, surrounded by the congregated multitude of the poultry-yard, to which she was distributing their portions, with impartiality and deep interest. She reasoned with a duck, which seemed dissatisfied—checked the arrogance of some presuming turkeys, and encouraged the timid chickens to come forward and assert their rights. He spoke to her, and her basket of grain was abandoned to the fowls' own discretion, and she darted away with a graceful rapidity, that fascinated, while it vexed him. But fortune at length favored him. His really fine taste led him forth to enjoy the rich autumnal scenery of New England woods. Long absence gave an air of novelty to the vividness of coloring found upon every bough at this season, and he gazed, almost with surprise, at the glowing branches of the maple, lifting themselves against the clear blue sky, while the thought forced itself upon him, that they were like earthly passions and hopes in the presence of pure and heavenly happiness.

A slight rustling among the dead leaves drew his attention, and he discovered the cause, in the blooming face of his lovely niece, peeping at him from under a bush which afforded but partial concealment. He instantly seized the child, lest she should escape him as before, though there was now less danger, as the scarlet winter-green berries which she held in her lap, were treasures too highly valued to be thrown down for flight. After half-an-hour's intercourse with the child, in which he found need of more winning words and insinuating caresses than he had ever before believed necessary to make himself tolerated, he ventured to advance a proposal, that as he had no little girl, Amy should belong to him instead of her parents. As an inducement, he enlarged upon the impropriety of rude manners, and the advantages of being sent to school, where she would become elegant and accomplished. As this seemed either incomprehensible, or not very delightful, he spoke of the pleasure of having every thing she wanted, and the opportunity she should possess of bestowing gifts upon those whom she loved.

"Will you take George, and my dear cousin Henry?"

"No, I only want one."

"Well," said Amy, deliberately, "shall I have to live with you always?"

Atherton could hardly suppress his mortification, but replied, that she would be placed at school, where he should visit her only once or twice in the year, and that he should bring her such beautiful presents, that she would be happy to see him.

It was next necessary to gain her parents' consent to his proposal, and Atherton found it a difficult task to win away the favorite child. The fond and pious mother wept bitterly; and, had the decision rested with her, Amy had never left her sight. But the father had an eye to worldly wealth. He was tasting the bitterness of poverty, while trying to supply the wants of a large family; and though he was disappointed that the benefits he had expected from his recently recovered relative did not extend themselves over his whole field, he could not find it in his heart to check the tide of liberality, although it did not flow in a channel of his own choosing.

Amy's parting with home and friends, was that of a child, too volatile for reflection and deep grief. She wept as she hung on her mother's neck, and would have been pathetic in her farewell to George and Henry, if she had not interspersed so many charges about rabbits, chickens, nuts, and behaviour. She would not see that this separation from a mischievous child, whom they had idolized, was a different and weightier circumstance to those whom she left behind, though the boys asserted that there were glistening drops on her round ruddy cheeks, as she gave them her last looks from the carriage window.

At a splendid private ball in one of our southern cities, a stranger's eye wandered carelessly over many gay groups, when his attention seemed absorbed by the movements of two who had just entered. An elderly gentleman, whose deportment seemed to indicate a wish to be thought more youthful than his countenance warranted, watched, with more than fatherly care, the beautiful young lady who held his arm. A lovely creature she was, slightly, but exquisitely formed—dressed with that simple elegance which denotes tasteful refinement; and as she returned the salutations of her numerous acquaintances, with a self-possession, which showed she was accustomed to command attention, the color glowed in her cheeks, and smiles lit her dark eyes into a brilliancy that accorded with her arch and playful manner. Her companion was constantly by her side. He evidently enjoyed the admiration she excited, while at the same time he seemed hardly pleased with those who looked too deep, or expressed too open an admiration. Though he followed her like a shadow, he seldom spoke to her, and when he did, a shade passed over the beauty's face, slight, but still visible. The stranger had looked longer than was consistent with politeness, for an acquaintance remarked, "She is indeed a creature to be worshipped, but the rites must be performed in secrecy and silence. Miss Atherton is universally admired, and I suspect would be a coquet if she might, but her old uncle will not allow any one to approach her. See, her bright eyes are turned towards us, after that inquisitive glance at the direction of his. Mr. Morland, what does this mean? Miss Atherton certainly recollects you; she is fainting."

A group immediately collected about the object of their remarks, and intercepted their view for a few moments.

"Will you do me the favor to introduce me to Mr. Atherton?" said the stranger to his companion, as the gentleman re-appeared.

"Certainly, Mr. Morland; but do not flatter yourself with a hope of success." As they crossed the richly-furnished saloon, he added, "That beautiful niece is reserved for some mysterious destiny. Wealth and high respectability are no passport to the favor of her guardian. I have seen many unsuccessful experiments of their power," while a bitter smile gave emphasis to his words.

Mr. Atherton received Mr. Morland with great politeness; but to his request for permission to renew a former acquaintance with his niece, replied, that Amy was indisposed, and was going immediately from home.

Morland stood in the embowered portico, when the uncle conveyed Amy to the carriage, and heard him say, in a tone more like that of cutting reproach than of the kindness due to one so young and fascinating, "Amy, I too saw the 'dear cousin Henry,' of former times."

Yes—it was Henry Morland—the devoted cousin of childhood became as devoted a lover as before Amy's childhood had passed away. During the only visit the adopted child had been permitted to make to her humble home, Henry had confessed to himself, and confided to Amy, the certainty that he should never know human happiness without her, and had received in return, a promise, made in the simple sincerity of fourteen years old, that she would never marry till he came to claim her. Henry Morland knew what he undertook when he resolved to raise himself from country obscurity to a rank which should enable him to hope for the niece of Mr. Atherton, and his efforts were proportioned to his aim.

In our country, honors and fortune are not hereditary—and the intelligent and energetic Morland appeared, at the age of twenty-three, possessed of both, in a degree equalled by few in his native land. Still, as the events of the evening had shown him, his success was doubtful, though he believed with satisfaction that Amy had never forgotten him. He left the crowded rooms of the house in which he was a guest, and wandered into the garden. Flowers were there, of every hue and perfume; the moonlight gave them a paler and more chastened beauty, while the heavy dew pressed out from them a richer fragrance. The snowy cape jessamin shone from among its polished leaves, in the elegance of perfect purity, and innumerable roses covered the arbor, and trailed their loaded branches along the path. "Beautiful, beautiful!" thought Morland; "but the little sweet-briar of the New-England woods is dearer. That name will not apply as it did once to Amy—this is a better emblem;" seizing a long wreath of the multiflora he shook the dew-drops from its clustered flowers. "Well, it is a wreath worth the wearing, and others will admire it more than my simple flower."

The appearance of Miss Atherton on this evening was long recollected by those who saw her, for it was her last. There was a report in C—that the stranger had asked her hand of her uncle, and received an immediate assent, but had been unable to obtain her own consent. It was evident that something very agitating had occurred, for she was attacked with delirium and violent fever, and when she was sufficiently recovered, Mr. Atherton and his niece left the city, and never returned to it.

"Mother," said the invalid, "draw aside the curtain, and let me look abroad once more." The light fell on an emaciated figure, supported by pillows. A flush, deeper than that of health, was on the countenance, but in the large dark eyes and clustering locks, which disease had spared, there lingered some resemblance to the blooming Amy Atherton. "Mother," said she, after a pause, "can you see the chestnut bank? There—there my misery began. I shall die soon—yes—die a victim to parental ambition."

"Amy," said the mild-looking mother, "I should think you unkind, if I did not know this to be the wildness of disease."

"Mother, I did speak hastily; and it is wrong to reproach those who meant me only kindness, though they have been my destroyers. I might have been innocent and happy if you had not sent me from you; and instead of watching over me, surrendered me to the guardianship of a stranger."

"Amy, this is either raving, or you have some meaning which I cannot penetrate."

"Listen, then, mother, for I find I cannot go down to the grave as I had resolved, with my tale untold. You gave me away in my childhood, but I did not forget you, nor my simple happiness. I might have loved my uncle, if he had not irritated me by perpetual contests, about what seemed to me, mere trifles. The constrained manners and ceaseless application which he inculcated, as the great duties of life, were as intolerable as they were incomprehensible to a child of nature."

"I hated the gifts with which I was loaded, because he gave them; and while I was envied by my schoolmates, I was unhappy almost beyond endurance. At the times when I expected the visits of my uncle, I was so wretched that the christian principles you early gave, hardly had power to restrain me from some rash deed for relief. My uncle knew that I hated him, and I believe that the knowledge piqued him to overcome my dislike, for his course of conduct towards me was entirely changed. After leaving school not the slightest restraint was exercised over me, and every wish was gratified almost before it could be definitely formed. It was not in my nature to be ungrateful, and I soon felt that I had acted very wrong. I found that my uncle's peculiarities had prevented my acknowledgment of his powerful and highly cultivated intellect; and to atone for my injustice, I gave him credit for virtues which he had not. When he took me from home, I believe his only wish was to gratify himself by an experiment upon his peculiar views of education. My waywardness had defeated his scheme, but the effort he had made to overcome it had its natural effect in exciting a deeper interest than he had intended in the object. I believe he would have spared the sacred fabric of religious faith my early instructions had reared, had not a reverence for human laws been twined around it. He admired female piety, as it was associated with innocence and purity. But this pillar of hope must be levelled, and he set himself assiduously to undermine it. He made me an infidel, and then urged me to become his wife! Mother, you shudder at this illegal union; so did I. I had, moreover, solemnly vowed to marry another; but Herbert Atherton, the soul of honor, urged the obligations under which his bounty had laid me, and in this he appealed to the only principles he had left me. I acknowledge that my vanity was gratified by his admiration; for he had often declared that he had remained single only because he had never seen the woman whom he would make his wife. I felt, also, that I was too degraded for the destiny I had once engaged to share, and in an evil hour I became the wife of Atherton. Our marriage was private, as the proud spirit of my uncle shrunk from the contempt which he knew must follow an exposure of this outrage upon public opinion. Mother, do not look reproachfully upon me. I was a child, and I should have been sheltered from evil in the bosom of my home. What was to be expected from such a union but remorse and misery? I sought happiness in gaiety and admiration. Jealousy and angry expostulations were the natural consequences, and I plunged again into extravagant pleasures for relief. I despised myself for the imposition I was practising, and I despised Herbert for the want of better principles, for the want of moral courage, and for the words of affection he lavished on me in public. Mine was a lot of glittering wretchedness; misery without the hope of future relief. It was then that I saw him—Henry Morland—and felt that he had come, in his unsuspecting uprightness, to claim one whom he believed incapable of change. Atherton immediately recognized him as the cousin whom I had loved in childhood, and all his evil passions were roused. With an infernal expression of countenance, he told me that he did not consider the marriage tie indissoluble, and bade me bestow myself and happiness on 'dear Henry,' for I had brought no happiness to him. He even gave his consent to Morland, when he asked him for permission to address me. I do not distinctly recollect what passed at my distracting interview with Henry, but I remember well what followed. I lay at death's open portal, but my thoughts were all of life. An earnest longing for my early home possessed me. I pined for the shade of green trees, for the rippling of cool streams. I agonized for home, for purity, and piety. Then, in my frenzy, I cursed Herbert Atherton, as my destroyer for time and for eternity. I sent him shuddering from my presence, and I have never seen him since. When the violence of disease had spent itself, I was told, in reply to my inquiries for him, that he had left C—, directing that when sufficiently recovered I should be sent home, under the care of George. And, mother, never let that noble-hearted brother know my wrongs. He must never exchange the gratitude he feels for Atherton for the indignation he owes him on my account. And now, mother, take the precious Bible, and soothe me from it, as you often do. Thanks to infinite mercy, in death there is hope of that peaceful rest which life has denied to me."

In the churchyard of W—, a simple stone is inscribed to "Amy, daughter of Robert Atherton, aged nineteen." This is the only memorial of the fair 'adopted child.'

MYRTLE CORRESPONDENCE.

A lady offered a young clergyman, of high scholastic attainments, a sprig of myrtle for his lady-love; he declined the gift, and sent her the following stanzas by way of accounting for his refusal:

Oh, give not me the myrtle spray
To deck a gentle maid;
I will not bear one leaf away,
Though I love its fragrant shade.

Rather in soft Italia's strand,
Where Tiber's waters flow,
Still let it crown the Cyprian band,
Or deck the wanton brow.

The Paphian Queen's unhallowed shrine
May still the myrtle wear;
The Grecian Helen well might twine
The blossoms in her hair.

Be mine the flowers that blush unseen
Down in the vale below;
The primrose peeping from between
The blue-bells where they grow.

Give me the snow-drop, fair and bright,
Chaste as the morning dew;
Give me the flower that shuns the light,
The violet, white or blue.

These be the floral gems I seek,
I ask no other aid;
The purest emblems of a meek,
A soft, retiring maid.

Then, lady, keep thy myrtle spray
To grace some other brow;
I will not bear one leaf away
To mock a lover's vow.

REPLY BY MISS MITFORD.

Scorn not the fragrant myrtle bough,
Oh, gentle minstrel, scorn not thou;
Nor change for blossoms frail and brief,
The bright imperishable leaf,*
Emblems of things that dearest be—
Of love, and truth, and constancy.

For be that maid as snow-drop fair,
As the first wintry primrose rare;
With eyes that share the blue-bell's hue,
Or morning violets steeped in dew;
Yet shalt thou own the myrtle bough
May well besem a virgin brow.

Let the dark wreath, with buds so pale,
Sit crown-like on the nuptial veil;
That verdant bay thyself mayst claim,
Large portion of that tree of fame;
Add laurel spray and orange flower,
And fair befall the bridal hour!

WORKS OF THE REV. ROBERT HALL.

On the appearance of the first volume of sermons, from the press of the Harpers, and before we had any opportunity of examining it carefully for ourselves, we noticed its publication, and quoted opinions of the writer by Dugald Stewart and Dr. Parr. We have since perused it, and to say that we have derived from it gratification of a very unusual and elevated nature, would be but the most ordinary praise which it may claim from every reader. We commend it to the attention of all who can appreciate deep and earnest eloquence of thought, and the most polished beauties of diction. It is not now our design to review the work; but simply again to call attention to its publication, and thus induce some to procure it, who otherwise might pass it by with neglect. Faultless it certainly is not; but its few defects are nearly invisible amid its power, reason, poetry, and moral splendor. It materially strengthens the estimation in which Mr. Hall is held, that he delivered all but one of these discourses extemporaneously. Dr. Gregory observes that "he generally set down on a sheet of letter-paper the plan of the proposed discourse, marking the divisions, specifying a few texts, and sometimes writing the first sentence. This he regarded as 'digging a channel for his thoughts to flow in.' Then calling into exercise the power of abstraction, which he possessed in a degree I never saw equalled, he would, whether alone or not, pursue his trains of thought, retrace and extend them until the whole were engraven on his mind; and when once so fixed in their entire connexion, they were never after obliterated." He adds, that the most "striking and impressive passages were often strictly speaking, extemporaneous."

That he was an extraordinary man, the ardent eulogies of the first literary individuals of the day may be regarded as a satisfactory testimony; of the beauty of his style the subjoined extract will afford our readers some idea. It is from the first sermon, in the book, which is a kind of treatise upon modern infidelity, founded on the text, "without God in the world."

After a few pages of logical reasoning he regards the dreadful consequences of skepticism on society, and enumerates two of an important nature, which must follow the general prevalence of this system, viz. the frequent perpetration of great crimes, and the total absence of great virtues.

"In those conjunctures which tempt avarice or inflame ambition, when a crime flatters with the prospect of impunity, and the certainty of immense advantage, what is to restrain an atheist from its commission? To say that remorse will deter him is absurd; for remorse, as distinguished from pity, is the sole offspring of religious belief, the extinction of which is the great purpose of the infidel philosophy.

"The dread of punishment or infamy from his fellow-creatures will be an equally ineffectual barrier; because crimes are only committed under such circumstances as suggest the hope of concealment: not to say that crimes themselves will soon lose their infamy and their horror under the influence of that system which destroys the sanctity of virtue, by converting it into a low calculation of worldly interest. Here the sense of an ever-present Ruler, and of an avenging Judge, is of the most awful and indispensable necessity; as it is that alone which impresses on all crimes the character of folly, shows that duty and interest in every instance coincide, and that the most prosperous career of vice—the most brilliant successes of criminality, are but an accumulation of wrath against the day of wrath.

"As the frequent perpetration of great crimes is an inevitable consequence of the diffusion of skeptical principles, so, to understand this consequence in its full extent, we must look beyond their immediate effects, and consider the disruption of social ties, the destruction of confidence, the terror, suspicion, and hatred which must prevail in that state of society in which barbarous deeds are familiar. The tranquillity which pervades a well-ordered community, and the mutual good offices which bind its members together, are founded on an implied confidence in the indisposition to annoy; in the justice, humanity, and moderation of those among whom we dwell. So that the worst consequence of crimes is, that they impair the stock of public charity and general tenderness. The dread and hatred of our species would infallibly be grafted on a conviction that we were exposed every moment to the surges of an unbridled ferocity, and that nothing but the power of the magistrate stood between us and the daggers of the assassins. In such a state, laws, deriving no support from public manners, are unequal to the task of curbing the fury of the passions; which, from being concentrated into selfishness, fear, and revenge, acquire new force. Terror and suspicion beget cruelty, and inflict injuries by way of prevention. Pity is extinguished in the stronger impulse of self-preservation. The tender and generous affections are crushed; and nothing is seen but the retaliation of wrongs, the fierce and unmitigated struggle for superiority. This is but a faint sketch of the incalculable calamities and horrors we must expect, should we be so unfortunate as ever to witness the triumph of modern infidelity.

"This system is a soil as barren of great and sublime virtues as it is prolific in crimes. By great and sublime virtues are meant those which are called into action on great and trying occasions, which demand the sacrifice of the dearest interests and prospects of human life, and sometimes of life itself: the virtues, in a word, which, by their rarity and splendor, draw admiration, and have rendered illustrious the character of patriots, martyrs, and confessors. It requires but little reflection to perceive, that whatever veils a future world, and contracts the limits of existence within the present life, must tend, in a proportionable degree, to diminish the grandeur, and narrow the sphere of human agency."

Since the above notice was written, the publishers have issued the second volume, which we have read with unabated gratification. It would please us to make copious extracts, did not the narrowness of our space admonish us to desist—but we suggest to all, and especially young females, to steal a few hours from the fashionable novels of the day, and open these pages as an experiment. They are worth a thousand romances.

VIOLA—FROM THE ITALIAN.

She had a form; but I might talk till eve,
Young as the sun is now upon our watch,
Ere I had told its beauties; it was slight,
E'en as yon willow, and like its soft stem,
Fell into thousand motions, lovely all.
But for her cheek—look on those streaks of rose,
Tinging the white clouds o'er us; now and then
A flush of deeper crimson lighting up
Their lovely wreaths like wind-kissed lilies fair:
And now and then a long, rich, ebon tinge,
Floating between them. There I think I see
Still, though she's in her grave, the cheek I loved,
With the dark tress that veild it. When I sat
Beneath her eye, I felt its splendor on me,
Like a bright spell. 'Tis not the diamond's ray,
Nor vespers starlight, nor aught beautiful
In this ascending sun, or in this world
Can bring me back its image; 'twas the soul
That has no portraiture in earth, a beam,
As we have heard of angels, where no lips
Are wanted to give utterance to the thought.
Her eye was radiant thought; yet when her voice
Spoke to me, or at ev'ning o'er her lute
Breathed some old melody, or closed the day
With music to the virgin, I have turn'd
E'en from the glory of her eye, to weep
With sudden keenness of delight. Those tears
On earth I weep no more. She's in the grave.

CONFESSIONS.

FROM THE MANUSCRIPT OF A SEXAGENARIAN.

In youth, when pen and fingers first
Coined rhymes for all who choose to seek 'em,
Ere luring hope's gay bubbles burst,
Or Chitty was my vade mecum.
Ere years had characterized my brow
With the deep lines, that well become it,
Or told me that warm hearts could grow
Cold as Mont Blanc's snow-covered summit.

When my slow step and solemn swing
Were steadier and somewhat briaker;
When velvet collars were "the thing,"
And long before I wore a whisker;
Ere I had measured six feet two,
Or bought Havanas by the dozen,
I fell in love—as many do—
She was an angel—hem—my cousin.

Sometimes my eye, its furtive glance
Cast back on memory's short-hand record;
I wonder—if by any chance
Life's future page will be so checkered!
My angel cousin!—ah! her form—
Her lofty brow—her curls of raven,
Eyes darker than the thunder storm,
Its lightnings flashing from their haven.

Her lip, with music eloquent
As her own grand upright piano;
No—never yet was peri lent
To earth like thee, sweet Adriana.
I may not—dare not—call to mind
The joys that once my breast elated,
Though yet, methinks, the moaning wind
Sweeps o'er my ear, with thy tones freighted;

And then I pause, and turn aside
From pleasure's throng of pangless-hearted,
To weep! No. Sentiment and pride
Are by each other always thwarted!
I press my hand upon my brow,
To still the throbbing pulse that heaves it,
Recall my boyhood's faltered vow,
And marvel—if she still believes it.

But she is woman—and her heart,
Like her tiara's brightest jewel,
Cold—hard—till kindled by some art,
Then quenchless burns—its fuel—
So poets say. Well, let it pass,
And those who list may yield it credit;
But as for constancy, alas!
I've never known—I've only read it!

Love! 'tis a roving fire, at most,
The cuervo santo of life's ocean;
Now flashing through the storm, now lost—
Who trust, 'tis said, rue their devotion.
It may be, 'tis a mooted creed—
I have my doubts, and it—believers,
Though one is faithless—where's the need
Of shunning all—as gay deceivers?

I said I loved. I did. But ours
Was felt, not growled hyena fashion!
We wandered not at moonlight hours,
Some dignity restrained the passion!
We loved—I never stooped to woo;
We met—I always doffed my beaver;
She smiled a careless "how d'y'e do—"
Good morning, sir—I rose to leave her.

She loved—she never told me so;
I never asked—I could not doubt it;
For there were signs on cheek and brow;
And asking! Love is known without it!
'Twas understood—we were content,
And rode, and sung, and waltzed together!
Alone, without embarrassment,
We talked of something—not the weather!

Time rolled along—the parting hour
With arrowy speed brought its distresses;
A kiss—a miniature—a flower—
A ringlet from those raven tresses;
And tears that would unbidden start,
(An hour, perhaps, and they had perished.)
In the far chambers of my heart,
I swore her image should be cherished.

I've looked on peril—it has glared
In fashionable forms upon me,
From leveled aim—from weapon bared—
And doctors three attending on me!
But never did my sternness wane
At pang by shot or steel imparted.
I'd not recall that hour of pain
For years of bliss—it passed—we parted.

We parted—though her tear-gemmed cheeks,
Her heaving breast had thus unmanned me—
She quite forgot me in three weeks!
And other beauties soon trepanned me.
We met—and did not find it hard
Joy's overwhelming tide to smother—
There was a "Mrs." on my card,
And she—was married to another!

DRAWING.—A London star, on entering the treasury of the theatre, and demanding the arrears of his enormous salary, a proprietor thus addressed him—"You really, Mr. M. ought to remember that you have not drawn during the whole season." "Very true," was the reply; "and, therefore, it is high time to begin, I come to draw now!"

LETTERS FROM PARIS.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF EUROPE.

NUMBER FOURTEEN.

The Garden of the Tuileries—Prince Moskowa—Sons of Napoleon—Cooper and Morse—Sir Sidney Smith—Fashionable women—Close of the day—The famous Eating-houses—How to dine well in Paris, &c.

It is March, and the weather has all the characteristics of New-England May. The last two or three days have been deliciously spring-like, clear, sunny, and warm. The gardens of the Tuileries are crowded. The chairs beneath the terraces are filled by the old men reading the gazettes, mothers and nurses watching their children at play, and, at every few steps, circles of whole families sitting and sewing, or conversing, as unconcernedly as at home. It strikes a stranger oddly. With the privacy of American feelings, we cannot conceive of these out-of-door French habits. What would a Boston or New-York mother think of taking chairs for her whole family, grown-up daughters and all, in the Mall or upon the Battery, and spending the day in the very midst of the gayest promenade of the city? People of all ranks do it here. You will see the powdered, elegant gentleman of the ancien régime, handing his wife or his daughter to a straw-bottomed chair, with all the air of drawing-room courtesy; and, begging pardon for the liberty, pull his journal from his pocket, and sit down to read beside her; or a tottering old man, leaning upon a stout Swiss servant girl, goes bowing and apologizing through the crowd, in search of a pleasant neighbor, or some old compatriot, with whom he may sit and nod away the hours of sunshine. It is a beautiful custom, positively. The gardens are like a constant fête. It is a holiday revel, without design or disappointment. It is a masque, where every one plays his character unconsciously, and therefore naturally and well. We get no idea of it at home. We are too industrious a nation to have idlers enough. It would even pain most of the people of our country to see so many thousands of all ages and conditions of life spending day after day in such absolute uselessness.

Imagine yourself here, on the fashionable terrace, the promenade, two days in the week, of all that is distinguished and gay in Paris. It is a short raised walk, just inside the railings, and the only part of all these wide and beautiful gardens where a member of the beau monde is ever to be met. The hour is four, the day Friday, the weather heavenly. I have just been long enough in Paris to be an excellent walking dictionary, and I will tell you who people are. In the first place, all the well dressed men you see are English. You will know the French by those flaring coats, laid clear back on their shoulders, and their execrable hats and thin legs. Their heads are right from the hair-dresser; their hats are chapeaux de soie, or imitation-beaver; they are delicately rouged, and wear very white gloves; and, those who are with ladies, lead, as you observe, a small dog by a string, or carry it in their arms. No French lady walks out without her lap-dog. These slow-paced men you see in brown moustaches and frogged coats are refugee Poles. The short, thick, agile looking man before us is General —, celebrated for having been the last to surrender on the last field of that brief contest. His handsome face is full of resolution, and, unlike the rest of his countrymen, he looks still unsubdued and in good heart. He walks here every day an hour or two, swinging his cane round his forefinger, and thinking, apparently, of any thing but his defeat. Observe these two young men approaching us. The short one on the left, with the stiff hair and red moustache, is Prince Moskowa, the son of Marshal Ney. He is an object of more than usual interest just now, as the youngest of the new batch of peers. The expression of his countenance is more bold than handsome, and indeed he is any thing but a carpet knight; a fact of which he seems, like a man of sense, quite aware. He is to be seen at the parties standing with his arms folded, leaning silently against the wall for hours together. His companion is, I presume to say, quite the handsomest man you ever saw. A little over six feet, perfectly proportioned, dark silken-brown hair, slightly curling about his forehead, a soft curling moustache, and beard just darkening the finest cut mouth in the world, and an olive complexion, of the most golden richness and clearness—Mr. R. is called the handsomest man in Europe. What is more remarkable still, he looks like the most modest man in Europe, too; though, like most modest looking men, his reputation for constancy in the gallant world is somewhat slender. And here comes a fine looking man, though of a different order of beauty—a natural son of Napoleon. He is about his father's height, and has most of his features, though his person and air must be quite different. You see there Napoleon's beautiful mouth and thinly chiselled nose, but I fancy that soft eye is his mother's. He is said to be one of the most fascinating men in France. His mother was the Countess Walewski, a lady with whom the emperor became acquainted in Poland. It is singular that Napoleon's talents and love of glory have not descended upon any of the eight or ten sons whose claims to his paternity are admitted. And here come two of our countrymen, who are to be seen constantly together—Cooper and Morse. That is Cooper with the blue surtout buttoned up to his throat, and his hat over his eyes. What a contrast between the faces of the two men! Morse, with his kind, open, gentle countenance, the very picture of goodness and sincerity; and Cooper, dark and corsair-looking, with his brows down over his eyes, and his strongly lined mouth fixed in an expression of moodiness and reserve. The two faces, however, are not equally just to their owners—Morse is all that he looks to be, but Cooper's features do him decided injustice. I take a pride in the reputation this distinguished countryman of ours has for humanity and generous sympathy. The distress of the refugee liberals from all countries comes home especially to Americans, and the untiring liberality of Mr. Cooper particularly is a fact of common admission and praise. It is pleasant to be able to say such things. Morse is taking a sketch of the Gallery of the Louvre, and he intends copying some of the best pictures also, to accompany it as an exhibition, when he returns. Our artists do our country credit abroad. Greenough and Morse and Cole, and a young man of whom I hear a great deal, though I have not met him, Mr. Chapman, are men to do honor to any nation. The feeling of interest in one's country artists and authors becomes very strong in a foreign land. Every leaf of laurel awarded them seems to touch one's own forehead. And talking of laurels, here comes Sir Sidney Smith—the short, fat, old gentleman yonder, with the large acquiline nose and keen eye. He is one of the few men who ever opposed Napoleon successfully, and that should distinguish him, even if he had not won by his numerous merits and achievements the gift of almost every order in Europe. He is, among other things, of a very mechanical turn, and is quite crazy just now about a six-wheeled coach, which he has lately invented, and of which nobody sees the exact benefit but himself. An invitation to his rooms, to hear his description of the model, is considered the last new bore.

And now for ladies. Whom do you see that looks distinguished? Scarce one whom you would take positively for a lady, I venture to presume. These two, with the velvet pelisses and small satin bonnets, are rather the most genteel looking people in the garden. I set them down for ladies of rank the first walk I ever took here; and the two who have just passed us, with the curly lap-dog, I was equally sure, were persons of not very dainty morality. It is precisely au contraire. The velvet pelisses are gamblers from Frascati's, and the two with the lap-dog are the Countess N. and her unmarried daughter: two of the most exclusive specimens of Parisian society. It is very odd—but if you see a remarkably modest looking woman in Paris, you may be sure, as the periphrasis goes, that "she is no better than she should be." Every thing gets travestied in this artificial society. The general ambition seems to be to appear that which one is not. White-haired men cultivate their sparse mustaches, and dark-haired men shave. Deformed men are successful in gallantry, where handsome men despair. Ugly women dress and dance, while beauties mope and are deserted. Modesty looks brazen, and vice looks timid; and so all through the calendar. Life in Paris is as pretty a series of astonishments as an ennuyée could desire.

But there goes the palace-bell—five o'clock! The sun is just disappearing behind the dome of the "Invalides," and the crowd begins to thin. Look at the atmosphere of the gardens. How deliciously the twilight mist softens every thing. Statues, people, trees, and the long perspectives down the alleys, all mellowed into the shadowy indistinctness of fairy land. The throng is pressing out at the gates, and the guard, with his bayonet presented, forbids all re-entrance, for the gardens are cleared at sundown. The carriages are driving up and dashing away, and if you stand a moment you will see the most vulgar-looking people you have met in your promenade, waited for by chasseurs, and departing with indications of rank in their equipages, which nature has very positively denied to their persons. And now all the world dines, and dines well. The "chef" stands with his gold repeater in his hand, waiting for the moment to decide the fate of the first dish; the garçons at the restaurants have donned their white aprons, and laid the silver forks upon the napkins; the pretty women are seated on their thrones in the saloons, and the interesting hour is here. Where shall we dine? We will walk towards the Palais Royal, and talk of it as we go along.

That man would "deserve well of his country" who should write a "Paris Guide" for the palate. I would do it myself if I could elude the immortality it would occasion me. One is compelled to pioneer his own stomach through the endless cartes of some twelve eating-houses, all famous, before he half knows whether he is dining well or ill. I had eaten a week at Very's, for instance, before I discovered that, since Pelham's day, that gentleman's reputation has gone down. He is a subject for history at present. I was misled also by an elderly gentleman at Havre, who advised me to eat at Grignon's, in the Passage Vivienne. Not liking my first coquilles aux huitres, I made some private inquiries, and found that his chef had deserted him about the time of Napoleon's return from Elba. A stranger gets misguided in this way. And then, if by accident you hit upon the right house, you may be eating a month before you find out the peculiar triumphs which have stamped its celebrity. No mortal man can excel in every thing, and it is as true of cooking as it is of poetry. The "Rochers de Cancale" is now the first eating-house in Paris, yet they only excel in fish. The "Trois Freres Provencaux," have a high reputation, yet their colettelettes provencale are the only dish which you cannot get equally well elsewhere. A good practice is to walk about in the Palais Royal for an hour before dinner, and select a master. You will know a gourmet easily—a man slightly past the prime of life, with a nose just getting its incipient blush, a remarkably loose, voluminous white cravat, and a corpulence more of suspicion than fact. Follow him to his restaurant, and give the garçon a private order to serve you with the same dishes as the bald gentleman. (I have observed that dainty livers universally lose their hair early.) I have been in the wake of such a person now for a week or more, and I never lived, comparatively, before. Here we are, however, at the "Trois Freres," and there goes my unconscious model deliberately up stairs. We'll follow him, and double his orders, and if we dine not well, there is no eating in France.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

THE EARLY PRODUCTION OF A FAMOUS NOVELIST.

THERE is not a more versatile writer in the world than Mr. Mushroom, (the author of the Fly-market Loafer). The style of his last work differs extremely from that of his former compositions. He is most generally known by his later productions, but there is one effort of his early years which, we presume, will be republished, and extensively read, now that he has established a reputation; although, at the time of its first publication, it was consigned by the critics to a cold and undisturbed slumber. We say we presume this will be the case, for who ever heard of Cooper's "Precaution," or "Bulwer's "Falkland," except their booksellers, until the Spy and Pelham had made decided hits? If authors complain of the difficulties they encounter in obtaining the "good graces" of the public, we can tell them in return that the task is far more difficult to lose them after they have obtained them. For instance, Scott has inflicted more things on the public than any other man. His life of Napoleon had sunk any one but a whale of literature, (we would say leviathan, "but the phrase is somewhat overworn," as Shakspeare's clown says of "the welkin.") It would have sunk any one but a whale of literature, but with him it buried itself in the blubber of his reputation, where it will become subservient in furnishing oil for the lamp or sperm for the candle of his immortality. By our genius, astonished readers, and that is the most potent spirit we know, by our genius, we are unrivalled at similes. But to return to our subject, like an exploded Montgolfier to earth. The early production of Mushroom, (fame already bids us pretermitt the christian name, because, as we suppose, her goddesship is herself a heathen,) the early production of Mushroom, we repeat, and this is the second time we have been so bewildered in the labyrinth of a parenthesis, that we have been forced to make wings for our meaning, and by the spirit of Dædalus we are fast again. The early production of Mushroom, we reiterate, to which we allude, is entitled "The adventures of Anna-Chronism." As Byron remarks of Christobel, it is a singularly wild and originally beautiful production; of which epithets, as regards the poem, we confess the singularly wild and original, but would not suit the "beautiful," by proving a tender of the term "unintelligible." But to return again. It was a remark of Butler's, in regard to the authors of his day, that "Some force whole regions in despite

Of geography to change their site,
Make former times shake hands with latter,
And that which was before come after."

Now many captious writers assert, that the literature of the present day is a degenerated bantling of the "giant of old." Let their remarks be met by the following extract from the adventures of Anna-Chronism, which standing no anomaly among that despised modern literature, incontestably proves that our authors, whatever their faults, have not, in one particular at least, degenerated from the contemporaries of the amiable and gentle Hudibras.

EXTRACT FROM THE ADVENTURES OF ANNA-CHRONISM.

CHAPTER THREE.

In the conclusion of the last chapter, we stated that Solecism was obliged to flee. He turned from the Bridge of Sighs into the garden of the Tuileries, where he met Pericles and Genghis Khan alternately exercising themselves on a velocipede, and perusing Shakspeare's treatise on the Indian languages of the south of Africa.

"Save me," cried Solecism. I fly from tyranny—the police of Owhyhee are after me; they have in pursuit of me a band of subsidized Gauls hired of Montezuma, the great mogul of Nova Scotia. The Marquis of Hastings, the lily-livered Kamschatkan has lent himself to the plot against me, and his friend, Sir Philip Sidney, autocrat of Ireland, has proffered the native elephants of that peninsula to assist."

"Dunder and blixen," exclaimed Pericles.

"Corpo di Baccho," ejaculated Genghis Khan.

"I cannot go far to assist you," continued Pericles, "I am on the limits, and should I trespass, Plutarch and John Wilkes, who are my sureties, would be mulcted."

Solecism turned imploringly to Genghis.

"Alas," exclaimed the Switzer, "I can do nought; I am myself obnoxious to the police; last evening I broke into the city of Mexico, and stole thence the statue of Minerva. I have, on this account, been concealed the last forty-eight consecutive hours in the ruins of the coliseum, and am now venturing forth to lave my burning limbs in the cool waves of the Caspian."

"Alas, alas," exclaimed Solecism, "whither shall I hie me? If I seek for shelter in the prairies of the Caucasus, blood-thirsty aligators, rushing from its summit will devour me; if I plunge into the Dismal Swamp, the marauding Cossacks will destroy me."

"Of what crime have you been guilty?" inquired Pericles.

"Crime," repeated Solecism; "I have but tweaked the nose of a base-born Amalekite for soiling the copy of Justinian's code I lent him. May the curses of the Manitto follow him."

"Calmly, calmly," interrupted Genghis; "listen to me, and learn to control thy passions. When Tecumseh insulted me in the streets of Algiers, in the presence of Tacitus, Anacharsis the younger, and Columbus; yes, even there, where the battlements of St. Petersburg yawning beneath our feet, published my glory to the world, I did not thrust my swivel through the heart of the Greenlander, but turned to Goldsmith, and exclaimed, 'You and Achilles are the only men living, beside myself, that would swallow such an insult.' Then Goldsmith, who was a Roman archon drew his Scotch plaid around him, and exclaimed, 'Glory of the age of Queen Anne, I applaud thy coolness.'"

"But see," hastily exclaimed Solecism, "they are upon us already; I see the Polish tomahawks gleaming on my track, and the Esquimaux cimexes flashing in the pan."

And again Solecism fled, and soon was lost to the eyes of Pericles, and the spectacles of Genghis Khan, as he turned from the Prado into High Holborn road.

SKETCHES BY A BRIEFLESS LAWYER.

MORALITY OF THE PROFESSION.

The law is one of the highest and noblest of the professions. Casual observers are apt to suppose that a lawyer is confined to the study of a few legal writers and the statutes; and it is a common jest against us, that we live on the sorrows of the community, and not always with honesty. The charge of falsehood is also frequently brought against us, from the fact that we are compelled to fight on one side of the question, right or wrong—to blind our ears to testimony—turn our eyes from truth, because we are compelled to exercise all our sagacity and knowledge in behalf of the party in whose employ we are hired. I shall remark upon these opinions successively and with as much brevity as possible, and illustrate my meaning by one or two anecdotes.

In the first place, the belief that a lawyer's mind must necessarily be filled with mere musty technical phrases and points of practice, is widely distant from the truth. His profession comprehends a vast extent and variety of knowledge. There is scarcely any art or science, a familiarity with which would not be made subservient to him, promote his efforts, and add lustre to his character. The mere circumstances which are developed to him in the course of a long practice make him acquainted with the secrets of many trades and modes of sustaining a living which could scarcely be exposed by any other process than law proceedings. Besides, if he studies law philosophically, he at the same time studies human nature. He obtains a vast insight into the motives and character of mankind. He is, as it were, admitted behind the scenes of society—beholds the coarse workmanship of many of its materials, and detects the multifarious springs and impulses by which the vast and glittering machinery is kept in operation. All other avocations are comparatively theoretical. His is a continual combination of theory and practice. In pursuing his avocations, law knowledge is certainly requisite, but not all-sufficient. With a large portion of his duties, indeed, it has little or nothing to do. In these his necessities lead him perpetually on to the examination of subjects at first of apparently the most opposite description. He must sometimes investigate the sources of statutes, in order to give force to his construction of them. He must be acquainted thus with history, which of itself tends wonderfully to elevate, as well as to enlarge the mind. He becomes thus possessed of facts which at the same time strengthen his memory, employ his reason, and furnish him with high and proper themes of reflection.

In the next place he wants logic—the potent cunning by which he wields multitudes. This is another strengthening study, but it does not alone answer his purpose. He must direct his attention to language, and become familiar with the use of words—weapons which admit of most skillful handling, and which few know how to use properly—or, to change the figure, strings of a mighty instrument which is seldom played on as it might be.—Hence he becomes inspired with a new ambition, and strives to be an orator; and about a master of eloquence there has ever been to me a grandeur. While I am under his influence, he seems brighter and higher than other men: as he unfolds the great truths which it is his purpose to illustrate, and one prejudice after another disappears from my mind like night shadows at the lucid touch of morning, he seems almost a superior being—as if a halo were burning around his forehead. As far then as adding dignity and strength to talents, setting up lofty objects of ambition, and opening extensive fields of industry can entitle a profession to respect, that to which I belong is entitled to it.

We come now to consider it in its relation to the morals of the practitioner, and examine into the validity of the objection that we live upon the sorrows of the community, and that in the natural path of our duty we lose the nice discrimination between right and wrong, and become callous to the claims of justice. It is true we thrive on the contentions of our fellow-creatures; but the fact should never be advanced in the spirit of reproach, for the physician, in the same way, profits by their diseases, and the divine by their sins. So every trade has its origin in their wants, but it is in supplying, not fostering them. If any of my brethren promote litigation, they are within limits of the censure; and a pettifogger in law, like the quack in medicine and the hypocrite in religion, is only prevented from being contemptible by the opportunities which he sometimes possesses of perpetrating evil. That this charge cannot be brought against our profession as a body, I most sincerely trust. I may here, however, be permitted to add that the injudicious pressure towards its ranks by all classes of society, without any reference to education, abilities or morals is a main cause in overflowing our numbers and degrading our character. It is also to be particularly observed by parents thus inspired with a mistaken ambition for their sons, that the danger of thrusting them into a profession where they are not wanted and for which they are not fit, is twofold; for while, as I have before stated, the effect upon the whole body is to mix it up with a variety of inefficient minds and doubtful and irresponsible characters, it is even to the honest youth himself fraught with serious risk. He enters upon the practice with high hopes. These are soon disappointed. For he perceives men, altogether his superior, distinguished also by more valuable advantages of friends and fortune, living and dying before him in the path he has chosen, and that without either honor or wealth. He then begins to narrow the circle of his aspirations, and instead of fame, riches, and power, is contented if he can procure an ordinary support. I say it with regret, not altogether unalloyed with horror, that there are hundreds in this state who cannot by any honest measures succeed in this design. I do not deem the word horror at all too strong to express my meaning. For there is something awful in the contemplation of so many young men doomed to a path of such dangerous temptations as that which lies before these disappointed and helpless cumberers of society. It involves a certainty of moral ruin by far more gloomy than could attach to their temporal destruction. Could this multitude be selected from their homes in early youth, brought out at mid-day into a public square and shot to death, the dreadful deed would make nations shudder, and hold a prominent rank in the history of mankind! but my mind beholds a sight of a less striking, but more gloomy and repulsive character in the prospect of so many virtuous souls gradually led to the state of wretchedness and desperation which urges them on to groveling frauds and base vices—to the extinguishing in them of all the beautiful light of virtue, of mercy, and principle—making them vile tools, ever ready to be used by the designing in executing cruelties and oppressions, and all the filthy tasks of avarice, vengeance, and guilt. As we have frequent opportunities of committing moral crimes silently and secretly, we are also blest with similar occasions of doing good. The sacrifice of a little lucre—the indulgence of gentle enthusiasm in the cause of right—the fostering of benevolence and general philanthropy, afford us the most delightful tasks of checking evil in its birth, of reconciling the estranged, of protecting the weak, of crushing a bad design, of encouraging a noble undertaking. The right character of a lawyer should be almost as sacred as that of the clergyman. He should, it is true, be in the midst of strife, but he should act there like a friendly spirit in hushing the fury of the passions. I speak now of his moral duty before a suit is regularly commenced, for as when that crisis is past, he owes all his knowledge and power to his client, he need not embark in a speculation which he does not deem just. But for this, the law or custom which makes his duty to his client a paramount consideration, would be as wicked as absurd. I acknowledge there are certain situations dangerous to the integrity of a poor beginner, and I shall close this article by mentioning one.

A plain, uneducated man, much advanced in years, came to me one day for my professional assistance.

"I want you to take me through the act, sir," he said.

"What amount do you owe, sir, and in what sums?"

"I do not know."

"That's strange. To whom do you owe them?"

"I do not know, sir."

I looked up to see if he was in his right mind.

"You are surprised, sir," he continued; "but what I tell you is true. The debts are not of my own contracting. I have been cheated most dreadfully. I took a friend of mine in whom I foolishly placed the most implicit confidence, into partnership a few years ago, and I find he has turned out a great rascal. He has incurred the most enormous expenses in all quarters, and has gone off, the Lord knows where. People tell me that I am liable."

"You are, sir, I am sorry to say. The law supposes that no one would be so imprudent as to enter into business with a dishonest man, and therefore makes the firm liable for the debts of the individual."

"Well, sir, this I know," said my client; "but I must say it is cruel. No one knows how cruel. I am a poor man, sir, and have been a hard-working man. I am turned of sixty now, and since I was ten years of age, I have toiled always like a beast of the field. Misfortune after misfortune pursued me in youth, but I never despaired. I always trusted in the overruling Power. I knew, at least I believed, that honesty and persevering industry must be successful in the end—and so they were. After I got married, the clouds seemed to break away a little from around me, and wife and I have been gradually getting up and up in the world. We've two children—a boy who has gone to sea to get an honest living by the sweat of his brow, as his father did before him, the other a girl. We don't like to praise what's our own, but, nevertheless, Mary has been a good child, and I have even now in my old age toiled and toiled from daylight to dark—and why did I toil so?"

I perceived the unfortunate man had on his first entrance mastered his agitation with a powerful effort, but that by thus dwelling in his narrative on the subject of his wrongs, he was gradually working himself up into a strong and very natural excitement. I also noticed his appearance more particularly as his face lighted up with emotion. He was a noble specimen of old age, and in a white head to me there is always a beauty that speaks to my heart.

His hair was nearly silvered over with time, but here and there the raven color showed what it had once been. His forehead was high and receding, bold and wrinkled. Large black eyes looked forth with flashes from under gray brows, so thick that they almost curled. His nose was aquiline—his complexion darkened and bronzed over by healthy labor and exposure, and the outline of his head had a striking grace and picturesqueness of which the simple old veteran himself had probably no idea. His voice was rich and mellow—and he answered his own interrogatory with a deepening color and flashing eyes.

"Why did I toil so? Not to purchase for me any idle luxuries. I have lived like a plain man, and so I will die. No, sir, I had no care for myself. I even overlooked my old wife. For she too has few wants—easily supplied—and neither of us expect or wish to be here long to want any thing. But for our poor daughter—we worked for her. She has been educated as well as money could do it, and we looked to leave her the mistress of a good competency when we went down—but all these long and strong hopes are nearly blasted by the base treachery and ingratitude of a villain!"

He struck the palm of his hand down forcibly on the table as he spoke the concluding word, and the tone of his now elevated voice rang in the air as he ceased speaking.

Like the physician, the lawyer must guard against the contagion of excitement. They must both tread among the despairing, the dying and the dead, with a cool step and unwearying eye. They must become familiarized to anguish of mind and body. Their duty calls them among the fragments of wreck and ruin. It is a difficult and painful task to keep up this habitual quietude and cheerfulness in the midst of surrounding distress—this apparent callousness to woe—but it is one imperatively necessary, and which is amply rewarded in the advantage it affords to observation and reason. I continued my inquiries of Mr. Armstrong without appearing to regard his statement except in its legal relations; although to confess the truth, I felt the flesh creep around my shoulders and the blood moving on more rapidly to my finger's ends at the thought of such a family as his thus wrecked by perfidy as he was about quitting it forever.

"What is the amount of debts contracted by your partner?" I asked.

"I cannot say, sir; but this I know, the bills already brought in amount to five thousand dollars."

"And what are you worth?"

"About that sum."

"Then, to discharge these liabilities will leave you without any means of support?"

"Ay, sir—without a penny; like an old horse, who, after he has been worked till he is useless, is turned out in the winter, on the barren heath—to die—and Mary too!"

His manner suddenly changed to that of hope, and drawing his chair close to mine, looked around—made an attempt to speak—looked around—drew his chair still closer, and said, in a whisper:

"Are you sure no one hears?"

"There is no one present, sir, except ourselves; but what if there were?"

"I'll tell you what. Let me ask you a few questions before you give me any advice."

"Go on, sir."

"Does not a man owe a sacred duty to his family, to support them—to educate them, and when he dies, which I may to-morrow—to leave them enough to shelter them from this dreadful world—to keep them safe and happy, and out of the way of temptation? Cheated, spurned, baffled, and trampled down as I, although a man, have been by the villains who compose society, do you imagine I can leave Mary—a delicate, tender thing, full of beauty and hope and affections—all those dangerous qualities to such young girls; do you think I can leave her behind me without a farthing, just leaving her to shift for herself, as chance and the rascality—I say it, sir—the rascality of the world can determine?"

I could not but admire how beautifully real emotion makes the plainest people deliver their thoughts.

"I think it would be hard—cruel—but how are you to avoid it?"

"I ask you again—do you think my very bones would lie still in their grave if any shame should come to Mary?"

"My dear sir, I feel for you sincerely, but what do you propose to do?"

"Let me first ask you another question, sir—I'll not keep you long. What is law made for?"

"Why, for the happiness and safety of the people."

"It's made for justice, sir," he added, with a Spartan sententiousness. "Law is certainly for justice. Now, let me ask you, sir—is it just then that any man should be made to pay another man's debts?"

"Certainly not."

"Then, sir, I'll tell you what I wish you to do. You shall take me through the insolvent act. I will convey away my property to a friend. I will give it to him. He will shelter my child, and, when I am gone, will be her father. Tell me, sir—can I do this? It is the strongest wish of my soul."

"I grieve—I sympathize with you, Mr. Armstrong, from my heart; but this cannot be done. You will have to break an oath."

"Manage it for me," he said, "in any way," (it was a weak moment, when I am sure he knew not what he said) "and I will pay you five hundred dollars cash."

There was a deep silence. I had no idea how my interest in the scene had been wrought up.

"Mr. Armstrong," I said, at length, "in doing what you propose, you must commit perjury, violate the law, and expose yourself to a criminal prosecution, besides the stings of your own conscience. I warn you against it. I would not, for millions, lead you into such a heinous error."

"Then," he exclaimed, in a broken voice, "I am a ruined man," and leaning his head down on the table, he wept bitterly. I obtained a discharge for him under the insolvent act afterwards, but all his little fortune was surrendered.

THE JUNIUS QUESTION.

We admit the annexed communication, as our columns are open to all controversy of a literary nature, fairly conducted. Of the "Junius question" we are rather wearied, and should indeed be almost sorry to see the covered head, so exciting to the imagination, usually published with the letters, reprinted, with the veil lifted, and the "stat nominis umbra," removed from beneath. Our correspondent, however, is learned and intelligent; and as he and many others feel the subject to be not yet divested of interest, his review of the reviewer is given without further comment.

A writer in the last number of the North American Review, commences an article on the subject of the Junius question, as follows:

"An attentive examination of the theories and arguments which have been put forth on the subject of the authorship of Junius, will detect certain prevailing fallacies, which have run through nearly all of them." If these fallacies did not extend to the whole, why did he not designate those which were free from them? "If the true theory have ever been advanced, it wears the same colors of sophistry as the false, and is not at present distinguishable from them." How can a true theory put on the colors of sophistry? Here is a false theory of the writer, so very apparent that there is no danger of its being taken for truth by any discriminating mind. If the writer is unable to distinguish truth from falsehood in this controversy, it only shows that he is uninformed on the subject, and therefore incapable of writing upon it intelligibly. "It remains to be proved, as much as it did when Junius ceased or began to write, and when men were watching for external indications of the author, instead of studying his works, and searching contemporary writings for resemblances." After making this wise declaration, he subsequently occupies nine pages of his review in showing the fallacy of the rule laid down by himself. This he heads as follows: "They, (the writers on this subject) have not sought the author of Junius, but plausible arguments to support the pride of pre-conceived opinion. The favorite, and almost the only means which have been employed for this purpose, has been the collating of parallel phrases, and identical words and ideas; and in this consists the third and most dangerous fallacy on this subject." Is not this studying the works of Junius, and searching contemporary writings for resemblances? The fact is, the writer deals in bold assertions, without regard to consistency. "Most of the examiners of this question have thought it necessary to place an implicit reliance on each of the assertions which Junius made touching himself." Each writer has usually selected those which were favorable to his theory, and without attempting to discredit the remainder, has omitted them in the discussion." By the words most and usually, he just kept this side of truth, but he should have had candor to name those who strenuously resisted arguments drawn from this source. "We give full credit to his (Junius's) declaration in the dedication to the English nation, 'I am the sole depository of my own secret, and it shall perish with me.' There is an earnestness and solemnity in these words, which convey a strong impression of their truth." An untruth, in order to gain credence, is generally pronounced with solemnity. This was the way that Junius deceived credulous men of his day, and the deception has continued in their posterity to the present time. The writer continues—"to suppose that when the danger of discovery was nearly over, or greatly diminished, when his machinery had been tried, and found safe and adequate to its purpose, and when there was no need of multiplying precautions to suppose that Junius would sit down to his dedication, and falsely make to the people of England that solemn asseveration, is to suppose what is inconsistent, not only with the sagacity, wariness, and practical good sense of Junius, but with the common-sense of mankind. No motive, apart from its truth, can be assigned for the declaration. It could no longer contribute to the safety or liberty of writing and publishing. The work was done and bequeathed to Woodfall, as one of the last acts of the author."

Does this writer not perceive that a re-publication of those letters, in a permanent form, calculated to hand down, with infamy, to posterity, the characters therein assailed, was an offence of far greater magnitude than their ephemeral publication in a daily paper? Because the author had bequeathed the work to Woodfall, was he out of danger? Junius had said, in a letter to his friend Woodfall, "I am sure I should not survive a discovery three days; or, if I did, they would attain me by bill. Change to the Somerset coffee-house, and let no mortal know the alteration. I am persuaded you are too honest a man to contribute to my destruction. Act honorably by me, and at a proper time you shall know me." The letter containing this passage was written after Junius had completed his letters, for he says in a letter to Woodfall, immediately preceding the foregoing, "At last I have concluded my great work, and I assure you with no small labor. I would have you begin to advertise immediately, and publish before the meeting of parliament; let all my papers in defence of Junius be inserted." Junius, it seems, knew the danger he still had to encounter better than this reviewer; and he, no doubt, made the declaration in question, in order to prevent his enemies, if possible, from further pursuit.

"Some have been brought forward, (as Junius,) because they esteemed a man or men whom Junius praised; others, because they hated men whom Junius hated; others, because Junius defended their personal rights or interests on some occasions, where their rights or interests involved public principles. Among these, the real Junius may be embraced; but if he be, this partial and narrow method of proof does not establish, but rather obscures his claims, and sinks him to a level with a multitude of vain pretenders. The same remark is applicable to this as to the preceding species of fallacy. It gives us too many Juniuses." The remarks, as applied to the American authors whose works the writer was reviewing, are without force. Of the men brought forward here, as Junius, three were lords; Sackville, Chatham, and Temple. The first was a member of the English government with Lord North, during the American revolution, and the very man who recommended the employment of Indian savages against us, as asserted by the person who advocates his claims. Chatham was out of place, and wished to get in, and of course was opposed to the administration and its measures towards America; but he said, "the Americans should not be permitted, if it were possible to prevent it, to manufacture a hob-nail." Temple possessed better principles than the other two, but I know of no particular claims that he has to the partiality of Americans. But then among the persons advocated, there was John Horne Tooke, who, although in favor of a monarchical government, as has been fully proved in the "Posthumous Works of Junius," was a bitter enemy to oppression, and opposed the government in its violent measures towards this country: and a republican might be supposed to be actuated by partiality towards him in searching for a man on whom to bestow the honor of the authorship of Junius's letters. This, I will venture to say, created a suspicion in the reviewer's mind which caused the above remarks. Such a narrow method of considering the subject, however, cannot invalidate claims, fully established by circumstances and facts. As to the motives which influenced English writers on this subject, the reviewer, of course, must be perfectly ignorant; but that, it appears, made no difference with him.

"We have read," says this reviewer, "fifteen volumes, written expressly to establish the authorship, and many incidental discussions in other works. There are several, which we know only by their titles; and in addition to these, various claims have been brought forward in magazines and other periodicals, which never emerged into an independent volume. These discussions are at least amusing; they are not without their use in an historical point of view, and they go to increase the great sum total of literary taste and liberal study." If this writer has paid the same attention to literary subjects generally, that he has to this on the authorship of Junius, he must have acquired some very equivocal species of knowledge. And moreover, as he has stated about twice the number of volumes that have been written in the English language on the subject, the others must be in Latin, Greek, or some foreign living language.

Of the works reviewed by this critic, I shall take notice only of his remarks upon the two issued in New-York, viz. "Memoirs of John Horne Tooke," &c. by Dr. Graham, and "Posthumous works of Junius," &c. anonymous.

"The remainder of this article," he says, "we shall devote to our own countrymen, who have very considerable claims to attention on this subject." Why, this is the very thing he proposed to have undertaken in the beginning of his article. He has now got on thirty-five pages of his work, in copying, from his fifteen volumes, what had been said by others on works upon the subject of Junius; which, for the most part, have no affinity whatever to what he undertook to do. The fact is, he was writing for fame, and not with a view of throwing any light upon the subject in controversy. He wished to make it appear that he knew more of the subject by skimming over a few volumes than those who had made it a particular study. And all he pretends to believe is that Junius never will be known. This common opinion is supported by him on the declaration of Junius himself, that the secret should perish with him. Not reflecting that the preservation of his life, at least in his estimation, depended upon his not being found out, and that this deception was the readiest way to prevent farther search for him, which at that time, by all accounts, was as great as at any former period.

The critic proceeds, "the first in the order of time is Mr. Graham. He supports Horne Tooke. The book is a respectable one, but, three-fourths of its contents consist of extracts from the letters of Junius, and the political writings and speeches of Tooke." Here is hot and cold in the same breath. The writer evidently meant to throw a slur upon the work by the manner in which he mentions its contents. Now, I ask what better mode of ascertaining the author could be taken than that which Dr. Graham has adopted? Was it not within the rule given out by this critic himself, as above mentioned?

"There is a great similarity of opinion between Tooke and Junius; so there is between Junius and Glover." To substantiate this, the writer adduces a solitary instance in the use of the word indecent, which is applied by Junius and Glover in the same manner as every body else applies it. But this quotation shows much reading. "Tooke is said to have declared that he knew who Junius was; so have several others." Who are they? He says something of George the Third's stating that he knew him, which is perfectly ridiculous. It is true, that it is said, papers have been lately discovered in the possession of the Grenville family which indicate the author of Junius, and of this I have no doubt, because the fact has been published in the English papers, and not denied. None of that family, however, are suspected of writing the letters of Junius. Is this fairly reviewing a work, or quibbling?

The critic, in taking notice of the "Posthumous works of Junius," gives it as his opinion that the compiler of this and the former book is one and the same person; and he asserts that both maintain that the abuse bestowed by Junius upon Horne Tooke was solely for the purpose of preventing any suspicion that the latter was Junius himself; or that the abuse is depended on as evidence of the fact; than which nothing is more false. The pretended quarrel is placed upon entirely different ground. The contest between Tooke and John Wilkes is first given. It is shown that Wilkes prevailed with the populace, and became high-sheriff of London. That he then writes to Tooke as follows: "Whether you proceed to a thirteenth or thirtieth letter is to me a matter of the most entire indifference. You will no longer have me your correspondent." That Tooke addressed a thirteenth letter to his opponent—but being mortified that he had not convinced the public of the unworthiness of Wilkes, and wishing to expose his character more fully, he, on the day preceding the date of his last letter, brings forward Junius to attack himself, and vindicate Wilkes. That, in order to make the quarrel wear the appearance of being in earnest, it was necessary to abuse Tooke in set terms of invective. That Junius, however, made but a weak defence of Wilkes, suffering Tooke to get the better of the argument, and to establish what he first undertook to do. The object of this pretended quarrel is so obvious that it is surprising that any man of common understanding, who has paid the least attention to the investigation, does not immediately perceive it.

The writer speaks of the notice taken of the circumstance of Junius's attacking himself in defence of the Earl of Hillsborough, and says, "this could contribute nothing to the concealment of Junius." Who could be so stupid as to suppose it could? Nothing of this kind was intimated by the compiler; but the critic adds, "or to answer any other valuable purpose." Here he discovers a want of discernment. If it be shown, as it has been in many other instances besides that alluded to, that Junius was in the habit of attacking himself weakly, for the want of an opponent, and then refuting his supposed antagonist, it is adding cases directly in point to support the alleged attacks on himself in the person of Horne Tooke.

I feel confident of being able to invalidate every position taken by this writer in regard to the above works; but I think enough has been said to prove that no confidence can be placed in his opinions on the subject upon which he has undertaken to criticize. He has made up an article of forty-seven pages, to do which he has extracted largely from the preliminary essay of George Woodfall's Junius, and other works respecting characters that had formerly been suspected of being Junius, but had long since been abandoned; and, among the rest, has made out a list of parallel phrases of different authors which include nine pages of his laborious article; which generally neither prove nor disprove any thing. In some cases, however, parallel phrases and similarity of sentiment may be made use of as strong circumstances in corroboration of other facts, which may be adduced in proof of authorship. Had the writer confined himself to the works which he undertook to review, and given an honest and candid critique upon them, he would have saved the reader much useless trouble, and done more honor to himself.

The following is extracted from Miss Landon's "Romance and Reality," just published by the Messrs. Harper:

ANATOMY OF A BALL.—It is a melancholy fact for an historian, that though balls are very important in a young lady's career, there is exceedingly little to be said about them; they are pleasures all on the same pattern—the history of one is the history of all. You dress, with a square glass before you, and a long glass behind you; your hair trusts to its black or brown attractions, either curled or braided—or you put on a wreath, a bunch of flowers, or pearl bandeau; your dress is gauze, crape, lace or muslin, either white, pink, blue, or yellow; you shower, like April, an odorous rain on your handkerchief; you put on your shawl, and step into your carriage; you stop in some street or square; your footman raps as long as he can; you are some little time going up stairs; you hear your name, or something like it, leading the way before you. As many drawing-rooms are thrown open as the house will allow,—they are lighted with lamps or wax-lights; there is a certain quantity of china, and a certain number of exotics; also a gay-looking crowd, from which the hostess emerges, and declares she is very glad to see you. You pass on; you sit a little while on a sofa; a tall gentleman asks you to dance—to this you reply, that you would be very happy; you take his arm and walk to the quadrille or waltz; a succession of partners. Then comes supper; you have a small piece of fowl, and a thin slice of ham, perhaps some jelly or a few grapes—a glass of white wine, or ponche a la romane. Your partners have asked you if you have been to the opera; in return, you question them if they have been to the park. Perhaps a remark is hazarded on Miss Fanny Kemble. If you are a step more intimate, a few despairing observations are made on the entertainment and the guest. Some cavalier hands you down stairs; you re-cloak and re-enter your carriage, with the comfortable reflection that, as you have been to Miss So-and-so's ball, Mrs. Such-an-one may ask you to hers.

THE DRAMA.

THE NEW-YORK STAGE, ETC.

The managers of the Park do not seem inclined to afford critics and fault-finders much opportunity of exercising their acumen. They continue to present, night after night, their sterling operas. These being but repetitions, have already been noticed in this journal, and consequently our dramatic department is not unfrequently left with but slender materials for animadversion. We must not, however, by the way, forget the sensations with which we observed the other evening in Masaniello, that this splendid but unfortunate opera made its re-appearance "like the sun, shorn of his beams." The general effect was diminished. The revolution went on without any red light, and there was no horse for Mr. Jones. Why, divers worthies go on purpose for these scenic displays, and we heard a disappointed amateur declare, that the piece was nothing without the red light! These instances of carelessness were rendered less pardonable by the attendance of an audience both numerous and fashionable. We are waiting, with all reasonable patience, for the White Maid, which will probably be produced during the present month.

Mr. Forrest is in Boston. A general desire prevails here that he should, on his way to the south, repeat his masterly delineation of Othello, and also furnish us with an opportunity of witnessing his Falconbridge, a character in which he has gained the highest encomiums from all parties, and which he seems, we know not why, to have lately laid aside. Cannot the managers effect this?

Miss Vincent draws full houses at the American theatre, and very deservedly receives great applause. The managers of this establishment have also a sovereign antidote to sentiment and pathos in the pantomime of "Mother Goose." Mr. Gay is a graceful Harlequin, and Miss Louisa Johnson both pretty and interesting as Columbine; but we solemnly protest against the hornpipe which Mrs. Gay inflicts upon the spectators; it is the worst we ever saw on any stage, or off either. The music of the piece is celebrated in England, and he who watches the amusing development of the story without merriment, must be worse than "old Cassius."

The Richmond Hill was closed on Monday evening, and, as the bill quaintly informed us, "for the benefit of the manager." Mr. Russel has won general esteem by his exertion in catering for the public taste, and his irreproachable deportment in the performance of his duties.

As some reparation for the paucity of our own theatrical information, we take a clever article from the London Tatler, on Madame Vestris. It contains both wit and fancy.

"Madame Vestris is an oddity?" That is strange, says the reader, and what is strange is odd; let that content you. Is it not odd that she is the only manageress; is it not, also, odd that she is more successful than all the managers collectively; is it not odd that she has produced no piece that failed; is it not odd that her theatre boasts of the loveliest woman (herself) and the ugliest man (Liston) on the stage!

Miss Bartolozzi was born in Marylebone, and was so lovely when little, that she was called "little love;" her heart was as light as her eyes were dark; she was beautiful as a butterfly, and as wild as one. When only fourteen, lovers came by streams (one went the same way, for he drowned himself); amongst others a certain gigantic attorney "sighed and looked;" but she objected to his size, and he never spoke aloud of his love, because his love was not allowed. She then adored nothing but music, which, I suppose, must have arisen from hearing her own voice, for there is no music like it. She studied the piano, though that was not her forte;—in dancing "she snatched a grace beyond the reach of art," for she had artless grace. Thus she proceeded making samplers and breaking hearts; reading romantic tales and turning romancer's heads; captivating all who heard her, without condescending often to hear from those she had captivated, until she was fifteen. Then when she was indeed

"A rose with all its sweetest leaves yet folded,"

she saw Armand Vestris, "the dancer." His pirouettes turned her brain; and, ere she was sixteen, she became his wife. He was rather gay, that is, he led a sad life (which means, a short and merry one). Madame Vestris found no resource in her husband, and began to husband her own resources. She did not go to Doctors' Commons, her own will was her prerogative court. As her husband was absent she embraced the stage, and appeared as Proserpina at the King's theatre: after brilliant success, she went to Paris. Helen never delighted the ancient Paris as Madame V. did the modern. Helen contributed to the ruin of a war, but Madame was content with promoting the run of a piece. In that city of pleasure, she had many a suitor that did not suit her. Philosophers forsook the love of science to study the science of love—Poets sang in measures of their measureless affection—Béranger was derangé—Deputies came in person; and she was three times offered to be made a countess, the moment the manager made her appear. But Monsieur V.'s finances ceased to go right, so she left, and in 1820 appeared at Drury-lane theatre. There, at the Haymarket and Covent garden, was she many a season the envy of one sex, and the delight of the other, when a serious event occurred. I saw her, I remember, all sunniness and song, as usual: a week after, what a reverse—her hair was no longer bedecked with flowers, for her form was enveloped in weeds. She was a widow. Her beautiful face peeping forth from her sables, like Aurora from a dark cloud, or Venus from the black sea. She looked more bewitching from the absence of any apparent witchery:—sickness had subdued the fire (not the beauty) of her eye; her voice was more touchingly tender—the very moonlight of sound; detraction said much of the years of coldness between her and her husband. "How could she regret him from whom she had been so long estranged?" Precious reasoners! Death flings a veil over error—recalls every image of former joy: the sins of the careless husband lie with him in the oblivion of the narrow house, whilst every tender word, every kind deed, returns with a sweet melancholy, and, knocking at the lonely heart, cries "remember!"—She resolved to become a manageress. In vain did woosers sigh: beaus came full of tears—her thoughts were on tiers full of beaus: they spoke of a marriage—she of the Chamberlain's! At length (it is said) amid a host of lovers, she chose one "whose love is indeed a host" (though her sister only is in America, it is well understood that both the ladies are in "the united state.") The Olympic theatre opened—how many have been jammed to death I know not; but the erection of the King's college so close, is of course to give immediate relief to the nightly sufferers. She must certainly have studied the art and mystery of a packer, or she never could have placed individuals to the amount of 180l. nightly, in a domus calculated but to contain 150l.

Madame V. is the best actress that ever sang, and decidedly the best singer that ever acted. She was born to fascinate the world, and possess a world of fascination. A man might be satisfied with the charms of her mind, could he avoid minding her charms. With talent to transcend beauty, she has beauty as transcendent as her talent. Those most ready to frame faults can find no fault with her frame. Her foot is not half a foot. Her eyes have all the fire of love, with yet a lovelier fire—a subduing softness, that melts while it captivates—the very pupils (unlike most pupils) seem to love their lashes. Her lips are severed cherries, imbued with their own dew; and the commentary they form on Horn's song of "Cherry ripe" gave to that song its popularity. Her ear seems revelling in her ringlets, as though it loved the curls it reposed among. She is so peer-less, you cannot laud her. She will never grow old; for Time, that flies with others, stands to gaze at her; his wings are idle, while he is loitering at hers.

She has wit enough to excuse severity, yet good nature enough to check her wit. One instance of a tart remark is on my memory. An actress and a spinster (who is very prudent and very ugly) was speaking illiberally of some ladies. "You mustn't wonder," said Mrs. O., "you know she is still a virgin."—"Yes, verging upon fifty," replied Madame.

Madame V. as a singer follows no school, she has formed one—a school in which the heart breathes music through the lips. In her own garb she is the beau-ideal of woman; in male attire she is indeed an ideal beau—the personification of Ganymede or Adonis in their juvenilia. She makes love like an angel—Moore caught his notion of the "Loves of the Angels" from her. As an actress she imitates no one; and (though many attempt) no one has succeeded in imitating her, for she is inimitable. Her laugh is sunshine to the eye, and music to the ear. She dances as if she did not belong to this world, and walks as if this world belonged to her. As a manageress she is the leader (and Jove's Leda was nothing to her); but who is to follow her footsteps? Others might rival at the Olympic, but who could rival her "Olympic Revels?" She is a magnet that attracts at each pole. Steele (though dwelling amid beauty) was never attached to such a loadstone. Her fame will never die (would she never might!) for the name of Madame Vestris will be remembered when all other vestries are forgotten.

EDITED BY GEORGE P. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WELLS.

SATURDAY, MAY 5, 1832.

England and the United States.—The time has been when a book of American travels was received in England with credit; at least, some classes read with respect, when they read at all. This period is now verging rapidly to its close. The general bad character of the needy and nameless tribe of foreign scribblers who have since deluged the press with idle and conflicting opinions, has, at length, spread odium over the fraternity, the whole of whom are, consequently, in this country, held in such disrepute, that the entrance of one suspected of being employed in any of these fabrications, is the signal for a general merriment. Their honest prototypes, Faux, De Roos, and the good-humored bungler, Hall, have left characters with which their successors are immediately identified; and they are, in nearly all companies, although themselves perhaps unconscious of the fact, objects of much sly ridicule and amusing observation. No individual has more contributed to bring them down to their proper level, and to connect them in a thousand ways with burlesque and ludicrous associations, than Mr. Paulding, whose "John Bull in America," stands as a fair specimen of these accurate and impartial book-makers, and should be in every body's hands.

The papers are, at present, commenting on a volume of travels by a Mrs. Fanny Trollop, the recollection of whose name calls forth these remarks. During the stay of the fair traveller in this city, we met her occasionally in private life, and immediately set her down as one of the disciples of Faux and Hall, from the eager avidity with which she occupied herself in ferreting out trifles, and the perpetual fever of sarcasms and discontent which marked her conversation. She came to the country, as has been stated elsewhere, with a famous female orator, or in accordance with some of their joint speculations, the failure of which set her adrift, leaving only one alternative, namely, to write a book. In order to procure materials for this undertaking, it was necessary for her to say that she had, at least, seen the places and the people which were to figure in her descriptions; and the rapid flying visits which she made for this purpose, occasioned, to our knowledge, not a little mirth among those who comprehended the object of her careful and valuable investigations. As an instance, however, of the general discrimination with which her literary researches had been directed, we may mention a trifling circumstance which would have amply satisfied us had other proof been wanting, of the respect due to her as a writer. When she was on the point of leaving this city for Liverpool, in the course of a debate upon several American authors, we ascertained that she was almost entirely ignorant of Dr. Channing, and she expressed much surprise to hear the earnestness with which we spoke of his abilities, notwithstanding the positiveness with which she mentions them in her work. We handed her a composition from his pen, but never obtained an opportunity, subsequently, of being instructed by her opinion. We do not mean to be extravagant, however, in observing that a professed book-manufacturer, residing in the United States to form an estimation of the character and talents of the inhabitants, and departing without any acquaintance with Dr. Channing's productions and fame, may be considered no better than a traveler who should leave Egypt with no knowledge of the pyramids.

The work of the ingenious satirist mentioned above, as might have been expected, teems with one-sided statements and coarse exaggerations, and it has also a very powerful pledge of respectability and recommendation to credit, in a number of caricatures. The lady had in her train an unhappy-looking artist, who endeavored to paint his way through the country, and who, we presume, is justly entitled to the immortality due to that portion of the work.

In these remarks we do not wish to be understood as reviewing the book, but rather as noticing the subject of the disagreement which has existed between the English and American nations, on various points. We deprecate every attempt to perpetuate these unfriendly sentiments. It is not a poor individual attack from an irresponsible female, like the present, although aided by the praise of the Quarterly Review and other tory journals in Great Britain, which can produce any perceptible evil; but it is the principle in its broad aspect, by which we are beginning to look upon every English stranger, who publishes concerning our nation, as an enemy, prejudiced against us, and feeding his prejudices with every casual occurrence. The citizens of the United States are much too sensitive on this theme. Editors and reviewers are altogether too easily aroused. The adventitious importance which these pennyless pretenders derive from such notice is the very thing they wish. It sells their book, it fills their pockets, it spreads their name, and invests them with a kind of spurious notoriety which they cannot distinguish from fame. So long as there is a sensation produced, they care not how, for their object is accomplished. They do not labor for the diffusion of truth, for the increase of happiness, for the building up of an honest reputation, but simply for a livelihood. The more discussion and clash they cause by their statements, the surer they are of more employment. Unable to attract notice without committing crime, they resemble Erostratus, although urged by more groveling motives, who was willing to destroy a magnificent temple rather than remain in obscurity. Their proper punishment, then, should be neglect. The opinions of such venal foreigners can be of little consequence to Americans, however highly they may appreciate the friendship of the more intelligent and respectable orders. That the latter is the case, is apparent from the endeavors of the enlightened circles of both nations to produce an interchange of good feeling. Americans are invariably received in Great Britain with every kindness, which is warmly reciprocated on this side the water to those visitors whose absurd demeanor does not forfeit every claim to respect. It is evidently the interest, as well as the inclination of the two countries, to cultivate mutual sentiments of friendship and respect. Such a disposition is fraught to both parties with innumerable advantages, which a state of animosity precludes, and changes to offices of petty ill nature, in all the points where we come in contact. It is to be regretted that, while the most gifted and amiable, both here and there, are using their strongest efforts to unite us in a durable friendship, a few hungry adventurers should succeed at all in counteracting them. The blame of this must be borne partially by publishers and reviewers. The former should not reprint works from a vulgar source; or if they find it for their interest to do so, editors ought not to notice them. We should not have done so, but for a casual acquaintance with the writer, and in the hope that our brethren of the press will suffer the work to go quietly down into oblivion. Those who wish to find themselves abused "in good set terms," will pay the Harpers, and be gratified. We have understood that the renowned Mrs. Anna Royal, the legitimate leader of that class of vagrant book-makers who belong to the lovelier sex, is about to review the publication of Mrs. Trollop. We trust the respectable conductors of newspapers will not interfere, but stand by and see fair play, as the soldiers in ancient armies dropped their weapons and breathed, while their leaders fought. We wager on the fair American, who, when she is really roused, is no ordinary opponent; and we are convinced that we cannot commit the reputation of the country, as far as Mrs. Trollop is concerned, to more appropriate hands.

word, And yet, when morn-ing bright-ens, Thy cheek in co - lor heigh-tens, Thine eyes fresh bril-liance gain, Like spring flow'rs af-ter rain.

3d v.—Of what canst thou be dreaming,
To set thine eyes thus streaming?
Ah, would I watch'd thy sleep,
And saw thee sigh and weep,

For then, if love reads rightly,
Thy heart would beat more lightly,
And not a tear should stray,
But to be kissed away.

3d v.—I guess the name thou'rt spoken,
'Tis I thy rest have broken,
Oh, truth, as dear to me
As doubt was sad to thee!

Then hide, thou blushing blossom,
Thy head upon this bosom,
And breathe again the word
That night so oft has heard.

Salmagundi.

EXTRACT FROM PAULDING'S TALE OF THE POLITICIAN.—I was called out of my bed, early one cold winter morning, by a person coming on business of the utmost consequence, and dressed myself in great haste, supposing it might be a summons to a cabinet council. When I came into my private office, I found a queer, long-sided man, at least six feet high, with a little apple head, a long queue, and a face, critically round, as rosy as a ripe cherry. He handed me a letter, recommending him particularly to my patronage. I was a little inclined to be rude, but checked myself, remembering that I was the servant of such men as my visitor, and that I might get the reputation of an aristocrat, if I made any distinction between man and man.

"Well, my friend, what situation do you wish?"

"Why-y-y I'm not very particular; but some how or other, I think I should like to be a minister. I don't mean of the gospel, but one of them ministers to foreign parts."

"I'm very sorry, very sorry indeed; there is no vacancy just now. "Would not something else suit you?"

"Why-y-y," answered the apple-headed man, "I wouldn't much care if I took a situation in one of the departments. I wouldn't much mind being a comptroller, or an auditor, or some such thing."

"My dear sir, I'm sorry, very sorry, very sorry indeed, but it happens unfortunately that all these situations are at present filled. Would not you take something else?"

My friend stroked his chin, and seemed struggling to bring down the soarings of his high ambition to the present crisis. At last he answered,

"Why-y-y, ye-s-s; I don't care if I get a good collectorship, or inspectorship, or surveyorship, or navy-agency, or any thing of that sort."

"Really, my good Mr. Phippeny," said I, "I regret exceedingly that not only all these places, but every other place of consequence in the government, is at present occupied. Pray think of something else."

He then, after some hesitation, asked for a clerkship, and finally the place of messenger to one of the public offices. Finding no vacancy here, he seemed in vast perplexity, and looked all round the room, fixing his eye at length on me, and measuring my height from head to foot. At last, putting on one of the drollest looks that ever adorned the face of man, he said,

"Mister, you and I seem to be both pretty much alike, haven't you some old clothes you can spare?"

JEANIE DEANS.—Sir Walter Scott has ordered a monument to be erected to the memory of Helen Walker, the original of his Jeanie Deans. In his epitaph he says, "this humble individual practised in real life the virtues with which fiction has invested the imaginary character of Jeanie Deans."

HOW TO GET RID OF A COLLECTOR.—A woman in Westminster, being at a loss what excuse to make about the twentieth application for rates by one of the collectors of the Chelsea water works, at length informed him, that her "poor husband had recently died of the cholera, and that she had also been seized with that dreadful disorder; but," added she, "if you'll walk in, I'll see if I can make up the money." The collector, however, was almost petrified with terror, and shutting up his book instantly, bolted out of the house much faster than he entered.

A MAN OF BUSINESS.—A friend of ours, says the Sportman's Magazine, was in treaty with G. the horse-dealer, (who died the other day,) for the purchase of a mare, but could not agree by ten pounds. Next morning, however, making up his mind to split the difference, he posted off to the yard, when the first person he met was the groom. "Master up, Joe?" said he. "No, master be dead," said Joe, "but he left word you're to have the mare."

DIFFICULT QUESTION TO ANSWER.—A New-Bedford paper says, a sea-captain of our acquaintance once took on board a large number of passengers at a port in the Emerald Isle, to bring to this country. On approaching our coast he, as usual sounded, but found no bottom. "And did ye strike the ground, captain?" inquired one of the Irishmen. "No," was the reply. "And will ye be so good as to tell us," rejoined Pat, "how near ye came to it?"

PUTTING YOUR FOOT INTO IT.—According to the "Asiatic Researches," a very curious mode of trying the title to land is practised in Hindostan. Two holes are dug in the disputed spot, in one of which the lawyers on either side put one of their feet, and remain there until one of them is tired, or complains of being stung by the insects, in which case his client is defeated. In this country it is the client and not the lawyer who "puts his foot into it."

CURIOUS CLOCK.—It was customary formerly, in several French towns, to make the clocks tell the hour by means of one or more statues, who struck the bell with hammers. A similar custom prevails in Italy; and it is the case in the little town of Lambese. There is on the top of the tower a man, who strikes the hours in this manner; at the same instant a woman appears, and makes him a low curtsy; she then walks once round him. The people of the country call these figures Gincomar and Giacomarda.

ANSWERS OF THE DEAF AND DUMB.—The following are the extraordinary answers to questions proposed to some of the elder pupils of the "Deaf and Dumb Institution of Paris," at a late examination:

What is eternity?

It has neither birth, death, youth, infancy, nor old age. It is to-day, without either yesterday or to-morrow; the circular day without succession, the non-age.

What is difficulty?

A possibility with an obstacle.

What is ingenuousness?

Ingenuousness is being natural, frank, and candid, without cunning or disguise, and free from subterfuge in word or action. Peasants and country people are generally simple, because their mind is not cultivated; children and youths of good family, who have been well educated, are ingenuous, because their hearts are not corrupt.

What do you understand by idea, thought, judgment, reasoning, and method?

Idea is the result of attention, and paints the object to the mind: thought unites two or more ideas in comparison: judgment decides upon their value: reasoning connects these comparisons and judgments, deduces one from the other; and method is the art of doing anything according to rule.

What is grace?

Grace is something divine diffused over the whole body, and apparent in motion and gesture.

Grace is a gift—a favor.

Grace is the aid of divine inspiration.

What is modesty?

Modesty, the most interesting of virtues, colors the brow of an honest man, or that of a young girl, with a delightful carnation. It is a legitimate antipathy, evinced by an amiable blush, at the sight of anything repugnant to virtue.

What is clemency?

A magnificent pardon.

What is the difference between a handsome woman and a pretty one?

A handsome woman has a powerful charm which excites our admiration. She strikes us by the noble and regular proportions of her body, and by the roses and lilies of her complexion. A pretty woman pleases and interests us by the delicacy of her features and the grace of her manners. She is like a jewel which we love more than we admire. A handsome woman is handsome only in one way; a pretty one is pretty in a thousand.

What is the difference betwixt fine and magnificent?

For works of art or productions of the mind to be fine, they must have regularity, a noble simplicity and grandeur; but magnificence adds to them an extraordinary splendor arising from an assemblage of perfections and proportions, which we cannot help admiring. A union of the fine and the magnificent produces the sublime, which elevates, ravishes, and transports us. The sublime is always natural.

What is happiness?

To taste of the enjoyments of life, is only pleasure. Happiness is the peace of conscience.

DAVID.

THE proud Philistine lay upon the earth,
Food for the hungry ravens, and his huge
Proportions, wherein dwelt a champion's strength,
Drew down th' admiring gaze of Judah's host;
And when they saw the life-stream ebbing fast
From the big severed veins, some did suspend
The swift pursuit till heaven were praised.

King Saul
Stood in the midst, erect; and, like the pine
That lifts its top above the forest trees,
Excelled in stature and in beauty, all
Of Israel's people. His dark hair flowed down
Gracefully, and his chin and delicate lip
Were shaded by his beard. He was arrayed
As it became a warrior and a king.
A battle blade was in his hand, its point
Upon the ground; and on his brow the helm,
Whose brazen front flashed brilliant in the sun,
Sat lightly as it were an ornament;
And while he rested by the champion,
Joy lighted up his eye, and he beheld
The foes of Israel pressing from the field,
With unstained armor gleaming in the light,
And banners streaming on the hills and through
The valleys, as the impetuous throng commixed—
Proud leaders, soldiers, and the affrighted horse
Rushed onward to the mountains, while there came,
With shouts sent far through heaven, victorious hosts
Athirst for slaughter, treading down the strong
Mailed ranks of warriors, till the flowery fields
And the way-sides of Gath were strewn with slain.

The conquerors returned rejoicing—hymns
Of praise arose, and every heart was warm
With thanks to Him who made them strong to war.
The king sought out the valiant youth whose arm
Struck down the proud Philistine that had dared
To battle e'en a champion of that race
Beloved of the Most High. So David came Before King Saul, attired as he had been
On the hill-side amidst his father's flocks.
A youth he was, whose gentle spirit burned
To serve the righteous cause; and when he heard
The warrior's challenge uttered boastfully,
He bound on his light sandals, and without Sword, shield, or helm, or cumbrous mail, took up
His simple sling, and, trusting in his God,
Stood forth to battle.

Saul looked on the boy
With a pleased eye, and questioned of his birth,
His parentage, and country; and did seem
To listen with a willing ear of flocks
That range the pastures, and of rural cares,
And humble pleasures of the pastor's life;
And kindly heard the shepherds' artless tale
Of peril when from out the wilderness
A famished savage beast rushed angrily
Amid the bleating lambs, and but for him,
Whose tender arm was nerved by heaven itself,
They all had perished. While the king beheld
The stripling formed for mighty deeds, though round
His haughty lip there played half scornful smiles,
Wrath kindled at his heart; and every pulse
Beat quicker with unnatural throb. He saw
And recognized God's humble instrument,
And felt his own bright glory had been dimmed
By that meek shepherd; jealousy took flame
Within his breast, and as they journeyed home
He silent grew, and almost sullenly
Made answers; and his thoughts were tinged with hues
That darkened rapidly, when from the towns
And cities while they passed, fair maidens thronged
Along their path rejoicing, and with songs,
Commingling with sweet sounds from cymbals struck,
Making their gladness known; and whispering
High praise of David, whose ten thousand slain
Upon the gory field, out-numbered Saul's.

The king was resting on his couch, o'ercome
By a dark spirit's mastery; his brow
Was clouded, and his lips compressed into
A settled sternness; on his arm reclined
His head, his gloomy eyes half-closed and fixed,
Seemed heavy with unquiet thoughts. His hand
Clenched firmly in its grasp a javelin;
And though he slept not, yet he seemed to dream
Of a fierce contest with an enemy.
The helmet and broad shield were thrown aside
Carelessly; 'gainst the wall an uncleansed sword
With its gay baldrick idly hung. Throughout
The palace reigned deep silence; there were forms
Stole in the spacious chambers anxiously;
And round the royal couch there lingered those Who ministered in vain. Then David came,

Bearing a minstrel's harp, and he passed in
And stood before the king, and made rich tones
Rise from the chords touched skilfully, and sang
Melodiously a gentle song like those
A shepherd warbles to beguile the hours
Of watching mid the pastures. On the brow
Of Saul there gathered a new cloud of gloom,
For music to his ear did then convey
No thrill of pleasure—nor a balm instil
Into his heart to soothe its fevered rage.
He raised himself with a strong effort; then,
Fierce glances darting from his angry eyes,
He muttered words almost inaudible,
And balancing the missile with a firm
And practised hand, drew back and aimed a blow
At the unarmed minstrel. Swiftly flew and whizzed
The pointed javelin winged for David's heart;
Yet only raised with its quick breath a lock
Of his dark hair. The youth turned from the king,
And sought again the hills, and sat him down
Beneath the palm tree's shade, and mournfully
Gave to the silent woods his minstrelsy.

ORIGINAL MORAL TALES.

SOLITARY CONFINEMENT.

In one of the French prisons, before the revolution, a young Englishman was immured in solitary confinement for life, on suspicion of having committed some crime, of which many believed him innocent. So much sympathy had been excited in his behalf that, in accordance with a previous request, he was allowed to receive writing utensils, by the same means by which he was supplied with food. He remained thus imprisoned many years, and at length finished his existence there. In the course of the revolution a search took place, and a blotted and scrawled manuscript was taken from beneath a heap of bones and dust; and, by a prying searcher into such treasures, a portion of it was at length rendered intelligible. How much more there was of it cannot say, nor what space of time is embraced in it. Certainly it terminates very abruptly; but that might be the result of various causes. It passed through many hands, always as a great curiosity, and has lately, by circumstances which it is not necessary for me now to relate, fallen into mine. I am certain it has never been in print, and I take pleasure in presenting it, with my best respects, to the editors of the Mirror. It appears, although it is commenced in the regular form of a diary, that the unhappy author soon became bewildered in his calculation of time, and wrote in wild fragments from the impulse of the moment, with scarcely any idea of the season.

JUNE.—Yes, I am awake. I am—I am. * There! I have wept. I who have been the fiercest in anger, the haughtiest in principle, the merriest or the boldest in all adventures, have wept child-like tears, and sobbed bitterly, and wished my heart would break while I thought it was breaking. It is an incomprehensible creation, this human soul. I am happier now here, in this small stone cell, with only yonder single stream of light falling from that narrow aperture, suffering the realization of my worst forebodings—I am less miserable than I have been for months, months before. The suspense is ended. I had rather be broken on the wheel at once than live in that suspense; besides, these tears have relieved me. Yet even now my mind is thronged with images—the court-room, the vast heaving crowd, the faces all gazing, the hum and murmur of multitudes, the voices of the contending parties, the judge, the hushed silence, the condemnation, the strange eyes fastened on me—my brain teems with them all yet, with a dreadful vividness and reality. I cannot close my eyes against them. I cannot drive them from my imagination. Sleep itself affords me no cessation, for they pass all with exaggerated importance into my dreams, and so haunt me. Wonderful images of the outward world, that world which I am never to see again. Never—never. *****

JUNE.—Two nights have passed since I wrote the above. I have been too wretched; my reflections have been too excruciating to admit of writing. Sometimes I have paced up and down my cage. I must have exercise or I die, so I walked and leaped and stamped, to put my blood in motion. Then I laid down for hours, and thought. My past life has been all in review before me. I have slept, too, and dreamed—not of the faces—oh no! a sweet, sweet vision of early youth—of my mother. While I write, the big tears are bursting out from my swollen eyes, and coursing each other down my cheeks. They fall, like the heavy drops of a shower, on the paper. Well, let them. It is fitting it should be stained with tears. Some one when I am dead and mouldered, even here where I am now sitting, will see the sheet; will know of the anguish that now heaves and swells my bosom, and blinds my eyes; will regard the heap of ashes at his feet, and breathe a sigh of commiseration at my dreadful fate. How wonderfully are we human beings bound together, that the pity even of strangers, people whom I shall never see—nay more, that the hope, the dim possibility of it, should soften the rugged horrors by which I am encompassed, and shoot a momentary ray of cheerful feeling through the passages of my crushed and dreary heart. If we are thus knit together by mysterious ties, what a fate is mine! Solitude! *****

Deep, utter, eternal, unchangeable solitude; perpetual shadow and confinement. Never again to see the human face, to hear the human voice; never again to look on nature; never to see the sky, to feel the breeze, to tread on the elastic grass, to lean my ear to the rustle of leaves, to watch the rippling of brooks, and be lulled by the warbling of birds. It is impossible. It cannot be that any one, even if I had been guilty of the charge alleged against me, it cannot be that they will really doom me to this fate, till death. Ah see! night is coming on. I have already become familiar with all the little changes perceptible in this dim sepulchre. I can detect the change of light. The shadows will now thicken rapidly. My invisible keeper will presently send in my pittance of food and drink. These shadows have now darkened many times, and wrapped me in complete gloom. See how dimly the bleak rough walls look already. Ah, now the magnificent sun is verging towards the western horizon, signing millions of weary and grateful laborers to leave their toil. The eyes of my happy fellow-creatures are turned on him from the land and the sea. His disc is broad and round; half the heavens is overflowed with rosy waves, and reflects its subdued splendors down upon the earth, kissing fragrant flowers, and painting velvet grass with the lengthened shadows of a thousand peaceful and lovely objects. In some places silver waves are washing up gently, and breaking on the sparkling beach; in others the cottager—happy, happy man—is returning to his simple home; his affectionate wife, his dear and beautiful children. Gradually the twilight steals over the scene, and then the round moon and many stars commence their still courses in the ascending heavens, hushing all to silence, and touching every thing with quiet lustre; and lovers rove through paths perfumed with flowers, while these gushing tears—with their source never dry? It grows darker and darker. I will lie down and hide my face. God of the innocent, assist me. Thou canst humble the proud, thou canst lift up the penitent—calm the anguish of my thoughts. If I must drink this bitter cup to the dregs, cheer me in my affliction with thoughts of thee. *****

Days have passed. Dreadful, still, lonely; a monstrous monotony. My greatest joy is to watch for the first sign of morning. I always wake before it approaches, and am almost happy when I discover it. Oh, if the direct sunbeams could visit this dark chamber! If I might once more see his lucid touch on the wall. But no, the light which comes to me must be reflected from some other wall. I cannot see from the high window, if window it may be called. I shall never see sunshine again! *****

I have found a new amusement. I refrain from eating till I am more than usually hungry, and my scanty meal then affords me a sort of temptation, against which to struggle.

I have made a list of all the books I ever read, and put down every thing I can remember concerning them. This I have committed to memory. *****

I believe I shall be released from these horrors, at least I often reason myself into that opinion. It makes me very happy. I used to be exceedingly fond of singing. I have sung all my old songs over and over again. This I do till I am fatigued, fatigue begets the want of sleep, and rest gives me refreshment and new strength. *****

It is unusually dark to-day, and I am certain I heard thunder, so there is a storm without. How strange to feel that it is nothing whatever to me, unless it would roll these stupendous towers from their base, and restore a poor wretch to the blessed, blessed light of day. It is extremely annoying, but I cannot at this moment remember where I am. I was conveyed here in a carriage, nearly delirious with horror, and I neglected to observe the way. It would be something of a consolation for me to know where I am, that I might fancy what is passing without the walls. *****

I have been delighted—strange word to use in such a place—but nevertheless I have been delighted with the plan, which suddenly struck me, of composing new words to all the old songs with which I am acquainted. What an amusement! I shall confine myself to one in three days, so as to vary the employment with others of a different kind. *****

The shadows of night have often darkened on the walls since the above. I have produced many songs. I compose them aloud, without the pen. I think several of them are good. If I ever get free, with what emotions I shall recollect them. *****

Time rolls on. I am yet in this solitary dungeon. No tears come to me now. I have no more impulses of feeling. The current of my sensibilities is stagnant. My soul is benumbed. I had a presentiment last night that I was to be released: I watched all night to hear the slightest sound, leaning my ear down against the bottom of the door. Father of heaven, will they never come?

What strange reflections I have had lately. The incidents of my early life seem uppermost in my mind. Ten years ago!—it seems but yesterday—ten years ago I was a happy, glowing boy. God! if I had been told, while I stood on the hill side, looking down into my native valley, that in ten fleeting years I should be doomed to perpetual, solitary confinement, what horror would have seized my faculties? I can see, absolutely see before me the forms of those with whom I then used to associate. My father, my mother, my brother. Where are they now? Are they at all? Sometimes I think they never had existence, except in my own brain, that I have never been outside this cavern, that nature placed me here, and that all the remembrances of mankind, which crowd on me sometimes, are only dreams; at least they are no more to me. I shall never see them, never hear them, or know any thing of them again. Suppose they are all destroyed—well, I am in all respects the same. They live to me only in idea. They are phantoms—beautiful, dear, beloved—but still phantoms. Perhaps they never did live. Perhaps they once lived, but are now ashes; or they are yet moving in life, smiling, loving, rejoicing. They have mourned me as dead; they have talked of me, and regretted me, and now their grief is quelled, and they are happy again, because I am forgotten. Oh! could I hear the voice of but one creature I loved, but for a single moment, even though it was not addressed to me, I, too, should be happy, exquisitely happy. But I never shall hear it. I am the most crushed and wretched of all beings. I have the horrors of death, without its peace. I am buried alive. The future—awful reflection. In this existence a blank, an utter waste of precious life, of great capacity and energies. My faculties are losing their keenness, and becoming rusty. I am growing to be something different from other human beings. Could these massive walls be suddenly rent apart, and I appear to some festive assembly, what a sight of horror I should present. My gaunt, emaciated face and shrivelled limbs, my masses of knotted and shaggy hair, my long beard, my hollow eyes and blighted form. Oh! beautiful, happy boyhood; dream of delight; when my limbs were round, and full of health and strength; when my cheeks glowed with crimson, and my lips were full of joy; when my playful sister parted the glossy curls of hair from my forehead, to kiss that forehead with her sweet mouth; even herself would start away and shrink at this hideous, filthy, loathsome reptile—this ghostly and blasted creature—this—**

If I am never to revisit the world, what is to be the manner of my death? How will this life, this mysterious consciousness, this power by which I remember and suffer, how will it leave me? Will my enemies come in, tired at length of feeding me, and give me poison, or stab me, or strangle me? It would be easy and safe for them to do either, and they may well think it would be merciful. Horror of horrors! They surely will massacre me. Who would know, who would care? Whose hand would be stretched out to protect me? Let me turn from so agonizing a reflection. Yet which way shall I turn? Suppose they have no such design, what, then, will be my fate? I must wait the slow hand of time. Years and years must drag on, perchance, till some execrable disease, engendered in darkness and filth, shall steal over my limbs, and corrupt my feeble body. When it comes I must meet it alone and unaided. No kind hand to touch my feverish forehead; no dear eyes to watch while I sleep; no friendly voice to cheer me; no beloved bosom, on which sinking nature may breathe its last sigh of affection, and receive its parting caress. No—no—no—madness—darkness—cold stones. Merciful God! my senses are deserting me. I hear a noise. *****

Fool—fool. I have been ill; how long I know not, but I am better, and firmer, and calmer. So far from fearing death, I court it, and defy it. I am regardless in what form it may come. Men have died before, and will again; ay, and to all those now in the midst of riot and joy, to all the time will come. There is no one of them but death must grapple with, and bear down with him into his unknown gulf. He will stretch out his hand to the triumphant palace, and drag down the proud and noble; he will go to the sweet cottage, and take the father from his helpless family. Beauty, too; radiant, glowing beauty; lips of coral, eyes of light; voice enriched with silvery music; how his skeleton hand will change their warm perfections into motionless and haggard marble! He will touch the child's golden head, and the lover in his hopes, and the hero, and the poet, and they shall all go to the land of shadows, with those monsters who have buried me here. Why shall I shrink? I fear nothing but bodily pain. The rest—feeling, affection, hope—are all fancy. Is it not better to be thus here, sitting in peace, than writhing and quivering on the dreadful rack? *****

A calm has stolen over me. I feel no more yearnings to leave this dungeon vault. My senses are clear, my mind is full of easy, and I believe rational thoughts. I know perfectly where I am, and what I am. Yes, yes—my name is Walter Hubert. I have been imprisoned a long, long time, in a solitary dungeon, for a crime of which I am entirely innocent. My spirit has at length sunk under the weight of torture. I have been sick, wretched, mad, mad, mad—but now my senses are returned, and I am dying. God prepare me, and bless those I love. I would—the pen—I can scarcely hold it—and the little light from my window is beginning to be darkened. *****

HUMORS OF A YOUNG MAN ABOUT TOWN.

NUMBER FIVE.

THE DECLARATION.

I LEFT the ball, as late it wore,
And glad to be in her boudoir
From surveillance exempt, I
Gazed on the books she last had read,
The chair her form had hallowed,
And grieved that it was empty.
And Sleep his web was round me weaving
While listening to that wind-harp's breathing,
Whose melody so wild is,
When one, whose charms are not of earth,
(Her father just a plum is worth,
And she his only child is)
With stealthy step before me stood,
As if to kiss, in mad-cap mood,
My eyes, in slumber folded.
Her form was large—too large you'd say,
Yet know not whence to pare away,
So finely was it moulded.
Her eyes were of a liquid blue,
Like sapphires limpid water through
Their softened lustre darting:
Her mind-illumined brow was white
As snow drift in the pale moonlight;
The hair across it parting
Was of that paly brown we're told
By poets takes a tinge of gold
When sunbeams through it tremble,
While round her mouth two dimples played
Like—nothing e'er on earth was made
Those dimples to resemble.
And there she stood in girlish glee
To win a pair of gloves, or see
How odd I'd look when waking,
When I her round her taper waist
So unexpectedly embraced,
The bond there was no breaking.
Her swelling bosom heaved at first,
As if her bodice through would burst
Its angry little billows,
Her eye was fired beneath its lashes
As streams on which the lightning flashes
Will sparkle through their willows;
But when I loosed the eager grasp
In which I to my breast did clasp
Her struggling and unwilling,
I felt somehow her fragile fingers,
(The tingling in my own yet lingers)
Within my pressure thrilling.
I spoke to her—she answered not—
I told her—now I scarce know what—
I only do remember
My feelings when in words expressed,
Though warm as August in my breast,
Seemed colder than December.
But how can words the thoughts express
Of love so deep, so measureless
As that which I have cherished?
Oh, God! if my seared heart had given
The same devotedness to heaven,
It would not thus have perished!
I said, "you know—you must have known
I long have loved—loved you alone,
But cannot know how dearly."
I told her if my hopes were crossed,
My ev'ry aim in life was lost—
She knew I spoke sincerely!
She answered—as I breathless dwelt
Upon her words, and would have knelt,
"Nay, move not thus the least,
You have—you long have had"—"Say on,
Sweet girl! thy heart?"—"Your foot upon
The founce of my battiste." H.

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE NATURAL HISTORY OF SELBORNE, IN A SERIES OF LETTERS.

SELBORNE is an English parish. The present volume was originally printed in 1789. It was written by the Rev. Gilbert White, at the request of several gentlemen of science, and consists of a series of letters addressed to them, comprising numerous pleasing incidents and facts, related in an agreeable style, and is a charming work for all classes. Publishers furnishing such chaste, amusing, and at the same time rational and instructive volumes, merit patronage as well as praise. Mr. White's letters have been several times reprinted. The edition before us is from the press of Carey and Lea. It is much in the general style of the "Journal of a Naturalist." Here are a few passages, which speak for themselves. We have a brief letter on the propensity of brutes to herd together.

"There is a wonderful spirit of sociality in the brute creation; the congregating of gregarious birds in the winter is a remarkable instance.

"Many horses, though quiet with company, will not stay one minute in a field by themselves; the strongest fences cannot restrain them. My neighbor's horse will not only not stay by himself abroad, but he will not bear to be left alone in a strange stable without discovering the utmost impatience, and endeavoring to break the rack and manger with his fore feet. He has been known to leap out at a stable-window after company, and yet in other respects is remarkably quiet. Oxen and cows will not fatten by themselves, but will neglect the finest pasture that is not recommended by society. It would be needless to instance sheep, which constantly flock together.

"But this propensity seems not to be confined to animals of the same species; for we know a doe, still alive, that was brought up from a little fawn with a dairy of cows; with them it goes a-field, and with them it returns to the yard. The dogs of the house take no notice of this deer, being used to her; but, if strange dogs come by, a chase ensues; while the master smiles to see his favorite securely leading her pursuers over hedge, or gate, or stile, till she returns to the cows, who, with fierce lowings and menacing horns, drive the assailants quite out of the pasture.

"Even great disparity of kind and size does not always prevent social advances and mutual fellowship. For a very intelligent and observant person has assured me, that in the former part of his life, keeping but one horse, he happened also on a time to have but one solitary hen. These two incongruous animals spent much of their time together in an orchard, where they saw no creature but each other. By degrees an apparent regard began to take place between these two sequestered individuals. The fowl would approach the quadruped with notes of complacency, rubbing herself gently against his legs; while the horse would look down with satisfaction, and move with the greatest caution and circumspection, lest he should trample on his diminutive companion. Thus, by mutual good offices, each seemed to console the vacant hours of the other; so that Milton, when he puts the following sentiment in the mouth of Adam, seems to be somewhat mistaken:

"Much less can bird with beast, or fish with fowl,
So well converse, nor with the ox the ape."

One or two facts in the annexed little treatise on "Echo," will be new to many readers:

"In a district so diversified as this, so full of hollow vales and hanging woods, it is no wonder that echoes should abound. Many we have discovered that return the cry of a pack of dogs, the notes of a hunting-horn, a tunable ring of bells, or the melody of birds, very agreeably; but we were still at a loss for a polysyllabical articulate echo, till a young gentleman, who had parted from his company in a summer evening walk, and was calling after them, stumbled upon a very curious one in a spot where it might least be expected. At first he was much surprised, and could not be persuaded but that he was mocked by some boy; but, repeating his trials in several languages, and finding his respondent to be a very adroit polyglot, he then discerned the deception.

"This echo, in an evening before rural noises cease, would repeat ten syllables most articulately and distinctly, especially if quick dactyls were chosen. The last syllables of "Tityre, tu patulae recubans—" were as audibly and intelligibly returned as the first; and there is no doubt, could trial have been made, but that at midnight, when the air is very elastic, and a dead stillness prevails, one or two syllables more might have been obtained; but the distance rendered so late an experiment very inconvenient.

"Quick dactyls, we observed, succeeded best; for when we came to try its powers in slow, heavy, embarrassed spondees of the same number of syllables,

"Monstrum horrendum, informe, ingens—"

we could perceive a return but of four or five.

"All echoes have some one place to which they are returned stronger and more distinct than to any other; and that is always the place that lies at right angles with the object of repercussion, and is not too near, nor too far off. Buildings, or naked rocks, re-echo much more articulately than hanging woods or vales; because in the latter the voice is as it were entangled, and embarrassed in the covert, and weakened in the rebound.

"The true object of this echo, as we found by a curious experiment, is the stone-built, tiled hop-kill in Gally-lane, which measures in front forty feet, and from the ground to the eaves twelve feet. The true centrum phonicum, or just distance, is one particular spot in the King's Field, in the path to Norehill, on the very brink of the steep walk above the hollow cart-way. In this case there is no choice of distance; but the path, by mere contingency, happens to be the lucky, the identical spot, because the ground rises or falls so immediately, if the speaker either retires or advances, that his mouth would at once be above or below the object.

"We measured this polysyllabical echo with great exactness, and found the distance to fall very short of Dr. Plott's rule for distinct articulation; for the doctor, in his 'History of Oxfordshire,' allows one hundred and twenty feet for the return of each syllable distinctly; hence this echo, which gives ten distinct syllables, ought to measure four hundred yards, or one hundred and twenty feet to each syllable; whereas our distance is only two hundred and fifty-eight yards, or near seventy-five feet to each syllable. Thus our measure falls short of the doctor's as five to eight; but then it must be acknowledged that this candid philosopher was convinced afterwards, that some latitude must be admitted of in the distance of echoes according to time and place.

"When experiments of this sort are making, it should always be remembered, that weather and the time of day have a vast influence on an echo; for a dull, heavy, moist air deadens and clogs the sound; and hot sunshine renders the air thin and weak, and deprives it of all its springiness; and a ruffling wind quite defeats the whole. In a still, clear, dewy evening, the air is most elastic; and perhaps the later the hour the more so.

"Echo has always been so amusing to the imagination, that the poets have personified her; and in their hands she has been the occasion of many a beautiful fiction. Nor need the gravest man be ashamed to appear taken with such a phenomenon, since it may become the subject of philosophical or mathematical inquiries.

"One should have imagined that echoes, if not entertaining, must at least have been harmless and inoffensive; yet Virgil advances a strange notion, that they are injurious to bees. After enumerating some probable and reasonable annoyances, such as prudent owners would wish far removed from their bee-gardens, he adds,

—'Aut ubi concava pulsus
Saxa sonant, vocisque offensa resultat imago.'

"This wild and fanciful assertion will hardly be admitted by the philosophers of these days, especially as they all now seem agreed that insects are not furnished with any organs of hearing at all. But if it should be urged, that, though they cannot hear, yet perhaps they feel the repercussion of sounds, I grant it is possible they may. Yet that these impressions are distasteful or hurtful, I deny, because bees, in good summers, thrive well in my outlet, where the echoes are very strong; for this village is another Anathoth, a place of responses, or echoes. Besides, it does not appear from experiment that bees are in any way capable of being affected by sounds; for I have often tried my own with a large speaking-trumpet held close to their hives, and with such an exertion of voice as would have hailed a ship at the distance of a mile, and still these insects pursued their various employments undisturbed, and without showing the least sensibility or resentment.

"Sometime since its discovery, this echo is become totally silent, though the object or hop-kiln remains; nor is there any mystery in this defect, for the field between is planted as a hop-garden, and the voice of the speaker is totally absorbed and lost among the poles, and entangled foliage of the hops. And when the poles are removed in autumn the disappointment is the same; because a tall quick-set hedge, nurtured up for the purpose of shelter to the hop-ground, entirely interrupts the impulse and repercussion of the voice; so that till those obstructions are removed, no more of its garrulity can be expected.

"Should any gentleman of fortune think an echo in his park or outlet a pleasing incident, he might build one at little or no expense. For whenever he had occasion for a new barn, stable, dog-kennel, or the like structure, it would be only needful to erect this building on the gentle declivity of a hill, with a like rising opposite to it, at a few hundred yards' distance; and perhaps success might be the easier insured could some canal, lake, or stream intervene."

THE OMNIBUS—A UNIVERSAL NEWSTELLER.

We commend this work to lovers of fun and frivolity. It is more witty than any thing since Salmagundi. Where can it come from? Some touches about it are altogether Addisonian. There is a subject of great interest to every body. It is handled below with great delicacy, as it always should be.

"Noses.—The nose, of all the features of the human face, being an organ with which mankind is most usually dissatisfied, and anxious to amend or exchange, the subscriber has been induced at a vast expense of time, thought, and money, to commence a regular manufacture of the article; and he now confidently offers to the public a large collection, that will suit all tastes. He has at this moment on sale a beautiful variety of the Grecian, Roman, Ethiopian, &c., the genuine aquiline, and true witty nez retroussé. He requests all who desire an improvement in this prominent feature, to call immediately, when he is certain they can be suited to a very hair.

"In a few days he will have ready for inspection several noses, with the real satirical sneer for theatrical critics, (these will also answer for writers of reviews.) A few of the exalted kind, drawn up with dignity, suitable to the nouveau riche, and recently appointed to office. Also, a large number will be ready about the first of June, of a very stout texture, and made perfectly invulnerable to odors of all sorts, particularly adapted to be worn during the warm weather in New-York, (the patentee intends to petition the common council for a handsome remuneration for this last invention.) Snuffers can be accommodated with dress noses; but it would be tedious to enumerate the various species of olfactory organs that have been, or are about being manufactured. The inventor will conclude the list of those already enumerated, by very earnestly recommending to the notice of a discerning and liberal public, his late invented gum elastic nose, warranted to stand pulling or wringing to any amount. From the nature of the material used, and by the aid of a concealed spring, it immediately resumes its pristine beauty, and is ever better and handsomer for the operation; as they are expected to be in great demand during the ensuing election, those in want should apply as soon as possible. The southern and western markets will be supplied on fair terms with the above; and a liberal reduction made to those who will enter on the trade. He takes this opportunity of informing his friends and the public in Virginia, North Carolina, &c. that he contemplates manufacturing very well-looking artificial eyes, made expressly to bear gouging, without the slightest inconvenience to the wearer."

We should like to know the gentleman alluded to in the subjoined advertisement. How well he must have lived!

"SALE.—At auction this first day of April, at number ten Fancy Row, the furniture belonging to a gentleman going abroad.

"Two very rich grates for stone coal, made of the best Bristol board, and ornamented with beautiful borderings of gilt paper.

"Belonging to the above, two sets of wooden tongs, shovels, and pokers, painted and gilded to match. Also an excellent guage bellows, and two white satin coal-scuttles, the handles ornamented with wreaths of roses; a comfortable and convenient sofa for winter use, of Parian marble, with porphyry cushions; two elegant blue satin dining tables; twelve book-muslin chairs; two superb cut paper carpets, of the finest texture; three substantial French crape bedsteads, with light polished tin draperies for musketo nets, with a great variety of splendid and useful articles of the latest fashion.

"The kitchen furniture is quite new, and of the best kind; among which are three highly-finished curled-maple gridirons, a handsome pair of ivory andirons, a beautiful bobinet frying-pan, with strong filagree paper pot-hooks and trammels of the last mode; a lot of richly embroidered rose-colored silk dish-cloths, and kitchen rollers will also be sold.

"N. B. The sale is peremptory."

The following advertisement will be eagerly read by a majority of our mothers and nurses:

"SCHOOL.—Whereas there are many parents and guardians who prefer having their infants frightened into good behavior, and a knowledge of their A B C, and are often at a loss how to put the plan into execution, Mrs. Tabitha Tantrabobus begs leave to inform them, that she has taken Scareim Hall, and will open it in a few days as a nunnery and preparatory seminary, and will receive children of either sex from their weaning till five years of age, and by methods peculiarly her own, undertakes, by progressive reform, to frighten her little charges into the best possible order. She begins her scaring course by the mildness of sweeps with soot bags, and ragged old men with deep pockets. When these fail, she has a choice assortment of dark closets, furnished with boogaboos and raw head and bloody bones of the most terrific kind, who are always waiting to eat up naughty little children. She has machinery for chopping them up and making sausages of the pieces. Her assistants are all from the country, and well versed in stories of ghosts and hobgoblins. She takes the greatest pains, too, to make them afraid of thunder and lightning, so that she is able to insure that the little darlings committed to her care shall when the time comes to send them to boarding-school, not dare to go one yard after sunset, or to bed without being watched, nor see a cloud in the sky without a panic. For terms apply at the institution.

"N. B. Children taken by the day, and frightened out of their wits, or into fits, on reasonable terms."

The publication is from the press of P. Body; and, as the title-page informs us, is to be sold all over the world, and in some parts of Kentucky and Oregon territory.

NEW-YORK ANNUAL REGISTER FOR 1832.

This useful compilation, which has now been several days before the public, commands a rapid sale. Every body praises it, and, what is better, almost every body buys it. The legislature of the state, and also the corporation of this city, have shown a good example in taking a suitable number of copies of the work. Mr. Williams deserves his success.

COBBETT'S FRENCH GRAMMAR.

This is a collection of letters to the son of the author, and every where shows marks of that extraordinary man's mind and peculiar mode of thinking. It has had a rapid sale in Great Britain, and is calculated to excite here not a little attention. The volume before us is a reprint from the English edition, in a very neat form, and from the press of Mr. John Doyle.

Mr. T. Towndrow has issued from the press of Jocelyn, Darling, & Co. a second edition of his complete guide to Stenography.

IN PRESS.—The Brothers Harper have in press, and will soon publish the following works:—"Conversations with an Ambitious Student in Ill Health, with other pieces;" being articles written for the New Monthly Magazine, by Mr. Bulwer, before he became its editor, and published anonymously. "Tales of the Early Ages;" by Horace Smith, Esq. author of "Brambletye House," &c. "Adventures of a Younger Son;" by Mr. Trelawney, formerly an associate of Lord Byron—a spirited novel.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

PUBLIC EXHIBITION OF INFANTS UNDER SIX YEARS OF AGE.—This is an age of novelties—the whole ingenuity of man appears to be at work to produce something new. Last week we were astonished to hear Signor Paganini produce sounds from a fiddle, such as that instrument was hitherto thought incapable of producing. Yesterday we heard and saw children, under six years of age, sing half-a-dozen tunes, which had been taught them in the short space of five weeks—explain perpendiculars, horizontals, pentagons, triangles, squares, hexagons, octagons, and describe the shape of the room with the greatest facility. When asked if the lustrous were suspended or supported, they all shouted out—suspended! and explained the difference to the satisfaction of as numerous and respectable an audience as ever met within the walls of the assembly rooms. The babies marched into the rooms in military order, along a raised gallery—kept the step, and were seated in an instant, at the sound of a whistle. Not a whisper was heard. Mr. Wilderspin stamped his foot, and they all rose—the whistle sounded again, and they were seated as before.

Mr. Wilderspin briefly addressed the assembly, and stated, that the institution lately opened in Aberdeen was an infant school in two senses—being composed of infants, and itself in its infancy. The Rev. Mr. Foot then opened the meeting with a short and impressive prayer, during which the children closed their eyes, and remained perfectly quiet. They rose again at the sound of the bell, and sang a simple and beautiful hymn, to an equally simple tune, with such correctness, time, and, withal such touching and artless strains, that we could perceive many persons moved to tears; no doubt, that beautiful passage in Scripture occurred to their memory—"out of the mouths of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise;" and we are quite certain that no person present could have previously supposed it possible that such little creatures could have sung as they did. When we add to all this, that they went through the pence table, multiplication table, scripture lessons, and numeration, up to thousands of billions, with brass figures, &c. &c., the next question will be, what is there that young children may not be taught? We have stated nothing but facts, which were witnessed by at least six hundred of the most respectable and influential persons of our city. Not a single child cried during the whole course of the exhibition, which lasted nearly two hours. The smiling faces, sparkling eyes, and happy countenances, at once prove the absurdity of the objections too commonly raised by persons unacquainted with the subject, against the system. Indeed, such was the interest excited, that numbers of persons could not get admittance, and we understand that the directors, in order to meet the wishes of many of our fellow-citizens, have requested Mr. Wilderspin to conduct a second exhibition on Monday next, when our readers may have an opportunity of judging whether we have overstated the matter. We have no doubt, when Mr. Wilderspin's system becomes generally known, it will be generally adopted; and if seeing the children perform their exercises will not remove the prejudice which still exists against the propriety of these institutions, we envy not the man who retains it. The labor Mr. Wilderspin must have undergone to have brought about such results must have been very great, and the time will come (though not in his lifetime, perhaps,) when these labors will be properly valued. We think mothers, nurses, and even fathers, might get some useful lessons from him.—Aberdeen Observer.

FEMALE HEROISM.—"One day," said Massena, "being at Buezhengen, I perceived a young soldier belonging to the light artillery, whose horse had just been wounded by a lance. The young man, who appeared quite a child, defended himself desperately, as several bodies of the enemy lying around him could testify. I immediately despatched an officer, with some men, to his assistance, but they arrived too late. Although this action had taken place on the borders of the wood, and in front of the bridge, this artillery-man had alone withstood the attack of a small troop of Cossacks and Bavarians, whom the officer and men I had despatched had immediately put to flight. His body was covered with wounds inflicted by shot, lances, and swords. There were at least thirty. And do you know, Madame, what this young officer was?" said Massena, turning to me.—"A woman!—yes, a woman—and a handsome woman too! although she was so covered with blood, that it was difficult to judge of her beauty. She had followed her lover to the army. The latter was a captain of artillery; she never left him; and when he was killed, defended, like a lioness, the remains of him she so ardently loved. She was a native of Paris; her name was Louise Bellet; and she was the daughter of a fringe-maker in the Rue du Petit Lion."—Memoirs of the Duchess of Angantes.

MUSICAL AUTHORSHIP.—The following bit of pleasant information came out in the course of the evidence in an action brought for the recovery of compensation for adapting certain bars to certain airs, in a certain musical annual. John Whittaker said he was a composer and publisher of music. Published "Paddy Carey," "Oh, say not woman's love is bought," and many others. Thought ten guineas far too much for "We met;" it was not an original air, for he had heard it in a snuff-box; there were some additions put to it by the plaintiff. The whole book was composed of common-place musical trifles. He should think two guineas enough for each, and two guineas extra for orchestral accompaniments. It was a common thing to get Miss Paton (or some other person of celebrity as a singer) to allow her name to be fixed to the song, as being sung by her, in order to give it a sale, and the singer was, on such occasions, paid a sum of money for her name!—London Times.

RICH AND POOR.—In a conversation which Madame Campan had with Napoleon, he said: "It is not the poor, but the rich, who require to be looked after in a state. It is the higher ranks who demand attention. If they were not reined in, they would pull down the sovereign in no time. I hold them with a firm hand, and keep them at a due distance, for they are full of ambition. They are pleasant companions, but they have keen appetites. The poor must be protected, for they would be devoured. They have every advantage in society; their rank and wealth protect them but too well. The power of the throne is in the lower ranks, and all the dangers that threaten it proceed from the great."

FAMILY HEIRLOOMS IN THE HIGHLANDS.—At Calder you may yet see the bed in which King Duncan was murdered; at Moy the sword of King Charles and Dundee; at Dunmoly the brotche which was torn from Robert the Bruce, in the battle of Strathfillan; and at Dunvegan, the little four-legged black oak cup, called "Gluin dubh," in which the "Mighty of the Isles" have drunk Hoel at the christening and rest at the funeral of twenty Mac Leods.—Royal Lady's Mag.

EARLY IMPRESSIONS.—Professor Hayne, of Gottingen, used to relate that the first impressions on his mind were made by the tears of his mother lamenting that she was not able to find bread for her children.

The oldest monument of an English king, which Great Britain contains, is that of King John, in Worcester cathedral. The tomb was opened some years ago, when the skeleton was found in good preservation, and in precisely the same dress as that represented in the statue.

A HUMAN PRIVILEGE.—Brutes never make themselves ridiculous; that is the peculiar prerogative of man. The former, in their strangest vagaries, act according to nature; while the latter, in trying to go beyond her, render themselves contemptible in the eyes of others, just in proportion as they excel in their own.

LETTERS FROM PARIS.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF EUROPE.

NUMBER FIFTY-THREE.

Hospital des Invalides—Monument of Turenne—Marshal Ney—A Polish lady in uniform—Females masquerading in men's clothes—Duel between the sons of George the fourth and of Bonaparte—Gambling propensities of the French.

THE weather still holds warm and bright, as it has been all the month, and the scarcely "premature white pantaloon" appeared yesterday in the Tuileries. The ladies loosen their "boas," the silken greyhounds of Italy follow their mistresses without shivering, the birds are noisy and gay in the clipped trees—who that had known February in New-England would recognise him by such a description?

I took an indolent stroll with my friend, Mr. Van B— this morning to the Hospital des Invalides, on the other side of the river. Here, not long since, were twenty-five thousand old soldiers. There are but five thousand now remaining, most of them having been dismissed by the Bourbons. It is, of course, one of the most interesting spots in France; and of a pleasant day there is no lounge where a traveler can find so much matter for thought, with so much pleasure to the eye. We crossed over by the Pont Louis Quinze, and kept along the bank of the river to the esplanade in front of the hospital. There was never a softer sunshine, or a more deliciously tempered air; and we found the old veterans out of doors, sitting upon the cannon along the rampart, or halting about, with their wooden legs, under the trees, the pictures of comfort and contentment. The building itself, as you know, is very celebrated for its grandeur. The dome of the Invalides rises upon the eye from all parts of Paris, a perfect model of proportion and beauty. It was this which Bonaparte ordered to be gilded, to divert the people from thinking too much upon his defeat. It is a living monument of the most touching recollections of him now. Positively the blood mounts, and the tears spring to the eyes of the spectator as he stands a moment, and remembers what is around him in that place. To see his maimed followers creeping along the corridors, clothed and fed by the bounty he left, in a place devoted to his soldiers alone, their old comrades about them, and all glowing with one feeling of devotion to his memory, to speak to them, to hear their stories of "L'Empereur"—it is better than a thousand histories to make one feel the glory of "the great captain." The interior of the dome is vast, and of a splendid style of architecture; and out from one of its sides extends a superb chapel, hung all around with the tattered flags taken in his victories alone. Here the veterans of his army worship, beneath the banners for which they fought. It is hardly appropriate, I should think, to adorn thus the church of a "religion of peace;" but while there, at least, we feel strangely certain, somehow, that it is right and fitting; and when, as we stood deciphering the half-effaced insignia of the different nations, the organ began to peal, there certainly was any thing but a jar between this grand music, consecrated as it is by religious associations, and the thrilling and uncontrolled sense in my bosom of Napoleon's glory. The anthem seemed to him!

The majestic sounds were still rolling through the dome when we came to the monument of Turenne. Here is another comment on the character of Bonaparte's mind. There was once a long inscription on this monument, describing, in the fulsome style of an epitaph, the deeds and virtues of the distinguished man who is buried beneath. The emperor removed and replaced it by a small slab, graven with the single word TURENNE. You acknowledge the sublimity of this as you stand before it. Every thing is in keeping with its grandeur. The lofty proportions and magnificence of the dome, the tangible trophies of glory, and the maimed and venerable figures, kneeling about the altar, of those who helped to win them, are circumstances that make that eloquent word as articulate as if it was spoken in thunder. You feel that Napoleon's spirit might walk the place, and read the hearts of those who should visit it, unoffended.

We passed on to the library. It is ornamented with the portraits of all the generals of Napoleon, save one. Ney's is not there. It should, and will be, at some time or other, doubtless; but I wonder that in a day when such universal justice is done to the memory of this brave man, so obvious, and it would seem necessary a reparation, should not be demanded. Great efforts have been making of late to get his sentence publicly reversed, but though they deny his widow and children nothing else, this melancholy and unavailing satisfaction is refused them. Ney's memory little needs it, it is true. No visitor looks about the gallery at the Invalides without commenting feelingly on the omission of his portrait; and probably no one of the scarred veterans who sit there, reading their own deeds in history, looks round on the faces of the old leaders of whom it tells, without remembering and feeling that the brightest name upon the page is wanting. I would rather, if I were his son, have the regret than the justice.

We left the hospital, as all must leave it, full of Napoleon. France is full of him. The monuments and the hearts of the people, all are alive with his name and glory. Disapprove and detract from his reputation as you will, (and as powerful minds, with apparent justice, have done,) as long as human nature is what it is, as long as power and loftiness of heart hold their present empire over the imagination, Napoleon is immortal.

The promenading world is amused just now with the daily appearance in the Tuileries of a Polish lady, dressed in the Polonais undress uniform, decorated with the order of distinction given for bravery at Warsaw. She is not very beautiful, but she wears the handsome military cap quite gallantly; and her small feet and full chest are truly captivating in boots and a frogged coat. It is an exceedingly spirited, well-charactered face, with a complexion slightly roughened by her new habits. Her hair is cut short, and brushed up at the sides, and she certainly handles the little switch she carries with an air which entirely forbids insult. She is ordinarily seen lounging very idly along between two Polytechnic boys, who seem to have a great admiration for her. I observe that the Polish generals touch their hats very respectfully as she passes, but as yet I have been unable to come at her precise history.

By the by, masquerading in men's clothes is not at all uncommon in Paris. I have sometimes seen two or three women at a time dining at the restaurants in this way. No notice is taken of it, and the lady is perfectly safe from insult, though every one that passes may penetrate the disguise. It is common at the theatres, and at the public balls still more so. I have noticed repeatedly at the weekly soirees of a lady of high respectability two sisters, in boy's clothes, who play duets upon the piano for the dance. The lady of the house told me they preferred it, to avoid attention, and the awkwardness of position natural to their vocation, in society. The tailors tell me it is quite a branch of trade—making suits for ladies of a similar taste. There is one particularly, in the Rue Richelieu, who is famed for his nice fits to the female figure. It is remarkable, however, that instead of wearing their new honors meekly, there is no such impudent puppy as a femme deguisee. I saw one in a café, not long ago, rap the garçon very smartly over the fingers with a rattle, for overrunning her cup; and they are sure to shoulder you off the sidewalk, if you are at all in the way. I have seen several amusing instances of a probable quarrel in the street, ending in a gay bow, and a "pardon, madame!"

There has been a great deal of excitement here for the two past days on the result of a gambling quarrel. An English gentleman, a fine, gay, noble-looking fellow, whom I have often met at parties, and admired for his strikingly winning and elegant manners, lost fifty thousand francs on Thursday night at cards. The Count St. Leon was the winner. It appears that Hesse, the Englishman, had drank freely before sitting down to play, and the next morning his friend, who had bet upon the game, persuaded him that there had been some unfairness on the part of his opponent. He refused consequently to pay the debt, and charged the Frenchman, and another gentleman who backed him, with deception. The result was a couple of challenges, which were both accepted. Hesse fought the count on Friday, and was dangerously wounded at the first fire. His friend fought on Saturday, (yesterday,) and is reported to be mortally wounded. It is a little remarkable that both the losers are shot; and still more remarkable, that Hesse should have been, as he was known to be, a natural son of George the Fourth; and Count Leon, as was equally well known, a natural son of Bonaparte!

Every body gambles in Paris. I had no idea that so desperate a vice could be so universal, and so little deprecated as it is. The gambling-houses are as open and as ordinary a resort as any public promenade, and one may haunt them with as little danger to his reputation. To dine from six to eight, gamble from eight to ten, go to a ball, and return to gamble till morning, is as common a routine, for married men and bachelors both, as a system of dress, and as little commented on. I sometimes stroll into the card-room at a party, but I cannot get accustomed to the sight of ladies losing or winning money. Almost all French women, who are too old to dance, play at parties, and their daughters and husbands watch the game as unconcerned as if they were turning over prints. I have seen English ladies play, but with less philosophy. They do not lose their money gaily. It is a great spoiler of beauty, the vexation of a loss. I think I never could respect a woman upon whose face I had remarked the shade I often see at an English card-table. It is certain that vice walks abroad in Paris, in many a shape that would seem, to an American eye, to show the fiend too openly. I am not over particular, I think, but I would as soon expose a child to the plague as give either son or daughter a free rein for a year in Paris.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

GLANCES AT THE DRAMA.

In a paper headed "Dramatic Improbabilities," and published not long since in the Mirror, there are remarks which I learn some persons, who suppose themselves alluded to, take very much to heart. The young gentleman who personates robbers, on perusing the allusions to his style of playing them, I am told, looked and acted more naturally like a desperate fellow behind the scenes than he had ever done on the stage. Indeed, a friend of his was heard to observe that if he would put on the same expression and attitude before the audience which he assumed on that occasion, he might go to Brooklyn as a star, and instead of playing the robber, even appear as Macbeth himself. I should, however, sincerely regret to see him lay aside that genteel address which marks every part he is put in. If there must be throats cut and people poisoned, why not have it done in a gracious and quiet way? It must greatly diminish the horror of assassination in the eyes of the unfortunate victim, to have the deed perpetrated with a scrupulous attention to those little elegancies of manner which add so much to the enjoyment of life. It is well known that a man who had been rescued from drowning by the exertions of a passenger, once brought an action against his deliverer, in consequence of the injuries which he had inflicted on his person while taking him from the stream. If, then, saving one's life roughly, be a cause of anger, why may not destroying it in a polite way, induce a species of gratitude? For my part, I think the young man is right. So far from wishing him to pay the slightest attention to those critics who sneer at all improvement, and are unable to keep pace with the march of intellect, the next time he is cast in a murderer, instead of blacking his face with burnt cork, and glueing on the usual ferocity, in the shape of beard and mustachios, I advise him to wear small-clothes, silk stockings, and a powdered wig, and never to end any mortal's existence without first giving a satisfactory reason and apologizing for the liberty he takes. If he will do this, I here pledge myself to stand by him against the critics, as the Scottish tyrant observes, "come what, come may."

My informant also adds that the ladies who, I said, held up their dresses from the dust, while flying from the eruption of Mount Vesuvius, discover considerable triumph at a species of anachronism in which they have detected me, and wish me to explain how they could hold up their garments when every one knows that the prevailing fashion of female attire renders such a proceeding altogether unnecessary.

Besides these, the man that manages the wind and thunder, says his feelings are much hurt at the notice I took of one of his tempests, which happened to be a little behind hand. He declares that on that occasion the individual who works the moon sent it up ten minutes before the time, which compelled him to wait.

Notwithstanding these discouraging circumstances, I am resolved to go on with my design of exposing to view what ever I can detect contrary to reason or modesty. Common sense, perhaps, cannot always be consulted, that is, the strictness of reality may be sometimes waived. Imagination must assist in deceiving the audience, and they must tacitly consent to connive at the fraud. Thus years may pass in hours. We follow an adventurer around the world, while in fact we know he has been all the while in the same place—and rocks and mountains, woods and skies, come and go as the contingencies of the piece require. We must also be content, in watching the progress of any story illustrated in a play, to find every occurrence excluded but such as relates to the particular plot in which we are interested. Real life presents a medley of strangely complicated and heterogeneous incidents—the most common-place trifles and stupendous events are mixed up together—and scenes of anguish and of merriment not only follow each other closely, but are so mingled, that we cannot observe one without, at the same time, being struck with the other. It is one of the wonders of Shakspeare that he often succeeded in imitating this medley. Every body has read "Romeo and Juliet," and will remember that touching dialogue between the lovers in the opening of the fifth scene of the third act; but, perhaps, every one has not dwelt on the peculiar turn which the exquisite observer of human nature has given to the end, and which is exactly the characteristic I was describing. The beautiful and affectionate girl at length convinced that the light she discerns in the east is the approach of day, urges the lingering youth to flight.

Jul.—Oh, now begone: more light and light it grows.
Rom.—More light and light?—more dark and dark our woes.

Nurse.—Madam.
Jul.—Nurse?
Nurse.—Your lady mother's coming to your chamber, &c.

The languid melancholy of the enamored boy, venting itself thus naturally with the air of a refined and poetic mind, in comparing the difference between the brightening up of morning and the shadows which a separation from his mistress casts over his own soul—then the hasty voice of the ignorant vulgar nurse, cutting short his sentimental reflections—these are beautiful displays of power, and so aid the fancy, that we who sit in the boxes forget where we are. But as every dramatist is not a Shakspeare, many plays present inconsistencies which cannot be easily got over. I saw a girl in an opera so completely ruined both in innocence, happiness, and reputation, that my heart bled for her; and, although I think suicide a dreadful crime, I almost pardoned her when she ran off the stage, declaring her intention to fling herself into the sea. Poor thing! I was deeply affected; but when she proceeded to carry her design into execution, the waves washed her ashore, whereupon she stepped forward with an inimitable archness and grace, and danced a merry hornpipe to such lively music, that I could scarcely sit still in my seat. By the way, while touching upon the impropriety of being so extremely cheerful while one is so exceedingly unhappy, I must take the audience a little to task for a palpable want of sympathy which they sometimes betray, with the most affecting accidents and agonies of all sorts going on before their eyes. I have seen them take snuff in the midst of a battle, and make fun of the executioner who was to break a gentleman on the wheel. They button up their coats and prepare to go out for beer while a hero is dying; and I have known a brace of strapping citizens eat peanuts with an unfeeling avidity, while even female virtue and beauty were in distress. I cannot judge of the feelings of the characters most concerned, but as for myself, if any thing could heighten the pain of misfortune, or make the stings of remorse more intolerable, it would be seeing or hearing a bystander eat peanuts.

There is a gentleman at one of the theatres, who often wears his hat in a drawing-room with ladies. This, although not well-bred, would appear less remarkable if he did not so frequently come bareheaded into the woods. Indeed, the hat is an article not sufficiently considered on the stage, which is never owing to necessity, but always to carelessness. It has struck me, too, as very odd, when pretty young women are met rambling in pathless forests in spotless white muslin, and without any bonnets. Though my readers may smile, I cannot but think a stricter attention to these and similar circumstances, trifling as they are, would add to the illusion of the scene. When the stage presents an ocean, sometimes so agitated by a tempest as to shipwreck a large merchantman, I have seen occasionally a supernumerary walk through it as unconcernedly as if he had been a mermaid. The extraordinary delight which the audience invariably manifest, on the occurrence of these mistakes, must be exceedingly gratifying to the performer, who is perhaps in the middle of a sentimental soliloquy, or relating his woes to them. If I did not fear to be set down as presuming in thus lecturing the public, I could here again remind them of the numerous instances where they break into merriment at some common-place trifle, which has nothing to do with the play, and thereby destroy the spell. I have heard a dying man uttering his last request amid shouts of laughter. A mistake happening on the stage is likely at all times to excite more notice than a humorous expression; and when a fellow, coming on to hand a letter, hits his foot and stumbles, from the general pleasure visible in the countenances of the spectators, you would think it one of the wittiest things possible.

I have been troubled with the guns used by persons on the stage, which, in an emergency, nearly bring the whole company to a stand by refusing to go off; yet the person who is to die knows his part is to fall, without inquiring whether the piece is regularly discharged or not. Many a man is shot in this way with an amiable understanding between him and his murderer, not often met with between the best of friends.

Every performer should comprehend the whole play, and have that knowledge of the characters about him as if the whole were real. Unless he effects this, he is liable to fall into ludicrous error in those points to be illustrated by actions instead of words, as well as in the manner of reading. In this way the Frank Osbaldistones in Rob Roy are nearly all dubious persons. I noted one who, in the fighting scene between himself and Rashleigh, which is interrupted by the sudden entrance of the noble outlaw, while Rob is urging him, with the greatest vehemence, to keep back, and not pursue the conflict further, Frank stood so quietly, that if I had not been previously acquainted with his character, his present tame bearing might have induced a very serious suspicion of his courage.

I shall conclude this article with a word to the managers on the subject of double entendres, or indelicacies of any description. Custom has, in a degree, sanctioned the admission of incidents and language in a play, the mention of which would be intolerable in private circles. An allusion made by a great author like Shakespeare, from the force of the moral which it inculcates, may, perhaps, not be without its excuse; but when such as these fall to the part of a performer, who, despairing of the approbation of the wise, is satisfied with the coarse applause of the vulgar, he gives it so much emphasis, and makes it stare every one so broadly in the face, that fathers who have daughters in the boxes secretly resolve they will not for the future expose themselves to so much obscenity. He who on such occasions would boldly hiss, would certainly find others to join him, and would render a service to every modest female accustomed to attend the exhibition, and in the end to the theatre itself. The delivering these vulgarities is, I acknowledge, not the actor's fault, who must, by the rules of the establishment, speak what is set down for him. It is the manager's duty to purify the pieces from all allusions from which an innocent girl must shrink. But when this is not done, the actor, by passing it over lightly and carelessly, shows a kind of noble generosity in sacrificing a round of acclamation from the pit, for the sake of a few whose feelings he is unwilling to wound. I have detected several actors in doing this silent act of goodness. It shows not only a praiseworthy confidence in their own powers, which persuades them to violate no decency for the sake of applause, but also it discovers a clear head and sound heart, and I commend them as models to the attention of the rest of the company.

SKETCHES BY A BRIEFLESS LAWYER.

FIRST EFFORTS.

It was after a day of more than usual exertions, that, harassed and fatigued in mind and body, I sat in my office, brooding, in no pleasant humor, over my situation. The night was dark and cheerless, and the heavy moaning of the wind as it swept through the street, loaded with damps, and pressing itself through every crack and keyhole in its course, told that the night without was in unison with the gloom within. The last few months of my life passed in quick review before me. They were the commencement of my career in the world; and I asked myself what I had found in them to answer the yearnings and aspirations of the whole of my previous life. In the pride of youth I had looked with scorn on those I had heard complaining of the cares and anxieties of the world, and had wished that they might fall thick and strong upon me. There was excitement in the idea of buffeting the waves of life, and struggling in them for an existence which I felt myself able to preserve, and I had waited with impatience for the period of trial to arrive. It had come. But under circumstances how different from what I anticipated had my first efforts been made. In the true spirit of enterprise, hoping all things and expecting all things, I had lunched my barque on the sea of life; and with the sanguine feelings of youth, I had ventured in it all my hopes of honor, of fame, and wealth, not suffering myself to contemplate even the possibility of an unsuccessful voyage. But difficulty and embarrassment and anxiety had already encountered me, and although my success in business had not been trifling, and it was after a day of triumph over one of the most bitter and unrelenting enemies to my advancement in my profession, I began to feel as if I was a wearied sojourner on the "world's shoreless, sleepless sea." Victory had brought with it no elevation of spirits; the buoyancy of youth had departed, and I then felt as if I could have laid down

"Like a tired child,
And wept away the life of care
Which I had borne, and yet must bear."

I have never felt a disposition to join in the weak lamentations for the pleasures of childhood, or the happiness of school-boy days, so common to imbecile manhood and doting old age. The sorrows of each period with me have been in proportion to its joys. If in childhood I have been pleased with a new frock, the tear of sorrow has been shed over a rent in it; or if a new top has made my young heart leap with joy, my anguish has been proportionably great over a broken whistle. But there is a period, when on the verge of manhood, in which the pleasures of life have in them little of alloy. The capacity for enjoyment is then matured; the mind and body are vigorous and healthy; and although the powers of both may be afterwards increased by labor and continued employment, they are also hardened and rendered callous by the same means. There is then light-heartedness which is not the produce of insensibility, but the attribute of a spirit yet unsubdued by adversity and misfortune. The veil which hangs before the realities of life has not been raised, and the world, as it is seen through it, is bright and glorious. In the future there is every thing to hope and but little to fear; and if some wretched example of mortality should be presented to a youth at this period, he would see in it no presage of his own fate. What is it to him at this time of life, that others who have preceded him in the struggle for fame, with hopes as high and prospects as fair as his, have failed in the contest? What is it, that on every side of him he can find an instance of the fickleness of fortune and the vanity of human pursuits? He will not see in the decrepit forms which so often meet his eye, men whose hearts once bounded as high with hope as his—neither will he believe that after a few brief years of toil and disappointment, his career will end as theirs has, and that he will at length rest where they have rested. He hopes for better things; and as he stands proud in the consciousness of his own powers, strong in the affection of admiring friends, and buoyant with the hope of a future life of respectability and usefulness, he heeds not the warning he might receive from the numerous instances of failure and disappointment. And is it not better that he should not heed it? No knowledge can ward off misfortune, for it is life itself; and the blind man, who fearlessly approaches the gulf, and with a firm step walks into eternity, is less to be pitied than the wretch who vainly struggles against the horrors which he beholds from its brink.

It was a recurrence to this period, and a comparison of the expectations in which I then indulged, with their realization, that gave the tone to my reflections on the evening alluded to at the commencement of this sketch.

One of the first suits I had instituted after opening my office in —, was against a member of my own profession. It was in behalf of the widow and administratrix of a mechanic, who, dying very suddenly, had left his affairs in great disorder. His widow had employed the defendant to assist her in the settlement of the estate, and had placed in his hands for collection, notes, accounts, and other evidences of debt, amounting to two or three thousand dollars. After they had been in his possession about eighteen months, and he had received a large proportion of the debts, my client applied to him for the proceeds. He put her off with the reply that he would soon bring her affairs to a close, and would then make a general and final settlement with her. After some months, her necessities compelled her to urge another application, which he avoided under various pretexts; but the wants of a numerous family not permitting her to cease her demands upon him, he at length told her that there was no money in his hands belonging to her—that his receipts had only been sufficient to pay the costs of suits in which he had been unable to collect any thing. It was in vain that the bereaved widow appealed to his sense of justice, and even to his charity for a trifling sum to sustain her family until she could make some other arrangement for their support. Trusting to his standing in society, where his legal acquirements and shrewdness had given him considerable eminence, and believing that a poor and helpless widow could never call him to an account, or disturb him in the possession of this considerable acquisition to his fortune, he spurned her from him, and tauntingly told her that if she was not satisfied with his charges, she had better seek redress at law. She did apply to several members of the bar; but on hearing against whom, and for what she sought redress, and being unwilling to embroil themselves in a quarrel with a member of the profession, with whose vindictive and revengeful character they probably were acquainted, they had declined undertaking her cause.

At length one of them directed her to me, as a young lawyer who had recently settled in —, who had as yet little business, and who would probably be very glad of such an opportunity of appearing before the public. She came. It needed not her tears or entreaties to invite me to exertion. The case itself was the very one, of all others, I would have chosen at this period of my professional career. I knew not and cared not with whom I came in contact. My desire for eminence in the law, my hatred of oppression, the love of justice, the detestation of villany; every chivalrous, and indignant, and even interested feeling was roused, and whatever powers I possessed at the time were put forth in this cause. I had need of them all to sustain me in the arduous struggle which ensued. The character and money of the defendant were both at stake, and he hesitated at no means to preserve them, or injure one who had dared to jeopardize them. During the many months of the "law's delay," he took infinite pains to injure me in the minds of my legal brethren, and I at length discovered that they began to view me in the light of a legal pirate, and that with the community I had the unenviable character of a stirrer-up of wriss. My zeal, however, was unabated, and my determination to prosecute my cause, and bring it to a trial, unwavering. After a series of demurrers, pleas, rejoinders, surrejoinders, rebutters, and surrebutters, which continued near eight months, I was at length able to notice my cause for trial. The case had excited much attention, and the court-room on the day of trial was filled to overflowing. The defendant had employed one of the most distinguished counsellors in the place to assist him in his defence, while I, determined that whatever of honor or disgrace grew out of the cause should be mine alone, had prepared to try it without any associate.

Few who see and know me now, would believe that one of the greatest obstacles to my early advancement, was diffidence; and fewer still would credit a relation of my struggles to overcome it. In my boyhood, an unexpected address from a gentleman, or a word from a lady, would cover my face with blushes; and even in manhood, I have been obliged to resort to all kinds of expedients to hide the blood which shamed my years. I have been called impudent, and, perhaps, with justice, judging from my conduct, or actions, but it was not an impudence that proceeded from self-conceit, or indifference to observation; it had its origin in this very diffidence, and was the effect of the absolute desperation with which, in my efforts to overcome it, I would throw myself before the world. It is possible that some of my readers may be able to conceive my feelings when my cause was called. As I heard the clerk read over the names of the parties, I cursed my infatuation in not having associated some counsellor with me; and a moment before opening to the jury, I would have given every farthing I was worth, and all my hopes of present or future advancement, to have been alone, in any place where the eye of man could not rest on me. Anticipating, in some measure, this state of feeling, I had determined to confine myself in opening the case, to a very brief statement of our cause of action. I have never been able to recollect a word of what I said to the jury, but presume I must have repeated a statement I had prepared and committed to memory. The first thing I remember, after rising to speak, was hearing the judge say, "the counsel for the plaintiff will proceed with the cause." This roused me from a something like stupor, in which I had sat for a few moments after finishing my opening. For some time I went on mechanically, with the examination of a witness, from questions which I had prepared and held in my hand; but as I grew more collected, my interest in the cause revived. I remembered how much I had suffered from the misrepresentations and slanders of the defendant; how much my standing with the members of the bar, and my reputation as a lawyer depended upon the issue of the cause, and that the rights of a widowed mother, and fatherless children, were committed to my care. The facts which were gradually developed in the course of the trial, were, of themselves, sufficient to rouse me. Among other things, I showed, by a clerk in the office of the defendant, that he had received above two thousand of the three thousand dollars of debts placed in his hands for collection, and that he had appropriated all that sum to the payment of his costs, in suits for debts, varying from four to ten dollars, which he had not been able to collect, and which he must have known before putting them in suit, could not have been collected. It was not to have been expected that the defendant would bear such disclosures with any degree of patience.

The examination and cross-examination of witnesses presented one continued scene of wrangling and disputation; and more bitter feelings were engendered during the trial, than, in any other in which I have ever been engaged. The defendant summed up his cause himself. He appeared to have reserved all his energies until then; and smarting as he was under the disclosures I had been the cause of bringing to light, the full vial of his wrath was poured out upon me. I had not then learned to command my temper, or acquired the control of my feelings, which I now possess; and as charge after charge was made by him, impugning the honesty of my motives in bringing the suit, and degrading in every way to my character as a man and a lawyer, my cheek paled and flushed, my limbs trembled, and the indignant feelings which swelled my bosom were manifest in every feature. I forgot my timidity, when I rose to reply, and my indignation found vent in the strong language of passion. Words and phrases and sentiments, of which I have now no recollection, were then at hand; and I felt, when I had concluded my reply to that part of his speech which had been addressed to me, that my vindication of myself had been full and triumphant. It was then that I recurred to the merits of my cause, and the wrongs of my client. If, in the excitement occasioned by an attack upon myself, I had for a moment forgotten my duty to her, it was but for a moment. Her forlorn and distressed situation, had touched my heart, and from my heart my appeal to the jury in her behalf was made. I forgot that I was in court; I forgot that the eyes of the multitude, and the scowl of hatred were upon me; I forgot every thing but my client, and her wrongs; the defendant and his extortions; and as I dwelt upon his conduct to my client, I found that I was addressing men whose hatred of oppression and injustice was as deep and strong as my own. My profession and my ambition have often brought me before my fellow-men as a public speaker, and my efforts have been rewarded by their applause; but I am confident that no speech I have made was more sincere than that which gained a verdict of nineteen hundred dollars for my widowed and most grateful client.

CITY RAMBLES.

A ramble through the city now is really a continued pleasure. The equivocal season has taken a stand. Winter is gone. Spring is actually here at last, and beautifully she makes herself visible every where. The green shrubbery peeps over the garden fences—the buds are bursting forth—her verdant carpet is laid over park and meadow—and the early morning air is loaded with balmy fragrance like breezes in a poem. Dear spring! It covers the earth and fills the atmosphere with poetry. I even caught my sober friend B. H. the other day poring over his virgin attempt, extorted from him, it seems, by the universal enchantress. Here it is:

Spring is come!
And the cool fresh breeze blows fitfully,
O'er the sparkling waters dancing;
And ripples their surface, playfully,
With waves in the sunbeams glancing.
The water-fowl's cry is borne on the lake,
And music is floating from bush and brake,
And the frog's harsh croak, and the grasshopper's hum,
All are proclaiming—spring is come.

Spring is come!
The tall old trees again are green,
The young grass to life is springing,
Dew-drops and wild flowers around are seen
Where the birds are merrily singing.
The air is warm and the sun shines bright;
All nature is joyous with life and light;
And above and around, with a ceaseless hum,
Is murmuring forever—spring is come.

It is truly a season to melt the heart of a sinner. The pale faces which have been wasting, for so many weary months, by the heat of all kinds of coals, from Rhode Island to Liverpool, turn to the lifted window with a new feeling. Already the thought of distant shades is stirring at the heart of the worn citizen. The peach blossoms have unfolded their tender crimson leaves, and the willow droops more languidly beneath its fresh foliage. In the suburbs of the city the signs are more palpable. The frog croaks in the late frozen pool, the birds warble from bursting flowers, the poultry lie clustered on the sunny bank, the cattle stand lazily in the brook lashing themselves with their tail, and half an hour in the wood or by the river side passes delightfully. Every thing is calm, serene, and lovely. Every thing betrays the absolute overthrow of the tyrant Winter. Thank heaven, he has, at length departed, and the grateful air, which now blows in so softly on my forehead, assures me—

I had written thus far last evening, lulled in redolent visions of summer beauty. The window was open. The fire was out. I stopped once to listen to the hum of a musketo. It was so warm that I laid aside the paper and went forth to walk. But who shall say when a New-York winter is ended? The whole scene is totally changed. It is tempestuous, desolate, cold, and altogether wintry. The omnibusses thunder splashing along the sloppy streets, full of shuddering, wet citizens, with dripping cloaks, coats, overshoes, and umbrellas. A keen, cold air pierces to the bones. They who have fuel, build fires—they who, trusting to the deceitful smiles of this false month, have not, (heaven help them) go without. Neighbor Dobson, who keeps his office opposite, took down his stove yesterday afternoon. Nothing like decision of character! Mem.—Never take down a stove till June. As for me, I have not had a more cheerful fire this winter than at present. Bursting leaves and blossoms, indeed! Nature's velvet carpet! Morning dew! Very pretty things—excellent in their way. (John, hand me the poker.) Half an hour by the river side! I think I see myself standing on a wet rock, with some of that slippery green weed beneath my feet. (Another scuttle of coal, John.) I pity editors of weeklies on these occasions. If they do sometimes say queer things touching the weather, poor fellows, we should not draw conclusions unfavorable to their integrity. They mean well, but it is the climate which deceives their expectations. I have known their carriers, positively blue with cold, trudging round the dreary-looking city to serve trembling subscribers with printed congratulations on the unusual mildness of the season. At other times we are gravely recommended to lay in coal, and list the doors well, and not venture out in thin shoes while we are, in fact, choosing the shady side of the street to enjoy the air and taste a cream.

It is now the twenty-second of April. Come here, George. Look out of this window—there, by those vine leaves—don't you see a humming-bird, clad in an unspeakable gorgeousness, shaming the richest eastern monarch, and floating on his half-visible wings from bud to bud? Hark to his hum. Does not your heart leap with the rarest summer associations at the sound? What a superb creature! Let us go forth and rove awhile. There is something irresistibly seducing in the first breath of spring. How serene and bright is all nature. The air is of a delicious temperature, and yet the sun has not yet lifted his magnificent disk fairly into the heaven. See, even now his expanded rim lingers a moment on the horizon, as if to steal a parting kiss. Now that deep, rich cloud has broken into lines and crosses his dazzling face like golden bars. See how they break away—slowly melting from his fiery beams. There—there—they are gone aside. He is clear, and his radiant floods roll over the scene without interruption.

Let us take a stroll around the good old city of Manahatta. It has been obscured so long with wintry storms that we have not lately lingered in the streets. We will greet them with a little more attention.

The trampling of horses' feet. It is a party of pleasure, consisting of several ladies and gentlemen. They come this way. Pretty! very pretty! And now as they are sweeping that corner I hear the sound of their light laughter. Riding is a healthy and graceful exercise, and I observe with pleasure that it is coming into fashion more and more every year; and, what is better, the ladies ride—before breakfast. Groups of them may be frequently noticed at this early and delightful period of the day passing in high glee up Broadway into some of the fine avenues which lead over the island. There are many admirable roads for this purpose in our vicinity. Those adjacent to the East river have many charms, but on the whole, I prefer those in the vicinity of the Hudson—through Bloomingdale, and along several by-paths that lead through winding and shady lanes down to the water's edge. I suspect the fair travellers are not all acquainted with the noble, I may add splendid prospects, within an hour's ride of their homes. There is one in particular from the rocky shore of the North river, beautiful and striking in a remarkable degree. You catch a fine picture view of Weehawken point—the broad bay and river—the New-York shore, and also that of New-Jersey, gradually rising and beginning to heave with those graceful swells and abrupt acclivities which, as you proceed up the stream, enlarge so splendidly into mountain scenery.

But the sound of the horses' hoofs has died away, and here we are by the Park. Nature is gleaming out here as well as every where else, and by the assistance of the corporation will, I trust, brighten it up into a very pleasant spot. But how those awkward, tasteless, white-washed, board palings around the grass plots deface their beauty! The scene, however, in many respects, discovers the hand of improvement. The fairy change in the old jail is nearly completed—and a very grateful one it is. Fancy that Harlequin struck his wand against the blackest, dreariest, most disgraceful, and disreputable-looking prison you ever saw, and converted it into an Athenian temple, and you have it exactly. Yet if the honorable corporation aim at the power of Harlequin, they are very far from reaching his dispatch, as the hall of record has been in progress an indefinite period of time, and I have not met any one able to conjecture when it will be finished. I must not omit to observe the fine iron railing springing up behind the old institution for the deaf and dumb, and facing Chamber-street.

I wonder what's to be done with the bridewell?

The warm weather has brought out all the bees, white pantaloons, and soda-water shops. The academies of paintings are to be opened—Niblo's garden is opened—Contoit, Palmo, Castle garden—the note of preparation is sounding far and wide.

Niblo is one of the most wonderful fellows that ever lived. The influence of his original mind has absolutely wrought a change in this city. He has given an impulse to gardens, and fireworks, bowers, green-lamps, dinners, &c. There was a time when the men and women of New-York walked. The ladies walked from the Battery to the Sailor's Snug Harbor. The merchants walked down Broadway in strings to Wall-street after they had got their breakfast; and when they had perpetrated all their transactions they walked back. Citizens of every grade—except youth of the very first order—were compelled to follow the example of Loony Mactwotter, and traverse the distance of this extended metropolis on the machines that the hay makers use in Ireland. Hackney coaches are expensive, and the drivers insolent. But who walks now? Niblo's fertile imagination one day struck out a new plan, for he has the inventive and bold genius of Napoleon himself. "Do you see that star?" said the emperor one day to his uncle as an explanation of his ensuing excursion to Russia. "No," replied the old cardinal. "I do," was the reply. "Do you not see what this is for?" said Niblo to the carriage maker, when he ordered a stage four times larger than had ever been conceived here before, and to be fitted up in the most expensive style. "No," replied the wheel-right. Niblo placed the tip of his fore-finger on his nose. An expression of deep thought passed over his face. "I do," he said; and leaving the room, ordered his man to get a bottle of Maderia, a corkscrew, and one glass, and deny him to all visitors. The event has realized his expectations. There are now in Broadway alone, twenty-six of the most fanciful and pleasant vehicles to ride in that can be imagined. You travel two miles for eight cents or a shilling, and each one, I learn, takes in sixteen dollars a day. Who says the designer of this is not a public benefactor, and ought not to have a dinner?

Do you see that row of fine houses in William by Wall-street? They are to come down—half of Ann-street ditto—and I do not know how many others, for the sake of improving and beautifying the city. The changes which at present it is undergoing will materially alter the appearance of many portions of it. You remember the mass of filthy buildings in the rear of the college-green. See what an imposing row of mansions now occupies and ornaments the spot. It really has a lordly air, and is one of the most charming sections of the town. This place was formerly a sand bank; and before it was at all cultivated, or had any particular value attached to it, I have heard the then corporation leased it, with a vast amount of other real property, for an exorbitant length of time at an annual rent of a few bushels of wheat! Of course, when the old lease expires, the estate will revert to the corporation.

It is strange that with all the extended plans which the common council form for the benefit of the citizens, they are so inexcusably negligent of cleanliness. No city in the Union is so filthy. There seems to be no energy exerted on the subject, although the daily papers teem with epistles from cats and dogs who have departed this life, praying a decent interment. Mud lies often in the streets for weeks, ankle deep; and as for dirt, the inhabitants may fear the ophthalmia, a disease of the eyes which many Arabs suffer from the sands of the desert. There—look at that fellow yonder, emptying ashes into an uncovered cart. See as the light breeze springs up how it sweeps in a long train down the street into the faces of the passengers, and on the other side behold a waggon of lime treating the people opposite in the same way. All this is mighty agreeable.

Well, here we are on the Battery—a scene of which we can never tire. See that winged boat flying across the surface and leaving behind it a wake of whirling eddies and sparkling foam. Is it not pretty? Farther off is a ship putting out to sea. She floats with a slower motion. The gentle wind which sends the other bounding along the wave, only swells those broad white sails with its breath. That must be a packet. How gracefully and gallantly she shapes her course towards the distant gates which lead from these silver waves—this peaceful scene—forth far and wide over the broad ocean. I never saw a noble ship, all her flags streaming, and her sails set, putting out to sea, without a sensation of anxiety, admiration, and delight. But hark! the cry of the milkmen and bakers. The sun is high, and the carts are thundering along over the pavement. The various sounds of labor are rising on all sides round me, and I, like others, a slave to artificial wants, must to my task with the rest.

MAY 4.—I dropped into the theatre this evening to enjoy the opera. A friend asked if I had "heard the crash?" "Of what?" "the building." I requested him to explain. The immense high store of Phelps and Peck, in Fulton-street, had fallen to the ground, and crushed to death he knew not how many people. I hastened to the spot, which presented a most extraordinary scene. Fancy an immense crowd, condensed within the narrow streets, around the relics of a lofty brick building, six stories high; the surrounding houses illuminated, and men upon the ruins, distinctly seen in the lurid glare of the windows and a number of torches; the shouts of the workmen, and the murmur of horror, which ever and anon ran through the throng, as a body was extricated, or a mass of the remaining wall rolled crumbling and thundering from its base. A part of the roof remained overhanging the rubbish, and apparently unsupported. The ringing of the bells had collected the hook and ladder companies attached to the fire department, and one daring fellow climbed up and fastened a rope to the tottering fragment, by which it was drawn to the earth. It is indeed a scene to be remembered. The excitement is tremendous. Hark! another hum and bustle—a mangled form has been extricated.

MAY 5.—Through the city this morning, there is one only theme of conversation—the accident. You hear fragments of sentences, as you pass along the streets; hasty questions and answers, all on the same subject. Let us again visit the spot. See, as we draw near, there is a sensible change in the manner and character of the passengers. They have not the settled business look and walk which mark the New-Yorkers at nine in the morning; they are eager and rapid in their pace—their faces wear an expression of anxiety—curiosity—wonder—horror.—They are, in larger numbers, moving all the same way, with the same purpose. There stands the mayor, busily talking, and yonder goes a train of constables, with their poles, to keep order among the anxious and rapidly increasing crowd. The scene would call to mind a revolution, or some popular commotion; yet, instead of anger, the prevailing sentiments are fear and pity, which have hushed all the noisy and boisterous riot incidental to such large collections of people. They stand silent and awe-struck, gazing on the ruins. Officers are ranged round to keep a circle clear, and give room to the workmen, who have been all night, and are yet laboring to disinter the bodies, and remove such parts of the building as remain in a situation dangerous to the surrounding inhabitants. The edifice was one of the largest in the city; the fact that it was built in the winter, but feebly put together, and completely filled with cotton and heavy merchandise, must account for the catastrophe. I never saw a picture so strikingly emblematic of wreck and ruin as it presents at this moment. It seems to have been struck with a thunder-bolt, and rent in twain; the walls and massive timbers are wrenched asunder—vast quantities of rubbish and merchandize lie heaped up on the spot, while others are precipitated into the street; much of the latter is exposed; the place looks as if an avalanche had tumbled from a mountain, and in its descent dashed a village into atoms. The bodies of a number of the unfortunate tenants have been rescued; some are discerned, but cannot yet be disentangled. One is crushed, with his head upwards. A pair of feet are uncovered beneath his arms; while, in a different place the arm of a clerk is alone visible, a silver pen yet in his fingers. One hour before this calamity occurred, I was in the second story of this very house. What strange thoughts come crowding on my imagination!

MAY 7.—I actually dreamed all last night of the dreadful scene described above. The earliest beams of morning found me awake, and as a ray of the sun touched the walls of my chamber with golden fire, I shook off the remaining drowsiness of slumber, and dressed myself for a walk. Come with me, dear reader. Lift your cheek from the hot pillow. Spring is abroad, in all her magnificence. Fly from the phantom-dreams that haunt your rest, and taste the sweet reality of nature. I know it is not the easiest enterprise—even the traversing of that short distance from your bed to the window. I know how potently the "murderous slumber" lays his "leaden mace" upon you. I know how delusively the moments are beguiled by spirit forms, and lovely visions—but start away from them; and how suddenly you become a new creature. Let the stupid and the guilty kill time in "awiniah sleep." It is a gain to them. But to you, whose hearts are light—whose consciences are clear, it is but a death in the midst of life, which, after a certain period, benumbs and deadens all the faculties. Ah, you are up. How the grateful air from the window revives you! Did you ever notice the expression of a person's face directly after sleep? Such a vacancy—such a ludicrous absence of thought and feeling—such a "where am I?" or "I wish you were at the d—!" sort of a look as he gives when you break his darling repose. I have burst into laughter on such occasions, on accidentally catching a glance of my countenance in the glass.

Is not it a delicious sensation, the laving your temples and neck with that cool transparent water? Already, the blood stirs through your veins more boldly and cheerfully. Upon my soul, a faint sparkle of intelligence is rising in your eyes—you are washed and dressed—"Richard's himself again." So now for our ramble.

Whither shall we go? You do not like the dust you say, of street-sweeping—well, nor I. So pass we on, by whole armies of servant maids, with mops and watering pots—cleaners of brass knobs and door handles—bakers, milkmen, goers to market, and a thousand et ceteras, and here we are at Hoboken ferry. Hear, the bell rings—they are about to start. With what a deafening din the steam bursts and spouts from the pipe. We are safely on board—the engine moves, the city recedes. We are ploughing this splendid sheet of water, which would be of a mirror smoothness but for the long foaming wake of our boat, that breaks the lucid stillness beautifully, striking its transparent green into ripples of sparkling light. Vessels, of all kinds, are plying their course, in various directions around us. The waters lie like a graceful lake by the sleeping city, circled with shores of green, except where distance lends its magic charm, and the verdant foliage melts into heavenly blue. How finely the outline of Staten Island is painted on the sky; and to the north what can be more picturesque than the broken promontory of Weehawk, with a train of snowy-winged sloops doubling its verdant cape? Hear the hum of labor, rising from the town, and the dash of oars from yonder boat; and see two high ships gliding through the Narrows; and now we approach the grassy shores of New-Jersey, all lighted up by the level beams of the eastern sun.—The fresh air has given color to your cheek, and brightness to your eye. Your soul is awake, as well as your body. You are glowing with a thousand pleasant feelings, some subdued into tranquil contentment—others deepening into transient rapture. Tell me, is not this better than even all the boasted luxuries of morning sleep?

THE DRAMA.

THE NEW-YORK STAGE, ETC.

Miss HUGHES has concluded a successful engagement at the Park, to which Mrs. Austin has just returned. We have attended several rehearsals of the magnificent opera of the White Lady, every time with increased gratification. It is nearly ready for production. Much activity prevails in the musical department. A clever young artist, Mr. Harri, has been placed at the flute desk, as second to Mr. Kyle; the basses and tenors have been doubled, and a seat assigned to Mr. Trust, the harpist. The beautiful tint of Scottish melody, which Boieldieu has so admirably infused throughout this chef d'œuvre, the soundness of his harmony, and the mildness of his modulation, come in quick succession of each other, and with the happiest effect; and if the drama be a fair vehicle for the music, and we have faith in Howard Payne, this opera bids fair to deserve as warm a reception from an amateur as the never-failing Cinderella.

On Tuesday evening Mr. Blanchard personated one of the Dromios, at the Park, and with his usual felicity, for the benefit of Mrs. Barrymore. This deserving actress has fully sustained the favorable impressions produced by her first appearance. Her action, as the dumb girl in Masaniello, is extremely graceful and spirited.

Miss Vincent, Mrs. Hamblin, and the piece called the "Rent-day," are the chief novelties at the American theatre. This establishment is under excellent management, and meets with increasing encouragement.

We learn that Mr. Barnes has leased the Richmond Hill, where vigorous operations will soon be commenced.

We have not space for the voluminous communication of "Crito," and if we had, it could only appear after certain erasures. He should remember that indiscriminate abuse is not criticism. However proper it may be to animadvert upon a public performance of an actor, he has nothing to do with his private character or manners. We should be sorry to receive the "Anderson case" as a precedent.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE F. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, MAY 12, 1832.

First of May.—The execrable custom of moving on the first of May, flung the city into confusion at the commencement of the present month. It is one of the most ludicrous sights that could arrest the attention of a stranger. We are not aware that it is practised in any other part of the world; but a regular-bred New-Yorker stares at hearing the inhabitants of other places often welcome the dreadful day as an innocent and merry festival. If distant readers could have glanced at this city at the last anniversary for the celebration of this capricious custom, they would have believed we were afflicted with nothing less than the cholera or a revolution. It calls to mind the dream in one of the Spectators, which describes the joy of mortals on hearing an edict from Jupiter, that each one might be relieved of whatever trouble or deformity he happened to possess, on condition of assuming one of some other person's, according to his own fancy. That great writer well paints the general delight which first prevailed after the exchanges had been effected, and the subsequent desire for relief from their new evils, although at the expense of being afflicted with their old ones. We suspect the same principle is often illustrated by the peripatetic citizens of this metropolis; and the complaint which we print below, from one of the sufferers, goes far in justifying the opinion.

Messrs. Editors.—I am a quiet man—one, although attentive to business, not destitute of sensibilities. Among my peculiarities is a great proneness to fall into attachments. I get to love certain people most ardently before I have known them a week; and, what is remarkable also, my likings, although sudden, are firm and durable. This overflowing of the heart I attribute to good health and a naturally cheerful and benevolent disposition, which I inherited from my parents. You will not deem me a jester when I add, that my love is not confined to my fellow-creatures. I imbibed partialities, which are almost always reciprocal, for dogs, parrots, and monkeys. When I return home in the evening, our cat is ready to leap out of her skin for joy. She brushes up to me with longing and grateful eyes; lifts her back and rubs herself against my feet, at the same time expressing, by a continual purr, how glad she is of my presence. Nay, my susceptibilities are not even satisfied to be struck with such intelligent animals, although of the dumb kind, as can, in some degree, appreciate my attentions; but I become familiar with places and innumerable objects. I conceive tender sentiments for a river, or fall in love with a tree; and, if I have dwelt long and happily in a house, I am conscious of entertaining towards it a kind of affection, which makes me regret to leave it.

Such being my character, the fashion of moving (is it not a wretched New-Yorkism?) has all my life given me a great annual disturbance. I have never lived two years in one place. I am now going on towards thirty, and I keep date by the names of the streets where I have lived, which I find a decided assistance to my memory. My birth took place in Pearl-street; my second year fled in Wall; I passed my third in Cherry, and my fourth in Orange. My notes of occurrences interesting to myself are dated thus: was at school in Broome, Franklin, Madison, and Washington. I entered college in Maiden-lane, and came out in Green-street. Spent a year at Philadelphia, in Hanover-square; courted my wife in Cedar, and married in Pine. Even she has fallen into my way, and convinced me the other day that my eldest child was four years of age, by counting on her fingers Chatham, Third Avenue, State-street, and Washington-square. Yet, in all these revolutions, I have never once met a dwelling to my satisfaction. In avoiding a smoking chimney we have got next a burying-ground, which we exchanged the succeeding year for a disreputable neighborhood. The landlord raised fifty dollars on us once, whereupon we told him to let his house, which he did; but the additional rent of our next residence, instead of fifty dollars was a hundred. We have moved up town, for the sake of pure air and good water, and down again to be near business. Our last house had no yard; our present is without closets, which my wife thinks, with some justice, one of the most indispensable of all requisites for a dwelling. Besides the trouble, which has been enormous, and the expense of carting the things, which would also make a tolerable item, (as cartmen charge on the first of May four times as much as they do on any other,) when I consider the furniture which has been broken and wasted; the carpets cut up, because they did not fit the new parlors; and the general cost in many different ways which I have thus been at for the last ten years, I fully agree with Franklin, who thought three movings equal to a fire!

In your enumeration of New-York evils, I wonder you could have forgotten this, but trusting you will admit my version of it into your paper, I am, sirs, your obedient servant, L. B.

Imprisonment of Dr. Howe.—Our readers have heard that Dr. Howe undertook the conveyance of thirty thousand francs to the Poles, contributed by some benevolent individuals in the United States, for their relief; and also that his hazardous journey had met with a serious interruption in his imprisonment by the Prussian government at Berlin. His countrymen at home, as well as abroad, regarded the circumstance with sincere anxiety, and experience great relief in the late accounts: the last representations of Mr. Rives, our minister in Paris, affording strong encouragement to the hope of his speedy release. Nothing has met our observation respecting the fate of the funds in his hands, and we cannot say whether he has been permitted to execute the object of his journey. All thoughts of the point seems to have been merged in the solicitude universally felt for the safety of the gallant philanthropist. The zealous labors of Dr. Howe in the cause of the oppressed, both on the present occasion and formerly in behalf of the Greeks, have distinguished him honorably among the conspicuous men of the present day. He seems animated with the most elevated sentiments, his sympathies with misfortune never sleep, and his literary attainments, added to his pure character and delightful manners in private life, fully entitle him to the warm expressions of interest which his late casualty elicited.

Death of Mr. Slosson.—The papers have announced the death of William Slosson, Esq. of this city. His health, which for several years had been declining, became latterly so much impaired as to compel him to relinquish the arduous pursuits of a professional life; and, at the commencement of the last winter, he took a southern tour for the purpose, if possible, of repairing a constitution severely shattered by the most unremitting labor. The seeds of disease were, however, too deeply sown, and while on his return home, an unexpected attack put an end to his existence.

As has been usual on such occasions, a meeting of his brethren of the bar was held on the first instant, to testify their respect for his memory. It was truly gratifying to behold with what warmth and sincerity the occasion was embraced by his professional associates. His honor, the vice chancellor, presided, assisted by Judges Irving, Edwards, and Hoffman. Resolutions expressive of the high estimation in which Mr. Slosson was held, were presented by David S. Jones, Esq., seconded by John Duer, Esq. The remarks of the latter gentleman were characterized by the greatest fervency and eloquence. In adverting to the public and private excellence of the deceased, his language was peculiarly forcible and touching. As a lawyer, he described him learned in an extraordinary degree—as a speaker, clear and convincing, without, indeed, that power of language which enchains the will instead of affecting the judgment—as a man, in his exterior cold, and to a certain extent repulsive, but at the same time of an affectionate and feeling heart, and of the most unsullied probity and integrity. The blank which is left by such an individual will be as keenly felt by society at large, as by the profession of which he was one of the most distinguished members; and while we sympathize with those upon whom this bereavement has fallen so heavily, we take pride in pointing the young aspirant for distinction in this honorable profession to the untarnished excellence of his example.

New-York Traveller.—We had occasion, some time ago, to notice the appearance and character of this paper, and the subsequent numbers have justified the favorable opinion then expressed. An Advertisement has recently been made to the editorial department, Mr. J. J. Adams having become an associate with Mr. Freeman Hunt, formerly the sole conductor. Mr. Adams is extensively known, and justly esteemed. The proprietor of the Traveller is fortunate in having secured his assistance, and we welcome him to his new avocation.

The late Mr. Goddard.—We have been requested to state that subscription papers, to aid the family of the late Mr. Goddard, who lost his life in the recent melancholy catastrophe, are left at the offices of the Commercial Advertiser, Journal of Commerce, and with Mr. Mercein, printer, 240 Pearl-street, corner of Burling-slip. Mr. Goddard was a meritorious and useful citizen, of amiable character and respectable attainments. His time has been assiduously devoted to the support of a numerous family, who by this calamity are left almost entirely destitute. The sympathies of the community are strongly aroused, and, we doubt not, that the collections will be rapid and liberal.

Communication.—MESSRS. EDITORS—I have had the perusal of a poem, written by Mr. John Thomas, which presents a little novelty. The ostensible subject, indeed, is not at first very promising. Yet the "Origin and Course of Intemperance," which is its title, is made to embrace the beau idéal only of the subject. The poetry of the Hebrews, and emphatically of the sacred writings, as containing a transcript of the feelings of a people in a primitive state of manners, independent of inspiration, is always allowed to be full of interest. Nor is its biography far behind. Mr. Thomas has selected for his first canto a warranted conjecture respecting the discovery of the vine, deduced from passages in the sacred writings and in Josephus. The succeeding cantos comprise the causes of the flood—a description of the deluge itself—of a group upon the Himalah mountains—and of two swimmers, the last of the antediluvians—the biography of Noah and Lot—and finally, the feast of Belshazzar. Of the skilful execution of the poem, the Rev. Mr. D. L. Carroll, of Brooklyn, speaks as follows, in a communication to the editors of the Long Island Star: "The literary execution of those parts of the manuscript which I have perused, is very creditable. The first hundred and fifty or two hundred lines of the canto on Belshazzar's feast will be found full of the genuine inspirations of poetry—the 'immortal fires' that will burn in the memory of the reader." I have gone farther than I intended in adverting to all to the merits of the work, but I have felt myself justified in doing so, since it stands connected with social and moral objects of an important rank, and I have also confined myself to the testimony of a very competent judge. I shall only add, it is a subscription poem. Five hundred copies subscribed for will justify the putting the manuscript to press, and three hundred of these have been already engaged. Yours, Z.

TYROLIENNE, "MINE ALONE!"

COMPOSED BY C. DE BERIOT—THE WORDS BY W. BALL.—FROM THE MUSICAL GEM, FOR 1832.

Andante.

Where is my hun-ter boy? Tra-la-ra, la! la-ra-la! Where sounds his song of joy? Tra-la-ra, la! - ra - la! Through glen and val-ley His brave com-rades ral-ly, And now, now is the bu-gle blown! Tra-la-la, la - ra - la. Glad strains float near me, But, oh! none can cheer me Like his, who is mine a-lone! Tra-la-ra, la - ra - la!

2d v.—Hark! 'tis my hunter boy! Mark ye that cry of joy! || How my heart, beating, As pours the wild greeting, || Rebounding, hails the signal tone! Tra-la-ra! || Mid the first and fleetest, What song to me is sweetest? || Oh! his, who is mine alone! Tra-la-ra!

For the New-York Mirror.

SONNET.—MARY.

SHE opes her eyes, and oh, my bosom's swell!
 When, like some timid angel peeping forth
 From the dim gate of paradise to earth,
 The soul looks forth from each seraphic cell,
 Bright, tender, rapt, incomprehensible!
 She opes her eyes, for mischief or for mirth,
 And the sweet light, as at a planet's birth,
 Shines on my faltering spirit as a spell.
 Perhaps she laughs in secret, when she views
 The tumult of my rapture, and the endeavor
 To still the throb that fills my eyes with dew,
 And makes my cheek to flush, and my lip quiver:
 Perhaps she knows not how the gaze subdues,
 But opes her eyes, and seals me hers forever! R.M.D.

GOOD PILOTAGE.—Nothing is more amusing than the alacrity of Irishmen in getting into scrapes, and the happy naiveté and blunders by means of which they endeavour to extricate themselves. A captain of a man-of-war, newly appointed to a ship on the Irish station, took the precaution in "beating out" of harbor, to apprise the pilot that he was totally unacquainted with the coast, and, therefore, he must rely entirely on the pilot's local knowledge for the safety of his ship. "You are perfectly sure, pilot," said the captain, "you are well acquainted with the coast?" "Do I know my own name, sir?" "Well, mind I warn you not to approach too near the shore." "Now, make yourself asy, sir; in troth, you may go to bed if you please." "Then, shall we stand on?" "Why, what else would we do?" "Yes, but there may be hidden dangers, which you know nothing about." "Dangers! I like to see the danger dar hide themselves from Mick. Sure, don't I tell you I know every rock on the coast;" (here the ship strikes) "and that's one of 'em."

While, we can easily defend our character, we are no more disturbed by an accusation than we are alarmed by an enemy whom we are sure to conquer; and whose attack, therefore, will bring us honor without danger.

THE DEATH-BED.

We watched her breathing through the night,
 Her breathing soft and low,
 As in her breast the wave of life
 Kept heaving to and fro.

So silently we seemed to speak—
 So slowly moved about,
 As we had lent her half our powers
 To eke her living out.

Our very hopes belied our fears,
 Our fears our hopes belied—
 We thought her dying when she slept,
 And sleeping when she died.

For when the moon came dim and sad—
 And chill with early showers,
 Her quiet eyelids closed—she had
 Another morn than ours.

THE TRAVELER IN SPITE OF HIMSELF.

From Blackwood's Magazine.

In a neat and comfortable cottage in the picturesque village of Bastock, lived a middle-aged gentleman of the name of Samuel Holt. The clean white paling in front of the beautiful little flower-garden before his door, showed he was a man of taste, while the coach-house and stables at the side showed that he might also be considered a man of fortune. He was in truth in very comfortable circumstances. He had a considerable quantity of land—let to a respectable tenant, for he himself knew nothing about farming—and the rest of his property consisted in about fifteen thousand pounds, which was lent on mortgage to a very wealthy baronet. Mr. Holt might have altogether somewhere about a thousand a-year. He spent it in the true style of old English hospitality. His house was never empty; friends, when they came, were so kindly treated, that they found it extremely inconvenient to go away;—and what with courtings in the morning, comfortable dinners, pleasant companions, and extraordinary port wine, Mr. Samuel Holt was the happiest fellow in the world. His outward man was in exact correspondence to his internal tranquillity. He was stout, but not unwieldy; there was not a wrinkle on his brow; a fine open expression animated his countenance, and there was such a glorious ruddy hue of health upon his cheek, that his friends talked of him by no other name than Rosy Sam.

"Well, my boys," said Rosy Sam, one fine September evening after dinner, "we'll drink our noble selves—I don't think I ever shot better in my life."

"Your second bird was beautifully managed," said Jack Thompson; "I never saw any gun carry so far except once in Turkey, when the Reis Effendi shot a sea-mew at a hundred and fifty yards."

"With a long bow," I suppose, said Rosy Sam, who disbelieved every story, the scene of which was not laid in England.

"No, with a long brass gun which went upon wheels."

"Well, well," replied Sam, "it may be all very true; but, thank heaven, I never saw, and never expect to see, any of them foreign parts."

"You may live to see half the world yet; and if I were inclined to be a prophet, I should say you will be a very great traveler before you die."

"I'd sooner be tried for murder."

"You may be both."

This last was said so solemnly that Rosy Sam almost changed color. He passed it off with a laugh, and the conversation went on upon other subjects connected with Thompson's travels. All the evening, however, the prophetic announcement seemed to stick in poor Sam's throat, and when the party was about to separate for the night, holding the bed-candle in his hand, and assuming a degree of gravity which can only be produced by an extra bottle, he said,

"I'll tell you what it is, Jack, here in this cottage have I lived, man and boy, for two and forty years. I never was out of the county in my life, and the farthest from home I ever was, was three-and-thirty miles. If you mean to say I am to be a traveler in my old age, the Lord have mercy on me, for a helpless dog should I be among the foreignarians—fellows that can't speak a word of English to save their souls, poor devils—but, poh! poh! man, you can't be serious."

"I am serious as a bishop, I assure you. You will travel for several years."

"Poh! nonsense! good night." But the party laughed at Sam's alarm; and retired to bed.

All that night Sam's dreams were of ships and coaches. He thought he was wrecked and half drowned, then that he was upset and had his legs broken by the hind wheel. He woke in a tremendous fright, for he fancied he was on the top of one of the pyramids, and could not get down again. He thought he had been on the pinnacle for several days, that he was nearly dying of thirst and hunger; and, on starting up, he found it was time to rise; so he hurried down stairs with the utmost expedition, as he was nearly famished for his breakfast. He was met at the parlor door by his old servant, Trusty Tommy, who gave him a letter, and said,

"This here letter is just come from Mr. Clutchit, the attorney. His man says as how there must be an answer immediately, so I was just a comin' up to call ye."

"You would have found me knocking about the pyramids," said Rosy Sam, as he proceeded to open the letter.

"Fie for shame!" muttered old Trusty, "to make use of such an expression. Ah! as good Mr. Drawline says"—

"Devil take you and Mr. Drawline—Saddle the Curate this instant, and tell the gentlemen, when they come down, that I am forced to set off on business, but that I shall certainly be back to dinner."

In the utmost haste, and with no very pleasant expression, he managed to swallow three or four eggs, nearly a loaf of bread, and half a dozen cups of tea. His horse was soon at the door; he set off at a hand gallop, and left old Trusty Tommy with his mouth open, wondering what in the world it could be that induced his master to such unusual expedition. The motive was indeed a serious one. Mr. Clutchit had discovered that there was a prior mortgage over the estate upon which poor Sam's fifteen thousand was advanced, and their great object now was to get the mortgage transferred to some unincumbered security. The seven miles which intervened between the lawyer and his client, were soon passed over. Hot and breathless our poor friend, who was now more rosy than ever, rushed into the business-room of Mr. Clutchit. That gentleman, however, was nowhere to be found. On his table Sam saw a note directed to himself—he opened it, and found the following words:

"DEAR SIR—By the strangest good luck I have this moment heard that Sir Harry is at present in London. I lose not a moment, as the coach is just starting, to obtain an interview with him there, and should strongly recommend your following by the eleven o'clock coach. Indeed your presence is indispensably necessary. I shall only have the start of you by two hours.—Your obedient servant, J. C."

Sam threw himself into a chair in an agony of grief and wonder.

"That infernal fellow, Jack Thompson," he moaned out, "is certainly more than human. They say they learn wonderful things abroad. He has learned the second sight. Little did I think two days ago, that I should ever have to hurry so far away from home. London must be seventy miles off at least—oh lord! oh lord! quite out of my own dear county—what is to become of me!"

While indulging in this moralizing fit the coach drove up to the door—Sam mounted, almost unconscious of what he did, and was whirled off before he had time to recover from his reverie. On arriving in London, night was rapidly closing in. The house where the coach stopped was a very neat comfortable sort of hostelry, and our honest friend, before proceeding to any other business, solaced himself with the best dinner the bill of fare would allow. After refreshing himself with a solitary pint of port, he set out in search of Mr. Clutchit. But where to find that gentleman was the difficulty; he had left no address in his note to his client, and the people of the inn could not tell where the nine o'clock coach went to in London. They recommended him, however, to apply at various inns—the Dragon, the Swan, the Bull-and-Mouth, and a variety of other great coach caravanseries, the very names of which were utterly unknown to the unsophisticated Sam.

Away, however, he went, in total ignorance of his way, and much too independent and magnanimous to ask it. First one street was traversed, then another, and at last poor Sam was entirely lost. His great object now was to retrace his steps; but one turning was so like another, that he could not distinguish those by which he had come, and in the midst of his perplexity, he recollected that he had forgotten to take notice of the name of the inn at which he had dined, and of course could not ask any one he met to tell him his way to it.

Tired out by his day's exertions, and very much dispirited, he resolved to go into the first house of entertainment he came to, and resume his search early in the morning. He accordingly went into the next inn that presented itself. He took particular pains this time to impress its name upon his memory. The Cabbage Leaf was the sign of this tavern, and it was situated at the top of one of those narrow little streets in the neighborhood of the Tower. Honest Sam, it will be seen, had traveled in the wrong direction; but now he was too much harassed and wearied to recover his mistake. On going into the bar, he was told by the bustling little landlady that he might have a bed; but they were really so full, that he must submit to share his room with another gentleman. Sam comforted himself with the reflection, that necessity has no law, and consented to the arrangement. After a Welsh rabbit, and a glass or two of brandy and water, he was shown to his apartment.

His fellow-lodger came into the room nearly at the same time, and Sam was somewhat pleased to see he was of a very decent exterior. They entered into conversation, and his new acquaintance promised, from his knowledge of the town, to be of considerable use in furthering Sam's inquiries after Mr. Clutchit. He, however, told him, that he had some business to transact very early in the morning, and took the precaution on these occasions, especially in the winter, of shaving at night. He accordingly proceeded to shave himself; but poor Sam was so fatigued, that he fell asleep before he had finished the operation. On awaking next morning, he looked to his companion's bed, but it was empty. He had told him, however, that he should rise very early, so he was not surprised at his absence. On getting up, and searching for his inexpressibles, they were nowhere to be found. In their place, he discovered those of his late companion; and after many strange surmises, and coming at last to the conclusion that he was robbed, he quietly slipped them on, and proceeded down stairs.

His watch he had luckily put under his pillow, and there had not been above two pounds in his pockets; he found a few shillings in an old purse, a penknife, two keys, and a set of very fine teeth, carefully fitted up, and apparently never used, in the pockets of the habiliments which were left. These circumstances staggered him as to the predatory habits of his companion; and he resolved to say nothing on the subject, as he had still some hopes of the stranger's making his appearance as he had promised, and clearing up the mystery. He waited some time after breakfast with this expectation; and at last telling the landlady he should be back at a certain hour, he went out in hopes of falling in with his companion in the street.

He walked down towards the river, and gazed with astonishment on the innumerable shipping. Wondering more and more at the strangeness and immensity of the scene, he thought of returning to where he had slept. Just as he was leaving the river, he saw several men go into one of the barges, and begin dragging the shallow part of the water.

"What are those men after?" said Sam to a person who stood watching them.

"They be draggin' for the body of a gentleman as was murdered last night, and the folks thinks that he was mayhap thrown into the river."

"Dreadful!" said Sam, turning pale at the horrid supposition. "I hope they won't find it, it would be the death of me."

And shuddering lest they should pull up a mangled body in his sight, he rushed from the spot. On reaching the inn, he entered it, and was going into the bar, when two stout men rushed upon him, the landlady crying,

"That's the man," and threw him down with all their force.

One held him by the throat, while the other handcuffed him in a moment. They then hustled him out of the house, forced him into a hackney-coach, and drove off at an amazing pace.

Sam was so much astonished at the rapidity of the whole transaction, that he could scarcely summon breath to ask his conductors what they meant. At last he said,

"What the devil can be the meaning of all this? Is this the way to treat a country gentleman?"

"How bloody well he sports the Johnnie," said one of the men to the other, without attending to Sam's questions.

"He'll queer the breaks if the tide stands his friend, and rolls off the stuffin'."

"No, there be'n't no chance of that," responded the other, "for they've set to so soon with the drags. I'll bet a gallon of gin to a pint of purl, he dies in his shoes, with his ears stuffed with cotton."

"Do you mean me, you scoundrel?" cried Sam, who did not quite understand them, but perceived that they spoke of him rather disrespectfully.

"Come, come, master, none of your hard words; we aint such scoundrels as to Burke our bedfellow howsoever."

At this moment, at the corner of a street, Sam saw Mr. Clutchit hurrying as if on very urgent business. He pushed his head out of the window, and holloed—

"Clutchit, Clutchit, here's a pretty go!" and held out his manacled hands.

But his companions pulled him forcibly back, and he did not know whether his attorney had perceived him or not. Soon after this, the coach stopped at a dingy-looking house with iron gratings before the windows.

"We gets out here, my covey," said one of the men, "but I dare say, we shall join company again on our way to Newgate."

"You insulting scoundrel," said Sam, "I hope never to see your ugly face again."

"No, nor Jack Ketch's neither—but mizzle, mizzle, I say—his worship's been waiting this hour."

They then proceeded into a dark room which was crowded with people. They all made way for Sam and his two conductors, till they stood directly in front of three gentlemen in comfortable arm-chairs.

"Call the first witness," said one of the gentlemen, and immediately appeared the bustling little landlady of the Cabbage Leaf.

"Is that the man who slept in your house last night?"
 "It is, your worship; and little did I think such a bloody-minded villain—"

"Hush! answer only to the questions that are put to you—about what o'clock was it when he came to your house?"
 "About ten o'clock, the rascal."

Here Sam, whose astonishment now gave place to rage and indignation, started up, and said to the magistrates,
 "Harkee, gentlemen, I'll be smothered if I don't make you pay for this. How dare you—"

"Officers, look close to the prisoner," said one of their worships. "I recommend you, prisoner, to say nothing till the examination is concluded."

And Sam sat down again, wondering where all this would end. "You say the prisoner came to your house about ten o'clock—had you any conversation with him?"

"No, your worship;" he only had his supper, and two glasses of brandy and water."

"He then went to bed?"

"Yes; I showed him up to number nine."

"Was it a single bedded room?"

"No; there were two beds in it."

"Describe its situation."

"It is just at the top of the first stair, which fronts the side door into the lane."

"Could that door be opened without wakening the house?"

"Yes; we never keep it closed with more than a latch, 'cause of the watermen getting quietly down to the river."

"Was the other bed in the same room occupied?"

"Yes; a gentleman slept in it."

"You saw no more of the prisoner that night. Well, in the morning, when did you see him?"

"He came down to breakfast, but seemed very low and uneasy."

"Did he say any thing to you about his companion?"

"Yes; he sighed, and said he was sure he would never come back."

"When did he leave the house?"

"He went down towards the river in about half an hour."

"Very well—you may stand down. Call the next witness."

The chambermaid made her appearance.

"On going into the prisoner's room this morning, what did you see?"

"Nothing particular at first. But in a little I thought the beds and carpet more tumbled than usual. I looked into the other gentleman's bed and there I saw the sheets and pillow marked with blood."

(Here the witness turned very faint.)

"Well, did you give the alarm?"

"Yes; I ran down and told missus, but the prisoner had gone out."

"What did you do?"

"We told all the lodgers, and asked if they had heard any noise. One of them, John Chambers, heard heavy steps on the stair."

"Well, we shall examine John Chambers himself."

John Chambers, on being examined, said that about three or four in the morning, he heard heavy steps coming down the stairs, as if of a man carrying a great weight; the side-door into the lane was opened, and the person went out. He watched for some time, and heard a stealthy pace going up stairs again; after which he fell asleep, as his suspicions were quieted by the person's return.

A witness next appeared, who deposed, that, having an appointment with Abraham Reeve, the person supposed to be murdered, he proceeded to the Cabbage Leaf and found it all in an uproar at the suspected murder. Abraham Reeve was by profession a dentist; and had that morning fixed to furnish the witness with a handsome set of ivories.

"Please your worship," said one of the officers who had conducted the unfortunate Samuel to the office, "on searching the prisoner, we found this here in his breeches pocket;" and saying this, he held up a complete set of false teeth.

The magistrates upon this shook their heads, and a thrill went through the court, as if the murder were transacted before their eyes. The purse also was recognised by the landlady; and even the evidence of the person whom Sam had addressed by the side of the river, when they were dragging for the corpse, told very much against him. That witness stated, that the prisoner turned very pale when he saw what they were about, and after seeming excessively agitated for a long while, had said, as if unconsciously, "It will be death to me if you find him." The evidence, by various concurring circumstances, was very strong against our unfortunate friend. The magistrate cautioned him against saying any thing to criminate himself; and asked him if he wished to make any observation before being remanded on suspicion. Thus adjured, Rosy Sam, who was, alas! now no longer rosy, essayed to speak.

"Upon my honor, this is a most curious business. All that I know about the matter is, that the man who slept in my room must have got up very early in the morning, and stolen my breeches. I am a man of fortune—my name is Samuel Holt, Esq. of Bastock Lodge—and as to stealing—"

But his harangue was here interrupted by a new witness, who exclaimed,

"Please your worships, this swindler of a fellow cheated me last night out of an excellent dinner and a pint of old port."

And poor Sam, on looking round at his new assailant, recognised the landlord of the inn where the coach had stopt. Casting his eyes up to heaven, in sheer despair, he sat down in his seat, and muttered,

"It is my firm belief I shall be hanged, because a cursed fellow of a dentist, took a fancy to my breeches. But it all comes of traveling. May the devil take Jack Thompson!"

But at this moment a prospect of safety dawned upon him, for Mr. Clutchit entered the office.

"I say, Clutchit!" cried the prisoner in an ecstasy, "just tell these people, will you, that I never murdered a dentist—confound his breeches—but that I am Sam Holt of Bastock—Rosy Sam."

Mr. Clutchit, thus addressed, bore witness to the respectability of his client, and begged to be made acquainted with the circumstances of the case. On hearing the name of the missing individual, he exclaimed,

"O, he's safe enough—this very morning he was arrested at Westminster for debt, and is snugly lodged in the Fleet. A stout, good-complexioned man, dentist, about two-and-forty years of age, and much such a figure as Mr. Holt."

"Just such a figure," cried Sam, "our clothes fit each other, as if the tailor had measured us both."

Mr. Clutchit's evidence altered the appearance of the question, and a messenger was despatched to the Fleet, to ascertain whether the dentist was really there. In a short time he returned to the court with the following letter:

"Sir—I am sorry for the scrape my disappearance has got you into. On shaving myself last night I cut my chin very severely, and had nothing at hand to stop the bleeding. On getting up very early to proceed to Westminster, I took my trunk down stairs and put it into a boat, but recollecting I had left my dressing case, I returned for it as gently as I could, for fear of disturbing the house. It was so dark at the time, that I find, in mistake, I had put on some clothes which did not belong to me. On landing at Westminster, I was unfortunately arrested at the suit of a scoundrel named Clutchit, and sent off to this place. I herewith return you the things contained in your pockets, and would return the habiliments themselves, but just at present have no change of wardrobe. Yours respectfully, ABRAHAM REEVE."

Sam was now complimented and apologized to, on all hands; and though Mr. Clutchit spoke in no very kindly terms of the unhappy Abraham, owing, perhaps, to the manner in which he was spoken of in the note, Sam, who was now in the highest spirits, said, as they went out of the office together,

"He's not a bad fellow that same dentist—he has saved my neck from the gallows, and I'll be hanged if I don't pay his debt. But I say, Clutchit, only think what would have become of me if he had been drowned on his way to Westminster!"

"Ah, my dear sir, you know nothing about the law. But come, we must talk on business. I have not yet seen Sir Harry, but have a note from him—that he expects us both to dine with him on board his yacht to-day, which is lying at Blackwall. You had better go and arrange matters with him in a friendly way, while I draw out the deeds, and make all right."

"Just as you please," said Sam, "but in the meantime, my toggery is not just what I could wish, and my purse—"

"Say no more, say no more. One can get every thing in London."

And in the course of an hour Sam found himself well dressed, with two or three shirts and other articles in a carpet-bag, and fifty sovereigns in his pocket, for which he gave the lawyer his note. Rejoicing in his recovered liberty, and anticipating a comfortable dinner and quiet bottle once more, he presented himself on board the Tartar, at four o'clock.

Sir Harry was delighted to see him, introduced him to some friends who were on board, and in the happiest mood possible the whole party sat down to dinner. But Sam's hilarity was doomed to be of short duration. Before he had time to swallow the first mouthful he perceived that the vessel was in motion. Sir Harry assured him they were only going a trip to the Downs to see the fleet, and would be back the next day; and Mr. Holt, who never took long to accept a friendly invitation, professed his happiness at the prospect of the voyage. But a dinner on board a little yacht of fifty tons, and in his nice parlor at Bastock Lodge, were very different things. A slight swell of the river made her motion very uneasy, and a lurch which emptied a plateful of scalding pea-soup into Sam's lap, and diverted the point of his fork from its original destination—a kidney potatoe—to the more sensitive kidneys of his leeward neighbor, made him half repent his nautical expedition.

When they had left the comparative smoothness of the river, and entered upon the open sea, which was heaving under a pretty tolerable breeze, Sam's feelings were of a very different nature from those of pleasure.

After various ineffectual attempts to enjoy himself below, he felt that the fresh air was absolutely necessary to his comfort, and rushed upon deck. Here he was quite bewildered. The night was not entirely dark, but a dim lurid gloom spread itself all round the heavens, and even so unpractised an eye as poor Sam's saw that there was a storm in the sky. In the meantime, the wind blew fresher every minute, and the Tartar skimmed on the top of the waves one moment, and the other, sunk so instantaneously into the hollow of the sea, that Sam laid himself down upon the deck, partly to repress his sickness, and partly, perhaps, to conceal his fears. Meanwhile, mirth and revelry were going on below, and even the sailors appeared to Sam to be much less attentive to the vessel than the exigency of affairs demanded. From time to time our friend lifted up his head, to satisfy himself whether the sea was becoming more rough, and laid himself down again with an increase of his alarm. At last he caught an indistinct view of some large dark object, heaving and tumbling in the waters; he kept his eye as steadily fixed on it as his sickness would allow, until he saw a ship of large size.

"I say, coachman!" he said to the man at the wheel, "mind your reins; there is a London waggon coming down hill, fifteen miles an hour."

The man, whose ideas were as thoroughly nautical as Sam's were terrene, paid no attention to his warning; but still Sam's eyes were fixed on the approaching object, and he cried out, in the extremity of alarm,

"Drive on, drive on, or pull to the side of the road; or we shall all be spilt!"

His exclamations produced no effect, and the ship drew rapidly near. He saw her as her huge beam rose upon the crest of a wave, and sank yawning down again, till her hull was entirely hid; but each time she rose, he perceived that she had greatly shortened the space between them. Sam cried out to the steersman,

"You infernal villain, why don't you get out of the way? Do you not understand what's said to you, you tarry, quid-chewing abomination! See, see, she's on us!—she's on us!"

He heard the dash of her bows through the foam, and while the bellying of her sails above sounded like thunder, a hoarse voice was heard through the storm, crying,

"Luff, luff;" and the helmsman, now thoroughly awakened to his danger, turned the wheel, but it was too late.

A scream, wild and appalling, burst from the crew, who were on deck, and the next instant a crash took place; the little vessel shook as if every plank were bursting, and Sam found himself battling with the waves. He soon lost all consciousness of his situation, and how long had elapsed, he did not know; but when he came to his recollection, he found himself in a warm bed, while a gentleman in naval uniform was holding his pulse, and several other persons anxiously looking on.

"It's of no use, I tell you," said Sam, with a rueful expression of countenance. "It's of no use—I'm a changed man. Yesterday I was nearly hanged, now I'm entirely drowned; and what's to happen next, Lord only knows. The last time I slept in Bastock, I had never been forty miles from home, but now I suppose I'm at the other end of the world."

"Keep yourself quiet, sir, you are in good quarters," said the gentleman who held his pulse. "You are on board his Majesty's ship Bloodsucker, eighty-four, bound for the Mediterranean. Take this composing draught, and keep yourself quiet for a few days, and I have no doubt of your soon recovering your strength."

And accordingly, in a few days, Sam was able to go upon deck. By the ease and jollity of his social disposition, he soon made himself a favorite with the mess. On his first emerging from the cabin, he gazed with breathless astonishment at the prospect which presented itself—magnificent hills at an amazing distance, and a vast extent of level country, rejoicing in the sunshine.

"Pray, sir," said Sam, to a tall, romantic-looking gentleman in black, who was admiring the same scene, "what county may we be opposite now? Is it any part of Hampshire, sir?"

"Hampshire!" repeated the gentleman thus addressed, "these are the mountains of Spain. These hills were trod by Hannibal and the Scipios, by the Duke of Wellington, and Don Quixote. This is the land of the inquisition and liquorice. Yonder is Cape Trafalgar; there, in the arms of victory and Sir Thomas Hardy, fell heroic one-eyed Nelson! This is Cape Spartel. Hail Africa's scorching shore, hot-bed of niggers! See! we open the pillars of Hercules! These mighty portals past, every step we'll be on classic ground or water!"

Long before this rhapsody was concluded, our friend had betaken himself to another part of the ship, and did not appreciate the eloquence and enthusiasm of the classical chaplain of the Bloodsucker. It is not to be supposed that Sam was a willing encounterer, all this time, of the perils of the deep. Frequent and anxious were his inquiries as to the possibility of his return. He was assured that at Gibraltar there was no doubt of his getting a homeward vessel, but till then, he had better accommodate himself to circumstances. Accordingly, with right good-will, he set himself to enjoy as many comforts as his position would afford. The purser, being luckily a stout individual, furnished him with a wardrobe; and the wine being good, the mess pleasant, and the sea calm, Sam's only drawback from his felicity, was his absence from Bastock Lodge. On casting anchor off St. Rosier, they ascertained from the pratique boat that the yellow fever was so virulent on shore, that the deaths averaged nine a day; so, without the delay of a moment, all sail was hoisted again, and with a favorable breeze the Bloodsucker pursued her way to Malta.

Here, at last, Sam was lucky enough to get information of the sailing of a Sicilian sparona bound for Catania, from which he was assured he could not fail to catch the regular passage-boat home. With many adieus and cordial invitations to the officers to beat up his quarters at Bastock Lodge, Sam betook himself to the St. Agata, with every prospect of a favorable voyage. The passengers consisted principally of invalid officers and soldiers, and Sam had the deck to himself. As night was coming on, a vessel about the same size as the St. Agata hove in sight, and, in passing, made a signal of distress, and begged some water, as their casks, they said, had all leaked out.

"Oh, give the poor devils some water," said Sam, as soon as he understood what they wanted. "Thirst is a horrible thing, especially of a morning, after dining out."

The strange vessel sent its barge; but no sooner had the crew got on board, than at the whistle of the villain who had mounted first, eight armed men started from the bottom of the boat, and, after a slight struggle, in which they shot two sailors, and threw the captain overboard, they gained possession of the St. Agata, and secured all the passengers below.

After being kept in confinement a long time, and sparingly fed on bread and water, they were landed one moonlight night, and marched into a dark cave among the rocks on the sea-shore. Sam's meditations here were by no means of a pleasing cast.

"Don't you think it a very hard case, sir?" he said to the officer who was chained to his wrist, and whose strength, after a severe fever in Malta, was scarcely able to support him under the treatment of his captors—"don't you think it a hard case to a middle aged man like me, that I should be moved about all over the world against my will, leaving the nicest cottage in England, and a lot of good fellows—to be first suspected of murdering somebody else, and then most likely to be murdered myself?"

"The last," replied the invalid, "we shall all undoubtedly be, as we are in the hands of the Greeks."

"Of the Philistines, you mean," said Sam; "but it's all one." While carrying on this melancholy conversation, they were suddenly startled by a great deal of firing, mixed with screams, and the other outcries which attend an onslaught.

"Mercy on us all!" said Sam, "what the deuce is to come next?"

"They are, most probably, murdering some other prisoners," replied his companion; "it will be our turn soon."

"Then, I'll take my oath, they shan't kill me like a sheep. I'll have a tussle for it, and if I get a right-hander on some of the scoundrel's breadbaskets, I'll make them know what it is to bully a free-born Englishman."

In a short time advancing steps were heard, and our bold Briton, supporting his companion to the mouth of the cave, stood in as Crib-like an attitude as his unencumbered hand could assume; and resolved to knock down the first man that entered.

They had not been long in this situation when they perceived that their place of confinement was left unguarded, and they were still more surprised, on proceeding a little way in front, to perceive the dead bodies of several of their captors, already partly stripped, while further down upon the beach they saw a large body of Turks forcing many of the unarmed natives on board of some vessels close in shore.

While congratulating themselves on this prospect of escape, and while they continued gazing on the scene before them, they were suddenly surrounded by a fresh body of Turks, and, without a word spoken on either side, they were conducted down the passes of the rocks, and conveyed on board.

"Worse and worse," sighed Sam, whom this last disaster reduced to complete despair. "It is my firm belief I am not Sam Holt of Bastock, but have changed places with the wandering Jew. Jack Thompson's prophecy is fulfilled, every bit of it."

But poor Sam's lamentations were of no avail. On the third day they were taken out of the vessel, and conveyed to shore. The unfortunate invalid, with whom Sam had been chained so long, appeared so ill after landing, that he was released from the fetters; and what become of him Sam never discovered.

Our friend, whose dress was of the most heterogeneous nature, consisting of whatever articles he could pick up—for, in all his misfortunes, his wardrobe was the first to suffer—was ranged along a wall, in a magnificent building, along with about forty others of all ages and countries. Many people, in strange dresses, with towels, as Sam expressed it, round their heads, passed and repassed them, looking narrowly at each. At last an old white-whiskered man, pointing with his finger to the still portly figure of our friend, entered into a conversation with the person who had conducted them to the place, and in a few minutes Sam was taken from the rest, and the old gentleman beckoning him to follow, walked majestically out of the building.

Poor Sam, who now felt himself to be a very different being from what he used to be, presiding over his well-filled table at Bastock Lodge, followed in the most submissive manner. His conductor paused at the door of a very stately edifice, and said a few words, which Sam did not understand, to a group of lounging domestics. Immediately three or four rushed forward, and seized violently hold of Sam, and carried him into the hall. There they let him stand for a few minutes, till the old gentleman who had preceded them, and who had gone into an inner apartment, returned, and spoke to them in the same language as before. Again they hurried Sam forward, and at last when they came to a pause, the astonished squire of Bastock had time to look round him.

Seated on a low, richly covered ottoman, was an old white-headed man, with a long pipe in his mouth; near him were several others, but evidently his inferiors—while, a little way from the raised floor on which they were sitting, was a multitude of soldiers, in such a uniform, and with such arms, as had never entered into Sam's imagination to conceive. While he was taking this survey the old gentleman, his conductor, bending to the very ground before the magnifico with the pipe, apparently directed his attention to Rosy Sam. Without casting his sublime eyes on so insignificant an object, the great man ordered the dragoman to discover who the stranger was. A young man now stepped forward, and addressed our friend in French.

"No, no—no parley vous," said Sam, who knew just enough of the sound to guess what language it was.

He next spoke in English, and said he was ready to report Sam's answers to the dignitary on the sofa.

"I say," said Sam, who had now recovered a little of his confidence from hearing his mother tongue once more, "who's the old covey in the dressing-gown? He seems a prime judge of tobacco."

The person alluded to scowled and said something to the interpreter, who turned to Sam, and said,

"His highness, the Reis Effendi, says you are a dog, and if you speak till you're spoken to, he will tear your tongue out, and cut off both your ears."

"He's curiously polite—but did you say he was the Rice Offendy?—ask him if he hasn't a brass gun upon wheels that kills sea-mews at a hundred and fifty yards."

The interpreter, probably not understanding Sam's language, or willing to screen him from his excellency's anger, said a few words, and promised obedience on the part of Sam.

The conversation went on.

"The Reis Effendi desires to know if you have any particular wish to be strangled?"

"Tell the Rice, that with his permission I would rather not, but am just as much obliged to him for his kind offer."

"His highness wishes to know if you have any objections to be beautifully dressed, well treated, made rich, and have eight wives supported for you at the sultan's expense?"

"Tell him," said Sam, quite delighted, "that he is a jolly old cock; that I accept his offer with all my heart; but as to the wives, I can't think of more than one or two at the very most."

"Will you turn mussulman to obtain all these advantages?"

"Mussulman? Ay, to be sure, I'm a devil of a fellow at all sorts of fish."

"Will you wear the turban, and swear by the prophet?"

"Turban? Yes—heaven bless you, what does it signify what a man wears? and as to swearing, 'gad I'll outswear you all for a hundred."

On the dragoman relating the result of the conversation, his highness deigned to cast eyes on the new believer, and at a nod several men stepped forward, and threw little jars of rose-water over his face and person; and immediately he was hurried into another apartment, stript by five or six zealous attendants, forced into a warm bath, which was richly perfumed, and after being rubbed and anointed, he was clothed in the splendid flowing robes, and ornamented with the glittering jewels of a Turkish basha. When he came into the anteroom, through which he had already passed, he recognized the old gentleman who had brought him to the palace, and beckoned him to come near.

"I say, old boy, what can be the meaning of all this? Are ye all mad, or only drunk?"

The old man bowed, and almost prostrated himself, but answered nothing.

"O, I see how it is," continued Sam. "Whereabouts is the dragoman? He's no great hand at English, poor devil, but he is better than none."

The dragoman appeared, and bending obsequiously, said,

"What is it your lordship's pleasure to do with your slave?"

"Pooh, lordship! nonsense, man. I say, Draggy, he's a comical old shaver, that Rice Offendy; and fought rather shy of answering us about the gun; for my own part, I think it's a lie of Jack Thompson's."

"Your lordship is too complaisant to your slave."

"Perhaps I should be if I had him; but we have no slaves. I have a servant, an old canting scoundrel, called Trusty Tommy; but pahaw! you know nothing about these things. Now, can you tell what they want me to do, for surely all this scrubbing and dressing can't be for nothing?"

"Your highness's escort is now, I believe, at the door. You are about to proceed as an ambassador from the sultan of the world to the pacha of Albania. Your highness is decorated with three tails."

"The devil a tail have they left me at all—not so much as a jacket—I feel for all the world as if I were in petticoats. Well, you say I go as ambassador to some gentleman in Albania. Is it a long journey?"

"Yes, it will be some time before your highness's return."

"For I was thinking," continued Sam, it would be as well, before I go to—how many wives did you say I was to have kept for me by the sultan?"

"There were eight destined to rejoice in your highness's smiles."

"The devil there were! But where do they hang out? They are, perhaps, ugly old frights."

"Beautiful as angels in paradise. But the sultan's orders are imperative. Your highness must not delay a single moment, but leave every thing till you return."

"Well, well, what must be, must." And Sam mounted a magnificent Arab, which was standing at the door, and set off with a large retinue of splendidly dressed warriors, while another interpreter rode close by his side. As he left the gate of the city, an officer stooped the cavalcade, and, with all due formalities, delivered a packet into the ambassador's hand. The interpreter told him to lay the packet on his head, for it was the firman of the sultan. In a short time the cortege passed on, and Sam had ample time to moralize on the mutability of fortune. Long before the journey was over, he was intimate with every man of the escort; and when, at length, on entering the Albanian territory, all except four left him, they took leave of him with so much appearance of regret, as evidently showed how much they liked their commander.

To be concluded in our next.

MARBLE FIRE-PLACES.—If you live in a house that has marble fire-places, never allow them to be washed with suds; this destroys the polish. They should be dusted, the spots taken off with a nice oiled cloth, and then rubbed dry with a soft rag.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

TO —.

I've gazed on forms, whose matchless mould
Seemed lent from perfect worlds above;
And yet my heart, unmoved and cold,
Felt not the glow of love.
And thus while others fondly praised
The glory and the grace of thine,
With stoic pride I careless gazed,
Nor bowed before thy shrine.

Nor was the spell that binds me now
A willing captive to thy thrall,
Born of the locks that round thy brow
In wreathed darkness fall;
Nor of the dimpled loveliness
Of cheeks as tinted, pure, and fair,
As the first rose that wakes to bless
The spring's maternal care.

Nor of the beams divinely bright,
That play within thy clear dark eyes;
Like starry brilliancies that light
The gloom of midnight skies;
Nor all thy dower of native charms,
Nor all thy trophies won from art,
Could furnish love with forceful arms
Against my guarded heart.

But when, like some frost-stricken flower,
The brightest in the fields of May,
Thy gentle sister, hour by hour,
Seemed fading fast away;
And thou with sleepless care forlorn
Didst watch beside her couch of pain,
From darkling eve till bright'ning morn,
From morn till eve again:

And when I heard the whispered prayer
Upwafted on each frequent sigh,
And marked the agonizing air
Of thine imploring eye;
I felt how passing far above
The worth of gold, and fame, and power,
Is woman's strong, undying love,
In sorrow's trying hour.

Then was ambition's towering helm
Struck down from manhood's passioned throne,
And o'er my heart's recovered realm
Love made thee queen alone.
And thou shalt reign, whatever lot
Be mine on time's eventful stream—
The theme of every waking thought,
And every visioned dream!

PROTEUS.

THE BROKEN VOW.

Lines addressed to one who will understand them.

Go, false one, go—and not one sigh
Shall pierce the heart that's free;
No tear again shall dim the eye,
That turns no more to thee;
A faithful heart cannot repine,
When freed from one as false as thine,
Whatever its fate may be;
My only shame is now, that e'er
I deem'd thee worthy of a tear.
Fool that I was! to let one thought
Of thee in fondness rise!
But it was frenzy, and it wrought
A blindness o'er my eyes;
I loved thee then with reckless love,
Which neither friends nor foes could move—
Such love is seldom wise—
But now I see thee as thou art,
And gladly throw thee from my heart.

Remember how in joy I stood,
Thy hand within my own,
Once in the green and spring-clad wood,
When we were there alone,
And there I listen'd to thy word,
And to thy vow, which angels heard,
Breathed in affection's tone,
That thou wouldst be forever mine,
Though earth against us should combine.

Remember what thy lips oft spake,
And sealed with solemn oath,
That none should tempt thee e'er to break
The tie that bound us both.
Where is thy truth, thou trait'ress! where?
That oath shall haunt thee in despair,
As falsehood ever doth;
And others now shall deal with thee,
Falsely as thou hast dealt with me.

Yes, thine shall be a hapless way,
For every joy will fade,
Where falsehood such as thine may stray,
With plighted faith betrayed;
I shall forget, and love again,
But thine is guilt's abiding stain,
Cold-hearted, faithless maid!
Nor will I envy him his rest,
Who slumbers on thy perjured breast.

THE CENSOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

No. 116.

THERE is no better remedy for low spirits than a walk to the summit of Weehawk hill on a fine May-morning, before breakfast. From the first turn of the steamboat-wheel, on the New-York side, to the white edifice, known by the name of the Mountain-house, it is a continual succession of the most agreeable views. On such a ramble, too, the observer meets with many pleasant surprises. Here a tree, budded with an unusual perfection; there a bush, painted with a richer green; in one place, a sweep of lawn, distinguished by verdure; in another a wood, deepened with picturesque shadows. There is a spot, half way up the hill, which commands a prospect to be remembered. You look down upon the city and harbor from an eminence, and catch, also, the graceful bends in the Jersey shore, on the south towards Hoboken. He must be a blind or a dull mortal, indeed, who can stand on this place, and not be filled with many serious and pleasant ideas. This beautiful combination of nature and art furnishes a double theme of reflection. He knows not which to admire most, the silver water sleeping at his feet, the shores of the two sister states, arrayed in all the graces of spring, and like lovely belles, vying with each other in charming the spectator; that splendid city, rising magnificently from the flood, its densely crowded roofs, and innumerable windows, and bristling spires glittering in the sun, or the many vessels, of every description, motionless on the tide, or busy around in ministering to her wants.

I had wandered up here early one morning, and being tired, sat down on a piece of broken rock, when I observed that the Little Genius was with me. He greeted me with a smile of irresistible sweetness.

"Dear spirit," said I.

I was going to express my delight and gratitude, when he placed his finger on his lip, and with a droll look, by which I saw he was meditating some odd caprice, he cut me short.

"Silence," said he, "and you shall learn something. There is in England at this moment a gay and learned young man. He has genius, wealth, and industry. Every one who knows him loves him; but, like you and all your fellow-creatures, Master Student, he has faults. Among these is a weakness in yielding to prejudices. It is the more excusable, although not the less productive of bad consequences, from the fact that it has its origin in honorable sentiments. His piety makes him think every Turk a villain, whereas some of them are very good, honest fellows, who know not what is comfortable. His patriotism causes him to believe whatever is said in favor of his own country or against another. He is distinguished in literature, and an able critic where his bigotry does not interfere."

"You draw a very common character," I said.

"But, in one respect," replied my companion, "a very weak one. He piques himself upon a general knowledge of the world, yet in his readings concerning your country he has only perused Hall, Faux, De Roos, and others of minor importance."

"I am told," I said, "that in Great Britain there are many such. What can be more ludicrous than for a foreigner, flying across a country, whose physical features he has scarcely time to see, whose institutions, laws, and moral peculiarities he has neither the leisure to examine, nor, from the opposite bias of his previous education and habits, without the greatest difficulty the intelligence to comprehend—what can be more absurd than the attempt of such a person to decide at a glance upon the character of the people, and the efficacy of their government? When I think of the blood which has been shed in founding these United States, of the many great and learned men, revered by all the world, whose wonderful genius has been exerted with so much care and toil, in creating those institutions, I cannot avoid smiling to behold nameless wandering adventurers passing opinions upon them so presumptuously, and reviewers at home, who even know less than their subjects, declaring all they say to be true. But what of the learned patriot, of whom you spoke?"

"He is this moment," said the Genius, "asleep in London. I caught him dozing over a book of American travels, and I will, if you wish, transport him here to this lovely shade. He is as raw about your country as any backwoodsman, and will afford us much amusement. When he awakes he will imagine it but a dream."

I was a good deal interested in the progress of this plan, when suddenly I found by my side a well-dressed, genteel-looking fellow, whose appearance immediately prepossessed me in his favor. I was particularly pleased with the glowing look with which he gazed around, and his enthusiasm in admiring what I myself had admired so much.

"What a superb scene!" he exclaimed. "What beautiful city lies yonder. From the course of those noble ships, spreading their white canvas to the breeze, I presume that distant strait leads out to some ocean; and there I behold others returning, like weary travellers, from their sea-beaten journey. Where can I be?"

"Saw you a ever scene more imposing?" said the Genius.

"No," replied the stranger. "Every thing bespeaks a nation wealthy and powerful. Yon gigantic ship of war rises from the wave like a castled rock, and from that forest of masts I see streaming the flags of every nation. Where out of England can exist a place so glorious?"

"Hast thou never read of such a place?"

"I have read of Grecian and Roman cities," replied the stranger,

"but this answers not the description in many particulars; nor am I acquainted with any book from which I could recognize this."

"You are in America."

The stranger stared.

"Let us pass over among the multitude," said the Genius.

We found ourselves in a church. It was crowded. An individual rose in the pulpit to address the throng. Every whisper was hushed; his words were listened to with stillness as profound as that of "summer's noon-tide air." Never were heard purer principles of morals delineated with greater power of language. The stranger was pale with the emotion which had been conjured up by the speaker.

"Who can he be?"

"It is Clanning," said the Genius.

On a sudden we stood before the Capitol at Washington. The stranger regarded it a moment, and seemed about to speak, but we passed into the senate chamber. An orator was addressing the assembly on the question of the Union. The stranger stood enchanted. It was Webster. He was delivering his glowing speech on the constitution.

"Is it possible there are such eloquent men in America?" exclaimed the stranger.

We walked through Broadway. A lovely girl was passing, when a drunken Swiss offered her a rudeness, and was in an instant prostrated by the arm of a gentleman who happened to be passing, and who scarcely staid to receive her thanks. The lady seemed frightened; and the stranger first addressed her—then admired—then fell in love.

"Upon my soul," said he, "I thought the American women were savages."

A company of the militia happened to march by, but the Genius turned away, in some confusion, and conveyed us all back again to Weehawk-hill.

"I'll tell you what," said the stranger, "I have not done you Americans justice in the articles which I have furnished the Quarterly on the subject. I am really ashamed of myself, and hereafter I promise —"

Just then he vanished from my sight; but I looked in the glass, and recognised him in a gentleman in a London apartment fast asleep, with Mr. Faux's book of travels on his lap, and a half-finished long article, made up from it, lying on the table.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

LETTER FROM SEDLEY.

I owe my acknowledgments to the editors of the Mirror for a sight of the letter from Lucy. The notice taken in it of my remarks on matrimonial felicity, although leaning towards censure, flatters me, to say nothing of the odd gratification I derive from being thus addressed anonymously. Scarcely any mental pleasure is more agreeable than the easy exercise of imagination; and epistles like the present, coming from we know not whom, awaken it gently, and employ it in drawing numerous conjectures touching the character, accomplishments, and appearance of the author. The penmanship of Lucy's letter is exceedingly neat and graceful, and I warrant has been exercised many a time and oft in confidential correspondence, that would make up as pretty an article for a weekly as the public could desire. Then the language is clear and modest, and verging slightly towards the sentimental. She has read Blair, and feels poetry; and sometimes lets a rare scene or a dear friend tempt her into a stanza of her own. There are verses at this moment lying in her portfolio. She reverences religion, but her piety is not austere or bigoted. It is tempered with cheerful feelings and a fervid love of nature. Her mind is now and then filled with lofty and melancholy thoughts; but they melt soon, and leave her susceptible to every pleasant influence, and she can be saucy when she has a mind, as is proved by the postscript, which rates you like schoolboys.

I shall beg your leave, gentlemen, to lay this document before the reader, assuring him that it is a real bona fide communication, and not one of those letters wicked editors sometimes insert, and which, like Watty's collar and ruffle in the play, are "all sham."

MESSRS. EDITORS—I belong to one of those fragment societies, formed by young ladies to contribute in relieving the distresses of the poor. Last week we met at the house of one of our most entertaining members. She is a bright, lively girl, and far more fond of talking than sewing. I like her the better for this, for I am always sure of having her to countenance me when I get a fit of idleness. That afternoon, I know not why, (and yet it's nothing unusual,) I felt in a particularly lazy mood; so I proposed reading aloud. "Here's the Mirror," said I, "and I have not seen it these three months; do let me read something from it." My friend, lovely Kate, gave an approving smile, and as I took it up, I glanced my eye over the pages, and caught the sight of "Matrimonial Felicity!" Now, Messrs. Editors, you know there's nothing girls like to hear of and talk about so much as matrimony, falling in love, and all that; so they were very clamorous for me to proceed. I read on uninterrupted, except by an occasional whisper for "cotton," "more silk, to finish the pin-cushion," or something of that nature, till I came to the conclusion of the last dialogue, so tenderly interspersed with "my dear;" and oh, gentlemen, if you could only have been ensconced behind the ample folds of the curtain, and heard the criticism passed on this unfortunate piece! They all declared, in the first place, it was too severe a cut for the wives; and as for the author, they were certain he was some selfish, disappointed old bachelor, totally wrapt up in himself, and who appeared delighted to seize every instance of an unhappy marriage, to strengthen him in his first resolution of bachelorship, and steel him against the fascination of some of his fair friends.

"Indeed," said Kate, putting her arm around me, and drawing me off the sofa, "I think there is a far greater number of good wives than husbands; men are so general in their admiration, they love so many; every new pretty face pleases them as well after as before marriage, and this cannot fail to make a sensitive woman wretched: one who has given all her love to the husband of her choice, and thinks but of him."

"Yes," said I, "this may be all very true, Kate, but they say such wives are very rare; that it is more frequently the fault of our sex, that the domestic heart is so seldom enlivened with gaiety, or sweetened by the social interchange of thought and feeling. It certainly is in the power of the wife to render her home either happy or miserable; and if she is a woman of principle, and even finds herself afterwards united to one not altogether such as she had expected, she will still appear cheerful; nay, make herself contented, and hide the disappointment deep in her own heart. Who could blame a husband for flying from his wife and family, if she received him coldly, languidly, and probably pouted at his lengthened absence, when, perhaps, that very time had been spent in toiling for her support. How different, dear Kate, is the conduct of the kind, affectionate wife. At the first sound of his footstep she hastens to meet him; her soft eyes, beaming with love, and her whole face brightening with delight. If chance, or the world's cares, have cast an unusual sadness over his brow, how quickly she notices the change; and then how sweetly, how kindly she soothes him!"

"Oh! how I love such a woman," said Kate; "and even among my limited circle of young friends, I know at least a dozen girls who would prove the fondest, most devoted wives; they are talented, warm-hearted, and elevated in their feelings; and gentle, sweet in disposition; but these very girls are of such retiring manners, either from natural inclination, poverty, or other insurmountable obstacles, that they have no opportunity of being known to intelligent, refined men, and will probably throw themselves away on beings altogether unworthy of them, incapable of appreciating their fine qualities. And do you know, Lucy," continued she, "it often makes me feel sad to hear any one of these dear girls picture such a bright happiness for her future life; and express the pure, exquisite joy she would feel in loving one, and being all the world to that one! I tremble, and think how very soon her early dream will pass away. But, pahaw! I'm getting sentimental. Let's join the girls."

As you probably care little about hearing any more of our idle chit-chat, I bid you adieu; not forgetting, however, to express our regret that Sedley is so unfortunate as never to have met with the fairest, the sweetest among our sex, and so ungenerous as to instance a weak, ill-natured wife, as an example of the whole. With profound respect, yours,

LUCY.

P. S. We do not care whether you honor this with a space in your paper, or not. It was meant, Messrs. Editors, only to let you know some of our thoughts on the matter. Perhaps—and if we feel very much inclined—we will let you take another peep in upon our little sewing party.

L.

This letter reflects very prettily the image of a young mind, full of the pure thoughts and aspirations of woman, before time has taught her the true character of the world. She has evidently caught her ideas from books, not from experience. Twenty years from this time she will look back upon this letter, and shake her head demurely, and not without a sigh, at the recollection of the present days. I do not prophesy that she will be unhappy, only that she will be changed. I wish I had been behind the curtain during the animadversions on my piece, to have heard the sage remarks of a circle of innocent and inexperienced girls, who, being young and unmarried, must know a vast deal about the matter. I cannot refrain, however, from a retaliatory criticism of Lucy's composition; and being kindly disposed towards her, will afford her the benefit of my opinions; so patience, my fair incognito, and I will be brief as possible.

In the first place, you confess that it is not unusual with you to fall into a fit of idleness. A cause no more important than that sometimes shakes the fabric of a husband's love. Sentiment and romantic ideas are appropriate and pretty, during the agreeable days of courtship, but by and by they come to be mixed up with common-place thoughts. Dinners must be cooked, stockings mended, the house kept neat, bills paid, calls answered, civilities extended where the husband's friendships are concerned, a thousand little duties of a trifling nature individually, but of great value in the aggregate, must be performed. They are groveling perhaps, but must, nevertheless, be attended to. Their omission creates annoyance, that produces ill-humor, which leads to murmurs, replies, and ungentle words and looks, and so the altercation is begun.

That whispering for "cotton" and "more silk" while one is reading aloud, is abominable. How the beauty of a glowing thought is marred by having its climax capped with the word "pin-cushion." But as you met together for the purpose of sewing, and reading at that time was but a subordinate occupation, perhaps those interruptions could not well be avoided.

Your friend Kate falls into a natural error in saying that there is "a far greater number of good wives than husbands," and I smiled when I read her reasons for thinking so. "Men are," she says, "so general in their admiration—they love so many—every new pretty face pleases them, as well after as before marriage." Certainly it does, and why not? It is the too refined conception of wedded happiness; the expectation of any thing contrary to this that makes so many disappointed wives and provoked husbands. "Sensible women" should not suffer themselves to be wretched from so unworthy a cause. What spell is upon a man after the marriage ceremony has taken place, to divest him of a taste for beauty of any description? Lucy must not think I confound admiration of beauty with love of the possessor. I am afraid, however, Kate, whom I like much in the description, would be, as many others are, too tenacious of her influence over her husband, if she would not let him admire a pretty face. She might, on the same principle, be offended when he gazed on a lovely painting or statue, although but a fancy piece. I remember a couple who quarreled seriously, exactly from this cause. The wife would not have her husband admire any thing but herself. At a party in the theatre one night, I looked a long time in vain for the cause of her being suddenly agitated with unhappiness, till I found her unconscious lord gazing intently at an actress through the opera glass. She turns reproachful glances at him when he meets a friend with lively pleasure, because she thinks her society ought to be sufficient for his amusement. He cannot spend an hour in the city library with her knowledge, without offending her; and when he reproves her mildly, and reasons with her, she falls to crying, and says it's all for the love of him, which being only the truth, he shuts his mouth, and looks like a sad fool.

Love alone never can insure tranquil contentment. It must be tempered with a conviction of the frailties of human nature, and the many chances there are against any two mortals living together long in a state of perfect agreement. It must be willing to sacrifice something for the sake of preserving the rest; as mariners, in a tempest at sea fling a portion of the cargo overboard in order to save the remainder. I do not think all married people unhappy; and the character so offensive to Lucy's ideas of the reality, was not drawn as a representative of the whole, but of a class. I do not believe, however, the majority of marriages happy. Too many accidental combinations are necessary. It was my intention to make a rough calculation, but I find it very well done to my hand in the Boston Literary Magazine, a monthly work, of which only one number has been published. As it is not at all known yet, I extract something from its pages. It is, perhaps, a little ill-natured, but there is, nevertheless, much truth in it.

"When I was young, and my imagination somewhat bewildered by reading novels, I fancied, that to be married was to regain paradise. But wishing to convince myself by critical observation whether the mass of married people were well matched, and happy in each other, I set off in disguise, and visited more than fifty families, part in the city, and part in the country. I spent not less than two days, nor more than ten, at any place. I pretended to be a simple love-crazed child, and found but little difficulty in gaining admittance. I had writing materials with me, and took a hasty sketch of each family.

"The following are the remarks I made upon a part of the families, in the order that I visited them. Years have passed since. No one can now be injured by their publication, and they may, in some measure, correct the erroneous impressions that are made upon the minds of young people by the reading of novels.

"1. Old people. The man grumbling—sour and savage; the wife clever and simple, and an everlasting talker. I heard her husband say, 'her tongue will never cease; she will surely talk me to death.'

"2. Middle-aged. The man, a poor hen-pecked thing, has to do and go, fetch and carry, just as his wife tells him; she is a good manager, but void of all noble or generous feelings. Her parents had 'a more splendid trough, and a wider sty' than his, and she frequently reminds him of it, that he may not forget that he is a grade below her.

"3. Middle aged. The husband a brute and a tyrant; the wife a beautiful flower trampled in the dust.

"4. Young people. The husband a rough, uncultivated, unfeeling sot; the wife a fine, intelligent, but heart-broken woman.

"5. Old people. The husband an uncultivated, but kind, good-natured man; the wife a superior woman. She manages her husband in every thing, yet in such a kind, complying manner, that he believes he has the reins of government in his own hands. 'Her children rise up and call her blessed, her husband also praiseth her.'

"6. Young people. The husband wild and enthusiastic, but active and intelligent; the wife a pretty, harmless, inanimate thing. She gazes upon her beautiful child as unmoved as a marble statue. Surely this woman does not possess so much as animal instinct.

"7. The husband, a great lazy boy of five-and-thirty, spends most of his time in playing checkers with other boys of his own age; the wife, a clever, strong, able-bodied woman, takes care of the barn, chops wood, tends the children, and waits upon the great boy that is tied to her, like a good obedient wife.

"8. Two infernal spirits confined in vehicles of flesh, and fastened together, to be a mutual torment to each other.

"9. The husband, a very handsome man—a great dandy, and too much in love with his pretty self to feel interested for any one else, (as if a handsome man without a mind was anything more than a handsome horse;) the wife rather plain in her appearance, but a woman of fine talents and pleasing manners, but ashamed of her mate.

"11. A young couple just married. The husband a fond silly thing; the wife ditto.

"12. I had some difficulty in getting in here. The man sent me to his wife. I had to tell her a most doleful story to prevail on her to take me in for a week. The husband is a weak, silly, good-natured, passionate man; the wife an uncomfortable, vexatious, tantalizing, jealous, fretful, disagreeable woman.

"13. The man a brainless fop, and struts about like a great turkey; the woman jealous, peevish, and restless—reproaches her husband for having married her for her property—tells him that he neglects her—reminds him of all the kind foolish things he used to say to her in their days of courtship, and always finds something to fret about or complain of.

"14. The husband a kind, generous man; the wife a fascinating, accomplished woman. They are not happy. She had imbibed erroneous ideas of conjugal felicity. She did not consider that the descriptions of married life in novels were ideal, and nothing like the sad realities of life. She says that there are a thousand things to try people in the married state, that the young never dream of.

"15. The husband good-natured and amiable; the wife a high-bred, intelligent woman, yet cold, haughty, and selfish. She carries with her a lock of hair that once belonged to a former husband, which she sometimes shows to him, telling him that she loves that better than his whole body.

"16. The man a lazy, awkward, ill-natured fellow; the woman an excellent housewife, and an everlasting scold—has enough to make any woman scold.

"17. An old bachelor, sour and sad. Regrets that he was not married when young; says that he would rather have a wife, though she were forever scolding, than to live so lonely.

"18. The husband a highly-gifted, noble-minded man; the wife a lively, generous, sensible, interesting woman. The minds of both are well cultivated, and their feelings warm and enthusiastic. Their love is pure and holy, and they are happy in themselves and in each other."

HUMORS OF A YOUNG MAN ABOUT TOWN.

NUMBER SIX.

To wed, or not to wed—that is the question,
Whether 'tis better singly thus to suffer
The taunts and jeerings of outrageous spinsters,
Or to take heart, and with some lovely scoffer
At Hymen's altar end them.

SUCH, after seeing Kean's inimitable Hamlet last evening, were my reflections, as, stepping out of bed this morning, I rested my hand inadvertently upon a comely, comfortable-looking little volume, entitled "Domestic Happiness Portrayed, or a Repository for those who are, and those who are not married," which my landlady, (bless her soul, she is not yet five-and-forty,) had left upon my dressing-table. The poor bachelors! how various are the stratagems to win them from their boasted freedom, and break them in to the great uses of society! They were restive under the last attempt—that of General M'Clure, to tax the luxury of celibacy, and the enemy has, therefore, in this instance, gone more insidiously to work. The book before us, contains all the good things that have been or may be said in favor of the married state, and—not one against it. We have new essays, and old essays, with the arguments in its favor; new disquisitions, and old disquisitions, upon the happiness of which it is the cause; and new recipes and old recipes for avoiding or correcting the evils that are incident to it. There are several well written papers from American pens, and gleanings from the British classics, from the days of Addison down to ours, so that nothing more can be said upon the subject, unless upon the other side. As that never ought to be said, we take the liberty of summing up in favor of the affirmant, with due allowances for ex parte statements. The fact is, that in this country, such an engine against celibacy is hardly yet needed to be brought into play: no one thinks here of remaining single after five-and-thirty, unless he intends to travel, or some smouldering affair of the heart puts him hors du combat in matrimonial matters. Such Geraldine—

"Once fondly loved, and still remembered dear"—

such as flickers in the breast of him who trifles here. Adored Geraldine!—thou who, when life was new, didst cheat my mind of all its powers—my soul of all its tenderness; stole me from my studies and my sports, and haunting with thine image each chamber of my heart, makes the lone mansion tenantless; even while I write, do thy radiant features shine through the mist of years upon my paper, lovely as when first I worshipped them. Beautiful Geraldine! years have passed away since that delicious season, and time, who has sown his threads of gray among my raven locks, must ere this have thinned thy golden tresses, yet still the same unchanged—unchangeable—still, still, I love.

Pshaw! I shall never get on at this rate. To return to our mutt. We have no club-houses here as in London, where for a tithe of the expense single men can enjoy agreeable society and most of the comforts and more than the elegancies of home; nor have we yet that variety of amusements which fill up a man's leisure time in Paris from one end of the year to the other, and form a fascinating substitute for the enjoyments of a domestic fireside. We have not even the bustle of business and the solace of money-making to compensate the forlorn bachelor for the want of a home, after he has exhausted the few means of killing time without torture, which our cities afford. He may be in business, it is true; but who patronizes, who trusts him? Merchants are not eager to form connections with one who has not taken root in the community; lawyers would rather share their business with those whose affairs are more closely interwoven with the ramifications of society; churches will not call one to be the father of a flock who cannot claim the reverence due to paternity; and though the stalwart bachelor may walk the hospital till he looks like some anatomical preparation, it is out of the question to call him in as a family physician so long as he is single. If an editor, he may, to be sure—what with stirring news, animated politics, and showers of new publications—slip along well enough; but, owing to the causes above-mentioned, even this favored class of mortals are likely to be forsaken by their kind as they advance in life, for bachelors are notorious deserters of their own ranks; and the sworn fellowship of those they leave behind weighs not a feather with them when they turn Benedicts, and go over to the enemy! No; there is no question, but that in this country a publication of the kind before us, is entirely a work of supererogation, or, rather, a piece of mischievous cruelty, in the pictures of married bliss it draws, offered to the fated single. The dissertations upon the choices of a partner for life, however, with the observations upon general deportment between married parties, may not be thrown away. If it be true, as a general remark, that the sum of human happiness is made up of trifles, the observation more particularly holds good with regard to the intercourse of two people who are inseparably connected, and constantly in each other's society. Great sacrifices are seldom required, but habitual courtesy, toleration of each other's caprices and peculiarities, and consideration for mutual weaknesses, must all be exercised; and these constitute that real politeness, that benevolence of manner, which, founded on good sense and good feeling, may exist alike in every class of society, though its counterfeit is rarely found but in the highest. Few men, it must be confessed, with more solid or dazzling qualities, possess such qualifications for a husband, in the perfection of a Sir Charles Grandison.

Shocking as it may seem to the young and fair reader, we do not believe that there are more than a dozen such men in the world, and they, alas! are only to be found in novels. Take two or three of the best husbands in town, and how near do they come to such a model? Sam Cypher, to his former celebrity as a man of letters and lover of the fine arts, has long since added the reputation of being the best husband in the world. He not only never goes to a party without Mrs. C., but he cannot look in at a play, or witness, with other savans, the triumph of chemistry in fire eating, without taking her with him. Sam, being a naturalist, was dying to see the ourang-outang; but he never called upon that interesting female, as his wife would not accompany him. This may really arise from conjugal tenderness, though ill-natured people attribute it to certain other causes, when they hear him called a pattern of a husband. Those who are so uncharitable, might with equal reason have sneered at the extreme facility of his tamper in other respects. He gave up breakfasting in his slippers, for instance, at the request of his wife, a few days after he was married, without a struggle; and since then has distinguished himself upon the annals of good-natured men by several important concessions. Notwithstanding the authority of Jonathan Oldbuck for being a monarch in his study, he allowed the womenkind, as the antiquarian calls them, to drag him from that fastness when Mrs. Cypher gave her first ball; and turning it into a temporary conservatory, send his books, papers, and collections into the garret, and supply their place with plants hired from Thorburns for the occasion. Nor was this excruciating test of Sam's equanimity all that was required of him. He was equal to the occasion, however, and without a murmur took the children, and slept at a relation's, when his bed-chamber and their nursery were turned into card-rooms, upon the same memorable evening. Let it not be suspected, however, that Cypher wants spirit from thus submitting to such invasion of his comforts. Not at all. He has been known to dine at Delmonico's, without previously sending word home; and once, upon a call of business, he actually visited the Springs without his wife! It was at mid-winter. In short, though Cypher makes such a figure aside of his wife that he really stands for nothing, yet nothing is lost by having his existence so merged in hers; for, counting the lady one, they together form a lively personification of that figure in cabinet literature, called a "unanimous unit." As for Ned Manly, he deserves not half the credit the world gives him for being so domestic as he is. Manly is fond of music, and likes to have his old friends about him. The secret of his being so much at home is, that his wife keeps up her practice of the first, and cheerfully makes up a hand at whist when the last drop in of an evening. Nor, on the other side, was poor Rashton so much to blame for the domestic explosion that broke up his housekeeping. If he was too attentive to the family mantua-maker, his wife, it must be allowed, was in fault, by setting him an example of misplaced familiarity, when she made a companion of the retailer of thread and gossip, and passed the morning in listening to her tattle about wild young A. the old Miss B. and those strange people the C.'s, in all of whose families the mischief-maker had used well her opportunities for laying in a stock of the small wares of scandal. Upon the whole, judging from these instances, and the many we have in reserve, it must be concluded that a man's domestic habits are determined almost entirely by the character and manners of the females of his family, and depend upon their ability and disposition to make home agreeable. In the same manner that the influence of woman has caused the retiring disposition and accomplished habits formed to grace a home, in the first character we have noticed, to be squandered and lost in his wife's passion for fashionable notoriety, that influence in the case of Manly has changed a convivial bachelor into a home-cheering husband; and the vulgar taste of a silly woman, in that of Rashton, has led on an amiable but weak man to what the coldness of his temperament would never have betrayed him into. "Domestic happiness" is to be "portrayed" then, not in set and formal lines of duty; not with the pen of a mannerist or pedant—more cold and prosaic even than that which is here so feebly employed in a glowing cause—but in the uncertain and varying bounds of woman's temper and attractions, and with a pencil so delicate, warm, and discriminating, that it can detect color, and distinguish each peculiarity of manner, shade of feeling, and trait of character; and all the rules the accumulated wisdom of sages could make upon the subject would not be worth as much as the native tact of the sex, when prompted by the heart.

To the ladies, then, I again commit these matters, with an earnest apology for having taken them out of their hands even for a moment, while indulging in these rambling observations; regarding which, despite the erratic course they have taken, the ingenious reader has, no doubt, discovered that, like Hamlet's madness, they have method in them. RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

PITCAIRN'S ISLAND AND OTAHEITE.

NUMBER thirty-one of the Family Library. A very valuable and interesting volume, by John Barrow, Esq. with plates. Its reputation is established in England. Every one will read it with pleasure. Publishers, brothers Harper. The various maritime expeditions of discovery, undertaken by powerful civilized nations, have led to incidents characterized at once by the deepest interest and the wildest romance. The extraordinary occurrences related in this work are of the strangest cast, one of which is the narrative of the discovery of the mutineers, including the account of the mutiny on board the ship Bounty. We subjoin an extract, relative to the criminals in that transaction, many years after the perpetration of the deed, and the discovery of the last one on a lonely and beautiful island in the Pacific.

"Twenty years had passed away, and the Bounty, and Fletcher Christian, and the piratical crew that he had carried off with him in that ship, had ceased to occupy a thought in the public mind. Throughout the whole of that eventful period, the attention of all Europe had been absorbed in the contemplation of 'enterprises of great pith and moment'—of the revolutions of empires—the bustle and business of warlike preparations—the movements of hostile armies—battles by sea and land, and of all 'the pomp and circumstance of glorious war.' If the subject of the Bounty was accidentally mentioned, it was merely to express an opinion that this vessel and those within her had gone to the bottom, or that some savage islanders had inflicted on the mutineers that measure of retribution so justly due to their crime. It happened, however, some years before the conclusion of this war of such unexampled duration, that an accidental discovery, as interesting as it was wholly unexpected, was brought to light, in consequence of an American trading vessel having, by mere chance, approached one of those numerous islands in the Pacific, against whose steep and iron-bound shore the surf almost everlastingly rolls with such tremendous violence as to bid defiance to any attempt of boats to land, except at particular times and in very few places.

"The first intimation of this extraordinary discovery was transmitted by Sir Sidney Smith from Rio Janeiro, and received at the Admiralty on the fourteenth of May, 1809. It was conveyed to him from Valparaiso by Lieutenant Fitzmaurice, and was as follows:

"Captain Folger, of the American brig Topaz, of Boston, relates, that upon landing on Pitcairn's Island, in lat. 25° 2' S., long. 130° W., he found there an Englishman, of the name of Alexander Smith, the only person remaining of nine that escaped in his majesty's late ship Bounty, Captain W. Bligh. Smith relates that, after putting Captain Bligh in the boat, Christian, the leader of the mutiny, took command of the ship, and went to Otaheite, where great part of the crew left her, except Christian, Smith, and seven others, who each took wives, and six Otaheitan men-servants, and shortly after arrived at the said island, (Pitcairn,) where they ran the ship on shore, and broke her up; this event took place in the year 1790.

"About four years after their arrival (a great jealousy existing), the Otaheitans secretly revolted, and killed every Englishman except himself, whom they severely wounded in the neck with a pistol ball. The same night the widows of the deceased Englishmen arose, and put to death the whole of the Otaheitans, leaving Smith the only man alive upon the island, with eight or nine women and several small children. On his recovery, he applied himself to tilling the ground, so that it now produces plenty of yams, coconuts, bananas, and plantains; hogs and poultry in abundance. There are now some grown-up men and women, children of the mutineers, on the island, the whole population amounting to about thirty-five, who acknowledge Smith as father and commander of them all; they all speak English, and have been educated by him (as Captain Folger represents) in a religious and moral way.

"The second mate of the Topaz asserts that Christian, the ringleader, became insane shortly after their arrival on the island, and threw himself off the rocks into the sea; another died of a fever before the massacre of the remaining six took place. The island is badly supplied with water, sufficient only for the present inhabitants, and no anchorage.

"Smith gave to Captain Folger a chronometer, made by Kendall, which was taken from him by the governor of Juan Fernandez."

THE AMERICAN PORTRAIT GALLERY.

From the press of Peabody and Co. A work which, from the excellence of the plan, the skill of the artists, and the knowledge and ability of the editor, Mr. Samuel L. Knapp, must be popular. The work will appear in numbers, the present being the first of the series. It contains lithographic portraits of Washington, John Smith and Columbus. We wish it success. It certainly deserves it.

THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL PULPIT.

A monthly publication, containing select original sermons, by clergymen of the Protestant Episcopal Church. The present is the second and third numbers of the second volume, from the press of John Moore. Many chaste and elegant compositions are here given. The impression before us is enriched with one from the pen of the late Bishop Hobart and the present Bishop Onderdonk; also one from the pen of the Rev. William L. Johnson.

ROMER'S ILIAD.

Mr. J. D. Ogilby is the editor of an edition of this poem in the original. His object is to bring it more within the compass of the reader's understanding, by a substitution of improved English notes for the usual voluminous Latin commentaries. Learners will, doubtless, find an advantage in using Mr. Ogilby's edition, and proprietors of schools in recommending it to their classes.

THE NORTH AMERICAN ARITHMETIC.

One of that class of useful and greatly improved school-books, on the admirable plan of Pestalozzi. Lincoln and Edmonds, Boston, publishers.

IN PRESS.—"Stanley Buxton, or the Schoolfellows;" by John Galt, Esq.; two volumes. "The Records of a Good Man's Life;" by Rev. C. B. Taylor, M.A. author of "May you like it."—Harpers, publishers.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

NOTICE OF THE LATE WILLIAM SLOSSON.

It has been the misfortune of our city, within a few years, to lose some of the most valuable members of its bar; and the sympathy of the profession has been feelingly called forth and expressed at these repeated bereavements. The name of William Slosson has been lately added to these melancholy mementos of departed worth.

Mr. Slosson belonged to the elevated rank of his profession, and had, by years of laborious application, prepared himself for the discharge of its highest duties. He was from early life an indefatigable student, patient and unwearied in research. Law was with him pursued as a science, its principles thoroughly investigated, and then applied to the purposes of professional employment. His mind also, from its habits of deep reflection and meditation, was admirably fitted for comprehending and developing whatever might be abstruse or complex, in what is usually termed the mazes of the law.

As an advocate, he was listened to by the bench with great respect, not only for his learning, but for the able deductions of his own mind, and its clear exposition of the merits of any case which was the subject of its investigation. The researches of learning were but auxiliary to the resources of his own intellect, and helped to illustrate those conclusions which had already been formed by a sound and discriminating judgment.

There was nothing in the address of Mr. Slosson glowing or impassioned. He was not what might be termed a persuasive speaker, nor did he seek the aid of any thing adventitious to accomplish his object. His aim was not to make a lodgment upon the feelings, but to enlist on his side the understanding of his hearers, and to that his strength was invariably and successfully applied. Yet though he might not be considered as cultivating the graces of eloquence, there was a peculiar earnestness and sincerity of manner which riveted the attention of a jury, while a power of condensed reasoning and argument usually carried conviction to their minds. As he strongly felt the conclusions to which he had brought himself, and as forcibly portrayed them, it was but rarely that he failed in impressing them as strongly upon others.

To these acquisitions of forensic knowledge, he also added the treasures of classical learning. Though in a great measure a self-taught scholar, he was well acquainted with the Greek and Roman languages and with their varied literature. These studies he pursued with ardor and enthusiasm. They had been the peculiar delight of his youth, and they continued to beguile what little time could be spared from the cares and perplexities of an extensive professional business. It is remarked of him, by the late N. H. Carter, in his published letters from Europe, who traveled with him through a part of Italy, (which he visited a few years since, in search of health,) that his depth of erudition, considering the known labors of his professional life, had been remarked by him with perfect astonishment. "If," said he, "a hill or a stream, a plant or ruin chanced to suggest an idea in a Roman historian, orator, or poet, he would not only give chapter and verse, but repeat the passage in the language of the author. In the course of our rambles, whole pages of Livy, Caesar, Tacitus, Cicero, Virgil, and others were poured forth without effort, as if nothing was necessary but to hoist the flood-gates of memory." Upon his return, it was one of his fondest recollections, to dwell on the hours he had passed in those classic regions; to express the mixed feelings of veneration and delight, awakened amid the seats of ancient learning, and to contrast the glory of the past with the present sad monuments of their departed greatness.

With these habits and acquisitions, which so peculiarly fitted Mr. Slosson for the duties of an accomplished advocate, he also possessed great intellectual purity. Though in his disposition courteous, yet his manners, from a life of close and retired application, were rather formal, and to some appeared constrained; but within the exterior there was a warmth and goodness of heart, which made him the delight of his family, and endeared him to those who intimately knew him. Frank and candid, his opinion could be implicitly relied on for its sincerity. It was this virtue which especially recommended him to those who sought his professional aid, and he was as much relied on for the disinterestedness as the soundness of his advice. His conduct was ever subservient to the integrity of his character, for there was a correctness of purpose which distinguished all his actions.

The writer of these remarks knew him from youth up, intimately and thoroughly. His character had been uniform. His path was that of undeviating rectitude; and his life was an example of integrity and truth. I.

A BACCHANALIAN SCENE.

"Quite well at ten,
A few friends to sup with me;
Queer at eleven,
At twelve all up with me."

I was the other evening ushered by a friend towards an upper room of the G— hotel. The apartment was brilliantly lighted—sounds of music came from the windows—a couple of shillings furnished us with as many tickets, which entitled us to enter. I followed my companion to the spot whence proceeded the sound of merry voices, singing with a pure spirit-stirring brogue, an Irish glee. On opening the door an odd scene broke upon my sight. Two or three hundred persons were in the room, sitting at small tables, each of which could accommodate four. Most of the assemblage had their hats on, and seeking nothing but ease in the disposition of themselves, were grouped in every possible manner. One table I would find loaded down with the feet of the four persons who sat around it—each with a lighted cigar in his mouth, and a glass of punch in his hand. On another were piled the hats and punch of those around, and on a third the occupants beat their applause. At the head of a long table which ran across one end of the room, sat mine host. He was exactly fitted to preside over such a scene. I never saw good humor personified until then. I despair of giving any idea of his broad, jovial countenance, where the rose of the carbuncle, the purple of good living, and the amaranthine hue of a hundred wine cups, bloomed side by side. It was a face "to look upon," not describe. He was called upon for a song, a moment after my entrance, and I prepared myself for a hearty laugh. But in a voice soft and sweeter far than any I had before heard, he commenced the beautiful song "Bring Flowers," the words by Mrs. Hemans. When he had finished, with a most ludicrous cock of the eye, and twist of his face, he called upon a man at the other end of the room for "Teddy Rowe." The person thus designated was the exact counterpart of mine host. He was a long, lank, methodical looking Yankee. The straight black hair combed down smoothly over his forehead, almost concealed the small black eyes which were generally moving restlessly around the room, but which ever and anon were turned up towards heaven, giving to his long and narrow face a devout and sanctified appearance, which Lorenzo Dow himself might envy. The call for "Teddy Rowe," produced an instantaneous and entirely new change in his countenance. In a moment all appearance of sanctity had departed. By some extraordinary power over his muscles, he would first draw his mouth on one side of his face, and after singing with it there awhile, he would twist it around on the other. His whole countenance assumed an expression of humor that is indescribable, and with a brogue as pure as was ever given to a son of the Emerald Isle, he went through with his ditty. Call succeeded call, and the song, the glee, and the jest went merrily around. We left them at ten o'clock in the height of their mirth. An hour since I was shocked by the intelligence that the jovial host who had presided was dead. He passed away in a short time, after the breaking up of the party, at his supper table. Poor fellow! his death, after all, was like his life—a happy one. He died while the smile was yet on his lip, while the jest was struggling for utterance: and while his heart was still warm with kindly feeling, and glowing with the praise which tingled in the parting adieu of his friends, the cold finger of death touched it, and it withered.

This sketch may be deemed trivial by some, but there must be many who will recognize, even in my imperfect portrait, the features of a late merry and music-loving promoter of good fellowship, who by means of his jest and song, and with the aid of one or two of his friends, attracted large numbers of young men every Friday evening. One beholds strange scenes sometimes in a city, where death and revelry walk hand in hand, startling the thoughtful observer by their discordant notes.

THE DRAMA.

THE NEW-YORK STAGE, ETC.

Mrs. Austin is warbling at the Park theatre, where a succession of delightful operas are delightfully sustained. The "Rent-day," the striking new drama so successful at the American, is also to be performed here.

Miss Vincent has made an impression at the American theatre, and attracted unusual houses. She deserves her success. Her Clari is, in many respects, a very effective piece of acting; and her girlish and graceful appearance prepares every one to be indulgent.

Mr. Charles Kean is at the Walnut-street theatre, and Mr. Sinclair and Mrs. Knight at the Arch-street, Philadelphia.

At Covent-garden Miss Fanny Kemble, in her own tragedy of Francis the First, is much noticed, and praised by the critics; and Sheridan Knowles's new play, the Hunchback, has also been greatly admired.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE F. MORRIS, THEODORE S. PAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, MAY 19, 1832.

State of Europe.—The accounts from Europe are appalling. Paris seems to have fallen into the hands of demons. A more melancholy picture of human wretchedness it is seldom our lot to contemplate. The passions of mankind appear bursting out with fearful impunity. Commerce suffers the severest restrictions; the claims of justice are disregarded in the general anarchy; and religion is but a jest. The many various forms in which the consequences of such a state of society must fall on the people, and which are too numerous and complicated to be described and brought within the imagination of the ordinary observer, must be unfavorable to virtue as it is to happiness. Scenes of individual distress are merged in the general misery, as a wounded and dying soldier is overlooked in the din of a great battle; but much, nevertheless, there must be to claim the sympathy, and excite the horror of the philanthropist. But the misfortunes of these countries are not confined even to the tempestuous passions of the inhabitants. Nature adds her angry visitations to carry mourning and pain into every bosom. The cholera is extending its ravages, and earthquakes have been felt in several sections of Italy. The Parisians are also terrified with rumors that the wines and springs of the city have been poisoned by order of the government. Tumults are continually breaking out between the troops and the people of Italy and France, in which the unarmed and affrighted citizens fall by the musketry of the soldiers; and a recent journal states, that a large number of individuals are ranging through Paris, knocking down with clubs, and misusing in the most brutal manner even unoffending strangers, and that for this violence there is no redress.

In reading over the European journals one thought must strike every American mind. While we sympathize with the multitudes of our fellow-creatures who are suffering the evils resulting from corrupt governments and a luxurious aristocracy, a silent feeling of gratitude rises in every heart, that a broad ocean rolls between us and them. While we are happily cut off from a participation in their fatal disorders, we may read in the narrative of their sufferings many a lesson which should be treasured up, and forever acted upon by our own people. The character of Europe has ever been that of a licentious profligate. Her kings and conquerors have often been tyrants and fools; her queens criminal and unprincipled; her ministries venal, ambitious, and destitute of philanthropy; her laws narrow, and calculated to trample down human rights; her institutions tending to foster learning among a few, and keep the many in darkness. The people have too often submitted to every species of indignity. Liberty has struggled abroad with nearly the whole influence of Europe, if not all the moral force of the globe against her; and every step of her advance has been in blood. History is full of monstrous incidents. It has never been reviewed. It ought to be. No one in Europe could do it. It must be regarded from a loftier point of moral elevation than can be assumed even by the enlightened writers of that land. The simple principle of equality is there a theme of ridicule; and it is a dogma of European politics, not wholly excluded from our own, that the human neck was formed by nature for the yoke. What would be a more interesting enterprise for a great author than to analyze the history of Europe, from the earliest authentic accounts to the present day; and to measure the actions and characters there recounted and described, according to the standard of abstract morality? We do not refer to the people. It is in their behalf that we speak. It is against them that the systems of oppression has been directed by governments. How grateful should we be to Providence, that the clouds charged with thunder, which are rolling across the empires and kingdoms of Europe, have not as yet reached our atmosphere, whose serenity remains unobscured; that all our rights are distinctly defined and ably protected; that peace is by the domestic hearth, and in the harvest field; that our youth are not torn from their families, to serve the bloody purposes of any dazzling madman; that the sound of civil discord does not startle us from our sleep; that we do not awaken in the morning to find our streets washed with the gore of our fellow-citizens, massacred by hireling butchers; but that, instead of these, law is predominant over brute force, and tranquillity and plenty bless us on every side.

These are favors not fully appreciated; they should make us love our native land and respect her laws; and cause us to be ever on the alert to guard that freedom and wealth, which we possess over every other country on the globe.

New-York Marble Cemetery.—It was but recently that interments were allowed to take place in the yards attached to the churches in various parts of the city. This was found productive of consequences deleterious to health, which will easily be conceived from the fact that the enclosure alone, adjoining Trinity church, contains the relics of about two hundred and fifty thousand human beings. A law was therefore obtained to prevent the increase of an evil so palpable, and prohibiting burials within certain limits, under heavy penalties. This has caused the construction of two cemeteries in the upper part of the town, built in a manner which obviates the objections urged against others, and which must be regarded as a very important advantage to the city. One of these edifices has been long completed, and its value was so well understood by the wealthiest and most respectable members of the community, that the whole number of vaults was immediately purchased. The other lies adjoining, and in the interior of the block formed by the First and Second Avenues, and Second and Third streets, being in the eleventh ward. It is four hundred and fifty feet in length, and ninety in breadth; and is surrounded by a massive stone wall two feet thick, and from top to bottom twenty-two feet high, twelve feet above the surface. The number of vaults is two hundred and eighty-eight, one quarter of which are now finished and in daily use. On entering this enclosure, the interior presents only the appearance of a park, surrounded by a lofty wall and very beautifully laid out with appropriate trees and shrubbery, among which are the yew, box, and myrtle. The vaults themselves are altogether concealed from view, and are only designated by slabs of marble laid in the wall, marked with the owner's names. When the plants which have been already set, shall attain a luxuriant growth, the spot will be a grateful resort for the mourners over departed friends here deposited.

It is a great advantage to the proprietors of these melancholy abodes, that all persons who are, or who shall become owners, have been lately created a body corporate. The uses of this are various and important; the vaults shall be deemed personal property and exempted from taxation or sale on execution, and shall not be inventoried as assets applicable to the payment of debts, in cases where not more than one is owned by the same person. In cases of intestacy they will belong to the next of kin of the deceased.

In directing attention to this subject we are impelled by a desire to remind our readers that their applications may be unsuccessful if long delayed; and we are confident that few individuals at the head of families can avoid feeling a great interest in it. Several privileges are insured to the proprietors here which could not be obtained, at least in the same degree, by others; among them may be enumerated the pure air always preserved within the vaults, promoted by the marble interior, and which offers the melancholy opportunity for such friends as were distant at the time of interment, to gaze again on the features of those they love. The facility with which this sad pleasure may be obtained, must render the possession of one of the vaults a matter of the greatest moment. We need scarcely add, that the rapidity with which the funeral ceremonies are here conducted, and which are usually so agonizing to surviving relatives, divests them of much of their protracted horror. The procession moves to the spot, and the body is placed in a room, in which there is nothing loathsome. The mourner hears few of those soul-harrowing and lengthened details, which on similar occasions usually make the blood curdle, and excruciate the soul. The necessary circumstances are soon performed, and the sleeper is left in his resting-place. But the portals which shut him in are not irrevocably closed; and the tasteful decorations of vines, flowers, and foliage gleaming around, soften the harshness of the scene, and fling about the dreadful form of death a drapery of tender and not unpleasant associations. We learn that nothing which wealth can purchase or taste devise, will be spared in bestowing upon these enclosures every rural embellishment. The exquisite lines of Bryant rise in the memory of the bereaved lingerer around those pensive walks:

"There, through the long, long summer hours,
The golden light should lie,
And thick young herbs and groups of flowers,
Stand in their beauty by;
The oriole should build and tell
His love tale, close beside my cell;
The idle butterfly
Should rest him there, and there be heard
The housewife bee and humming bird."

Importance of example in educating children.—The sentiments contained in the following passages, which we find floating about the newspapers, uncredited, are apparently founded on a close observation; and are, as far as our experience goes, accurately true. No means of imprinting an impression upon an intelligent child's mind is so sure to be successful as that of example. The observation of Juvenal, "the greatest reverence is due to children," is full of instruction and beauty. We cannot teach a child arithmetic by example; but we can inspire him with respect for knowledge and perseverance in completing what he undertakes:

"All your cares will be in vain, unless you assist them by your example. Children are extremely imitative, attentive to every little word and motion, and turn of countenance, and way of acting, open to their observation; and I am apt to think their future character depends more upon the sentiments and habits they imbibe inadvertently, than on what is usually comprehended under the term education; nor would I pronounce it impossible that children might be led into all kinds of useful knowledge by a regular judicious conduct in all those about them, without other than such instructions as they would apply for of their own accord. However romantic this notion may seem, it cannot be denied that a great deal may be done in this way. Example has always been counted more powerful than precept, and by its bad influence may easily overthrow all the good that has been done by the other. You may, in some measure, lessen this influence from the examples of other persons, by showing their evil tendency, or turning them into ridicule, but you cannot condemn nor ridicule your own actions; you will have neither inclination nor eyes to see your faults; nor will it be prudent to lessen yourself in the child's esteem. Juvenal says, the greatest reverence is due to children; by which must be understood, that we cannot be too much on our guard how we behave before them; never to betray any marks of passion, intemperance, greediness, folly, or selfishness in their presence; if we have a foible we are resolved not to part with, let us at least reserve the indulgence of it for times when they are not by. But you will say it is unavoidable to do many things before children which we must not permit them to do, and they should be taught to know the difference between themselves and grown persons. True; for you may say to a child, you must not get on horseback, though I may, because I am stronger, and know how to manage him; but you cannot tell him you must not swear or get drunk, but I may; for there your prohibition must be general, or it will signify nothing. Therefore, if you invite him by your practice to what you forbid him in words, though you should be able to keep him in order at present by the fear of your authority, it will be a state of irksomeness and bondage to him; he will long for the time when he may take the same liberties you do; or more probably he will take them sooner, as often as he thinks it can be done without danger or discovery; therefore, prudence should withhold you even from some things allowable for yourself, when you cannot make him understand the danger and mischief of them to him."

Scarlet hats.—The Parisian dandies, by sporting this article, have created a sensation even in that city of caprices. The color is emblematic of the present disposition of the populace. The papers mention that five young men called on the editor of the Figaro for an explanation, touching some disrespectful allusions in that paper, against the hue which they had adopted. During the debate a scuffle ensued, in which the populace manifested some disposition to interfere. Heaven knows but there might have been another revolution, (the scarlet hat revolution! in which we trust the victims would lose their hats—not their heads—an improvement upon the French style of doing those things,) but the police interfered and killed it in the shell. By the way, we have detected several hats of a similar elegance in some of our shop windows. It will require a bold head to wear one here, but there is not a little of that imported heroism afloat in the community, and the lovers of the marvellous need not despair.

Goethe.—The death of this celebrated poet, at the age of ninety, is announced in the Gazette of Weimar of the twenty-second March. He breathed his last while sitting in his arm-chair, and without any agitation or pain. He appeared perfectly sensible, nearly until the last moment; and on the creeping over him of a lethargy, which immediately preceded his dissolution, a motion of his hand seemed to indicate a wish to write. The Gazette adds, "he had no presentiment of his end, for he rejoiced in the coming of spring, and had ordered a number of new books."

American Academy of the Fine Arts.—We have glanced at the present, which is the fourteenth exhibition of the academy. It opened on the twelfth instant. Several of the pictures are beautiful, and will be attractive. Visitors were already crowding in. There is room, however, for fault finding, which, with the great praise which certain among the artists deserve, want of space compels us to postpone till the next number.

Robbery of letters in the post-office.—An exertion of vigilance in this department is greatly wanted. Letters often come to hand which have been opened, and the enclosed money purloined. Where is the fault, and can it not be remedied? The frequency of this occurrence is shameful, and calls for decisive measures.

The Brothers Herrman.—These admirable vocalists have been buying "golden opinions," in both senses of the word, at the south. On Monday they gave a soiree musicale at the city-hotel, with their usual address, and to a fashionable, crowded, and delighted auditory.

Exchange papers.—We have received many additional applications, from almost every section of the Union, requesting an exchange. It would really gratify us to be able to comply with these solicitations; but a desire to accommodate our editorial friends has already swelled the exchange list to such an extent, that we shall be again compelled, however reluctantly, to curtail it. The Mirror, although afforded at a very low price to the reader, is nevertheless a most costly publication to us; and we make so little use of a great proportion of the newspapers sent us in return, that the burthen becomes very serious. Those who do not receive this journal after the close of the present volume, will please consider the exchange at an end, and accept these remarks as an apology. They do not apply, however, to such as have published the prospectus. We feel ourselves indebted to their kindness, and shall, of course, continue to forward our humble quarto as usual.

ANDANTE CON MOTO.

Garde a vous, garde a vous, be si-lent and be stea-dy, With ra-pid march still rea-dy Each ma-rau-der to pur-sue ; Garde a vous, garde a vous, garde a vous, Till morn the town pa-trol-ing, Thus chal-lenge all who strol-ing So late may meet your view! Who goes there? garde a vous. Till morn the town pa-trol-ing, Thus chal-lenge all who strol-ing So late may meet your view! Who goes there? garde a vous, garde a vous, garde a vous, garde a vous.

3d— Garde a vous, garde a vous, While rigid fathers snoring, Garde a vous, garde a vous, For we, though harsh the duty, Who goes there? &c.
 Gallants your love-foes pouring, Little dream how well you woo, And, ah! beware, fond beauty, Must even challenge you! And, ah! beware, &c.

ENCOURAGING TO DOCTORS.—M. Humboldt, in his "Personal Narrative," states, that "in Egypt, in the thirteenth century, the habit of eating human flesh pervaded all classes of society. Extraordinary snares were spread for physicians in particular. They were called to attend persons who feigned to be sick, but who were only hungry, and it was not in order to be consulted, but devoured."

A fair fashionable, lately united to one of the most dashing dandies of the day, having cause to complain of neglectful behavior, the bridegroom replied, "Have patience, my dear; I am like the prodigal son, and will reform by-and-by." "And I, sir," replied the spirited bride, "will also be like the prodigal son." "In what particular, madam?" "I will arise, and go unto my father." She left the house the same morning.

"Ah, my dear fellow," said an old man once to a friend, "I am quite weak and broken down with age. I used to walk entirely around the park every day; but now I can only walk half way round and back again."

Farmers, as well as poets, ought to be classed among the genus irritable, for there is no season so fine, no crop so abundant, but the farmer can find room for a grumble. A substantial yeoman of Hampshire was lately congratulated upon the excellence of the late harvest, and the great reason he and his brethren had to be grateful. "I don't know that," said he; "what be we to do for bad hay for our cows?"

THE SUITORS.

Mother! look round thee—round thee, and see
 All the youths struggling—struggling for me.
 Pierce the struggle, eager and wild,
 Does thy heart gladden?—I am thy child.

A lady said to a servant the other day, at dinner, "Go down cellar and bring up the bread which lies on the shelf there."—"It won't do no good, ma'am," was the reply, "for the bread on that shelf down cellar is up here in this cupboard, ma'am."

AMENDMENT TO THE DECALOGUE.—A writer in the Constellation proposes the following, as the eleventh commandment:—Thou shalt not walk.

MATERIALS FOR POETRY.—Good sense is the body of poetic genius—fancy its drapery—motion its life, and imagination the soul, that is everywhere, and in all, and forms all into one graceful and intelligent whole.

"Pray, sir," said a young belle to the keeper of a circulating library, "have you Man as he is?"—"No, miss," replied the clerk, wishing to accommodate her, and with no other meaning; "but we have Woman as she should be."

Our principal actress (says Bernard, in his Retrospections of the Stage) at Castle Carey, a Mrs. Kirby, playing Lady Anne, one evening, and inquiring, very piteously, "Oh! when shall I rest?" a grocer started up in the pit, and shouted out, "Not till you have paid me my one pound one and tenpence, ma'am!"

The following lines were written on a good composer, but a hideous singer of music:

So sweet's your music when another sings,
 We think you're stolen Dan Apollo's strings;
 So harsh it seems when by yourself 'tis bawled,
 We wonder how the deuce 'twas music called.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE TRAVELER IN SPIKE OF HIMSELF.

Concluded.

One day in riding down the side of a gentle valley, they came at a winding of the rude track they were pursuing, upon a large body of horsemen—and as they were immediately surrounded they had no alternative but to mention who they were, and admit. On the interpreter informing them that his master bore communication to the pacha from the sultan, they drew back with the utmost respect, and fell into the line of march, as part of the military guard. They told the party that the pacha was encamped a few miles farther down the valley, with an army of forty thousand men, and that he had expected the sultan's ambassador for some time. Encouraged by this assurance, Sam put his Arabian on his mettle, and soon was in the heart of the encampment. The pacha's tent was easily known from its superior splendor, and in a few minutes Sam was conducted in great pomp to his highness's quarters. Fierce-looking soldiers scowled upon him as he passed, and Sam was not altogether at ease, when he observed the ominous sneers they exchanged with each other.

At last he stooped short, and said to one of the soldiers, whose expression he did not like,

"You popinjay in fine clothes, do you make these faces at me?"

Another soldier who was standing by, started forward and said,

"Good heavens! an Englishman, and in that dress!—it is not even yet too late to save you; if you go on, you will be murdered to a certainty—the pacha has put twelve ambassadors to death already."

"The devil he has! and I'm sent here to make up the baker's dozen! Well, countryman, what's to be done? If you get me out of this scrape, and ever come to Bastock—"

"Stay—the only plan, when the pacha asks you for the firman, is to say you've lost it; here, give it to me."

And Sam had scarcely time to follow the soldier's advice, when he found himself in presence of the rebel chief.

He was standing at the farther end of the tent, in the middle of a group of officers. On seeing his highness the ambassador, he advanced half-way to meet him, and bowed with all the reverence of an eastern prostration.

"I worship the shadow of the sovereign of the universe. Your highness does too much honor to your slave."

"Your servant, old gentleman, your servant," said Sam, who guessed from the pacha's manner that he was paying him a compliment, "a pleasant gentlemanly sort of man, and no murderer I'll be bound—tell him I'm glad to see him, and hope he's well—ask him how his wife is, and the children."

The interpreter, at Sam's request, made a courteous speech.

"The messenger of the sultan is master here. We are sorry we can offer him no better accommodation."

"The accommodation's good enough—but riding in these hot mornings with a tablecloth on one's head is thirsty work, Master Dragsman. Ask him if he could give one a glass of brandy and water—cold without—"

But the pacha anticipated his desire. He seated him on the highest ottoman in the tent, and treated him with a deference and respect which were quite astonishing to Sam, but which seemed to yield the greatest amusement to the officers of the staff.

"The bearer of the firman is powerful as Azrael. Say, where is the imperial order for your slave's unfortunate head? The officers of the bowstring are near."

"An order for his head! Tell him I know nothing about his head, nor his bowstrings either. I brought a letter from an old smoking fellow at Constantinople, but I've unfortunately lost it by the way."

"What! lost it?" said the pacha, who did not seem by any means rejoiced at the prospect of retaining his head. "Your highness is pleased to jest with your servant. You undoubtedly came from the monarch of the earth to put the cord round your slave's neck?"

"I'll be cursed if I came for any such purpose."

"Ah, then," said the pacha, "it grieves me we can only give you the second-rate robe of honor. We are deprived of our sport," (he said to his attendants,) "for this time at least your chief's head is in safety. Put the caftan of favor round the dragoman's shoulders."

Two splendidly dressed men, with arms bare up to the elbow, and bearing a silk cord, now advanced towards the interpreter. He clung for safety to his excellency the ambassador, screaming,

"Save me, save me; they are going to strangle your slave."

"Strangle! Nonsense, man. Didn't the old gentleman treat us in the most polite way possible; and isn't he laughing, and all the other people too, as if it were a capital joke?"

But, in spite of Sam's consolatory observations, the interpreter continued his entreaties.

The men had now got up to him, and laid the green silk cord upon his shoulder. They then brought the two ends round to his breast; and another person, who seemed of higher rank, stepped forward, bearing a short staff in his hand. Round this staff he twisted the ends of the cord till it was closely drawn to the dragoman's throat, and then he waited with the most imperturbable coolness for some signal from the chief. That personage, however, seemed to enjoy the scene too much to bring it to a speedy conclusion, and continued to pour out his ironical compliments both to the dragoman and Sam.

"The caftan of honor is given to the servant of the messenger of the sultan; he does not seem to prize the distinction sufficiently."

"Oh, save your slave!" exclaimed the dragoman. "He is a dog, and would lick the dust; but save him, your highness!"

"Come, Mister Pacha," said Sam, as coaxingly as he could, "you have had your fun with the poor devil, though I can't see the joke of it myself. You see he's half dead with fright. Let him go, there's a good fellow."

"There are twelve of your brethren, the scoundrelly Greeks of the Faynal, gone before you, all wearing the same marks of my favor. See that the caftan fits him close—he will catch cold, else."

As he said these words, the pacha nodded to the person who held the staff; and in an instant, by a dextrous turn of the wrist, the cord was drawn tight, and the howlings, and terrified exclamations of the dragoman were cut short by death.

The staff was untwisted ere Sam recovered from his amazement, and the corpse of his companion, still writhing, fell down upon his feet. He started up in horror at the murder, and forgetting the danger which surrounded him, he exclaimed,

"You blood-thirsty Turk; by heavens, if there's law or justice to be had, for love or money, you shall swing for this. You're a rascal, to pretend to be so polite, and then to kill a poor devil of a fellow who never did you a morsel of harm. Keep your cursed staff to yourself, for I would not stay with such a burking old scoundrel, no, not to be a murderer of London."

And Sam, foaming with indignation, stalked away; but he had not gone far when the same two men who had brought the cord stopped him, and led him back to the ottoman he had left. This time, instead of a bowstring, they carried a long thong of thick leather, and the pacha, still continuing his respectful behavior, said,

"Your excellency is too condescending to your slave. Ho! chamberlain—put the shoes of glory on his highness's feet."

With the rapidity of lightning, Sam was thrown back upon the sofa; his shoes forcibly taken from his feet, and while the whole tent was convulsed with laughter, one of the men, swinging the bastinado round his head, inflicted such a blow on his unprotected soles, that Sam screamed aloud, with mingled rage and pain.

"Let me go this moment, ye bloody-minded rascals! I'll haul you up for this. I'll bring an action—"

But here the second blow enraged him beyond all endurance, and while struggling with enormous strength, and roaring at the top of his lungs, he felt a hand laid on his shoulder, and, on looking up, saw Jack Thomson in his dressing-gown, and all the rest of us, standing round his bed.

"Why, Rosy Sam, what the deuce is the matter with you this morning, disturbing the whole house?"

"Matter," said Sam, sitting bolt upright, "where's that infernal Turk? I'll teach him to strike an Englishman on the feet. What, Jack Thomson! Jem! Bill! All here—at Bastock—Lord bless ye, I've had such a dream—all coming of your confounded stories, Jack—I thought I was tried, drowned, taken, sold, beat, bastinadoed, married to eight wives—and the devil knows all what. But here we are, my boys, let's have our breakfast; then we'll have a day's coursing in the upland fields, and after dinner I'll tell you all my adventures—how I was sent as an ambassador by the sultan."

"And they could not have found a fellow," said Jack, who was a considerable punster, "who could have made himself more at home with the sublime port than yourself."

THE BEAU OF THE BALL-ROOM.

"To sigh, yet feel no pain—
To weep, yet scarce know why—
To sport an hour with beauty's chain,
Then throw it idly by"—Moore.

"Your truth will be my best blessing, Madeleine" said Hargrave, tenderly.

"I will never forget you!" murmured his mistress; and the son and heir of Sir Marmaduke Hargrave departed on his tour.

No lovely girl of eighteen was ever more sincere, as she uttered the vow of everlasting remembrance, than Miss St. Clair; but poor human nature will assert its right, even though the rosy lips of a Hebe forbid it. Madeleine was not seen en grand monde all the next season. Hargrave was away, and what to her were fashion and frivolity?

At length la belle désolée ceased to weep; she could support the view of the little penciled sketch of Hargrave's features, which adorned her boudoir, and the silk curtain was withdrawn—in a fortnight more she interfered with her woman in the arrangement of her fine dark hair; and in a month yielded to her mother's persuasions, and attended an assembly—poor Hargrave!—but we will not anticipate—

The ball was full and fashionable; and Madeleine beautiful and graceful, if not gay. Leslie was there, and Leslie was the ton; he admired her large black eyes almost audibly, and unconsciously as she heard, she smiled—if Leslie was charmed with the eyes, he was enchanted by the smile. Leslie seldom danced, yet "to obtain the honor of her hand"—Madeleine blushed, and her heart fluttered—he reminded her of Hargrave! A quadrille is a pretty vehicle of quiet coquetry—the sudden breaks when summoned to the duties of the set—the murmured converse when the music fills up the pauses—the graceful motion—the soft light—and the magic accessories of flowers and perfume, nodding plumes and shining gems—how much may be said and felt during a quadrille.

Leslie had that deep low voice which sinks into the heart, when perchance the subject breathed in a lighter tone would not travel farther than the ear; and it was not that he was handsome, many declared him even far otherwise, but it was the distinguished manner, the air noble, the perfect ton de société of Leslie which had given him so great a sway in the world of fashion. His eyes were blue; they were large, soft, expressive eyes—eyes which would have graced the countenance of the gentlest woman; his hair, too, was scarcely three shades darker than what is called flaxen; and his every feature was so delicately chiselled, that at the first glance he was passed over; but only at the first, for she who had once heard that low, deep voice, and felt the languor of those large, soft, expressive eyes, passed him not by again. Such was Leslie: but could Hargrave, the gallant, elegant Hargrave, have been in this votary of taste, this child of fashion? Who shall say? Hargrave was a lover—

Madeleine looked and listened; even thus had Hargrave charmed and spoken, and been the cynosure of all hearts and eyes—and yet his looks had never so softened, his tones had never so thrilled! They met again; Leslie rallied her on her frequent absence from the gay scenes of festivity, where her eyes outshone "the jewelled coronals," and he rallied her so tenderly that she became convinced. She had never touched her harp since Hargrave's departure, but Leslie wooed her to it with new music and gentle words; were she ill, he relieved the tedium of indisposition and solitude by smiles and cares and kindnesses; were she well, he rendered gaiety more pleasurable by gallantry and wit and assiduity; but he spoke no word of passion, and how could Madeleine throw back upon itself a heart so kindly? "My own Hargrave, too, would have done all this—" murmured the fair St. Clair, in a moment of memory; but she murmured it only to her own heart, and turned with a smile upon her lip to Leslie.

Hargrave's spirits were overpowering; he sailed along the horizon of fancy like an eagle which fixes its large clear eye fearlessly on the brightness above it, and revels in its broadest beams. Leslie floated amid the clouds of imagination like one in a car of silver; he, too, was bright; but it was the brightness of the lily, not of the diamond: you wondered at the wit of Hargrave, you felt that of Leslie. Madeleine St. Clair had read over all the letters of her lover, read them—start not, reader, if thou art of the gentler sex—till she yawned—it could not be with ennui! A small rose-wood desk, Hargrave's last gift, was before her; she took a quire of azure-tinted paper from it, and commenced a reply to his last, and her heart confessed, even his tenderest epistle; she immersed her crow-quill in the ink so carefully that she scarcely darkened its point; and the four first words came au naturel, "My ever-beloved Hargrave"—here she paused, laid down her pen, sighed, examined the tips of her pretty fingers one after the other, played with her French poodle, but all would not do—at length, au désespoir, she drew a miniature likeness of her lover from her bosom, and placing it on the table sought inspiration by gazing on it; but even this spell had lost its talismanic power!

A loud knock at the door, a conscious glance at the window—Leslie's curdled below, and its owner awaiting entrance—Madeleine hastily closed her desk, but the miniature was forgotten. She gave one hasty look at the mirror, another at her pale blue slippers, and Mr. Leslie was announced. Madeleine looked lovely; Leslie was enchanting; he flew from one idée spirituelle to another, as lightly as a butterfly skims from bloom to bloom in a flowery parterre—Madeleine reflected his smile, echoed his gaiety, felt his wit, and thought not of Hargrave.

After a time, the miniature attracted Leslie's attention: "And this, Miss St. Clair, is this the carrissimo amico?" The question would have been impertinent, but the tone saved it.

"A friend of—my mother's," said the lady with a slight blush. Leslie n'y croyait rien, but he was too well bred to look his incredulity.

"A fine countenance," he resumed, as he raised the miniature from the table, and gazed on the noble brow, dark eyes, and powerful expression it portrayed; "though, were I bold enough to criticize, I should almost say that it is fearfully fine—enough to scare a lady, were she other than an Amazon."

Madeleine would have silenced him, but she knew not what to say.

"I love a dark eye!" continued Leslie, thrillingly; "but it is such a one as Barry Cornwall has exquisitely portrayed in his 'Sicilian story,' when, speaking of his lover, he exclaims,

"And in his eye, where love and pride contended,
His dark, deep-seated eye, there was a spell,
Which they who love, and have been loved, can tell—"

this eye," and he pointed to the portrait of Hargrave, "has, indeed, pride enough; but for aught else—" and he turned his own, soft and melting, upon Madeleine, "not thus should lovers look when they would woo!"

"He is proud," said Miss St. Clair, glancing from her companion to the miniature.

"This very toy bespeaks it," said Leslie; nay, pardon me the expression," he added, in a low, deprecating accent, for the blush of Madeleine had deepened on her cheek, "I said it not in scorn—was not this portrait meant to be the toy of absence, for the memory to sport with?"

Miss St. Clair was silent.

"A man with pride is like a well-tempered weapon," pursued Leslie, after a pause; "a thing to wound, even though it dazzle; tenderness is like a sheath to the shining steel, it destroys not its edge, though it conceals its danger."

Alas! Madeleine—you had given your heart to Hargrave, like an unopened casket, of which yourself knew not the contents; but Leslie had wiled away the key, and to Hargrave, under such circumstances, the gift was valueless—

And yet Leslie did not love Miss St. Clair—he thought with the world that she was beautiful, and young, and gentle; and it was luxury to see her dark eye turned on him, and to hear her soft voice "making sweet music" in his ear—it was enjoyment to attend on her steps, administer to her wishes, and look upon her smiles—but beyond that, Leslie thought of—wished for no more; habit had nursed in him that natural tenderness which, like the quiet course of a mountain spring, works out its still and noiseless way to light, unconscious of its own progress. But Madeleine knew not this, and for a while she loved him; and the dark eye of Hargrave was remembered only as the occasion of one of Leslie's gentlest sallies.

Leslie quitted England—softly and tenderly he bowed upon the extended hand of Madeleine; wished her an age of happiness, and departed for the continent—thought little of her at Paris, and forgot her in Rome.

Three years passed, and Leslie returned. Again he met Madeleine—met her as the wife of Hargrave; smiled at their rencontre, reverted to their past friendship—brought a flush to the cheek of Hargrave, and a frown to his brow; and then left them to join another group, fan a fresh flame, and flutter round it himself unharmed.

MARCUS TULLIUS CICERO

IN THE DUNGEONS OF THE INQUISITION OF ROME, IN 1818.

Extracted from the manuscript of an Italian exile.

Rome, the majestic queen of the universe, the terror and admiration of the known world, under the dominion of the ancient Romans, became, in the first centuries of christianity, the cradle of religion, and the seat of apostles and martyrs.

But when the successors of St. Peter, forgetting their divine institution, and the precepts and examples of their holy predecessors, began to seek after worldly empire, Rome was so changed into a new Babylon; and in the Vatican were collected ambition, hypocrisy, craftiness, and all the concomitant vices of those base passions.

Who is not acquainted with the present miserable condition of the capital of priest-craft? An immense and beautiful city, the incomparable monument of ancient and modern wonders, thinly peopled by inhabitants, rendered unworthy of the glorious name of Romans, by the despotism, superstition, and tyranny of the thousands of monks and priests that literally swarm in that splendid metropolis.

However, as the Italians have naturally a lively disposition, and think but little about past and future sorrows, one may not be surprised to see in all places of amusement the appearance, at least, of true enjoyment. It is for this reason that the carnival of Rome presents, within the short space of twenty-four hours, the length of its real duration, more interesting scenes, and greater variety of masks, than the long and wearisome carnivals of Naples, Milan, and Venice. It may be said, that at that epoch the poorest of the inhabitants will sacrifice any thing to display themselves and their finery in the renowned Strada del Corso. It has been proved that, during that period, the pawnbrokers of Rome lend more money than for the rest of the year. It was at this season of merriment and rejoicing that the anecdote I am about to relate happened to me.

Amongst my many weaknesses, I am not ashamed to acknowledge my confirmed inability to withstand the entreaties of the fair. Being, therefore, solicited by a charming and beautiful lady to perform in mask, and assume the character of Cicero, with the promise that she would accompany me in the character and dress of Tulliola, I consented; and having had a mask taken from the bust of the Roman orator, which is preserved in the capitol, and dressed in the style of a Roman consul, I entered into the Corso, accompanied by my supposed daughter. At first, I placed myself under the gate of the Palace Bolognetti, where a great crowd soon collected around me. Clever men were not backward in questioning me about many ancient historical and political events, and I answered in Latin to all their questions. The facility with which I conversed in the language of the great Roman—a facility, indeed, which it had been my early ambition to acquire—excited public attention, and, in a short time, all the Corso spoke of nothing but of the wonderful Cicero of the Palace Bolognetti, and I was almost besieged by the multitude.

After having remained more than an hour in that situation, I went to pay a visit to Prince Ghigi, in whose drawing-room a great number of the Roman nobility, and many literary men, had assembled to witness the races of the Barbari. Cicero, of course, was soon attacked on all sides. Prince Ghigi accused me of having flattered Caesar, and changed my principles on several occasions. These accusations I combated with many historical arguments, and proved that Cicero's integrity and patriotism had remained unstained during that dreadful period of Rome. Every person present tried to guess who was the representative of the Roman orator. Some said, and felt assured, that I was a professor of the Sapienza; others, that I was one of the Scriptores of the Vatican; but the Cavalier Odescalchi said before the company, that he knew but one man who could perform Cicero in a like manner, and that was the Hungarian gentleman who had often delivered extemporaneous Latin poetry before the Accademia Latina. Seeing that I was so nearly discovered, I left the Palace Ghigi, but promised that, at night, I would go to the Festino of the theatre Aliberti.

From thence I walked up and down the Corso, and often spoke in Latin to the numerous English, who were seated before the Palace Ruspoli, particularly to a lady who, in my opinion, was one of the finest women I ever beheld. She could not understand me; and as I would not speak in any living language, her husband, a captain in the British navy, was my interpreter. I obtained their address, and had afterwards the pleasure of becoming intimately acquainted with them.

According to my promise, I went to the Festino. There all that Rome contained of talent and genius had assembled to attack, embarrass, and overcome, if possible, the living Cicero. For four hours all the most difficult parts of the works of the Roman orator were proposed for my explanation; several of his orations, in which either the beginning or the conclusion are wanting, I was required to complete. Having for many years had the works of this great master, I may say, at my fingers' ends, I was enabled to afford so satisfactory an explanation of them, that my auditors were truly astonished.

About one o'clock in the morning, the prince of Canino, (Lucien Bonaparte,) who was present, demanded my opinion relative to the present state of Rome, and inquired what I thought of its civil and criminal laws. Unfortunately for me, in the warmth of discussion, I forgot where I was, and having been questioned how I could speak so precisely on things that had occurred two thousand years after my death, I told them that I had often the opportunity of meeting in the lower regions some of the cleverest inhabitants of Rome, and that lately I had had a long conversation with Cardinal Maury, on the very subject. This was a thunderbolt to the ears of several of the auditors. Such a speech was the greatest blasphemy against the holy order of cardinals; and the arguses of the Roman inquisition soon denounced me to Monsignor Pacca, governor of Rome. Orders were immediately given for my arrest as soon as I left the house, and accordingly, about two o'clock, while I was stepping into a carriage, I was seized by four sbirri. They conducted me into a neighboring house, where my eyes were bound, and, without speaking a syllable, I was hurried into a coach and driven off. When I alighted, I found myself in the monastery of Santa Maria in Minerva, where the inquisitors of the holy office hold their infernal sittings, and where the dungeons are situated in which the accused are kept during the progress of their trial, and until their final sentence is pronounced. The little subterranean cave in which I was imprisoned was scarcely of sufficient height to allow me to stand upright; it was about six feet wide, and nearly as much in length. The only aperture was a small hole, which looked into a dark corridor, and served to admit the air. A wooden chair, and a pitcher of water, were all the furniture.

It would be impossible to describe what were my feelings and my anxiety during that long night. I had twice in my life been confined, and also condemned to death for political offences, but I had never tenanted a dungeon half so appalling as was that subterranean den.

In the morning, about ten o'clock, two robust friars made their appearance, and informed me that I was to be conducted before the inquisitor, but they wished to tie both my hands. I strongly opposed this act of tyranny, and said that I would not submit. They answered that it was indispensable; but I continued in my resolution. When the friars saw that I was determined not to submit they retired; and after about a quarter of an hour returned, and ordered me to follow them. We passed through several dark corridors, ascended by a gloomy staircase, and arrived at the cell of the reverend Father Olivieri, one of the four inquisitors of the holy office of Rome. This inquisitorial attorney-general was a man of about fifty years of age, of dark complexion and high stature, and possessed all the exterior striking features of his tyrannical vocation. His black, fierce-looking eyes, his large mouth and thick lips, inspired a sort of awe mingled with disgust. Next to him was seated a younger monk, ready to transcribe his questions and my answers. The reverend father stared at me for a minute or two, as if wishing to read into my heart, and then sitting down, began as follows:

"What is your name, country, profession, and religion?"

"I am Arduel Tchocha, a native of Buda, in Hungary, by profession a soldier, and a catholic by birth."

"Why have you been arrested?"

"I do not know."

"Have you not spoken in a public theatre against the holy order of cardinals?"

"I do not remember having committed such an offence."

"Did you not say last night, while speaking of the present laws of Rome, that you had seen, in hell, Cardinal Maury?"

"Yes, I did, but it was in the warmth of my argumentation; and I never thought that it would be deemed an offence to the holy order of cardinals, especially as I there represented Cicero, who was by no means a good catholic."

"Can you assign any other motive which might mitigate the rigor of the holy inquisition for your great crime?"

"I do not know of any. Besides," added I, "Cardinal Maury was, during all his life, undoubtedly opposed to the Roman church's infallibility, and to the last moment of his existence he would not abjure this erroneous opinion."

"'Tis true," answered Father Olivieri; "but you know that the holy pontiff, having sent to the dying cardinal his in articulo mortis absolution, it is almost an article of faith that Cardinal Maury has been saved from the torments of hell."

"I did not know this," replied I; "and I must confess that, had I been informed of the circumstance, it would not have altered my sentiments."

"Are you the same person who has often delivered extemporaneous Latin poetry in the Latin academy?"

"Yes, I am."

"Well," the reverend Father Olivieri then observed, "how can a soldier be so well acquainted with ancient literature and history as to deliver extemporaneous Latin poetry, and to represent, as you have done, the character of Cicero?"

"Factum infectum fieri nequit," answered I; "and if I have done it, it is the best proof of what a soldier can do."

"But," replied the inquisitor, taking a paper into his hand, "here is a letter which I have just received from the most reverend Monsignor Pacca, governor of Rome; he informs me that strong suspicions are entertained that you are not a Hungarian, but that under such a fictitious name is concealed an Italian nobleman, of very dangerous religious and political principles. What can you reply to it?"

"My answer will be very short," said I. "You and Monsignor Pacca have been deceived. I have a German passport, and am well known to Prince Kounitz, our ambassador at Rome."

Father Olivieri, on hearing this, seemed much surprised, remained silent for some moments, and then told me, "That I was to return to my dungeon, that he might make his report, and obtain farther information."

To this I replied, by saying, "That if I was to be retained as a prisoner, they should give me better accommodation, and that they should send for my clothes, for I could not remain longer dressed as Cicero." In the meanwhile, I told the inquisitor that I was intimately acquainted with the Cardinals Fontana and Litta, who were at that epoch the presidents of the tribunal of the holy office of Rome, and that if my just request was not granted, to them I would appeal for redress, and that I was certain to obtain it.

This observation rendered the reverend inquisitor more reasonable; he ordered the two friars to conduct me into the hall, where generally the offenders are kept in custody; he also promised me that I should have my clothes, if I would give a written order to my servant to deliver them to the messenger; this I did directly, and withdrew.

The new prison in which I was now confined, was a large subterranean apartment, placed under the court of the monastery of Santa Maria in Minerva. It was not very dark, for at the top of the ceilings there were several openings, guarded with iron bars; a long, wooden bedstead was at one side, upon which ten or twelve persons could have lain; a large black crucifix was suspended at one side of the wall, and several old dirty pious books were fastened with small iron chains to the wooden chairs of the apartment. On the walls were written, or rather engraved with some pointed instrument, some thousand names of the unfortunate victims of inquisitorial despotism, who had been interred alive before me in that dungeon, and, very probably, for no greater offence; among which I distinguished Guido Reni, Salvator Rosa, the Cavalier d'Arpino, Vincenzo Damiani, Cagliostro, and the celebrated Dominican monk, Fontana Rosa; under this was the following—Bene est, quia Monachus Monachos odi. I read also the names of several German, English, and Irish artists, and heretics, and not a few of the French liberals. After having minutely examined my new habitation, I threw myself on the bedstead, and, being extremely fatigued, went to sleep.

About four o'clock I was roused by a friar, who came to bring me some food, and my clothes. I thanked him, and requested that he would give me a light, for it was already very dark. This was granted. I ate something, and exchanged the dress of Cicero, which had proved so fatal to me. About twelve o'clock in the night I heard a very distressing voice, and the cries of a man who certainly was suffering under bodily torture, for now and then I plainly understood that he exclaimed, "Have mercy upon me. I cannot confess what I have not done. Have mercy upon me; I am dying!" This was a very dreadful omen; and I endured the most painful sensation in considering that perhaps a similar treatment was prepared for me.

Next morning the two friars came very early, and conducted me again to the inquisitor Olivieri. As soon as I entered his cell, he told me "that further information had been taken, and that he was fully convinced of my being not a Hungarian. Besides," he added, "Monsignor Pacca has been informed by the marquis of Fuscaldo, the Neapolitan ambassador at the court of Rome, that you are a very bad subject of his Sicilian majesty. If it be so, he has demanded you as a prisoner, and in a few days you will be confronted with persons who will identify you."

I was truly alarmed on hearing this, but did not manifest any exterior apprehension, for I was convinced that before such an epoch my friends would have certainly done all in their power to save me. In this opinion I was not mistaken, for my Tulliola, who had left the theatre a short time before my arrest, not having seen me the next day, began to think that some misfortune had befallen me; and having sent to my lodgings, was informed of my absence, and of the suspicion of my having fallen into the hands of the inquisition. Knowing that I was acquainted with the Austrian ambassador, she therefore immediately called on him, and related her apprehensions concerning me. Prince Kounitz immediately ordered his carriage, and drove to Monsignor Pacca, requesting to know where I was. The governor answered, that he knew nothing at all about my destiny, and that it was possible I had gone out of town. Kounitz was not satisfied with this reply, and remarked, that as I was one of the subjects of the emperor of Austria, it was his duty to see that I should not be ill-treated and unjustly condemned. Monsignor Pacca repeated that he was quite ignorant of what might have happened to me.

The ambassador called, therefore, on the cardinal of state, and finding that his eminence had gone to spend the evening at the palace Ghigi, and there to play at cards with the amiable princess, his favorite lady, the prince soon directed his course to that conversation, and having met Gonzalvi, called him out, and repeated to him the same questions he had already made to Monsignor Pacca, but received, almost literally, the same answers. To this Kounitz intimated his intention of addressing himself to the pope, if on the next morning I should not be found, or if the cardinal would not let him know where I was detained. Gonzalvi persisted in his being ignorant of my fate, and the prince withdrew.

Next morning, about eleven o'clock, Prince Kounitz, with all the etiquette of an ambassador, waited on Pius VII., and after having kissed his foot, explained the cause of his extraordinary visit. When the pope heard all that the prince had to say, he suddenly exclaimed—"What? is the Hungarian gentleman arrested? I know him. Poor Checchino! And for what?"—The prince answered, "That he did not know." "Well," replied the pope, "I will soon know," and having rang, ordered, to Monsignor Riario, who was his lord in waiting, that Cardinal Gonzalvi should be immediately sent for, and, dispensing with the papal etiquette, desired the prince to take a seat. During the time they were waiting for the secretary of state, Pius VII. spoke very favorably of me; assured Prince Kounitz that he had found in me a true friend while he was confined at Fontainebleau, and that I had often endangered my own welfare to bring him some comfort; the good pope added, that he knew me from my infancy, that I was intrinsically good, but that he had always found that I often acted very imprudently.

In a short time Gonzalvi was announced, and when, on entering, the cardinal saw Prince Kounitz sitting by the pope, he soon guessed why he had been called. Pius VII. was a very excellent man, and truly pious; he was also a profound divine, and extremely erudite. Of all the successors of St. Peter, since they have obtained temporal power, he is the only pontiff who has not enriched his family; and although he reigned more than twenty-four years, he died very poor, for his charity knew no bounds. The only fault he had was, that he cared very little about worldly affairs; and it may be said that, though Pius VII. was the nominal pope, it was Cardinal Gonzalvi that reigned uncontrolled.

However, when Pius VII. was determined that any thing should be done, or that any abuse should be abolished, he was the most firm, and the most obstinate man in the world. In the present circumstance he proved his authority, and, without any observation, demanded from his secretary of state—"What has happened to the Hungarian gentleman, who the other day performed the mask of Cicero, and since that period is missing?" Gonzalvi seeing that the pope knew that it was almost certain that Cicero had been arrested, replied—"Your holiness is well aware that those who sacrilegiously blaspheme against our holy religion are immediately given into the hands of the holy inquisition, and that their apprehension must be kept secret until they are examined and tried. It is for this reason that I could not give a satisfactory answer to the Austrian ambassador. But since your holiness commands me to disclose the secrets of the holy office, I will briefly relate what has been done with the Hungarian gentleman, or rather with the Neapolitan nobleman." Here the cardinal reported all that has already been exposed, and particularly insisted on the instances of the marquis of Fuscaldo. As soon as Gonzalvi ended his information, the pope said—"Cardinal, it is our will that the prisoner should be directly restored to liberty; and as the Austrian ambassador is so generous as to offer to go to deliver his subject, you will accompany his excellency, and see that my commands are fulfilled without further delay."

It was nearly three o'clock when I heard the footsteps of several persons in the corridor of my prison. I felt a strange sensation, but soon was relieved from my anxiety by my door being opened, and by the appearance of my excellent friend, Prince Kounitz, who, with a smile on his face, requested me to go with him.

To pass from the abode of tyranny, torture, and despair, to the magnificent palace of a generous prince—to escape from the furious hands of the inquisitors, to be again restored to my best friends, was but the work of an instant. A few days after this, having taken my leave of all those who had known and assisted me, I bade adieu to Rome and to Italy—probably for ever!

THE EMPEROR NICHOLAS OF RUSSIA.

His imperial majesty is a remarkably fine-looking man, upwards of six feet high. His countenance is open and ingenuous, his manner frank, but a little inclining to brusque. If I were to see such a man in a crowd, I should say that man is born to be an emperor. He is thirty-six years of age, and is represented by all those who have access to his person, and who are well acquainted with his character, to be the model of a prince and man. His fine physiognomy is expressive of benignity, magnanimity, and intelligence. He received us in private audience; and, as we stood in a sort of semicircle, he went round and addressed something kind and pertinent to our professions and nation to each of us. He asked me if I had ever seen in India anything of the cholera; to which I replied, that I had never been in India, but that I had had the complaint, commonly called cholera morbus, twice in my life; once at Buenos Ayres and once at Constantinople.

His majesty seemed surprised, and asked me how I was treated for it; to which I replied, the first time with barley water made very sweet, and the second time with syrup and water. I remarked, likewise, that the Arabs, who were well acquainted with the cholera, treated it with rice-water and sugar.

"Ah," said his majesty, "you have not, then, had oriental cholera, but its first cousin; but," said he, "your remedy is deserving of notice."  Turning to captain N—, of the Grenadier guards, he asked him how long he had been in Petersburg, and whom he came with. N— replied that he had arrived with Sir E. Codrington. "Oh!" said the emperor, "I'm sorry I did not know that, for I should have had much pleasure in showing you all that I showed him." He said something kind to two other gentlemen who were presented with us, and then told us that the empress would be glad to make our acquaintance; said that he hoped to see us often at court, and that we should make a long stay in Petersburg. "But of all things," added he, "go to Moscow, for there you will see the true Russian capital." He then bowed, and wished us good morning.

We were next ushered, by Count Modene, into the empress' apartments, and had not waited long before her imperial majesty appeared, attended by Count Litta, the grand chamberlain, and Madame la Comtesse Sophie de Modene, the lady in waiting. Her majesty is tall, fair, and beautiful. She was very gracious, and said that she recommended me to go from Moscow to Odessa, and so on to Constantinople, by sea; but when I told her majesty that I had already been at Constantinople, she replied, the English were such great travellers, that it was not easy to point out any new rout to them. We had the honor of kissing her majesty's hand; and at the expiration of about a quarter of an hour, she withdrew.

ST. VITUS'S DANCE.

The following is the description of a patient, a boy, recently cured of St. Vitus's Dance, at St. Thomas's Hospital, given by the medical gentleman who had the treatment of the patient:—"The appearance was that of his being possessed by a demon. I am sure, if the boy had been seen in ancient times, he would have been brought forward as an instance of possession of a devil. He made all sorts of faces, and turned his head about in all directions; his mouth opened and shut as if he were trying to snap at and chew the air; he grinned and gnashed his teeth; his arms were flung about in every way: he rolled off the bed, and when his medicine or food was given to him, it required two persons to hold him, while a third administered it. He was in the most horrid state of perpetual motion. This patient was cured in about three weeks, by doses of the sub-carbonate of iron."

THE SERENADER.

Singing Tom fell in love with a maid,
Each night 'neath her window he stood,
And there with his soft serenade,
Awaken'd the whole neighborhood.
But vainly he tried to arouse
Her sleep, with his strains so bewitching;
While he play'd in the front of the house,
She slept in the little back kitchen.

HUMORS OF A YOUNG MAN ABOUT TOWN.

NUMBER SEVEN.

LOVE BALLADS.

1.

Would that I in words could render
Half my bosom feels for thee;
Love no language has so tender,
Friendship less sincerity.

Far from thee my spirits languish,
Near thee I can know no rest;
Thus forever gloom or anguish,
Shades my soul or wrings my breast.

Could my feelings find expression,
This is what to thee I'd tell—
Alas! perhaps this wild confession
Already speaks my soul too well.

2.

They tell me that my trusting heart,
Thy fondness is deceived in;
They say that thou art faithless art,
As others I've believed in:

I heed not, reck not what they say
So earnestly about thee;
I'd rather trust my soul away,
Than for one moment doubt thee.

Though youth and beauty's spell no more
May link thy feelings to me—
Though life can ne'er the hopes restore,
That led thee first to woo me—
Devotion is most deep and pure,
In souls by sorrow shaded;
And love, like ours, will still endure
When brighter ties have faded.

3.

I know I share thy smiles with many;
Yet still thy smiles are dear to me:

I know that I, far less than any,
Call out thy spirit's witchery;
But yet I cannot help, when nigh thee,
To seize upon each glance and tone;
To hoard them in my heart when by thee,
And count them o'er when'er alone.

But, why! oh why, on all thus squander
The treasures one alone can prize—
Why let the looks at random wander
Which beam from those deluding eyes,
Those siren tones so lightly spoken,
Cause many a heart I know to thrill;
But mine, and only mine, till broken.
In every pulse must answer still.

4.

Oh, trust not Love—the wayward boy,
But haste, if you'd detain him,
Ere time can beauty's bonds destroy,
Or other eyes and lips decoy
With Hymen to enchain him.

The humming-bird the blossom leaves
When'er its sweets are failing;
The silken web the spider weaves,
Yields up the prey to which she cleaves
When tempests are assailing.

And Love, when beauty's bloom decays
Will spread his fickle pinion,
And prove the web in which he plays,
Too weak against the rude world's ways
To hold the roving minion.

Then trust not Love—the wayward boy,
But haste, if you'd detain him,
Ere time can beauty's bonds destroy,
Or other eyes and lips decoy,
With Hymen to enchain him.

5.

Think of me, dearest, when day is breaking
Away from the sable chains of night,
When the sun, his ocean-couch forsaking,
Like a giant first in his strength a waking,
Is flinging abroad his limbs of light;
As the breeze that first travels with Morning forth,
Giving life to her steps o'er the quickening earth—
As the dream that has cheated thy soul through the night,
Let me come fresh in thy thoughts with the light.

Think of me, dearest, when day is sinking
In the soft embrace of twilight gray,
When the starry eyes of heaven are winking,
And the weary flowers their tears are drinking,
As they start like gems on the moon-touched spray.
Let me come warm in thy thoughts at eve,
As the glowing track which the sunbeams leave,
When they, blushing, tremble along the deep,
While stealing away to their place of sleep.

Think of me, dearest, when round thee smiling
Are eyes that melt while they gaze on thee;
When words are winning and looks are willing,
And those words and looks, of others, beguiling
Thy fluttering heart from love and me.
Let me come true in thy thoughts in that hour;
Let my trust and my faith—my devotion—have power,
When all that can lure to thy young soul is nearest,
To summon each truant thought back to me, dearest.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

CONFESSIONS OF A DEFORMED LUNATIC.

"O, cry you mercy,
Noble philosopher, your company."

THE reader will be surprised at my confessing the imputation under which I labor. Alas! it forms one of my severest horrors. I have thought there are times when I am mad. I will endeavor to describe some of my sensations, and also several little incidents in my life, by which may be seen that if I am no lunatic, it is not because I have not suffered enough to make me so. Listen to my adventures, dear reader. Amid the many who raise their claims to excite your mirth, or amuse your fancy with soft pictures of ideal bliss, let me speak my melancholy thoughts, my dark and brooding imaginations. Even as I write a tenderness rises in my bosom, and I would weep, but that I am accustomed to restrain my feelings, and act with an apparent callousness which is far from my real state of mind. Before I proceed further I must explain a theory of mine, accounting for the different degrees of happiness allotted to human beings. I do not believe prosperity is measured out in equal parts, any more than peculiarities of personal appearance. Of these the world presents a never-ceasing variety. Look around on your fellow-creatures, and see how they are formed. What prodigies meet your eye—giants, dwarfs, skeletons, and creatures of unwieldy bulk—a thousand kinds of beauty and ugliness. The same accidental reckless distribution of blessings and curses is observable in the minds, characters, tastes, and dispositions of those about us. Dunces and geniuses, persons of slow or quick apprehension, cold-hearted, enthusiastic, noble and brave, cowardly and mean, are all mingled together. Who shall assert these are equal?

This diversity may be perceived in human happiness. To say that all are equally contented, or even that they ought to be, takes away the stimulus from industry, perseverance and virtue. Why shall one labor to attain an object, if the accomplishment of his purpose adds nothing to his happiness; or if his design be good, and could make him happier, how often may he strive without effecting it, while others succeed? The dogma, I know, is consoling to the wretched. They cling in anguish to their imaginary claim upon fate, and amuse themselves with the prospect of expected bliss, till death cuts short their ideal enjoyments. My opinion is, that there are unlucky ages for certain characters to be born in; when their capacities for happiness lie idle, in consequence of the state of the surrounding circumstances, and in the great mass of human events there are layers, if I may so speak, of misfortunes, in the influences of which a man may be born, and through which he may run his whole career, thwarted in all his desires. In the light phraseology of the day, these might be termed unlucky men, but this tendency sometimes takes a bolder course. Perhaps a simile, which has often struck my mind, may illustrate my meaning more clearly to the reader. It seems to me, then, that human beings are floating on a vast stream, crossed with ten thousand intersecting tides, some of which lead along limpid and silver waters, and by pleasant summer shores, while others lapse, with silent but resistless sway, into the deep, dark passages and caverns of misery and guilt, bearing their shuddering victim on and on, away from light and innocence forever. Few indeed are those waves which glide altogether through peaceful scenes. The vast majority are varied with joy and sorrow; but some conduct with heavy rolling billows, in gloomy directions, with a power which no intrinsic intellect or virtue can altogether resist. On these sluggish and loathsome currents, float the scowling forms of guilt and anguish. With the dash of the sullen waves are mingled shrieks and execrations. Mothers howl over their dead children; murderers wave their reeking blades; dreadful sounds of wail and moan forever, and despair flits across the scene, rendering visible its fathomless recesses with the light of her lurid torch. At the outset of life, the writer of this mournful sketch fell into the influence of such a stream; and although sometimes in its sinuous channel, it has wound so near the regions of human joy, that I listened to the laughter of sweet voices, and inhaled the wandering fragrance of the balmy air, yet this temporary indulgence only rendered my contracted journey more repulsive, and heightened the torture of my soul. It is for believing this that men call me a lunatic. Ah, may experience never teach them their error; may it never teach them that it is the wretched who read the book of truth—that the mad are the happy.

The fates made me sensible of their unfriendly designs concerning me, by sending me into the world marked by a deformity, of just sufficient importance to make me frequently an object of ridicule or disgust, without being one of sympathy. The next among her gifts, which contained the germs of much mortification and misery, were an acute sensibility and pride, and a strange ambition. In early youth these were added to a wavering constitution, which sometimes led me to the brink of the grave, unfitting me for any active duties, and rendering me a burthen to my friends. I do really believe, so fatally predominant were my faults and ugliness over those feelings of an attractive nature, which, by being uncalled for, were nearly concealed in my own bosom, that at the age of sixteen, when my disease began to assume a serious appearance, there was not in the wide, wide world, any single being who would have really regretted my death. This may be accounted for, partially, by my peevish habits and ill temper, arising from the continually wounded state of my mind. No one imagined my susceptibility to ridicule, or they must have pitied and excused me. I found it often undisguised, and sometimes, doubtless, thought I saw it in mere ordinary conversation. Yet it was the same to me. I have felt a casual remark like an adder's sting, and a curled lip has haunted me for a month.

Among my other evils was poverty. This compelled me frequently to do things which disgusted me, and sometimes to submit to insult. Gorgeous dreams of wealth have floated through my mind, all tinged with the golden hue of fancy, but I turned from them ever to slavish occupations—to a state of harrowing perplexities and care—to privation—scorn—solitude and anguish. I recollect having once thought that I could be happy—perfectly happy—(I was lying on a sunny-green bank, on a summer morning on the verge of a forest,) if there were no other human being in the world.

At this time, in the country village where I resided, there came to board a lady with her little son. She was not rich, nor of high rank, but very beautiful, and of a temper not unlike what I fancy my own might have been, had fortune blessed me with a happier lot. Her sensibilities were keen; her mind clear and intelligent; and I never knew any one with a disposition altogether so amiable and affectionate, tempered with so admirable a sense of propriety, and such uniform, all-pervading good sense. Her person was an emblem of her character. It was while looking on her face that the first gleam of rapture I ever knew, struck upon my soul! I was (why should I conceal it now?) occupying a menial situation in the house where she was residing that summer. Every body scoffed at me. I had no means of resistance, and flight would have conducted me only to new scenes of insult and pain. One morning, a person possessing some authority in the house, arraigned me for an offence—I do not even yet distinctly know what it was—I hurled back the accusation on his own head, with furious execrations. Dog, wretch, brute, were the words most usual in his mouth to me, and those with which at present he greeted me, till his rage grew so ungovernable that he seized a large stick, and was in the act of inflicting a blow upon me, when I rushed on him in a rage as fierce as his own, and prostrated him at full length on the floor. When Mr. B., the master of the family, returned, I was accused anew before him, and my foe appealed to the lady who had been accidentally present. I turned upon her scowling, and then looked down on the ground, muttering to myself "they are all leagued against me," and expecting, as usual, to hear myself represented as a guilty and noisome reptile, altogether in the wrong.

If the veins of any lover of music ever thrilled at a rare passage, so did mine as I listened to her reply. She expressed in a few words, the most graceful, the most endearing I had ever heard—exactly the truth. She explained my situation and feelings, which I had never been able to do. She represented my conduct as natural, and my anger at the accusation as proper. She spoke of me as a lonely and unhappy being, who had many good qualities, if people would but use me well; and conveyed a rebuke so touching and tremulous against the unfeeling cruelty of my foe—so precisely what I would have said if I had possessed the power—that when I turned my eyes on her lovely face, to thank her with a look, I was so blinded with tears as to be unable to distinguish any object. That simple office of kindness bound me to her forever. I was always afterwards more kindly treated in the house; even my foe came to me, gave his hand, and said he was sorry for what had happened. The feeling of gratitude which rose in my heart, became absolutely painful. Gratitude did I say? It was love—hopeless love.

I have omitted until now, to describe the young boy, her son. He was a miniature of herself. Gleamings of her face were perpetually flashing over his features. His society to me became soon a source of the strangest fascination. I am naturally ardent; and there is something in the innocent brightness of a sweet child, that charms me perfectly. It is no wonder that our Redeemer-blessed little children. Nature has formed nothing more fresh, pure, and winning. So far from having any desire of evil, they cannot even comprehend it. They are better beings than we. Guilt and woe to them are unintelligible things, and their thought is perpetual sunshine, varied by shadows more fleeting than summer clouds.

My attachment to this little fellow, was strengthened by my feelings towards his mother. I loved her. Yet I knew that even she must have smiled had she known it. In her presence, therefore, I was by no means at ease. But he acted on me like a spell, which called up all the new delight I owed to her, without the awe which she inspired.

If the innumerable and continually recurring charms of this child's manner impressed me so powerfully, the reader can form some idea of the affectionate solicitude with which he was regarded by his mother. I never saw an interest so strong as that with which she watched his growing beauties; and I trembled to reflect upon the chances of a life which to me had been so dark and wretched. I too had been once the idol of a mother, who turned not away from the repulsive marks which angry nature had stamped on my countenance. She too had suffered fears and woven hopes of my future career, and dreamed that Providence might compensate me for defects of person, by shedding the light of prosperity on my path. Alas! her forehead is in the dust, and my course has ever been wild, dark, and lonely. No hope has cheered my steps—no love has soothed my sorrow.

What other men make a merit of bearing, even with all the added charms of friendship and affection, I have endured alone. By alone, I do not mean the solitude of the desert, but of the heart. Why may not this boy, though his face beams with radiant happiness, though grace and beauty are shed upon him like a light—why may he not also feel the weight of miseries as dreadful as those which had afflicted me? Under my uncouth exterior I cherished a tender heart, which misery had rendered at once sympathetic and melancholy; and I shuddered to watch that exquisitely graceful communion between the mother and child, which in sincerity, disinterestedness, and heavenly purity, passes all other human feelings.

I am writing these lines in the cell of a mad-house. It overlooks a lovely scene of hill and dale and velvet meadow; white buildings are peeping from under heavy masses of foliage. I can just distinguish their angles, their chimnies, and ever and anon, the gleaming of their snowy fences through the trees. In the distance a river spreads its golden waves. The sun is setting, and the air is full of crimson light. How like a cold iron into my inward soul goes the thought, that I am regarding this scene through a grated window. Whatever may be the cause, I am touched; and the recollection of the incident which I am about narrating moistens my eyes, and makes my heart tremble and recoil. One day, even such a time as the present, a glowing, mellow afternoon in summer, I found the child alone playing in the garden. I had an errand to execute at the distance of a half a mile, and yielding to the pleasure I derived from his companionship, (if companionship it may be called—the temporary relation between one bright and blest as a creature of heaven, and one blasted like a perturbed and fallen spirit,) I took him with me. Our way wound along green woods and undulated meadows. We passed by vines and flowers, and through quiet valleys, till we came to a lake of extraordinary depth, and celebrated through the surrounding country for the richness of its wooded shores, and the transparency of its limpid waters. On one side were picturesque rocks, overhung with heavy foliage; on the other a snowy beach encircled it; and here and there a field of verdant grass ran so close to the edge of the stream, that the high tide washed the fresh turf. In the circle of this little lake or pond, rose a rock, three sides of which were perpendicular, and the fourth a very steep acclivity. It was, perhaps, hardly large enough to hold fifteen or twenty persons. One stunted cedar grew in a cleft; and beneath, on the slender stock of soil which had accidentally accumulated upon its summit, a few wild flowers, by their brilliant leaves of white and blue, could be discerned from the shore where we stood. That beautiful scene and rich hour! will they never leave my recollection? We stood on a rock; the child took off his shoes, and bathed his little naked feet in the water. At his side lay a fairy-looking green boat, so small and light that it swayed gently to the gray waves. To spring in and row across to the small island was but a natural impulse, and with the delighted child I landed on it, and clambered to the top. I well remember the laugh of music with which he reached the height, and commenced plucking the flowers for his mother. At that moment a demon took possession of my heart; for only some wandering spirit of evil could have whispered me to an act, which is as surprising to me as to all the world. It struck me that I would play off a jest upon him, and amuse myself with his surprise; and accordingly, while he was absorbed in his employment, and while the words of silver sound were dropping from his lips, I stole down noiselessly into the boat, pushed off, and had reached the shore before he suspected my absence. On discovering it, however, his presence of mind instantly deserted him, and his manner underwent a change, which surprised and alarmed me. He screamed, he raised his little hands to me, and approached so near the brink, on the abrupt side of the rock, as to actually hang over it. I could not swim, and the boat which I had left unmoored, parted from the shore, and glided away out of my reach. Horror seized me. I had no power to move. Remorse for what I had done, terror at his peril, struck me for a moment into the inanimation of a statue. My apathy was interrupted by a plunge. I saw the bleak rock deserted. A faint cry was smothered in the bubbling wave; then the struggling and splashing ceased, the long circling ripples came gently to the shore; my head reeled, and I fell to the ground. When I awoke to consciousness the sun had set, and the moon was shining. I had no distinct knowledge of what had happened, and sat down on a broken rock, to recall my scattered senses. While thus sitting my attention was attracted by an object floating near the shore, and sparkling in the pale light. Memory rushed on me like a torrent, and I fled into the woods. What happened to me I have not sufficient interest in now to relate. I know one absorbing thought haunted me—the dread of that mother's look. I had rather die at the stake, than meet it even yet. They say she is dead, and I have been tried for murder.

Now I am here for a madman. If I were not mad before, this is enough to make me so. Such looks as I have caught from some around me. Such scenes as I have beheld. Sometimes I am awakened at midnight by shrieks and groans, and the cry of murder. Heavens! how it rings through these silent halls. Yesterday I saw a party passing through the grounds. This boy, whom they say I killed, was with them. He has grown much, and is very noble-looking. It is a tyranny by which I am immured here; and I heard last night the mother's voice screaming, because the keeper was beating her. They conceal her son's escape from her, and that has made her mad. She waved her hankerchief to me yesterday through the grate, but some brutal wretch dragged her away.

FINE ARTS.

THE AMERICAN ACADEMY.

THIS exhibition has been recently opened, and the venerable president and directors have procured more than two hundred paintings, of which many are beautiful, and several exquisite. There is still the same inappropriate preponderance of portraits which drew forth complaints last year. In defence of this, it may be said, that many of the artists sending in the productions, are portrait painters by profession, and consequently, solicit the public favor by presenting their pieces here for inspection. We should think, however, that for this purpose one would be sufficient, or they might at least exert a little extra labor, and paint heads of persons known, and the preservation of whose features is a matter of interest to the community at large.

It is also to be regretted, that an exhibition could not be afforded of new paintings. Some of those now offered, have long been the standing theme of public observation; or at least we should be pleased to see larger additions made to the collection. The question naturally arises, are our artists idle, or do they receive so inadequate a remuneration for their labors, as to discourage their industry? Perhaps no artist requires arduous more imperatively than the painter. It is true, that without patronage, he may starve, and therefore there is, on the part of the public, a kind of duty to encourage and reward him who abandons the more certain and lucrative walks of business, to purify their tastes and minister to them pleasures of an elevated character. But on the other hand, an artist must make himself known. In a series of pictures, resembling Wilkie's in subject, and executed with the same power visible in many contributions in this collection, the artist would doubtless reap a pecuniary reward, at least indirectly, from the reputation he would establish.

There are a number of offerings also in an unfinished state, or rather, finished badly. It is a pity that an artist feels so little respect on coming before the public. If ardor is requisite, so is patient labor and careful revision; but we shall be more minute in noticing them individually. Our space this week only permits of a few brief observations which may be continued hereafter.

No. 1. One of the most prominent and best known. Sir Thomas Lawrence's admirable full length portrait of Benjamin West, representing him as delivering his last lecture to the Royal Academy, on the theory of light and color. Some writer has remarked that old age is repulsive, as conveying to the mind an idea of weakness and decay. The venerable and imposing head of our talented and distinguished countryman, as here brought to life by the inimitable artist, strikes the mind very differently. His majestic appearance indicates genius and wisdom, and the beholder is as much struck with reverence for the subject, as admiration of the great skill in the delineation.

63. The Dying Gladiator. An undoubted original of Annibal Caracci. Very powerful and true to nature, though perhaps not at first so striking. It is easy to attract notice by exaggerating the reality. Where it is represented accurately in painting, it is often overlooked. In the present instance, you derive a great additional interest from a prolonged examination. It is a strange principle of human nature, but perfection, especially in an art, generally disappoints at first, or is liable to be disregarded. The best music is not that which is admired the most at a hearing. The finest literary composition does not strike, nor the most beautiful face charm from a cursory view, half so much as inferior specimens. There is something in true excellence, which, appealing either to the imagination or the reason, does not become visible immediately to the sight. The Dying Gladiator is in some degree an example. Study it out, and you are awe-struck. The vanquished combatant is prostrated in the agony of death. There is about him no radiant beauty—no demoniacal distortion of either the face or the person—but you perceive that the strength has passed from his limbs, and the hope from his heart. His left arm is half disengaged from the shield, and his right lies powerless by his side, in a position beautifully expressive of the languor of approaching dissolution.

43. Interior view of a Gothic cathedral, by light of flambeaux; by Henry Stienwick the Old; the figures by Vander Velde. The genuine pictures of this master are rare. The beholder will be delighted with a steady observation of this finished and valuable delineation. The dim aisles, the lofty and shadowy ceilings, the rich carved work, and the altars illumined by the torch light. Observe the archway or door on your right. The eye gradually pierces away in through the gloom. The delusion here is almost magical.

95. Miniature copy of Wilkie's "Blind Fiddler," by Hopkins, of London. Take care you do not overlook this beautiful little gem among some of greater magnitude, but less value. Most of our readers must be familiar with the engraving from the original. Wilkie is the Burns of painting, and is delightfully copied by Hopkins. This glance at the cottage circle, the forms of the children and their attitudes, the effect of the music on all the highly finished group, is as good as "the Cottar's Saturday Night," though of a different character.

133. Landscape—view of Lake George from the ruins of Fort George. Ward. A soft, dreamy, and rich transcript of one of the loveliest scenes in the world. It argues well for the taste and liberality of our city, that these very creditable pieces command a sale.

199. Landscape, with cattle and figures. Bourdon. This painting is one of the most exquisite in the room, and shows like nature itself. The great variety, ease, grace, and spirit of attitude among the cattle, the perfect finish of the coloring, render it choice and valuable. The artist has left the critic room but for admiration.

24. A French landscape—the Halt of Travelers. Bourdon. Another by the same masterly hand. It has been injured by some accident, but you recognize its extreme merit.

211. Blindman's Buff. L. Krimmel. A lovely thing, much in the style of Wilkie.

212. The Cut Finger, by the same. Spirited and striking in every respect. The consternation of the boy who has suffered the accident, with that of the whole group, is portrayed to the life.

213. The Favorite Bird, (from Barnett,) also by L. Krimmel. The man's face faultless, the child peeping into the basket inimitable. These three are small, but delightfully conceived, and marked by a pervading excellence of execution.

2. Landscape scene in Glen Bruer. Rev. John Thompson, Edinburgh. A fine rich picture.

4. Spaniel Dogs. Weir. The figure in the front very spirited, and so is the head in the background.

3. Landscape. Prior Park, near Bristol, England.

6. Landscape. Prior Park. Second view. The two last are by Colonel Trumbull, and are happily executed. The foliage, in particular, is done with softness and accuracy.

8. The Brigand Alarmed. S. F. B. Morse. The brigand and his wife are hidden in a cavern from the view of strangers without. The ruffian holds his blunderbuss, prepared for an attack, thinking the noise he hears proceeds from travelers; but the woman, seeing they are soldiers, restrains him from coming forward. This picture possesses striking faults as well as beauties. The sky is stiff; the blue Papal states, in the back ground, unworthy the artist. The dress of the female, too, wants the ease of drapery. It has a starched look. The figures are done, however, in a high style; the streaming in of light on the wife's form is admirable, and the man's face fine.

58. View on the Cascadilla, near Ithaca, New-York. G. W. Tyler. This is a young artist, who promises well. The coloring of this sketch is too bright for nature, but the drawing is good, and the branches of the forest, with the luxuriant foliage, finished very delicately and beautifully.

200. Portrait of a Lady. G. W. Tyler. The satin dress in this piece is perfect.

There are several valuable pictures by the old masters, and one or two others of merit. We have, however, only taken a cursory glance, and may have unintentionally overlooked some equally worthy of notice with those above enumerated.

LITERARY NOTICES.

MR. DUNLAP'S HISTORY OF THE AMERICAN STAGE.

AMONG the many works preparing for the press, is one comprising a history of the American stage, by William Dunlap, the worthy vice-president of the National Academy of Design, author of the Life of Cooke, and of many of the early dramatic productions of this country. No one within our knowledge is so well qualified for this task, and from the cursory examination which we have given the manuscript, we believe his execution of it will meet a large share of public attention and favor. By the liberality of the publishers, the Harpers, an arrangement has been effected by means of subscription, to ensure the author the full benefit of such sales as are made in this way. The public, we trust, will come forward in the cause of an individual highly respectable, both for his talents and industry, and his private worth, and place their names on the list of subscribers.

The manuscript being in our possession, we make the following selections from the first and twentieth chapters.

Garrick and the English stage.

"Before we embark with the adventurers who introduced the drama in its living shape, among the English colonists of America, we will look at the state of the stage in the mother country at that period.

"Garrick had reached the summit of fame and perfection in his arduous profession, about the year 1745. He had been rejected by Fleetwood and Rich, the managers of Drury-lane and Covent-garden in 1741, and after a probation at Ipswich, he was received and fostered at the theatre in Goodman's Fields, by his friend Giffard, the predecessor, as proprietor and manager of that place of entertainment, of William Hallam; deservedly called 'the father of the American stage.'

"On the boards of Goodman's Fields theatre, from which ten years after issued the leaders of that company which planted the drama in America, the English Roscius first displayed his unrivalled talents to a London audience, and perfected himself in the art which has immortalized him; embalming his name with that of the far greater artist and man, who 'exhausted worlds and then imagined new.' Let every artist hold in mind that Garrick rose to this height by hard study, and established his reputation as a man and a gentleman, as well as fame for skill in his profession.

"In consequence of the success of Garrick, Goodman's Fields theatre became the centre of attraction. Drury-lane and Covent-garden were deserted. At the end of the season of 1742, Fleetwood was glad to engage both manager and actor. Giffard, now befriended by Garrick, was invited to Drury-lane, and Roscius entered upon the scene of his future triumphs in the brilliant career of fame and fortune."

William Hallam—Father of the American stage.

"Mr. William Hallam succeeded Giffard at Goodman's Fields, becoming the proprietor of Garrick's cradle; rendered famous, but unprofitable, from the circumstance of having had such a nursing. Drury-lane flourished, and the successor of Giffard and Garrick became bankrupt in 1750. This event led to the voyage of discovery planned by the manager, and executed by his brother Lewis; the father of that Lewis Hallam is remembered still as 'old Mr. Hallam.'

"It is well known, that the state of the drama was in 1750 much more brilliant than it has been for the last half century, or is now in Great Britain. The best and greatest men of the country wrote plays and attended their performance. The pit of the theatre was the resort of wit and learning; while fashion, beauty, taste and refinement, the proud and exclusive aristocracy of the land, took their stations in the boxes, surrounding the assemblage of poets and critics below. In the course of our history we may find the causes which have degraded the drama, while every other species of literature and art have been rising in estimation."

Arrival of the first company of comedians in America.

"It is proper, in the early history of the stage in this country, to state many particulars which would be out of place in a record of the affairs of a more recent date. As we have the power to lay before the reader the original proportions in which the receipts of this first company were divided, with the shares assigned to each individual, we shall proceed to do so.

"The number of shares was fixed at eighteen. The number of adult performers was twelve, including the manager, each being entitled to one share. Mr. Hallam had another share as manager. Four shares were assigned to the property, and one share was allowed for the manager's three children. It is to be presumed that the four shares assigned for the property, were to be divided between the brothers, as the profits of the partnership; otherwise it is hard to say whence profit was to accrue.

"Having despatched these preliminaries, we will attend this band of adventurers on their voyage of experiment. Early in the month of May, 1752, they embarked in the "Charming Sally," captain Lee, and after a voyage of six weeks, a short passage in those days, arrived safely at Yorktown, Virginia.

"How many reflections does the name of this place suggest? What recollections to the American of the present day! Yorktown, the scene of that great drama of real life, or rather the catastrophe of the military drama, which secured never-dying laurels on the brow of that man in 1780, who, sent by governor Dinwiddie, in 1753, the year after the arrival of our adventurers, to summon the French posts on the Ohio, to surrender to the arms of England, is called by the writers of the Universal History—one Major Washington. This Major Washington very probably witnessed the first representations of plays in Virginia, and one at least (Lewis Hallam) of the same company of players, performed repeatedly before him, when he was the first magistrate of the greatest republic the world had ever seen, and the theme of eulogium to every enlightened or philanthropic statesman the world possessed."

Extract from the auto-biography of the Author.

"That the reader may decide how far the person who now assumed the direction of that powerful and complicated engine, the theatre of a great metropolis, was fitted for the task and responsibility, it is necessary that a brief retrospect of his past life should be taken. The opinion of the writer is, (an opinion perhaps founded upon the result of the experiment,) that he was not fitted for the arduous task. Had it been his lot to direct a theatre patronized by an enlightened government, having no care but that of selecting such dramas, and such performers as would best promote the great end of human happiness, he might, perhaps, have been entitled to the grateful remembrance of his fellow men; but he was now forced, by the circumstances already detailed, to burthen himself with a hazardous speculation, which, as far as it had been tried, had proved unsuccessful; and the power he once possessed of meeting temporary losses and providing the means of success, had been lamentably diminished. Instead of having an unembarrassed mind, whose entire powers could be directed to that which should be the object of such an institution, he was tempted to seek resources for the supply of the treasury, and the fulfilment of his monied engagements. Instead of studying to gain the approbation of the wise, pressing necessities turned his thoughts to the common methods of attracting the vulgar.

"The subject of the present chapter was born in the city of Perth Amboy, on the nineteenth of February, 1766. The writer has endeavored to avoid the much-dreaded pronoun "I," in the previous part of this work, but in what must be known as auto-biography, it would appear affectation; besides, a change of style, even thus unimportant, may be agreeable to the reader, and to leave the theatre for a time may render a return to it, perhaps, pleasant; certainly less tiresome.

"My father was Samuel Dunlap, from the town of Londonderry, in the north of Ireland. My mother's maiden name was Sergeant, and her mother's Stone; both natives of New-Jersey, and of English descent; as were all the original families in that part of New-Jersey which lies adjacent to its then capital. The names of Sergeant, Stone, Barron, Bloodgood, Freeman, Heriot, and others, testify this as fully as those of Van Rensselaer, Knickerbocker, Schermerhorn, Tenbroek and others, show the origin of the New-York or New-Netherland settlement in that great metropolis, and its adjacent villages and islands of Bergen Haerlam, Nassau and Staaten.

"My father" had been a soldier in his youth, and fought in famous battles;" and the name, originally Dunlop, is now well known in the world of literature by distinguished authors bearing it, and more generally as connected with Scott's Jenny Deans and the Dunlop cheeses.

"Among my earliest recollections are those associated with sickness, and the relief derived from being carried in the arms of my father. I was an only child. When old enough, I listened to the story of his early life with intense interest. He spoke of crossing the deep with the army that came to wrest Canada from the French, for he was an officer in the forty-seventh, and carried the colors of Wolfe's own. He told of the difficulties they encountered on the great river St. Lawrence—of the attempts upon the fleet by the French fire-ships, and the gallant cheerings of the English tars, as they towed off from their destination, and rendered harmless the blazing engines of destruction—of the landing, and of scaling the banks, to gain the plains of Abraham—of his being wounded and carried off the field, suspended in his sash, and borne to the ships, the pioneers throwing down their tools, supposing they saw their young commander disabled and leaving them—for Wolfe and his regiment wore that day one and the same plain uniform of scarlet without facings. In short, before I knew the meaning of the tale, I had heard all the circumstances of that important day, which fixed the destiny of this great continent of North America—which decided that from Hudson's Bay to Mexico, the descendants of Englishmen, or those deriving from them their civil and religious principles, should spread the language of Shakspeare and Milton, and plant the independent spirit of Hampden and Pym, throughout a moiety of the globe."

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

Mrs. Lincoln's Familiar Lectures on Botany.—The third edition of this excellent work is just published at Hartford, by F. J. Huntington. Several interesting additions are made. It has met with general praise, and is in great demand, we learn, in the higher class of academies. We are pleased to find the delightful science, which it is intended to illustrate, becoming a subject of so much attention, and trust the intelligent author will continue her useful labors.

Observations on the Rights of the British Colonies to Representation in the Imperial Parliament.—We get this volume from the little town of Three Rivers, Lower Canada, where nothing of the kind has ever before been published. It has been very favorably received in the provinces, and praised by the leading journals, and contains matter of interest. The author is Mr. David Chisholme.

The Ambitious Student.—These conversations are from the press of the Harpers, being a collection of pieces from the Monthly Magazine, by Mr. Bulwer. They are delightfully written,—fervid, philosophical, and rich in learned illustrations. The book will share the triumphant success of Eugene Aram and the other novels.

Dr. Lardner's Cabinet of History.—The last number of this series of valuable and instructive volumes, consists of the "History of the Italian Republics; or, the origin, progress, and fall of Italian freedom, by J. C. L. De Sismondi." It would indeed be a work of supererogation on our part, to commend a composition of Sismondi's to the notice of the reading public. The elegant historian has already gained too many admirers to render simple praise necessary, and we announce the republication of the production, by Carey and Lea, rather for the information of the reader than from any hope of adding to the author's reputation.

Secrecy.—A poem, by Thomas Power. This is a second edition, by Morse and Povey, Boston. It is finely printed, and contains good writing.

THE STAGE.

GLANCES AT THE DRAMA.

You must name his name, and half his face must be seen through the lion's neck; and he himself must speak through, saying thus, or to the same defect—Ladies, or fair ladies, I would wish you, or I would request you, or I would entreat you, not to fear, not to tremble: my life for yours. If you think I came hither as a lion, it were pity of my life; no, I am no such thing; I am a man as other men are;—and there, indeed, let him name his name; and tell them plainly that he is Snug the Joiner.—Shakspeare.

I assure the public, upon my honor, when I undertook to write about the theatres, I had no idea what a nest of hornets I was thrusting my hand into. I am a quiet old gentleman, and do not fight. My courage, as well as my skill, lies altogether in my pen; and I am withal a sincere patriot, and anxious to improve the drama, which I look upon as one of the most important engines for the diffusion of knowledge, as well as of pleasure, which can influence a people; plays having been often proscribed by governments, and sometimes revolutions having been traced to an opera. But the postman this morning brings me in such a load of letters from persons conceiving themselves alluded to in my remarks, or their friends, that I almost despair of carrying my design into execution. Some of these epistles are very brief and waspish, and some appeal to my feelings; putting me into a very awkward position, as, notwithstanding all my faults, I am really tender-hearted. One is from a noted murderer, who, although his language is polite and gentle, I fear will some day or other assassinate me; and another from a French marshal, who threatens one of Sir William Draper's "Gothic appeals to cold iron;" and if he fights as well as he talks English, I am little better than a dead man.

Letter from the Marshal.

"MR. SEDLEY—Sir: This is to warn you that your strictures on the stage are severe, unjust, partial, abusive, and (without meaning any especial reference to myself,) blind to modest merit. That which ought to be praised, you blame, that which ought to be blamed, you praise; and many things which you attribute to us injured people as faults, let me inform your ignorance, sir, are perfections. You notice points which are unworthy of notice, and pass silently over fine incidents which every good critic would designate as such. For example, I am constantly in the habit of appearing in a glorious struggle for fame while living, and after death I come on as one of my aids-de-camp, and follow my own body to the grave. You might perceive, if you had any real discernment, my sorrowful expression of face as I mourn over my departed worth, and see myself committed to my mother earth without a tear.

FRENCH MARSHAL."

The letter from the Thunder is rather alarming, as its resentment might be serious.

Letter from the Thunder.

"MR. SEDLEY—You may think yourself exceedingly witty, sir, on me; as if it were not my duty to stop bellowing when anybody on the stage is speaking. And if I have ever happened to peal before the Lightning, you ought to know, since you pretend to an acquaintance with the affairs behind the scenes, that I have to hail and rain as well as thunder, which is more than the managers ought to put upon me, it being as much against justice as against nature. When a man of authority, lately visited this establishment from London, on a pecuniary expedition, he retrenched the company so greatly, as to set at total defiance all Adam Smith's ideas on "the division of labor." He annihilated, without any ceremony, a whole host of venerable kings, dukes, lords and commons. He cut down our standing army, thinned the pavy list sadly, turned several nymphs, sylphs, and fairy-queens out of doors, wands and all; put the Lightning on half salary, and frightened me, the Thunder, out of my wits. Since that period I have been driven to do double duty, and therefore am much hurt at your animadversions. My friend, the Wind, is also sadly discomfited. Although he blusters a good deal officially, like many other worthies, and now and then wrecks a ship, or heaves up an oak, or two by the roots, yet I assure you, he is very amiable and meek hearted in reality, and was really out of spirits the other night, when he had finished blowing, on the perusal of your attack on him. He desires his respects to you, and says if he did not break out at the proper moment, it is the fault of the call-boy, and not his own. He invariably rises as soon as he receives his notice, and endeavors always to frighten the audience according to his ability. I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

THE THUNDER."

Letter from a Devil.

"MY DEAR FRIEND—From a long personal acquaintance with you I am desirous not to be uncivil, or to say any thing to alter the terms we stand on with each other. Let me however express my surprise that you have neglected writing something about me, and the favor I enjoy in the theatre. I am one of those who come on in Der Freischutz, and wish thus publicly to thank the managers for their liberality in allowing me my abundant quantity of fire and smoke in the grand incantation scene. You know, sir, that on that occasion, we roll forth such an ocean of sulphureous smoke and white fire, as to set all the audience coughing. The box doors are flung open; the ladies cover their faces with their handkerchiefs, turning their backs, and it is rumored that an apoplectic fat gentleman, in the pit, was strangled, and a young woman with the asthma, in the boxes, died of sneezing, no one being able to discover the mournful catastrophe for half an hour, till after the smoke had disappeared. My advantages in this particular I esteem highly, and fearlessly assert that nobody will refuse to receive them as a substitute for the weak choruses which sometimes mar this famous opera. Yours,

FIRST DEVIL."

Letter from the Young Assassin who turns his toes out.

"I am, Mr. Critic, by education a dancer, and ought to be put only in light characters, wherein I promise you, I am not below mediocrity. It is against my will that I am a cut-throat, and therefore my toes will turn out in spite of all I can do to the contrary. If I am cast in parts which ought to be filled by rough un-mannerly fellows, you must not expect me to speak big and look fierce, as it goes against my nature, and my attempts would only make the audience laugh. Besides, after I have murdered three or four gentlemen in the tragedy, I am sent on to dance a horn-pipe between the play and farce, which detracts much from my reputation as a ruffian, and keeps me from terrifying the spectators. Since your papers were printed about me, I have also observed myself narrowly, and made a grand discovery. My dancing-master has drilled me so effectually, that I believe I go through his motions in my sleep, and when I have any address to make before the audience, I involuntarily commence in the first position; as I grow warm I change to the second, and, if the sentiment is tragic, I gradually move into the third, and so end. I so far forgot myself the other night, in an interesting drama, that I came forward with a saxet to inform a deserter that the moment was arrived for him to be shot; and being left to deliver a melancholy speech over the body of a young lady who had drowned herself for the loss of her lover, I had nearly sprung up and cut a pigeon wing, when the scene changed and prevented me.

"Hoping hereafter that you will treat me with more indulgence, I remain,

THE YOUNG GENTLEMEN THAT PLAYS THE ROBBERS."

Letter from a Supernumerary.

SIR—I am one of that class of respectable personages whom you deal with most unjustly. I am, sir, a leader of supernumeraries in the theatre, and although we do not receive the high-sounding praises which your star-tragedians have heaped upon them, nor the honied and sugared terms bestowed upon lady-stars—particularly vocalists—although we do not get credit for deep feeling, pathos, bursts of passion, high-wrought delineation, and have not bodies inhabited by the spirit of Shakspeare, nor do we warble, and trill, and execute difficult divisions with the facility of a nightingale, nor deport ourselves as if we "always remembered of what sex" we are of; nevertheless, for numbers of prisoners correctly taken, and treated with either gross inhumanity or laudable magnanimity, according as the author has determined, no man ever arrived at greater perfection than myself. It is on the valuable efforts of such men as myself that the drama depends for support, and when we are sent on in a pair of pantaloons, the casts-off of such a man as Richings or Foot, we, having persons of moderate dimensions, it is shameful to turn us into ridicule. Why, sir, I have served my apprenticeship in London, and for five years played the White Bear in La Pousse, with great eclat at the English opera-house. I then quitted the establishment, because the manager insisted, as I was killed early in the piece, that I should go on for a savage man in the last scene; this I refused to do. Well, sir, after having often taken Macready, Kean and Warde by the collar, and conducted them to prison with much propriety, in divers plays, besides having acted all kinds of beasts most naturally, I thought myself entitled to appear with effect in this country; but here, sir, I find it quite another thing; my talents are doubly taxed, and I am bullied on all sides. Why, sir, I never remember having a word from the Times, Morning Post, or Chronicle in my life, while I acted in London; but here, if one misses the least thing, "You'll be in the Mirror, my boy," says one friend; "You'll be in the American," says another—and then, sir, we catch it just as bad from the stage-managers—for instance, in the piece of Napoleon, for which the manager advertised that he needed two hundred able-bodied soldiers, I and my friends, in number about forty, do the business of that multitude of men; yet, we get no better pay nor more credit for it. The other night, after I had ascended Mount St. Bernard three times, as a corporal of the old guard, wheeled up the same cannon six times, and passed muster, as a pioneer with a long beard, twice, I was running down the back way to be ready to go up and catch Mr. Placide's horse at the proper place, as an orderly dragoon, and I only just stooped to pull the hair of my beard out of my mouth, which was choking me, when up comes one of those gentlemen, either Barry-more or Barry-less, I forget which—"You skulking rascal," says he, "what are you doing there? Don't you know that you have got to bring up the flank-company of four regiments more? You will throw the army into confusion, and we shall be put in that infernal Mirror. I'll fine you a shilling, you villain." "Sir," says I, with much and justly offended dignity, "do as you please; but I go on no more; for what between you and these editors, an actor's life is worse than that of a hackney-coach horse." Yours, &c. AN OLD SUPER.

A number of other similar communications have come to hand, which convince me, that although the errors I have mentioned really exist, I have sometimes ascribed them to the wrong source. Nothing can be farther from my thought than to offend any one. Indeed, rather than do it, I would discontinue these essays, although I learn they are a good deal read and commented on behind the scenes, and among theatrical people in general. I give notice, however, to all concerned, that I mean to go on, and I particularly invite any one who has a complaint to make, like the Wind and the Thunder, as well as any one who may hit upon a just theme of praise, to write me forthwith, taking care to exclude all private malice, and also to pay the post if they live at a distance. For hints of this kind I shall acknowledge my gratitude, as indeed I should for any on other subjects. SEDLEY.

THE NEW-YORK STAGE, ETC.

THE NEW OPERA.

The "White Lady, or the Spirit of Avenel," was produced, for the first time in America, at the Park theatre, on Monday last. The charming music of Boieldieu's Dame Blanche has been skillfully blended with that of the Italian school—and a most delightful selection is the result.

The following is a brief sketch of this drama:—The Baron of Avenel, a catholic, and staunch adherent of James the second, had been obliged to leave his domains in Scotland, and retire to the continent upon the accession of William the third to the throne of Great Britain; previous to which, his only son, Julian, had been kidnapped, as it was supposed by pirates, from his sudden disappearance. The Lady Avenel had, on the loss of her son, bestowed her parental affection upon Louise, an adopted child; and, on the departure of the family abroad, she was accompanied by this child. After remaining absent some time, Lord and Lady Avenel died; and the latter, on her death-bed, entrusted to Louise the secret of the existence of an immense sum of money, accumulated from the sale of the English estates of the family, the title-deeds of which were concealed in an ebony casket within a certain statue, supposed to be the resemblance of a spirit, termed the White Maid, which tradition asserted watched over the house of which she had been once a member. This statue remained in the hall of the castle of Avenel, in Scotland; and thither Louise, upon the death of her guardian, was conveyed by a steward of the family. Her instructions from the dying benefactress were to buy in the estates of Avenel, which, by attainder, fell to the crown, and would consequently be put up at auction. During Louise's residence abroad she had nursed a wounded officer, who had been shot down in battle in Germany, and had formed an attachment for him. This officer eventually proves to be the kidnapped child, Julian.

The piece opens with a moonlight view of Avenel castle and the well, supposed to be the favorite haunt of the White Spirit. Fairies of the mountain and the mere are met on this spot, and the following chorus is sung:

The moon her silvery lustre sheds,
The stars their paler lights renew;
And we have strewn on violet beds,
The effulgent pearls of the evening dew.

Then dance the magic circlet round,
On spangled mead, in glade or dell;
And breathe a strain on fairy ground,
To the ladywhite of the haunted well.

On fragrant banks we'll soon repose,
Where tears are in the violet's eye,
Where liquid pearls adorn the rose,
While the sparkling stream is wand'ring by.

Then gaily dance, ye moonlight fays,
And sing to aid the potent spell;
Till zephyrs waft your breezy lays
To the ladywhite of the haunted well.

The White Spirit (Mrs. Wallack) rises from the well, and informs them that the domains she protects are about to be bought at auction by the rapacious steward, Gaveston; but that she is determined to thwart his design by a spell, which she intends to complete through the medium of the orphan Louise, (Mrs. Austin), whom she then summons before her. Louise appears, and sings in a dream, an exquisite melody. This vision song we shall endeavor to present at some future period to the readers of the Mirror. It is a charming morceau, and has a harp accompaniment, in addition to fine imitations by the wind instruments, in Rossini's best style. The White Lady, having fixed upon Louise as the means of saving the family of Avenel, and predisposed her mind for that purpose, disappears, and the scene changes to a landscape.

The highland tenants of Avenel are here met to celebrate the christening of Farmer McPhear's child; but he and his wife, Ailie McPhear, (Placide and Mrs. Starpe), meet their friends quite disconsolate at being disappointed in finding a godfather for the boy. At this moment George Brown, alias, the lost heir Julian, (Jones), comes down the mountain, and asks the hospitality of the farmer. This is instantly granted, and he in return consents to become the godfather of the boy, to the great delight of the young couple, especially when they find that he has the honor to bear a commission in the army. He explains that he is ignorant of his relations; but was bred up from childhood by a seaman, from whom he decamped on account of ill treatment, entered the army, and by his gallantry had won a commission. Much of this is told in Boieldieu's beautiful music. They treat him with every attention. In the course of conversation, the intended sale of the Avenel estate is mentioned; and the tradition of the White Spirit is described in a charming ballad by Ailie McPhear, supported by the chorus. There is likewise a pretty duet between Ailie and Brown, the subject of which is the jealousy of her husband. It is extremely arch and piquant. At this juncture of time, a farmer, (Blakeley), one of the tenants of Avenel, drops a letter on the stage, purposely in the way of McPhear, who picks it up, and with horror finds that it is a summons from the dreaded White Spirit, commanding him to meet her that night at the castle.

He here explains to George Brown and his wife, in great trepidation, that he is under a promise to this spirit, and that he owes his fortune entirely to her. His tale runs thus:—he had, in early life, been unfortunate in business, and one day wandering near the ruins of the old castle, he complained aloud of his unhappy lot, and declared that if the White Lady would furnish him relief, he would sell himself to her, body and soul. At that moment a purse dropped at his feet, with a paper, declaring that the terms were accepted; and, from that time he had thriven in the world; his farming stock was replenished; his business increased; he married a pretty woman, and had become the father of a fine child; but now all his happiness was lost by this summons from the dreaded spirit. George Brown gallantly undertakes to relieve the fears of the worthy couple, by becoming his deputy, and this produces the finale to the first act—Boieldieu's splendid trio, in which the terrors of the farmer and his wife are contrasted by the gaiety of George, and the whole takes place during a thunder storm.

The second act opens with a beautiful recitative and cavatina, by Louise, the subject from Rossini's opera, (by the by, one very little known,) Il Pietro di Paragone. It appears that she is aware of the determination of the steward, Gaveston, (Thorne), to lay out his ill-gotten wealth in the purchase of his former master's estate; and she, influenced by the spell of the White Spirit, and following the late Lady Avenel's injunctions, is determined to prevent his purpose. Consequently assuming the name of the supposed spirit, she has written to McPhear, with the intention of making him bid for the estate in her name; and she is further induced to do so from her knowledge that the purse of money bestowed upon the credulous farmer, under the name of the White Lady, was merely a gift of benevolence of the late Lord Avenel, who had relieved the farmer's distresses, and avoided his expression of thanks by working on his superstition. She, therefore, expects a visit from McPhear, as in duty bound. Gaveston and Margaret, an old nurse, (Mrs. Wheatley), here make their appearance, and Louise prevails on the former, who assumes the rights of master of the house, to receive a visitor. She quits the room to prepare for her project. George Brown arrives, as the representative of the farmer, and is allowed to occupy that which is supposed to be the haunted room. Louise appears to him, in the course of the night, as the White Spirit, and enjoins him to bid for the estate. On the following morning the auction commences; and, to Gaveston's great horror and astonishment, he is outbid by George Brown, and the estates of Avenel are actually knocked down to the rightful heir, who has no property of his own, but obeys the orders of the supposed spirit. This act contains a fine duet, by Auber, between George Brown and Gaveston; Boieldieu's admirable invocation to the White Lady; and the scène and the duo, between La Dame Blanche and Georges Broune. The auction chorus is likewise given faithfully, the spirited bidding of the parties and the general effect being closely adhered to; and this forms the finale to the second act.

The third act commences with the appearance of Louise and the old nurse, Margaret, employed in a fruitless search for the statue of the White Lady, which contains the treasure previously alluded to, and with which Louise expects to pay the purchase money of the estate, bought in George Brown's name. The statue has disappeared: Louise is in despair at the ruin of her project, and the certainty that her lover (for she has recognized him) will be thrown into prison as an impostor, in the event of his not making the purchase money good. Under these circumstances, remembering that her deceased patroness fully believed in the existence of a supernatural being, who watched over the family, and had even taught her a rhyme, which was supposed to bring the spirit to the aid of the family if in distress, Louise proceeds to try its effect, and here follows a scene of deep interest. The harp and organ are used most effectively, and the spirit appears to Louise; and, on retiring, a secret pannel flies open and discovers the wished-for statue, standing on its pedestal, with the casket in its extended hand. Louise, who has been terror-struck at the appearance of the spirit, rises from her knees and seizes the welcome object. A highly finished bravura, by Guglielmi, expressive of thanksgiving follows, most brilliantly executed by Mrs. Austin. Mr. Herwig's clarinet accompaniment cannot be too warmly praised. The next scene discovers George Brown receiving the homage of the tenants as lord of Avenel, and Boieldieu's celebrated chorus, in which George Brown has a faint recollection of his early days, rendered more vivid by the well-known air sung to him, is admirably given. The old melody of Robin Adair, is here introduced by Boieldieu, in the most masterly manner; and is, in our humble judgment, the chef d'œuvre of the opera. Next follows a scene between Gaveston and McJob (Richings) the sheriff, both rogues playing into each other's hands, who have discovered that Julian is in existence, and is actually, although ignorant of the fact, purchaser of the estate. They agree to suppress the circumstance, and to seize him as an impostor. Louise luckily overhears the plot; and, by coming forward at the moment it is about to fall upon Julian, she brings on the dénouement of the piece, pays the purchase money, is claimed by him as his bride, and the whole is concluded by a brilliant finale, in which the favorite air, Robin Adair, again is heard as a duet.

From the space occupied by the foregoing sketch we are prevented from speaking further of the representation than that, excepting a few little difficulties incidental to all first nights, the opera went off triumphantly, honored by the presence of a numerous audience. Mrs. Austin was brilliant. Jones added to his reputation, already decidedly so great. We shall be more particular in our next.

Upon an intimate acquaintance with the acting of Miss Vincent, at the American theatre, we place her high in the ranks of her profession. She has feeling, passion, and originality. Although sometimes she falls into the manner of Clara Fisher, it is only in the lighter scenes, and before she becomes warmed into the exercise of her own intrinsic powers. There is much in her to be improved, but there is also much to admire. If she will but study.

The Richmond-hill has re-opened, under the management of Barnes. It is an ample pledge of his resolution to satisfy and delight the audience, that among other talented performers, he has engaged Mr. and Mrs. Hilson, Mrs. Barnes, Mr. Green, celebrated for his delineation of Irish characters, Wilson, Hyatt, &c.

We have sincerely lamented the absence of Mrs. Hilson from the stage, and cordially welcome her back. In many of her characters she has no equal.

Mr. Sinclair has been attracting crowded houses in Philadelphia.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE P. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, MAY 26, 1832.

Griffin's Remains.—Of this work the April number of the New Monthly Magazine speaks in terms of great commendation. We subjoin a few extracts, which, while they furnish a specimen of liberal and enlightened criticism, and offer a just tribute to departed worth, take occasion to bestow a well-merited compliment on the rising literature of our country.

"These volumes furnish us with a very interesting view of the character and style of the literature which at this moment prevails in America. It is impossible to read them without being struck with the classical purity of taste which is cultivated in the colleges, and which the best writers who have received their education in these seats of transatlantic learning have recently displayed. Indeed the improvement is at once so remarkable and so rapid, that Great Britain had need look well to herself if she would maintain her superiority. It may be centuries before the new world will produce writers to compete with the greatest names of England; it may never, perhaps, be able to boast of its Shakspeare and Milton, its Bacon and Newton; but having, as well as ourselves, all these glorious models to guide and animate their efforts, the Americans have only to imbibe the spirit of intellectual distinction, and to feel the stirrings of literary ambition, to leave the present generation of European writers far behind them.

"In illustration of the truth of our statement, that America is rising in intellectual character, we refer to the work before us; especially to that portion of it, entitled 'A Tour through Italy and Switzerland, in 1829.' It breathes a pure classical enthusiasm, every object of beauty or sublimity, every circumstance illustrative of men and manners, whatever regards nature or art, the world of matter, the world of mind, all are treated in the spirit of a man who thinks, feels, and writes under the influence of a correct judgment and fervid imagination, informed and chastened with a rich store of previous knowledge and attainments; and it ought likewise to be remembered that these pages were not elaborated for the press; the author poured out the fulness of his soul to relieve himself, and to gratify his friends, but without the most distant view to publication.

"Of Mr. Griffin we have only to add, that at the early age of twenty-five he was suddenly removed from the circle of his friends and the sphere of his usefulness. His loss was severely felt, and what he might have been it is in vain to conjecture. No man was ever better prepared to act a conspicuous part on the great theatre of life, especially in a country like that which gave him birth. So active was his mind, so industrious his habits, that, though he died just as he had reached the point of manhood, 'he left behind him manuscripts which, if printed, would suffice to fill, at least, six octavo volumes.' The present selection has been made with a discriminating judgment. The memoir is peculiarly interesting, and the whole work a valuable addition to transatlantic literature."

Reading proof.—We frequently think a paper sent to press with an uncorrected proof, would create more merriment than very witty articles, accurately printed. It is impossible sometimes to resist a hearty laugh in the midst of this drier of all labors, at the odd things we are made to say by the misplacing of a comma, the omission of a word, or the alteration of a few letters; and a fresh sheet sometimes presents an assemblage of grotesque images, droll enough to break the gravity of a cynic. The effect of this is considerably heightened by the fact that they occur in the most solemn and pathetic parts of a discourse, and have, therefore, a very serious appearance. The other day we found ourselves informing our readers that "children might be led to all kinds of useful knowledge by a regular ludicrous conduct in all those about them;" and a little time previous we recommended them to attend the representation of an old play, which had been just revived, as we were authorized to say that the managers had expunged every "unexceptionable passage." In the next column we paid our grateful vows to heaven, that "a board ocean rolled between us and the turbulent countries of Europe," and ended with a patriotic flourish of trumpets, animating the people to "keep a careful watch over the freedom and wealth which they did not possess."

The New-Bedford Gazette relates the following anecdote, which is appropriate to these remarks:

"Several years ago, a highly respectable and respected lady in a neighboring state, took upon herself the onerous duties of editor and publisher of a literary newspaper. A proof sheet of the first number was forwarded to her, which she returned to the printer with no corrections. It may be necessary here to state, for the information of such readers as are unacquainted with the mysteries of printing, that it is customary, when a letter or point is wrong, to draw a mark through it, and place the desired character in the margin, so that the type can be changed. The proof of the next number was carried to her by the devil of the office, who remarked that he was surprised she could find no errors in the former one. "Why, as to that," replied she, "I cannot say much; for there was nearly a hundred superfluous commas in it, but I sat up all night and scratched them out with a penknife, so neatly, that no one could perceive them."

The Brothers Herrman.—These deservedly popular artists have closed their exhibitions in this city. We are sorry the period of their stay has been so brief. Although they have invariably been honored with the most enthusiastic testimonials of approbation, there must be many who have not heard them, and who would be pleased with a repetition of their concerts. The bass voice of Mr. J. Heard is actually wonderful, and as marked for its richness and sweetness, as its strength. Every body seems delighted with the spirit, taste, and perfect discipline displayed by these gentlemen. We hope they will make us another visit.

Monument to the mother of Washington.—What an appropriate inscription has been chosen for the monument to be erected over the grave of this matron. It tells like a Roman story:—"Mary, the mother of Washington."

SHE IS FAR FROM THE LAND WHERE HER YOUNG HERO SLEEPS.

WORDS BY THOMAS MOORE—AIR COMPOSED BY THE LATE HENRY VER BRUCK—ARRANGED FOR THE SPANISH GUITAR, AND PRESENTED TO THE NEW-YORK MIRROR, BY OTTO TOSK.

Andante affetuoso.

She is far from the land where her young he-ro sleeps, And lo - vers a - round her are sigh-ing, But cold-ly she turns from their gaze and weeps, For her heart in his grave is ly-ing.

She had lived for his love, for his country he died,
They were all that to life had entwined him,
Her soon shall the tears of his country be dried,
Her long will his love stay behind him.

She sings the wild song of her dear native plains,
Every note which he loved awaking;
Ah! little they think, who delight in her strains,
How the heart of the minstrel is breaking.

Oh! make her a grave where the sunbeams rest
When they promise a glorious morrow;
They'll shine o'er her sleep like a smile from the west,
From her own loved island of sorrow.

GLEANINGS FROM THE WORKS OF THE REV. ROBERT HALL.

FROM the second volume of the admirable works of Robert Hall we glean several passages, written in the vigorous, healthy, and pure style peculiar to this learned and able divine, and solicit the attention of such as have not perused the book itself.

Influence of religion.

"He who is truly intent on promoting the eternal happiness of mankind, must look on futurity with so steady an eye, that he is in more danger of falling into indifference to the spectacle that is passing before him, than of suffering himself to be too much inflamed by it. He is under more temptation to desert his proper rank in society, to undervalue the importance of worldly activity, and to let opportunities of exertion slide through his hands, than to indulge turbulent and ambitious views.

"Hence we find in the first ages of the church, heathens made frequent complaints of the inactivity of christians, but never accused them of turbulence; and that while many fled into deserts, from austerity and devotion, not one, during the prevalence of paganism, endured the chastisement of the laws for sedition or treason. The pious of every age have been among the quiet of the land.

"If our legislators are aware (as I hope they are) of the inconceivable benefits which are derived, in a political view, from the diffusion of pure and undefiled religion, no fascination of great talents or of high rank, no fear of misrepresentation or calumny, will tempt them to be guilty of a legislative suicide, by exerting their authority to suppress it; since nothing can ever give equal efficacy to the laws or stability to the government. The law of itself can only address fears; religion speaks to the conscience, and commands it to respect that justice on which the law is founded. Human law can only arm itself with penalties which may be averted, despised, or endured; religion presents, in the displeasure of our Maker, an evil that can have no bounds. Human laws can only take cognizance of disorders in their last stage, proposing only the punishment of the delinquent, without attempting to prevent the crime; religion establishes a tribunal in our own breast, where that which is concealed from every other eye is arraigned, and the very embryo of crime detected and destroyed."

Calumny.

"Before we proceed further, I must be permitted to lament that propensity to credit and propagate the most hideous calumnies which seems to have arisen to an unprecedented height in this age. It may answer a temporary purpose, but it is well if it does not recoil on those who employ it. It resembles the policy of insurrections and riots, which, though they may occasionally punish or crush an obnoxious sect, no wise government will adopt, for fear of a reaction. To fill the minds of the public with hatred, jealousies, and suspicions, is to poison the fountains of public security. When this spirit is once awakened among a people, the character and conduct of its rulers seldom fail, in the long run, to be injured by it. Under disasters which the utmost wisdom cannot prevent, under burdens which the strictest economy may impose, government presents a plain, a palpable, and permanent pretext of discontent and suspicion. Misery finds a sort of relief in attributing its sufferings to the conduct of others, and while it soothes its anguish by resentment and clamor, it fastens on the object that first presents itself. This object will naturally be the rulers of the nation. Nor is there any thing with respect to which men are more liable to be mistaken than the share which the imprudence or misconduct of civil government has in the production of public calamities. So various, so subtle, so complicated in their operation are the causes which conduct to prosperity or decline in the affairs of nations, that it is a matter of the utmost delicacy to determine what share is to be assigned to human agency, and what to contingencies and events. This obscurity furnishes infinite scope for the exercise of candor in the well-disposed, and for the indulgence of suspicion and discontent in the factious. In scenes so complicated, and when the steps are so numerous and so untraceable between the first movement and the last, it is equally difficult to form a right estimate of events when we are very remote or when we are very near them. If we attempt to survey a remote era, we are lost in naked generalities; when we turn our eyes on the scene before us, our attention is apt to be limited to detached parts; we are apt to confound proximate with remote causes, to mistake casual coincidence for natural connexion, and to give a disproportionate importance to whatever we immediately feel. Let them who have any doubt of the dreadful effects of calumny, look at what took place in France, where they will find it was the principal engine employed by the Brissottines to overturn the monarchy, and afterward by Robespierre to deluge that devoted country with blood. By inspiring everlasting jealousies and unbounded fears, he contrived to extirpate every remain of tenderness and pity, and to preserve the minds of the people in constant agitation, like the sea in a storm. It was this that whetted the daggers of assassins. It was the withering blast of this spirit that destroyed every thing amiable and noble in that unhappy kingdom, resigned to the desolating sway of selfishness and revenge. Nothing can be more fatal to public repose; nothing can tend more immediately to quicken the seeds of convulsion. That this malignant leaven should be infused into the public mind by any hands, must be matter of deep regret; that it should be mingled and prepared by those hands from which the world is wont to look for benedictions and blessings, seems awful and portentous."

Public opinion.

"Mankind are apt to be strongly prejudiced in favor of whatever is countenanced by antiquity, enforced by authority, and recommended by custom. The pleasure of acquiescing in the decision of others is by most men so much preferred to the toil and hazard of inquiry, and so few are either able or disposed to examine for themselves, that the voice of law will generally be taken for the dictates of justice.

"Nor is it the weakness only of mankind that inclines them to look with a favorable eye on what is established; some of the most amiable propensities of the heart lean in the same way—deference to superior wisdom and to great names; the love of quiet, and the dread of confusion and disorder. These considerations will prevail over minds which are too virtuous to be moved by a gross self-interest. Further, the religion of the state will ever be the religion of the vain and aspiring. A degree of ridicule never fails to be attached to a religious minority. In all the efforts of churchmen, their movements are facilitated by the current of public opinion, while dissenters are on every occasion obstructed by public prejudice. Thus churchmen set out with a partiality on their side, which nothing but neglect and misconduct can destroy; dissenters, with a weight of suspicion and dislike, which nothing but discreet and exemplary behavior can remove."

Fanaticism.

"Fanaticism, as far as we are at present concerned with it, may be defined, such an overwhelming impression of the ideas relating to the future world as disqualifies for the duties of life.

"From the very nature of fanaticism, it is an evil of short duration. As it implies an irregular movement or an inflamed state of the passions, when these return to their natural state it subsides. Nothing that is violent will last long. The vicissitudes of the world and the business of life are admirably adapted to abate the excesses of religious enthusiasm. In a state where there are such incessant calls to activity, where want presses, desire allures, and ambition inflames, there is little room to dread an excessive attention to the objects of an invisible futurity.

"A few rare examples of this kind might perhaps be found by diligent inquiry, over which infidelity would triumph and piety drop a tear. It is not uncommon, however, to find those who at the commencement of their religious course have betrayed symptoms of enthusiasm, become in the issue the most amiable characters. With the increase of knowledge the intemperate ardor of their zeal has subsided into a steady faith and fervent charity, so as to exemplify the promise of scripture, that "the path of the just" shall be "as the shining light, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day." As the energy of the religious principle is exerted in overcoming the world, so that variety of action and enlarged experience which the business of life supplies, serves to correct its excesses and restrain its aberrations."

Enthusiasm and superstition.

"Enthusiasm is an evil much less to be dreaded than superstition. The latter is a disease of opinion, which may be transmitted with fresh accumulation of error from age to age. It is the spirit of slumber in which whole nations are immersed. Placing religion, which is most foreign to its nature, in depending for acceptance with God on absurd penances or unmeaning ceremonies, it resigns the understanding to ignorance and the heart to insensibility. No generous sentiments, no active virtues ever issue from superstition.

"Superstition is the disease of nations, enthusiasm that of individuals; the former grows more inveterate by time, the latter is cured by it."

BRIEF SKETCHES OF AMERICAN ACTORS.

MR. HACKETT THE COMEDIAN.

With an accurate likeness.

In the attempts by the editors to render the literary matter of this journal every way acceptable to our countrymen, our wide and expensive arrangements keep pace with our increasing means; and we pledge ourselves that the various departments which the Mirror comprises, shall ever receive able superintendence as long as the liberality of the public, which we are so repeatedly called upon to acknowledge, warrants the necessary pecuniary appropriations. Nor shall our exertions be exclusively directed to the literary character, but also to the embellishments of the work, which it is our design, in addition to whatever other claims to support we are enabled to invest it with, to render an American portrait gallery, enriched with engravings, (as good as can be procured, from our own first-rate artists,) of eminent authors, orators, statesmen, actors, painters, and indeed of any, either male or female, who, from their celebrity and talents, may be justly considered themes of general interest. The universal thanks which we have received for the portrait of Washington Irving, fully encourages us to proceed in an undertaking, as well calculated, we trust, to gratify the taste of our readers, as to advance our literature and arts. In order to make this project palatable to all, it must not be forgotten what a variety of tastes are to be consulted. An intelligent critic need scarcely be reminded, that a plate may be less interesting to country than city subscribers, and so vice versa; and that our difficult task is to appeal to classes of different habits, and under different circumstances. Some would prefer the head of a successful soldier to that of a gifted poet; and others of a popular native actor to that of an established statesman. We confidently expect the indulgence of our friends, founded on these liberal considerations. In compliance with the request of several gentlemen, of high literary attainments, who zealously interest themselves in supporting a national school of drama, we offer a well-executed and accurate likeness of Mr. Hackett, with the hope that a closer attention may be thereby directed to the merits of a comedian, born here in the midst of us, and able by nature as well as observation, to afford the most ludicrous delineation of some of our national peculiarities. Such as are acquainted with the humor of his sketches, will be pleased with the possession of a fine engraving and good likeness; and those who are yet strangers to his strong talents for mimicry and the burlesque, may be induced to draw a favorable comparison between the comic powers of one of their own fellow-citizens, and the abilities of many who are praised as much because they are foreign as because they are excellent.

We feel pleasure in announcing our intention, at some future period, to present a superb plate of ONE other individual, whose name is interwoven closely with the history of the American stage.

James Henry Hackett was born in the city of New-York, on the 15th of March, 1800. His father, Thomas G. Hackett, was a native of Holland, descended from an ancient and honorable family,* and for a number of years held a lieutenant's commission in the life-guards of the prince of Orange, which, in consequence of declining health, he resigned with honor, and emigrated to America, in 1794. In 1799 he married the daughter of the Rev. Abraham Keteltas, of Jamaica, Long-Island, an independent and highly respectable presbyterian clergyman, distinguished for his talents and literary attainments, and zealous devotion to his country's cause in her revolutionary struggle, and settled in the city of New-York, where he pursued the occupation of a translator of languages until he died suddenly, of an apoplexy, in March, 1803: his widow, with her only son, the subject of this memoir, then retired to Jamaica, Long-Island, where she still resides. In the academy of that village Mr. Hackett was educated, and acquired the rudiments of the Latin and Greek classics. At school, his quick and lively turn of mind did not escape the notice of his preceptors, with whom, however, he gained more credit for his capacity, than application to his studies. Here he used frequently to indulge his natural propensity for mimicry, by imitating the peculiarities of his tutors to the no small amusement of his school-fellows.

In the autumn of 1815 he passed the usual probatory examination, and was admitted a student of Columbia college in this city. A severe and protracted illness, however, retarded the prosecution of his classical studies for nearly a year. After his recovery he did not resume them, but entered at once upon the study of the law; a pursuit that proved by no means congenial to one of his sprightly and volatile disposition. In 1817, his faint partiality for the legal profession was superseded by a desire to become a merchant, and he accordingly entered the counting-house of one of his relatives, in order to be initiated into the mysteries of commerce.

In 1819, Mr. Hackett married, and took from the stage Miss Lee Sugg, of the Park theatre, (then a distinguished favorite with the public,) and removed to Utica, in this state. He subsequently became extensively engaged in trade, which he conducted very successfully until the spring of 1825, when the city of New-York appearing to present a better field for enterprise and the activity of his capital, he returned and was numbered among our Front-street merchants. Unfortunately, however, participating in the rage for speculation which then prevailed, he became largely involved, and with many others of our wealthiest and most respectable citizens, suffered heavy losses in consequence of those violent and sudden fluctuations in the market which especially rendered that year so memorably fruitful in bankruptcies.

It was at this period, that, surrounded by the embarrassments and perplexities incident to his peculiar situation, and without any immediate or eventual prospect of regaining his late credit and standing as a merchant, Mr. Hackett first directed his thoughts toward the stage, with a view of adopting it as a profession. He had in his boyhood imbibed a taste for dramatic representations, and suddenly resolved to try the effect of those powers in public, which had long been considered as designed by nature for the drama, and had so often served to entertain his friends in private.

In March, 1826, he made his first appearance on any stage, at the Park theatre, as "Justice Woodcock," in "Love in a Village." His success in the character did not equal the expectations of his friends; his usual self-possession and humor seemed to have entirely forsaken him. Though much dissatisfied with himself that fright should so have got the better of him at his debut, he determined on making a second attempt, and appeared in "various imitations of popular actors, and in stories illustrative of American character," in all of which he was entirely successful.† The large audiences attracted nightly, and the applause he received by their repetitions, caused him to devise some legitimate means of turning an imitation to dramatic account. The "Comedy of Errors" seemed best adapted to the purpose, and he resolved on getting it up and personating one of the Dromios. The effect of that extraordinary imitation of the humor and peculiarities of Barnes, who performed the twin brother, and the succession of crowded houses it drew, are well known. Encouraged by the result of this effort, Mr. Hackett determined to improve the idea which the warm reception of his Yankee stories had suggested, and having fixed upon Colman's comedy of "Who wants a Guinea?" for the experiment, he expunged totally the part of Solomon Gundy, substituted one of his own creating, a Yankee, Solomon Swap, and otherwise altered the play which has since been acted under the title of "Jonathan in England." This proved a decided hit, and has now in fact become identified with the drama as an original, and established as a stock character.

Anxious to see what phasis the stage wore in the English metropolis, whence most of the theatrical excellence exhibited in this country had been derived, Mr. Hackett took his departure for England, in December, 1826, and spent the principal part of that season in London. In the following April, he was induced to try at Covent-garden theatre an experiment with his Yankee stories, with the ulterior view, if they were well received, of inducing some of the numerous dramatists there to undertake a character for him. Considerable curiosity was awakened on the occasion, to see how a native American would treat of the same manners and peculiarities which their own countryman, the celebrated Mathews, had so recently made effective, and palmed off upon John Bull for "ginooyne," from scraps and fragments, all of which, by the way, he had picked up second hand during his flying visit to a few of the Atlantic cities on the northern part of this continent, in 1822. Mr. Hackett, having then appeared but a very few times on any stage, was, of course, quite inexperienced as an artist, and without even the advantage of a friend capable of giving him any profitable advice. It was soon discovered that these stories were "undramatic, ill-arranged, too local, and lengthy," and withal, not properly seasoned so as to be relished by an audience totally unacquainted with the originals of the characters intended to be delineated. The consequence was, a decided failure, notwithstanding the narrator contrived, by some aptly introduced imitations of Kean and Macready, to turn the tide raised by the disappointment of his audience, and which he found himself at length unable to stem, into torrents of unanimous applause, that followed him even until the fall of the curtain. His imitation of Kean especially, was very highly commended, and pronounced by the critics generally, "the best they had ever seen," but perceiving clearly, that as a novice, he could not expect to overcome difficulties in a path which would prove formidable to the most experienced theatrical veteran, Mr. Hackett prudently desisted from any further attempt at the moment, and resolved on awaiting more favorable auspices in future. In pursuance of this determination, he returned the ensuing summer to this country.

In 1829, Mr. Hackett became lessee and manager of the Chatham and Bowery theatres. Theatricals were generally the very reverse of lucrative at that period; and, in the course of the year, he disposed of all his interest in the management, and devoted his time exclusively to his advancement as an actor.

Mr. Hackett has been literally forced to become a pioneer in the cause of the American comic muse, and explore a totally unknown path, not only alone, but with little aid from others, in attempting to dramatize for him; nevertheless, he has surmounted all obstacles, and added several new and distinct characters to his stock of Yankees, besides calling into action those other originals, Rip Van Winkle, from the Catskill mountains, and the redoubtable Nimrod Wildfire, that "screamer from Kentucky."

It has been remarked that no actor, commencing an utter novice in the history of the stage, Garrick not excepted, has derived, within so short a period, so much profit from his efforts as Mr. Hackett; at the same time, he has secured for himself a fame throughout the country, that will ever identify him as the patriarch of his department of the American comic drama. Any eulogium, where an individual is so well known, may seem a matter of supererogation; but there is one fact that does him infinite credit, and in justice should have full publicity; it is, that Mr. Hackett voluntarily devoted several thousand dollars of the first fruits of his theatrical labors towards effecting an honorable and satisfactory settlement with all his late mercantile creditors.

In private life Mr. Hackett is irreproachable. His spirits are high; and those powers exhibited on the stage are not lost in the domestic circle. The memoir of a living character must necessarily be brief, and confined in a great degree to his public acts; but we will not dismiss Mr. Hackett without observing, that few possess a more extensive list of friends, or better deserve their partialities.

ORIGINAL TRANSLATIONS.

THE SINGULAR PREDICTION OF DR. GALL.

From the French.

"You agree with the world, then, doctor, in thinking the princess of C. a superior being?"

"Perfect."

"Do you think her equal to a political intrigue?"

"Why, there is some finesse in her eyes, and in the expression of her face; but there is a want of management, resolution, of fertility in expedients."

"What think you of the brilliant Count de P.? It is but two weeks since he arrived at court, and already all the females in Vienna are distractedly in love with him. It is seldom that we find so much grace and noble bearing united to so much knowledge and such profound learning. It is the emperor's wish to marry him here, and attach him to his court. I predict for him a high destiny."

"I have as yet but glanced at him. He has every external advantage, but—"

"Nay, do not apply your system to him hastily."

"My judgment is founded on observation alone; and, as yet, I have not examined him so attentively as to enable me to pronounce a decided opinion upon him; but a fair exterior is not always an indication of good or great qualities."

"As for that, I give him up to your scrutiny. Analyze his features, feel again and again the protuberance of his brain, and I am satisfied you will be convinced with me, that never was there so fair a soul lodged in so perfect a body."

"Perhaps."

This conversation took place in the midst of a ball given at Vienna by Prince Metternich. There was assembled all that the court of Austria could display of the most illustrious and distinguished, as well by birth as by fortune. All the ambassadors from the different European courts; all the grand officers of the crown, decorated with ribbons, covered with rich embroideries, and glittering with diamonds; a crowd of charming females, the beautiful and the young, sparkling with precious stones, and arrayed with the greatest elegance. Amid this throng of high personages one of the most distinguished was the beautiful princess of C., by whom Metternich hoped to gain the favor of the emperor Alexander; and yet more conspicuous was the young count

* His father, Edmund Hackett, was by extraction an Irish nobleman, and settled in Amsterdam, where he married the daughter of the Baron de Massau.

† He played "Morbéau" in "Monsieur Tonson," also on that occasion.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

HINTS FOR EDITORS.

AN habitual reader of newspapers will soon find a marked sameness in their method of treating upon subjects. There is a certain editorial air, which betrays the veteran conductor of a public journal. After the freshness of youthful enthusiasm has been worn away, there is a kind of system into which he falls of transacting his professional duties. We have within the last year certainly known a hundred or two of publications, which were the "most interesting this country has ever produced;" and as many actors, who "stand foremost in their profession." Each one of the publishers is more enterprising than any of his contemporaries. Every novelist is the "American Scott," and all the managers of the theatres "deserve well of the public." If any timid author, to feel the pulse of criticism, sends his manuscript for perusal, it will, doubtless, "create a sensation in the literary world." There is no theme which can present itself to our attention, but it has already presented itself to the attention of somebody else, or rather of some thousands besides; and every combination of language which could be applied to it has already been applied, leaving the critic of the present day only a choice of hacknied expressions. This want of originality is much more discernible when, as it often happens, the critic has not examined the matter he is writing about sufficiently to form an opinion of his own, and has, consequently, to take his thoughts as well as his language from some other person. The gentleman below has hit upon a good idea in reference to this. We leave him to tell his story by himself.

GENTLEMEN—In great cities, like that in which we live, new trades and professions are continually rising up, to meet the multiplying wants of the people. A simple stranger in town, who did not bear in mind that money must be paid for every little accommodation and instance of politeness, would, indeed, deem himself in a strange place, when every hour of the day some person solicits his acceptance of a profit or a pleasure. If he seems tired, and looks at a coach, twenty drivers rush towards him, eager to have his own preferred. The most tempting articles, of every description, appeal to his eye from all sides; and reading the signs over, as he walked along, would create a crowd of the most agreeable anticipations. At one window he beholds the emphatic words, "Real turtle soup this day at three;" on the other side, "Steamboats for Philadelphia—the strictest attention will be paid to the comfort of passengers." Here a person at the door of the museum requests him to "Walk in and behold the curiosities." Then a flaming figure of Fortune, emptying guineas from a cornucopie, allures his eye to an inscription, offering him a great prize, which will forever give him command over earthly gratifications; while, to descend to minuter details, more insignificant slaves beg the privilege of cleaning his boots or supplying him with apparel. A man has just now passed the window in a cart, bearing the generous annunciation of "Carpets shaken for every body."

Among other offices to render life pleasanter, toil lighter, and the division of labor more complete, I have been several years employed in preparing a volume of blanks for the use of editors, similar to those in vogue among attorneys, except adapted to the emergencies of the editorial fraternity. They comprehend all subjects which can become the theme of newspaper discussion—theatrical critiques, notices and reviews of books; notices of editorial accessions and abdications; of important deaths and marriages; news from Europe; notices to correspondents, real and fictitious; addresses to patrons; dunning paragraphs; little articles about spring, winter, summer, and autumn; boastings of native literature; fourth of July, new-year, and Christmas paragraphs; puffs which satisfy the puffee, without, in fact, making a single assertion in his praise; plausible blank musical critiques for editors who don't know Di tanti palpiti from Yankee Doodle; and an immense variety of others equally valuable, but too numerous to mention.

The saving of time and brains by the use of my blanks will compensate for the expense; and I have brought them to such perfection, that a conductor of a public print, either quarterly, monthly, weekly, or daily, can take a trip into the country with perfect security, leaving only a man to write names and dates in the spaces, and correct the proofs. In this way the most powerfully conducted journal, which the simple public imagine is racking the genius and wearing out the head and heart of three or four sage authors, may, in fact, edit itself when once set a going.

For this improvement in an important branch of literature, I expect to reap much profit, although many of my blanks have got abroad, and are in use here and there, to the infringement of my copyright. Let such unprincipled scribblers beware, for I have one expressly intended to annihilate those who infringe copyrights, and I shall send it round to every one of the ten thousand journals in the United States, with the spaces filled up.

If you will do me the favor and print this, I may hereafter send you a few specimens, which you can either fill up and use, to save the great wear and tear of brains to which you editors are subject, or you can insert them as you get them, in an article by themselves, and for the benefit of the editors who are now swarming over the whole United States. Indeed one of the evils which I think may be apprehended from the general use of my plan is, that this profession will soon get to be as overstocked as the rest; and ignorance, inexperience, and presumption may win the laurels which have hitherto been awarded only to talent and learning. Yours, &c.

TOM SCRIBBLE.

de P. whose noble birth, brilliant exterior, and amiable qualities had, in so short a time, captivated all the rank of Vienna.

The count had left a fine estate, situated at the extremity of Bohemia, and appeared for the first time at the court of Francis, to whom he came to render homage as his sovereign. Metternich had been peculiarly struck with him.

The first of these speakers, although his years exceeded fifty, had all the vigor and confidence of youth. His forehead, already bald, was high and open, and his marked and decided features gave evidence of his habits of thought and observation. The other was a man of about forty years of age, whose effeminate exterior, nevertheless, abounded in beauties. A high forehead, a well shaped nose, large blue eyes, and a pleasing mouth, whose smile came frequently and at will, composed his countenance. Above the common places of the world, he was easy and affable in his manners; master of himself under all circumstances, he knew how to participate in the follies and dissipation of the great, but always with the disposition and ability to profit by them.

This was the celebrated Doctor Gall, the illustrious physiologist; the other Prince Metternich, prime minister of the emperor of Austria.

According to his usual habit, the prince, in the middle of the fête, retired to the privacy of his own cabinet, to resume for a few moments his labors. Gall remained alone, and struck with the interest which Metternich, as well as those around him, evinced in the young count de P., endeavored to observe him, with fixed attention, during the rest of the evening.

As the count had just finished a waltz with the fascinating princess de S., and during which the crowd had gathered round to admire the delicacy and grace of his motions and the elegance of his manners, the prince, who had returned to the apartment, and had placed himself behind Gall, struck him lightly upon the shoulder.

"Well!" said he, "have you examined him, and arrived at the conclusion that the count is a perfect being?"

Without replying, Gall withdrew the prince from the circle, and when they were alone,

"Your perfect being, prince," he said in a solemn manner, "is but a profound villain."

"By Saint Mary! doctor," said Metternich, laughing, "you jest. I am more convinced than ever I was before that your system is false."

"You shall not hear," replied Gall, "the reasons which have formed this opinion; but wait, and time will show which of us is most deceived."

Several years afterwards, the discovery of a crime, horrible and unheard of, gave a shock to the inhabitants of Germany. The perpetrator of this crime was brought before the high court of justice, and condemned to be degraded from his titles and dignities, and afterwards to be beheaded, which sentence was duly executed.

The criminal was the brilliant count de P.!

Two months after the ball given by Prince Metternich, and where we first found the count de P., this young noble married the heiress of one of the most illustrious houses in Hungary. Young and beautiful, she had but appeared at court when the emperor disposed of her hand, with her full consent, it is true, for she had not seen the count without feeling for him that strong sentiment with which he inspired all females at first sight. Immediately after their marriage the count withdrew to a distant estate, wishing, as he said, to enjoy in retirement, and without constraint, the happiness which he found in his new state. The three first years of their marriage were happy; the charms of which were augmented by the birth of two children. The count lived in complete retirement, neither visiting his friends and relations, nor receiving a single visitor in the interior of his chateau. The countess, without having any ill treatment to complain of, began to find her husband cold, stern, and reserved. Often a gloomy cloud obscured his brow, and although he never uttered a harsh word, or chastised his vassals, they avoided his presence, and trembled merely at his look. He appeared to have but one pleasure, and that was in the chase. In all seasons of the year he delivered himself up to it, with an ardor always equal and unwearied. He preferred in general to hunt the deer, and as often as possible those of which the pursuit was attended with difficulty and peril. His object did not appear to be attained when the animal was killed at one blow; he endeavored merely to wound it, when he took pleasure in delivering it up to the fury of his dogs, and in calculating the duration of its agonies. It was only when the struggle was long, and the death-agony prolonged and loud, that a singular smile unwrinkled his brow, and disposed him to view with favor those who accompanied him. If the day had passed without furnishing one of these spectacles, he ordered a combat to be opened before him between his dogs, which he never permitted to be interrupted until one of them had yielded or fallen a victim. If it happened that some of them would fly from the arena, he killed them immediately on the spot.

These singularities, however, did not appear more strange than those of many of the Hungarian nobles, who had withdrawn from court and lived on their own estates. The count, besides, was liberal, and even profuse in his gifts to all who approached him.

Two or three months previously to this part of our story, he had attached a physician to his establishment, as he wished for the future no stranger in his service, nor any one to be allowed to penetrate into the interior of his chateau. This physician was largely remunerated, and had no other care than to attend to the health of the inhabitants of the manor. He had been recommended by the count to communicate as little as possible with the adjacent inhabitants, and above all to observe a profound silence respecting all that might pass under his observation.

One evening the count entered the chateau after an unsuccessful chase, his brow even darker than usual, and his mood more morose. Without changing his garments or taking any refreshment, as was his custom, he repaired at once to the apartment of the countess. She was alone with her children, who now formed her principal pleasure and consolation. To arise and to fold him in her arms, was her first movement. The count repulsed her gently, and without noticing his children commanded that they should immediately leave the apartment of their mother. When alone with his young wife he led her to a chair, and placing himself opposite, regarded her in such a manner as to study her slightest emotion. He then drew from his girdle a long dagger, with a bright handle and a triangular blade, well sharpened; and seemed to amuse himself by trying the point, and moving it across the end of his finger or the palm of his hand. The countess, trembling at this new and singular occupation of her husband, cast her eyes upon the ground, and waited, with an anxiety that may well be conceived the end of this strange scene.

"Madam, you must die!"

"What mean you?" cried the countess, alarmed at these words, and the doleful accent with which they were pronounced.

"I repeat it, madam, you must die; and that without noise or complaint."

Seizing her then by the arm, he inflicted a slight wound in her side! She fell, without uttering a cry. When she came to her senses, she found herself on her couch. A bandage had been placed on the wound. The count was alone in the chamber, opposite the couch, regarding her with fixed eyes. A slight smile rested upon his lips, and he seemed happy in tracing in the features of his victim the various impressions which terror and suffering caused by turns to appear.

"I have changed my mind, madam," said he, when he perceived she was entirely recovered from her swoon. "You live; but, however, your life depends upon your discretion. At the slightest whisper of that which has happened, or which may hereafter pass between us, I know how to ensure your silence forever."

The count continued his usual mode of life. Every day, when he returned from the chase, he went to the apartment of his wife, and examined carefully, without saying a word, the wound which he had made, as it healed. One evening, after passing his dagger over every part of the body of the countess, doubtless, for the purpose of exciting her agonies, he wounded her again, by a blow skilfully applied; commanding her at the same time to refrain from her complaints. When the wound was opened, he gratified himself by gazing for several minutes at the blood which flowed from the incision, and then departed, after bandaging it as before, without any marked emotion.

When this second wound was healed the same thing was repeated, and successively every eight days; and each time with the same calmness, the same inexplicable cruelty. Nobody in the chateau suspected the real cause of the alarming and increasing paleness and loss of strength which they observed in the countess, who was now almost continually confined to her chamber and to her couch.

However, nothing appeased the sanguinary appetite of the count de P. The beautiful body of the unfortunate countess was now but one horrible wound, covered as it was with the marks of the poniard. Although the wounds were slight, made as they had been with a refinement of satanic cruelty, so that no one of them should cause her death, yet they were now so multiplied that they produced a violent fever, which threatened to deprive this butcher of his horrible recreations. He reflected, and resolved to call upon his physician, after menacing his wife with all his anger if she betrayed his infernal secret, and threatening the physician with his severest displeasure if he dared to seek the cause of her illness.

This physician, as well as all the persons attached to the chateau, believed that the countess was the victim of a consumption, which had for its foundation the austere, gloomy, and secluded life which she had led. An able practitioner, he was not long in discovering that the condition of the countess had a cause more extraordinary. A man of judgment and of feeling, an admirer of her virtues and her resignation, he succeeded in extracting from her the horrible secret. Without quitting the chateau he found means of informing the authorities of what had taken place. One evening, when the count returned from the chase, the court of the chateau was filled with a corps of cavalry. Arrested, and conducted to Pruda, he was tried, condemned, and executed.

In 1815, Gall, visiting Prince Metternich at Paris, found with him the grand duke Constantine.

"That, doctor," said the prince, when the grand duke had departed, "is a handsome man."

"His face has an expression of ferocity as decided as that of the bears which people the deserts of Siberia."

"Ah, doctor—"

"Do you recall to mind the count de P., that perfect being? His countenance, at least, was as handsome."

"I remember it but too well."

"The first was a monster whom a total want of sensibility rendered cruel: he sported with his emotions. This is but a ferocious brute by instinct."

THE DRAMA.

THE NEW-YORK STAGE, ETC.

AMATEURS of music will acknowledge the justice of our correspondent B.'s observations on opera. The White Lady has, however, been produced with a success as marked as it will be increasing and durable. Only the most superficial critic will refrain from an earnest admiration of the delicious power evinced by Boieldieu, and also of the excellent discipline of the corps, and the general attention of the orchestra. The overture, on the first night, was listened to with the deepest attention, and received with a sudden and simultaneous burst of applause, only allayed by a repetition. We are glad indeed to perceive these visible and audible evidences of the improved taste and discrimination of the community; and if, in any thing, we may differ from the views of B. it is in the character he so grotesquely draws of the audiences. Good operas often bring men of standing and intellect, and the pit, on such occasions, is the resort of gentlemen capable of enjoying the high order of the entertainment which the managers supply with a care, industry, expense and perseverance, that are really praiseworthy. If the operatic company at the Park theatre has not reached the first rank of excellence, (and we have no right to expect that it should at once leap to perfection,) it is rapidly and steadily approaching that point, and we unhesitatingly express our opinion, that with the great talent and science now employed in the theatre, and the readiness displayed by Messrs. Simpson and Barry to please, there is wanting only a uniform and liberal encouragement on the part of the public, to ensure us the best music, executed in the best style, in all the departments of the establishment.

The White Lady is rising with every repetition, in every body's estimation. Our audiences, however, are not sufficiently accustomed to good music, to enter fully into its spirit, and properly to appreciate its value at one, two, or even three hearings. The mind must be in a measure familiar with it.

We have heard, and laughed heartily, at the effect produced in a neighboring city by the first exhibition of the brilliant points of Cinderella. The people sat still and stared—sometimes at Cinderella—sometimes at each other. A few eat pea-nuts (mirabile dictu!) and one or two who piqued themselves on being sensible fellows, and rather too old birds to be caught with chaff, shrugged up their shoulders, and went out, slamming the doors after them. The comic dialogue, however, convulsed the house with laughter. By-and-by, the charms of this delightful compilation dawned on them, with the beauty of the opening day. The superb solos, the dreamy air—"Morning its sweets is flinging," imbued with the indolent spirit of a rich summer morning; the rapid and ethereal choruses of the fairies, and the spirit-stirring music of the hunters—the fine thrilling recitative of the prince, soon succeeded by the exquisite duets with the neglected but lovely sister, in her lonely dwelling, and the superb changes all through the piece, so expressive of the various incidents of the drama—all these, as soon as they were understood, were fully effective, and instead of the dead silence with which they were at first received, were each one followed by deafening applause.

We shall never forget a fellow's entering the pit during a performance by the Italian company. It seems he had heard and read long and much of the "Italian troupe," and had suffered his expectations to rise very high in respect to their powers of affording delight. He came in when they were in the paroxysm of a passionate chorus, and, for a moment, he stood aghast, and apparently petrified with surprise. He stayed five minutes, then scratched his head, and with an angry expression of face, and making the word troupe two syllables, he muttered, "Well—if this is your Italian troupe, they may go to the d—l for all me," and thereupon made his exit.

But we are digressing.—We have said that every night of the White Lady gives further proofs that it is to be a favorite. Indeed, the company play better, and sing more together, and with greater spirit and confidence. There has been some cutting—necessary perhaps, but much to be regretted. We hope the time will come when the people will relish a whole opera, and that without any nonsense in it, but we perceive the force of B.'s remarks.

The managers have not only to supply good music, but to supply it in such a shape as will attract attention. Mrs. Austin makes much of her part, and sings it beautifully. We wish, however, she had a more prominent situation in the concerted music. Her solos are delightful, and her brilliant bravura one of her best efforts. Mr. Jones has gained a confidence in his powers, which causes him to appear to additional advantage. He acts throughout with animation and effect. His invocation to the white lady, like "Calm thee to rest" in Masaniello, is sweet and powerful, and full of expression. We must compliment Mr. Thorne on his personation of Gaveston. He gives the music great effect, and was deservedly applauded. His rich bass should always secure to him similar parts. Mrs. Sharpe acquitted herself well. Her voice in concerted pieces is powerful, and she has evidently strengthened and improved it by study. Her acting was, as it always is, marked by pervading discretion and good sense. Mr. Placide has but little to do, though even in that little we see ever and anon the fine chaste style of an able performer, breaking out and exciting applause. Mr. Richings is droll and ludicrous in McJob. He is a tolerable actor, but he has a slight tendency to overact, which is more excusable in any other species of dramatic entertainment than opera. The error should rather be the other way. For people go to hear the music, and nothing should interfere with it. Mr. Richings is not alone in this propensity. It is a great annoyance, and should not mar the excellence of a performer, who really, with good natural abilities, has made himself too great a favorite, and too thoroughly acquainted with the business of his profession, to require any such spurious aid. Actors should never lose sight of this simple fact, that they are not to enter upon the stage with the sole purpose of distinguishing themselves, but to act in harmony together, and produce consistency and effect in the whole piece. We hint this to Mr. Richings, rather more in reference to the struggles and contortions of which he is guilty, in certain parts of Masaniello, than to his representation of McJob. Mr. Placide never oversteps nature, not even, although by doing so, he could raise a roar—an example to be followed by others, as well as Mr. Richings.

This opera answers our expectations. The music improves greatly on acquaintance, and, from musical artists, who attended the fourth and fifth representations, the encomiums come enthusiastically. It will be popular in the first circles, or we yield our opinion of New-York taste.

THE WHITE LADY.

MESSRS. EDITORS—You will, perhaps, give space to a few brief remarks on the production of this opera. That the present is an age of improvement, every body is ready to testify, and that among other arts and sciences, music is rapidly progressing, is a fact which scarcely requires to be recorded. The favorable reception of Boieldieu's Calife de Bagdad, translated for the American stage, followed by the unprecedented run of Cinderella, arranged from the English version, and adapted to the capability of the first theatre in this country, are strong proofs that a taste for dramatic music exists here. Nevertheless, to the person who undertakes the production of an elaborate opera, the task is not only one of difficulty and labor, but is even ungracious and hazardous. The formation of theatrical audiences, both here and in England, is a strong drawback on the efforts of a compiler or composer; the various tastes which meet in a theatre, and all of which, to a certain extent, are to be considered and catered for by managers; the lamentable certainty that the bulk of the people do not receive pleasure from the best efforts, at the same time that they express their opinions either by applause or disapprobation, in a much more potential manner than those who really appreciate what is worthy; the impossibility of separating the profanum vulgus from the more cultivated class of society, without a very decided inroad upon the pockets of the managers; all these circumstances render the task of introducing an entertainment which is divested of any other claim to attention than refined and beautiful music, a doubtful and somewhat rash undertaking. We may add, par parenthèse, that the success of a stationary Italian or French opera is consequently, in our poor opinion, almost hopeless. The success of Le Calife is attributable to the light and brilliant music, and to the quantum sufficit of low comedy in the piece, Messrs. Barnes and Placide contriving to keep "the gods" and groundlings on the broad grin, and thus preserving them in good humor. The familiar fairy tale of Cinderella, with its transformations and numerous Joe Miller jokes; its pumpkins, rats, mice, and lizards, formed an admirable substitute for that portion of le rol lol, or ti ra la sort of music, which is considered requisite in our theatres to call down the approbation of enlightened and discriminating audiences, and to make "the many applaud;" and our peanut-eating, apple-munching, orange-sucking friends consequently have contrived to endure with great fortitude that beautiful selection of music, of which the opera consists, and which has delighted our best amateurs for so many successive nights. We now have to speak of the White Lady; and we are aware that the adapter had many compunctious visitings of conscience when he refused to cut out the best of the music to meet what the managers call public taste, but resolutely turning from all suggestions as to the happy and easy introduction of some of that odious ocean of Scotch and pseudo Scotch music, which still rivals, in English taste, the original Swiss melodies composed in London, he most obstinately turned a deaf ear to the beauties of "Wha wants this," and "Wha wants t'other," "Charlie over the water," "Over the water to Charlie," and "Hurrah for all sorts of bonnets;" and eschewed any plaid but that worn by Boieldieu. This infatuation would doubtless have caused him to be confined by his friend the manager as a lunatic, had he not luckily compromised the matter, at the suggestion of a veteran critic, a man cunning in the drama, who once wrote a play, and who suggested that a bogle or two and a little magic would prevent the people from taking so much umbrage at the goodness of the music; and, consequently, some light pieces from Weber, and some selections from Rossini, &c. were added, to assist the ghosts. But, alas, "Incidit in Scyllam, qui vult evitare Charybdæa." No sooner was this arrangement known, than an erudite critic of a sister town grows mad, and dipping his pen into ink like gall, says he, "What! add any thing to Boieldieu's Dame Blanche? Horrid! It will not do for us, I can tell the gentleman. Let him stay at New-York. We are intimate with Boieldieu, and we know what is what! We want pure opera; none of your Cinderella mixtures. Do not we patronize the French company for two hot months every year, while the citizens of New-York are cooling themselves at the Springs; and is not that a proof of our taste, and that we know all about the matter? It is true that we have not any regularly engaged band nor choir at any one theatre in our city, which could perform an opera decently; nor do we think it necessary to compel our managers to constantly maintain such an establishment as the people at New-York do; nevertheless, we are great judges, and it is not our pleasure to be sweetly tempered on this occasion." In spite of all these objections, the projector took heart of grace, and pinning his faith upon the good taste of the town, and upon a zealous endeavor to render justice to the great masters from whom he has selected, by a close attention to orchestral arrangements, has at length succeeded in bringing the White Lady before the public, with all her musical faults on the shoulders of the adapter, who can claim no credit for the beauties which he may have been the humble means of displaying. In conclusion, if the excellent performance of the opera such as it is, by the most efficient and talented operatic company in America, has met with the approbation of the lovers of harmony, which he is fain to believe from its reception, every aim has been answered of gentlemen, your obedient, &c. B.

AMERICAN THEATRE.—Mr. F. S. Hill is at this house. Miss Clifton is also engaged, and Mrs. Hamblin. The spectacles nightly performed here, we have already noticed as expensive and well got up.

RICHMOND-HILL.—All the old lovers of the drama in New-York should attend this popular establishment, for the sake of Mr. and Mrs. Hilson, and Mr. and Mrs. Barnes. Besides these, Mr. Green is "worth gaun a mile to see." His Irishmen are not to be surpassed. They are playing exceedingly well. The audience are attentive and seem highly gratified.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

JEPHTHAH.

BY THE LATE MRS. S. LOUISA P. SMITH.

THE trump that tells of triumphs won,
Sends its clear note on high,
And proudly in the morning sun
The battle banners fly.
And Israel's hosts in pride return,
From off the blood-stained clod,
While fires on every altar burn
To Israel's mighty God.
Glad, grateful hymns ascend on high—
The fertile vales rejoice,
To Him who gave the victory,
"The floods lift up their voice."

And proudly at his people's head
The valiant Jephthah comes;
Strength from above his sword has sped,
To free their hearths and homes.
His right arm hath been bold to dare,
For One hath been its guide,
Who from the voice of Israel's prayer
Hath never turned aside.
One, who from out the desert stone,
For them made streams to flow,
And bade along their pathway lone
The lighted pillar glow.

What tribute shall the victor yield
Unto the king of kings,
Who safely from the battle field
His chosen army brings?
The first-fruit of the purple vine?
The crop the fig-tree boasts?
"A nobler offering be mine
Unto the Lord of Hosts."
Thus the rash Jephthah spoke aloud—
"Let him, the first of all
Who from the gates to meet us crowd,
A sacred victim fall."

A band of youthful maidens fair
Come forth to meet the king,
They send sweet music on the air,
And costly gifts they bring.
And lovely, at their head appears,
With more than queenly grace,
The prop of his declining years,
The pride of Jephthah's race.
She, who, in childhood's sunny prime,
Sate on his parent knee,
And learned to lisp her infant rhyme,
And laugh in sportive glee.

But he hath spoken, and the vow
Is registered on high,
And she, who comes in beauty now
To meet his smile—must die!
The single blossom of his hearth,
The cherished and the dear;
To mourning now is changed their mirth,
The glad smile to a tear;
And well may Israel's daughters weep
O'er her, their fairest, taken
So early to a dreamless sleep,
Which morn may not awaken.

And what, alas! are triumphs won,
And what is human praise,
To him who, childless and alone,
Wears out the lingering days?
The voice whose tones were clear and sweet,
As melody of old,
Will never now his ear to greet,
Its tale of love unfold.
Honors and fame are idols dear
In pleasure's reign of power,
But all earth's incense fails to cheer
The heart through one dark hour.

LETTERS FROM PARIS.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF EUROPE.

NUMBER SIXTEEN.

The Cholera—A Masque Ball—The gay world—Mobs—Visit to the Hotel Dieu.

You see by the papers, I presume, the official accounts of the cholera in Paris. It seems very terrible to you, no doubt, at your distance from the scene, and truly it is terrible enough, if one could realize it, any where; but many here do not trouble themselves about it, and you might be in this metropolis a month, and if you observed the people only, and frequented only the places of amusement and the public promenades, you might never suspect its existence. The weather is June-like, deliciously warm and bright; the trees are just in the tender green of the new buds, and the public gardens are thronged all day with thousands of the gay and idle, sitting under the trees in groups, laughing and amusing themselves, as if there was no plague in the air, though hundreds die every day. The churches are all hung in black; there is a constant succession of funerals; and you cross the biers and hand-barrows of the sick, hurrying to the hospitals at every turn, in every quarter of the city. It is very hard to realize such things, and, it would seem, very hard even to treat them seriously. I was at a masque ball at the Theatre des Varietes, a night or two since, at the celebration of the Mi Carême, or half-lent. There were some two thousand people, I should think, in fancy dresses, most of them grotesque and satirical, and the ball was kept up till seven in the morning, with all the extravagant gaiety, noise and fun with which the French people manage such matters. There was a cholera-waltz, and a cholera-galopade, and one man, immensely tall, dressed as a personification of the Cholera itself, with skeleton armor, bloodshot eyes, and other horrible appurtenances of a walking pestilence. It was the burden of all the jokes, and all the cries of the hawkers, and all the conversation; and yet, probably, nineteen out of twenty of those present lived in the quarters most ravaged by the disease, and many of them had seen it face to face, and knew perfectly its deadly character!

As yet, with few exceptions, the higher classes of society have escaped. It seems to depend very much on the manner in which people live, and the poor have been struck in every quarter, often at the very next door to luxury. A friend told me this morning, that the porter of a large and fashionable hotel, in which he lives, had been taken to the hospital; and there have been one or two cases in the airy quarter of St. Germain, in the same street with Mr. Cooper, and nearly opposite. Several physicians and medical students have died too, but the majority of these live with the narrowest economy, and in the parts of the city the most liable to impure effluvia. The balls go on still in the gay world; and I presume they would go on if there were only musicians enough left to make an orchestra, or fashionists to compose a quadrille. I was walking home very late from a party the night before last, with a captain in the English army. The gray of the morning was just stealing into the sky; and after stopping a moment in the Place Vendôme, to look at the column, stretching up apparently unto the very stars, we bade good morning, and parted. He had hardly left me, he said, when he heard a frightful scream from one of the houses in the Rue St. Honoré, and thinking there might be some violence going on, he rang at the gate and entered, mounting the first staircase that presented. A woman had just opened a door, and fallen on the broad stair at the top, and was writhing in great agony. The people of the house collected immediately; but the moment my friend pronounced the word cholera, there was a general dispersion, and he was left alone with the patient. He took her in his arms, and carried her to a coach-stand without assistance, and driving to the Hotel Dieu, left her with the Sœurs de Charité. She has since died.

As if one plague was not enough, the city is still alive in the distant faubourgs with revolts. Last night, the rappel was beat all over the town, the national guard called to arms, and marched to the Porte St. Denis, and the different quarters where the mobs were collected.

Many suppose there is no cholera except such as is produced by poison; and the Hotel Dieu, and the other hospitals, are besieged daily by the infuriated mob, who swear vengeance against the government for all the mortality they witness.

I have just returned from a visit to the Hotel Dieu—the hospital for the cholera. Impelled by a powerful motive, which it is not now necessary to explain, I had previously made several attempts to gain admission in vain; but yesterday I fell in fortunately with an English physician, who told me I could pass with a doctor's diploma, which he offered to borrow for me of some medical friend. He called by appointment at seven this morning, to accompany me on my visit.

It was like one of our loveliest mornings in June—an inspiring, sunny, balmy day, all softness and beauty—and we crossed the Tuileries by one of its superb avenues, and kept down the bank of the river to the island. With the errand on which we were bound in our minds, it was impossible not to be struck very forcibly with our own exquisite enjoyment of life. I am sure I never felt my veins fuller of the pleasure of health and motion; and I never saw a day when every thing about me seemed better worth living for. The splendid palace of the Louvre, with its long façade of nearly half a mile, lay in the mellowest sunshine on our left; the lively river, covered with boats, and spanned with its magnificent and crowded bridges on our right; the view of the island, with its massive old structures below, and the fine gray towers of the church of Notre Dame rising, dark and gloomy, in the distance, rendered it difficult to realize any thing but life and pleasure. That under those very towers, which added so much to the beauty of the scene, there lay a thousand and more of poor wretches dying of a plague, was a thought my mind would not retain a moment.

Half an hour's walk brought us to the Place Notre Dame, on one side of which, next this celebrated church, stands the hospital. My friend entered, leaving me to wait till he had found an acquaintance of whom he could borrow a diploma. A hearse was standing at the door of the church, and I went in for a moment. A few mourners, with the appearance of extreme poverty, were kneeling round a coffin at one of the side altars; and a solitary priest, with an attendant boy, was mumbling the prayers for the dead. As I came out, another hearse drove up, with a rough coffin, scantily covered with a pall, and followed by one poor old man. They hurried in, and I strolled around the square. Fifteen or twenty water-carriers were filling their buckets at the fountain opposite, singing and laughing; and at the same moment four different litters crossed towards the hospital, each with its two or three followers, women and children, friends or relatives of the sick, accompanying them to the door, where they parted from them, most probably for ever. The litters were set down a moment before ascending the steps; the crowd pressed around and lifted the coarse curtains; farewells were exchanged, and the sick alone passed in. I did not see any great demonstration of feeling in the particular cases that were before me; but I can conceive, in the almost deadly certainty of this disease, that these hasty partings at the door of the hospital might often be scenes of unsurpassed suffering and distress.

I waited perhaps ten minutes more. In the whole time that I had been there, twelve litters, bearing the sick, had entered the Hotel Dieu. As I exhibited the borrowed diploma the thirteenth arrived, and with it a young man, whose violent and uncontrolled grief worked so far on the soldier at the door, that he allowed him to pass. I followed the bearers to the ward, interested exceedingly to observe the first treatment and manner of reception. They wound slowly up the stone staircase to the upper story, and entered the female department—a long low room, containing nearly a hundred beds, placed in alleys scarce two feet from each other. Nearly all were occupied, and those which were empty my friend told me were vacated by deaths yesterday. They set down the litter by the side of a narrow cot, with coarse but clean sheets, and a Sœur de Charité, with a white cap, and a cross at her girdle, came and took off the canopy. A young woman, of apparently twenty-five, was beneath, absolutely convulsed with agony. Her eyes were started from the sockets, her mouth foamed, and her face was of a frightful, livid purple. I never saw so horrible a sight. She had been taken in perfect health only three hours before, but her features looked to me marked with a year of pain. The first attempt to lift her produced violent vomiting, and I thought she must die instantly. They covered her up in bed, and leaving the man who came with her hanging over her with the moan of one deprived of his senses, they went to receive others, who were entering in the same manner. I inquired of my companion how soon she would be attended to. He said, "possibly in an hour, as the physician was just commencing his rounds." An hour after this I passed the bed of this poor woman, and she had not yet been visited. Her husband answered my question with a choking voice and a flood of tears.

I passed down the ward and found nineteen or twenty in the last agonies of death. They lay perfectly still, and seemed benumbed. I felt the limbs of several, and found them quite cold. The stomach only had a little warmth. Now and then a half groan escaped those who seemed the strongest; but with the exception of the universally open mouth and upturned ghastly eye, there were no signs of much suffering. I found two who must have been dead half an hour, undiscovered by the attendants. One of them was an old woman, nearly gray, with a very bad expression of face, who was perfectly cold—lips, limbs, body and all. The other was younger, and looked as if she had died in pain. Her eyes appeared as if they had been forced half out of the sockets, and her skin was of the most livid and deathly purple. The woman in the next bed told me she had died, since the Sœur de Charité had been there. It is horrible to think how these poor creatures may suffer in the very midst of the provisions that are made professedly for their relief. I asked why a simple prescription of treatment might not be drawn up by the physicians and administered by the numerous medical students who were in Paris, that, as few as possible might suffer from delay. "Because," said my companion, "the chief physicians must do every thing personally, to study the complaint." And so, I verily believe, more human lives are sacrificed in waiting for experiments, than ever will be saved by the results. My blood boiled from the beginning to the end of this melancholy visit.

I wandered about alone among the beds till my heart was sick, and I could bear it no longer; and then rejoined my friend, who was in the train of one of the physicians, making the rounds. One would think a dying person should be treated with kindness. I never saw a rougher or more heartless manner than that of the celebrated Dr. —, at the bedsides of these poor creatures. A harsh question, a rude pulling open of the mouth, to look at the tongue, a sentence or two of unsuppressed commands to the students on the progress of the disease, and the train passed on. If discouragement and despair are not medicines, I should think the visits of such physicians were of little avail. The wretched sufferers turned away their heads after he had gone, in every instance that I saw, with an expression of visibly increased distress. Several of them refused to answer his questions altogether.

On reaching the bottom of the Salle St. Monique, one of the male wards, I heard loud voices and laughter. I had noticed much more groaning and complaining in passing among the men, and the horrible discordance struck me as something infernal. It proceeded from one of the sides to which the patients had been removed who were recovering. The most successful treatment has been found to be punch, very strong, with but little acid, and being permitted to drink as much as they would, they had become partially intoxicated. It was a fiendish sight, positively. They were sitting up, and reaching from one bed to the other, and with their still pallid faces and blue lips, and the hospital dress of white, they looked like so many carousing corpses. I turned away from them in horror.

I was stopped in the door-way by a litter entering with a sick woman. They set her down in the main passage between the beds, and left her a moment to find a place for her. She seemed to have an interval of pain, and rose up on one hand, and looked about her very earnestly. I followed the direction of her eyes, and could easily imagine her sensations. Twenty or thirty death-like faces were turned towards her from the different beds, and the groans of the dying and the distressed came from every side. She was without a friend whom she knew, sick of a mortal disease, and abandoned to the mercy of those whose kindness is mercenary and habitual, and of course, without sympathy or feeling. Was it not enough alone, if she had been far less ill, to embitter the very fountains of life, and kill her with mere fright and horror? She sank down upon the litter again, and drew her shawl over her head. I had seen enough of suffering, and I left the place.

On reaching the lower staircase, my friend proposed to me to look into the dead room. We descended to a large dark apartment below the street-level, lighted by a lamp fixed to the wall. Sixty or seventy bodies lay on the floor, some of them quite uncovered, and some wrapped in mats. I could not see distinctly enough by the dim light, to judge of their discoloration. They appeared mostly old and emaciated.

I cannot describe the sensation of relief with which I breathed the free air once more. I had no fear of the cholera, but the suffering and misery I had seen, oppressed and half smothered me. Every one who has walked through a hospital, will remember how natural it is to subdue the breath, and close the nostrils to the smells of medicine and the close air. The fact too, that the question of contagion is still disputed, though I fully believe the cholera not to be contagious, might have had some effect. My breast heaved, however, as if a weight had risen from my lungs, and I walked home, blessing God for health with undissembled gratitude.

P. S.—I began this account of my visit to the Hotel Dieu yesterday. As I am perfectly well this morning, I think the point of non-contagion, in my own case at least, is clear. I breathed the same air with the dying and the diseased for two hours, and felt of nearly a hundred to be satisfied of the curious phenomena of the vital heat. Perhaps an experiment of this sort, in a man not professionally a physician, may be considered rash or useless; and I would not willingly be thought to have done it from any puerile curiosity. I have been interested in such subjects always; and I considered the fact that the king's sons had been permitted to visit the hospital, a sufficient assurance that the physicians were seriously convinced there could be no possible danger. If I need an apology, it may be found in this.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

RIDICULE.

A LIVELY author somewhere mentions a remark made by a witty orator in conversation, respecting a very elevated sentiment expressed by a gentleman present. "Come, come," exclaimed the first, "the reporters are shut out, and there is no occasion 'to humbug.'" The writer very properly adds, that he thinks it a bad sign when lofty notions are readily condemned as bombast, and when a nation is inclined to ridicule the bias to magnify and exalt. "Exaggeration of sentiment," continues he, "can rarely, as a national trait, be dangerous. With men of sense, it unavoidably settles into greatness of mind; but moral debasement—a sneer for what is high—a disbelief of what is good, is the very worst symptom a people can display."

This observation contains a fine moral truth, although it is not more applicable to a whole country than to an individual. Men are very differently organized. It appears to me that their actual natures are unlike, and that animal existence, rising from the sloth to the Hottentot, (even independent of all accidental circumstances,) still goes on step by step, through innumerable grades, separated by insurmountable barriers—that it traverses as much distance between the obtuse dunce or savage, and Newton or Shakespeare, as it had passed from the first inspiration of inert matter, to the lowest class of mankind. This variety is distinguished in the earliest periods of infancy. It goes on broadening and strengthening from youth to manhood. We consequently every day behold beings marked by peculiarities, far greater than can be satisfactorily ascribed to education. The distinctions between them are manifested in various ways. I shall only observe that which causes one to enter fully into the spirit of moral and physical beauty, and another to deride them and all who feel them. A little friend of mine carries this so far, that he thinks the most serious and sacred matters legitimate themes of mirth. He is totally callous to every sight of horror and pain. You cannot think how many witticisms he lets loose against a prisoner just receiving sentence of death, and how heartily he laughs at "a hanging." When any of his friends die, he says they have "shot the pit;" and he offers to sell the fee-simple of his own anatomy to the surgeons, at a small advanced price. Being a man of wit, he succeeds in amusing the company by caricature descriptions of all that is pure and tender. He has a strong perception of the logical, the witty, the talented, but none of the beautiful. If you tell him of a sweet face, or an affecting book—an instance of heroic courage, or faithful affection—he sets you down as a school girl. His character is brought out in strong relief by an intimacy which he has formed, oddly enough, with young B. who is of a sentimental, romantic, sensitive and lofty turn of mind. B. exaggerates as injudiciously as M. contracts. It may be necessary to observe, that the peculiar opinions of the latter, are only uttered among his most confidential associates. To other men he passes for a quiet good sort of fellow, and rather simple. B. has feeling, M. judgment—when any thing pleases both, B. admires, M. approves. B. looks abroad upon mankind, with the eye of romance. His opinions are in extremes. He ascribes sublime motives to ordinary actions; or conceives those which spring in a great measure from chance, to have originated in deliberate depravity. M. traces the noblest deeds to selfish motives, and finds a virtue even in great crimes. One would die for fame, the other laughs at it. One is a mathematician, the other a poet. A poor beggar one day came to the house where they reside. B. was at home, and reading Sterne; he rose with moist eyes, gave him all the change about him, and a dinner; pursuing at the same time these reflections. "Poor fellow! he declares he has seen better times. Once he had a mother and father, who looked on his golden head and soft girlish features, with tears of rapture. Perhaps he has withered beneath disappointed ambition. Perhaps writhed in the pain of unrequited love. What reveries so ragged, destitute, and comfortless a creature must suffer continually, when he looks around the world and sees himself the meanest wretch in it. Why has fortune persecuted this unhappy one, and made his heart desolate?"

The beggar knew not the sentiments of his benefactor, but he appreciated his dinner and change; and it was presently discovered that he had carried off all the hats and coats he could lay his hands on. A few days after another came. He was old and miserable, and declared that he had been a revolutionary soldier, whose pension was denied; that he had tasted no food for several days, and was perishing absolutely of hunger. M. left a Latin treatise of Newton and kicked him out of doors, muttering as follows:—"It is shameful that these beggarly rascals are permitted to annoy people so. Why does not the groveling reprobate work? Money, indeed! yes, to spend in drink. He who gives even the smallest pittance to a street beggar, commits a crime against the community. If beggary never met encouragement, it would never be practised. It should be stigmatized by every individual as a vice, and as such it should be punished; deserving people never beg."

The night was exceedingly dark, cold and tempestuous; the dawning of the succeeding day discovered the dead body of the mendicant to the watchman, who inquired into his story, which was found to coincide with his own account. Feeling often commits folly; reason sometimes leads to cruelty. The class to which M. belongs, and which pique themselves upon deriding elevated sentiments and proper feelings, is not small. Indeed some of the most graceful qualities of our heads and hearts are in this way, not unfrequently the theme of merriment, or the object of satire. The affection of a lover for his mistress—a husband for his wife—a mother for her children, have all in their turn to endure the smart common-places of the observing and the disinterested. Indeed we are all so far tainted with the same views, that I question whether one of us could avoid laughing at a stranger in a circle of company, who should relate as a fact that he loved any particular lady with sincere ardor, and would make her his wife if he could. He may, as much as he pleases, express his applause of an actor—his satisfaction at a new treaty, or the interest he feels in an election—but if he were to weep in public at a sight of distress, or give vent to his homage for beauty and virtue, he might better never show his face again among his companions. This is what makes such a deal of whispering and tittering among the young when a courtship is going on, so many hints and innuendos from wags and wits, that altogether I had rather live a miserable bachelor, than pass into regions of felicity, the road to which lies through so many uncomfortable passages. I once undertook to be temperate in my food, and that, too, after having suffered much from frequently eating and drinking rather more than nature required. For several days I carried my design bravely into execution, and found the beneficial effects perceptible in my general health, but as soon as it began to be whispered about among my acquaintance, you cannot think of the smart things which were said about me, and what a butt I became whenever I went into company. When I refused to drink brandy and water, they asked me how long I had "belonged to the temperance society." When I said that sitting up late at night, eating heavy suppers and drinking my bottle of wine, made me very dull the next morning, they said it was sheer affectation, and that I ought to go home to my mamma. HUMORS OF A YOUNG MAN ABOUT TOWN.

NUMBER EIGHT.

BYRON.

A POPULAR writer in one of his late works makes some forcible remarks upon the rapid decline of poetic taste. A fault which seems to be as generally admitted, as is the more evident decay of the drama. He plausibly enough attributes this waning of the lights of imagination to the extinction of a luminary, whose influence, whether happy or malign, all have not hesitated to acknowledge. That the death of Byron may, to a certain degree, have produced the effect Bulwer ascribes to it, we do not hesitate to acknowledge; for it has ever been not one of the least perversities of human nature, to undervalue the good which is left to us, while we lament that which is gone forever; and the world, therefore, may, very possibly, turn too deaf an ear to the lyre of live bardings whilst mourning the lay of the departed poet. But we do not acknowledge this want of merited favor to literary aspirants, nor can we recognize at the present day a greater dearth of high poetical talent than distinguished the period which immediately preceded the coming of Moore, Southey, Scott, Wordsworth, and Campbell. The fact is, that we have had the poetic talent of a century crowded into a single generation: for without instituting a comparison between either of these individuals, and the Popes and Drydens of another age, when has this department of letters been in such a glow as in the years just gone by? When has England or the world known such a blaze of poetical genius as has fired the times in which we have lived? The dullness, then, of the present period is but the necessary consequence of such unwonted excitement. Nature must have her breathing spell, and this is but the flagging of an over excited system—a lassitude that is not necessarily permanent. The fields of Parnassus may lie fallow for half a century, and we may not see any new Byrons or Moores for the next fifty years, but they will come again at last. The British reviewers, about this time, whether in a quarterly, monthly, or hebdomadal, have a habit of prefacing every critique upon a new poem, with some ingenious theory, to account for the feeble inspiration of the present votaries of Apollo, and the lukewarmness, and falling off of the readers of rhyme. The mechanical turn and matter-of-fact spirit of the age, is advanced by one as unfavorable to the production of poetry; while, paradoxical as it may seem, another is the while insisting, that it is the heated and restless temper of the times, which, outstripping even the extravagant vagaries of fancy, calls for something more daring and original, than the exhausted stores of poetic fiction can supply. Be this as it may, whether from the art not holding a place in any system of utilitarianism, or its not keeping pace with the wants and spirit of the age, or whether rather from the public taste having been surfeited with poetry in the last twenty years, there is no doubt that it is at this moment, both as to its writers and its readers, in but little favor with the muses and the public. Not to mention the "Siamese Twins," which was to have worked such wonders in the way of reforming the republic of letters, what have become of Montgomery's "Satan," and "World before the Flood," of which, while magazine critics played Sir Hudson Lowe, with the Napoleon of verse, by consigning the noble Childe to some barren spot on Parnassus, was to usurp his wide domains of reputation, and consign him to oblivion, ere his century was many years older. Both of these books are still the theme of scholastic praise, but who reads and who quotes them? What have become, and what do become of the myriads of gilt-edge and wire-wove octavos, with margins like Rockaway beach, that come smirking in morocco and fancy binding from the British press every month, or strut with the air of an apprentice in his Sunday clothes, from the American, semi-yearly; puffed, peeped into, and put by, perhaps for ever? The Rosa Matildas, and Frederick Augustus's, that take a lease of immortality, in the London Athenæum, or Literary Gazette, are shocked to find a flaw in it, when the instrument comes to be recorded in Blackwood, or the Westminster; and those who think they have a fee-simple of fame, by proving title in the New Monthly, or Eclectic, discover too soon that they are treated as tenants at will by the Quarterly and Edinburgh: and unless, as in the case of Bayley the song-writer, they have some collateral claim to consideration, by a musical alliance, they are ousted from the premises of literary notoriety, without any hesitation. Yes, it must be confessed, that the divine art inspires now less respect for its professors, and less interest for its productions, than it has heretofore in many a year; and yet it was never more cultivated than at present. That every one versifies, or that every one is supposed to, may be judged from the number of albums that are lanced at every one. Here, to be sure, and in other large towns, perhaps, the bolt is slipped at you with the same slyness that other pieces of mischief are perpetrated. But once get a little beyond the borders of civilization, and the violence is committed with the most perfect openness. We have heard well authenticated instances of gentlemen being ordered to stand and deliver (their poetry) in log huts, in the far west; and a friend in a delicate state of health became seriously indisposed from agitation, at having one of Bourne's embossed albums presented suddenly at him while in a lonely shanty on a remote branch of the Delaware. In fact, the muses are now so common everywhere, that we shrewdly suspect them to be fit subjects for the Magdalen Report; but, alas! the omnipresence of these divinities by no means proves the universality of poetic genius.

Mediocrity! mediocrity! is the stale term we must adopt as generic, if we would characterize the productions of the last few years. We find easy and varied versification, and language (where it is not disgusting from the besetting foppiness of expression) choice and elegant. We find excellent imitations, in short, of the best writers of this century; but of originality, of new trains of thought, of new lights of imagination, we find neither the existence nor the indication; we see nothing in the poetry of to-day that might not have been written twenty years since; we find nothing akin to the nervous spirit of the age—and we do believe, unless it accommodates itself to the higher interests, and contributes its share to moulding the features of the time, poetry, instead of being revered as "the nurse and brooder of all good," that fosters into quick development the latent seeds of great actions, will be flung aside as the fitting bauble of boys and girls. Why did not the revolution in France—one of the noblest subjects (no matter how we now speculate about its consequences)—one of the most majestic, soul-stirring subjects—that was ever commemorated in song, why has it not produced one that will live? Why has not the glorious struggle of Poland called forth one decent ode? Why? Because one-half of the young disciples of the Nine, in the world, are pre-engaged in recording their own love-lorn miseries in rhyme, and the other half scoffing at every thing like enthusiasm; because there is no precedent for such a thing in "Almacks," or "The Exclusives," or elsewhere in the annals of mawkishness and petit maitre-ism. Because the lyre of Moore is mute, the muse of Campbell maudlin, because the lays of Scott are lost in more profitable productions; and because the mantle of Byron, like the cloaks which were flung on the Athenian actor, serves only to overwhelm the aspirants who would assume it.

Let us turn, then, from their feeble struggles, and dwell for a moment upon the character of the mighty master, as it stands revealed in the only authentic memoir we yet have of his life.

Moore's Life of Byron illustrates upon every page that aphorism of Napoleon, that "men must be placed in a favorable light, as well as pictures;" for we question if there is in the whole range of biography, such a thorough exposition of character, as Mr. Moore has given in his life of the noble bard. He has in fact performed the task with a fidelity that would amply satisfy the predilection of the illustrious subject of his labors, to expose his follies and vices to the world—if, "alas! poor ghost," he were conscious how uncharitably they would be passed upon by others. He conjured me, (says Moore,) by our friendship, if, as he both felt and hoped, I should survive him, not to let unmerited censure settle upon his name, but while I surrendered him up to condemnation where he deserved it, to vindicate him when aspersed, (p. 180)—and verily, Mr. Moore, like a Roman hast thou performed thy task? for the character of man was never bared to the world as is that of thy friend in thy thousand closely printed pages.

—"This eternal blazon should not be
To ears of flesh and blood!"

for, till the souls of men are stripped of their worldly covering, and their hearts laid as naked as that of the unhappy poet, never will he receive the tardy justice he hoped this self-dissection would insure. We know, then, the worst of Lord Byron, and should recollect, when judging of his personal character, and comparing it with that of other celebrated individuals, that of those whose reputations have become public property, there is no one that has been thus thoroughly denuded of the veil with which time and death envelope the motives of human actions. The first outcry against Byron was raised, not on account of his own habits, but the audacity with which he reflected upon those of others. His lively little poem, "The Waltz," with the piquant notes subjoined to it, must have given offence to many in the circle in which he moved—a class of society he has elsewhere denominated the most licentious in Europe. But it was his allusions to royal profligacy that first drew down upon the noble bard, those virulent attacks which so rapidly succeeded each other, and were so long and industriously continued. Those two stanzas upon "A lady weeping," addressed to the princess Charlotte, called out more obloquy upon the character of the writer, than did even the most reckless productions of his pen. Byron has shown in the fourth canto of Childe Harold, that he felt the personality and bitterness of these unmanly attacks,

"From the loud roar of foaming calumny,
To the small whisper of the paltry few;"

while his pasquinade upon an illustrious personage, written at the time, evinces how little he was affected by the threats of his enemies.

It was at this period, when the poet was patiently abiding the storm that assailed them from without, and manfully struggling with pecuniary difficulties within, that Lady Byron quietly abstracted herself from his dwelling; and left his lordship to the pleasing occupation of encountering a score of bailiffs, and perusing the lampoons that were daily lanced against him. The vindictory letter of Lady Byron, while it throws an entirely new light upon the motive of that separation, leaves the cause of its continuance exactly where it was before. The irregularity of Lord Byron's habits has always been the alleged reason of that step, and the surmises of the world are only confirmed by her ladyship's letter. She thought it necessary at last to say something on the subject; and her publication, unsatisfactory as it is, will hardly fix the blame more completely where her husband was always willing it should rest—upon his own head.

This cool, vital thrust at the reputation of Byron, is but a poor return upon the lady's part for the regard her husband preserved for her till his latest moment. It proves, too, how much the illustrious but ill-fated "Pilgrim" was mistaken when he thought that there was something in his nature which would breathe when he expired, and

"Like the remembered tones of a mute lyre
Upon their softened spirits, sink and move
In hearts all rocky now, the late remorse of love."

The particulars of the life which Byron led at Venice, form the most exceptionable part of the book. Moore has depicted the habits of the subject of his biography at this period, with the minuteness of a Flemish painter, and the grossness characteristic of that school of the art. Indeed, the only apology for plunging into these offensive details, is, that it enables him to show how sterling must the mettle have been which was not thoroughly corrupted by such base alloy. The end, however, would have been answered as well by less exceptionable means; and a brief, but severe notice of these disgraceful passages in the life of the bard, would have told with sufficient force to the reader the slough in which he was immersed, and the energy that was requisite to extricate him from it.

It was the chains of the Guiccioli which Byron exchanged for those degrading fetters—a liaison which, in spite of the poetic charm that Moore has thrown around it, a sterner moralist would hardly admit to be less degrading than the bondage from which he had just escaped. Fashion, however, that amiable custos morum, which winks at the political amours of king Caucus in America, and looks leniently upon galloping into Doctors Commons in England, has sanctioned connections like that of Byron in Italy. Nor is there question but that, at the early stages of their intercourse, this lady exercised the happiest influence over the disposition of Byron. In the source of that influence is to be found the key to his character. Haughty, wayward, and impetuous, in spite of his violent and ill regulated passions, he seems ever to have been easily governed by those who showed an affection for his person. Love or woman (for the terms are synonymous as we are about to use them,) could always mould his nature to good or evil. Not to speak of the effects of the thwarted passion of his youth in the marriage of Miss Chaworth—"A marriage," he says, long subsequently, "in which she sacrificed a heart which was hers from ten years old, and a head which had never been quite right since;" it was the chilling of his domestic hearth—it was woman, austere and uncharitable, that drove him to waste the vigor of his prime, in the dissipation of a foreign land. It was woman, artful and abandoned, that detained him in the circean life he had embraced; and it was woman, accomplished and captivating, that won him back to refinement, if not to virtue. And who shall say that a mind thus malleable through its affections, might not with kindness have been moulded to purity and virtue? We do not here mistake physical temperament for moral tendency; for we are convinced that gratitude, reciprocity of feeling for tenderness towards himself, entered as largely into these attachments, as they did into those friendships for whose fidelity through life, Byron was distinguished. "For," we are told that, "through life, with all his faults, he never lost a friend; that those about him in his youth, whether as companions, teachers, or servants, remained attached to him to the last; that the woman to whom he gave the love of his maturer years, idolizes his name; and that, with a single unhappy exception, scarce an instance is to be found of any one, once brought, however briefly, into relations of amity with him, that did not feel towards him a kind regard in life, and retain a fondness for his memory."

In fact, impatience of injurious treatment and gratitude for the slightest kindness, are the most prominent features of his character. The first hurried him into inconsiderate hostility with his countrymen, and the last created by some fancied obligation, was often lavished upon strangers who could not appreciate the emotion. He misplaced his affections upon entering into life, and in matters of feeling was playing at cross purposes with the world ever afterward. And then the world took him at his word, that his heart was steeled against each kindly emotion—as if poisoning one fount of affection would petrify all. How little he relished this concurrence in opinion with himself, we may gather from his exertions afterwards to lay the phantom of gloom which he had raised in his own shape.

The most interesting pages of these volumes, are decidedly those which treat of the part that Byron took in the revolutionary movement in Italy, and the more celebrated and fortunate struggle in Greece. The style of the biographer also improves as the more masculine characteristics of his subject are developed. He here lays aside the foppishness of expression with which he elsewhere tries to lend a grace to extravagance, and the sophistry with which he would gloss over licentiousness. Not to speak of the heroism of lanching in so desperate a cause, the energy, conduct, and humanity of Byron, shone conspicuously in the troubles at Ravenna. He appears to have done all that a man could do with such materials, to bring the conspiracy to a fortunate issue; and when it was quashed, to have served its luckless projectors with his fortune and influence at the risk of his life. His embarking in the cause of Greece is now first shown in its true light by Moore. It was not, as it has been generally considered, the enthusiastic act of a man flushed with success in one career of fame, hurrying off to achieve new triumphs in another. Nor was it, as some represent, the last resource of wounded vanity to retrieve a waning reputation, and build up a fresh character in the opinions of men. On the contrary, every thing that has come before the public on the subject tends to prove, that at least this act of Byron's life was acquiescence in what he considered the imperious call of duty—a melancholy, an affecting sacrifice of himself in what he believed a hopeless cause. Such Moore conclusively shows it to have been. With a presentiment of an early death, founded upon no weak superstition, but arising from duly estimating the powers of his broken constitution, and his knowledge of the trials to which the climate of Missolonghi would subject it—he lent his presence to the contest under circumstances which would have withheld almost any other man from taking a part in it. He did this, not with the blind fervor of a martyr, (which, indeed he was, and that in the noblest of causes,) but he brought to the cause he espoused the shrewdness and practical sense of the man of the world, as well as the zeal of the patriot; and, in the words of Moore, "the very firmness with which a position so lone and disheartening was sustained, serves, by interesting us more deeply in the man, to increase our sympathy, till we almost forget admiration in pity, and half regret that he should have been great at such a cost."

In offering these desultory remarks, we have not meant to extenuate that looseness of habit and licentiousness of opinion, which these memoirs show to have marked a portion of Byron's life. Indeed we think the worst feature in Moore's book, is, the attempt he makes to reconcile his reader to vice for the sake of him who commits it; and this, when there is no necessity for thus endangering the principles of the weak, by confounding good and evil in painting a character so made up of both—for the redeeming qualities are here as strong as the damning; and we defy an unprejudiced person who is not bent upon wringing a moral lesson from the story of the much calumniated poet, judging him out of his own mouth, to lay down these volumes without the tribute of a tear to his memory.

Misfortune stamped him for her own at his birth, and with no equivocal sign. A tergitant and a libertine were his cradle watchers. He had no "monitor of his young years." His youth was blasted in its spring: and (true, indeed, like many who have built themselves monuments in the bosoms of men) he who could move all hearts with sympathy, was unable to touch the one of his choice with love. He lived,

— "as lives a withered bough, Blossomless, leafless and alone."

He died—he, the man upon whom the eyes of the world were fixed with admiration, if not with favor, died in a cheerless barrack room, without a friend or a relative to minister to him; his last moments disturbed by the clamors of a mutinous soldiery, and his eyes closed by a menial. Nay more, his very remains cannot escape contumely. His ashes are excluded from a public cemetery by his countrymen; and there are those found, even here, in the land which he delighted to honor, who would brand his name with infamy! If such are the penalties of frailty and indiscretion, what ignominy is reserved for actual crime? The most bigotted prejudice cannot deny that Byron had the elements of every thing great and noble in his disposition, though blended in chaotic mixture with much that was gross and revolting. Take that single trait in his character, the overflowing "affectionateness" of his disposition; the wistful yearning after something to love that marked his early boyhood; the warm and enduring friendships that, where the passions of his youth and the long-tried and undying kindness which he evinced toward his early companions in his riper years. This single trait, leavening as it did his whole character, throughout his life, is alone sufficient to enlist our sympathies for the weaknesses of the poet, and command our charities for his vices. But when to this is added the early leaning to religion of a heart untutored in its precepts; the reverence he showed to sacred things in after years, amid the pleasures that allured and the passions that assailed him, without one principle implanted by others to foster and support the sentiment,—we pity him who denies that charity to the failings of one so strangely constituted, which, if a Christian, he must know that his own require. "I am no bigot," says Byron, in a letter to the late Mr. Gifford, "I am no bigot to infidelity, and did not expect that because I doubted the immortality of man, I should be charged with denying the existence of a God. It was the comparative insignificance of ourselves and our world, when placed in comparison with the mighty whole, that first led me to imagine that our pretensions to immortality might be overrated." These, if the doubts of a sceptic, are at least not the cavils of an atheist. They are the delusions of a strange humility that could only exist in the perversion of so noble an intellect, agitated to its depths by so awful a question. To us, the mind of Byron in its desolation, seems like the ruins of some pagan temple, where even the shrines of idolatry awaken reverence—for they prove it the abode of religion, though the worship has been perverted. The adoration of nature, in the sublime descriptions of her works which pervade his poems, if not the effect of piety in himself, may at least be the cause of it in others; while the darker delineations of human passion that are blended with them, may well awaken a feeling of humility in the haughtiest bosom. Let us not be understood as vindicating the opinions of Byron. There are, alas! too many of them which call for the severest animadversion. But we refrain from commenting upon them, because we know, that of those who will not make the necessary allowance for the effect of misfortune upon a man of keen susceptibilities and a haughty spirit, there are enough to censure where so many are eager to condemn. We confess, too, that we dislike to dwell upon the blemishes that are stamped upon the noblest minds, to prove their affinity with the meanest. We shrink from the task of measuring the imperfections of so glorious an intellect; we leave it for purer and more daring feet than ours to trample upon the ashes of the illustrious departed.

But if the epitaph which Byron chose for himself, with the mournful presentiment of an early death, cannot arrest the unhalloved tread of these, if the Implora pace he wished inscribed upon his tomb, cannot preserve it from violation, there is consolation in the thought, that his memory will still be revered by the countrymen of Phocion and Bozzaris; and the loss of that life which has been stigmatized here as worse than worthless, will long be lamented in the clime where it was sacrificed to the noblest of causes.

FINE ARTS.

NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.
THE SEVENTH EXHIBITION.

EVERY one acknowledges that this institution is an honor to the city; and we trust, therefore, every one interested in wiping away the odium which rests on us, from the fact that our artists are shamefully neglected, will come forward promptly, and add his mite in supporting it. The most distinguished names are seen among its contributors. It will reflect unfavorably upon our liberality, as well as our taste, if this exhibition be not encouraged by the fashion and beauty of the town. It is held this season, as usual, in the large room in Clinton-hall, and is enriched with between two and three hundred paintings. It is also embellished with those beautiful Chanting Cherubs by our industrious and gifted young countryman, Greenough—a cast from Frazee's admirable bust of John Jay—of Greenough's Washington—Amphitrite, by R. E. Launitze, and the cast of a superb Borghese vase, presented by Mr. J. F. Cooper. The portraits are also less numerous than on former occasions; and altogether, the display presents more variety, taste, talent and originality, than we have before witnessed. The subjects are well selected. The landscapes are of a high order, and the visitors will see nothing there but what is new and interesting. We shall glance at a few in the present number.

8. Full-length Portrait of Governor Yates. Vanderlyn. This belongs to the common council chamber. If the reader has ever seen "Ariadne" and "Caius Marius" on the ruins of Carthage, by the same hand, he will readily believe in the excellence of this piece. Mr. Vanderlyn paints with great power, accuracy, and experience. He is evidently familiar with the best models. Governor Yates is portrayed with his usual felicity, and is worthy of the artist.

62. Greek Female. Newton. Owned by Philip Hone. A fine, peculiar face and form, finished with delicacy and care, will attract notice from its intrinsic excellence, as well as from the painter's name.

54. Greek. Wier. Owned also by Philip Hone, and a beautiful match for the foregoing, which it equals in execution, and surpasses in design. The face expresses more. It is not only that of a Greek, but of a Greek full of high thoughts and heroic character. The work on the dress is exceedingly rich and well done.

70. Spalatro's Vision of the Bloody Hand. W. Allston. W. Bull possessor. A striking bold picture founded on an incident in Mrs. Radcliff's romance "The Italian." Spalatro was employed by Schedoni to murder Ellena, the heroine of the story, while the victim is asleep. The time is night. In the way to her chamber, the assassin's heart fails him, and he refuses to do the deed, and at that moment a bloody hand seems to beckon him in the air. Schedoni, the monk, struck by the paleness and horror of the assassin, asks the cause, but cannot see the hand; and the painting represents the haggard monastic countenance of the incredulous monk gazing in vain through the shadows to discover the object, while at his side the ruffian is convulsed with terror—his eyes starting from his head, and his attitude well exhibiting the most complete dismay.

206. Full-length Portrait of the late Colonel Varrick. Inman. Owned by the New-York Bible Society. One of Inman's best, which is saying a great deal for it. A fine and truly imposing picture, which will be admired by every body.

195. Mr. Hackett in the character of Rip Van Winkle. Inman. Admirable and unexceptionable, with one fault in the design. We recommend the artist to rescue the gun from its unfortunate predicament in the top of the tree. We suspect neither Mr. Crayon nor Mr. Inman would insinuate that it grew up there. The piece itself is delightful.

167. A Wood Scene. Hoboken Walk. Mr. Wier has painted an exquisite sketch from Hoboken, which has been as exquisitely engraved by Smillie. They were both done for the Mirror. They are considered by artists as first-rate, and both have been sent to the exhibition as specimens. The engraving is really beautiful, of full quarto size, and may challenge competition with any thing of the kind ever published in the United States. It will embellish an early number of the tenth volume of this work.

130. View of Castel a Mare, Bay of Naples. Bennett. Owned by Philip Hone. A lovely thing. The reputation of Bennett's pieces in water colors has been long since established.

215. Widow Wadman and Uncle Toby. Leslie. Owned by J. Kemble, Esq. A choice picture. The face of the widow is inimitable. Only look at that mouth, and the eyes,

— "the frailest and softest things,
Who shut their coward gates on atomies" might well be deemed tyrants over thee, kind-hearted, pure-hearted, excellent old uncle Toby. His face, too, is an image of tender simplicity and pity. The artist, however, appears to have laid out all his strength on the figures.

210. Fountain of Egeria. Weir. Owned by Rev. Manton Eastburn. A very rich and masterly painting. The artist took this from the actual scene, which is full of charms and softness. There is a verse descriptive of the place in Childe Harold:

"The mosses of thy fountain still are sprinkled
With thine Elysian water-drops, the face
Of thy cave-guarded spring, with years unwrinkled,
Reflects the meek-eyed genius of the place,
Whose green wild margin now no more erases
Art's works; nor must the delicate waters sleep,
Prisoned in marble; bubbling from the base
Of the cleft statue, with a gentle leap,
The sill runs o'er, and round fern flowers and ivy creep."

The spectator will pause long to gaze on the mellow, sunny light which overspreads this luxuriant landscape, that strikes the mind, as well from its delicious natural beauty, as from its teeming classical associations.

67. Bianca. Weir. Owned by Miss S. Glover. Weir's pieces are full of poetry, delicacy, and feeling. This is a warm, rich, and lovely picture of a young girl, very beautifully imagined, and highly finished. It represents one of the characters in Irving's "Tales of a Traveler."

"I first saw her," says the Italian painter, "in an apartment of one of the sumptuous palaces of Genoa. She stood before a casement, that looked out upon a bay. A stream of vernal sunshine fell upon her, as it lit up the rich hanging of the chamber. She was but sixteen years of age."

The artist might have added the succeeding expression, "and oh, how lovely!" for, indeed, he has produced in every way a most able realization of the author's fancy. The face and figure are exquisite. He has displayed a true taste in representing her in the most simple attire; her hair is parted plainly on her forehead, and the mind is not diverted by any gaudy or studied ornament from the contemplation of a countenance that is delightfully emblematic of pure innocence, happiness, and unconscious beauty. The "stream of vernal sunshine" is thrown into the window with striking effect; and, as the eye passes from the large Chinese jar in the foreground, out through the casement, and over the bay and distant mountain, one almost forgets he gazes only on a picture. This piece is highly characteristic of the artist's vivid imagination.

43. Bard-singing. ("Isles of Greece.") Ingham. In place of this painting we have an empty frame, for which we feel inclined to rate the artist in "set terms." His productions are too beautiful to be withheld without disappointing many visitors.

We are obliged to confine our observations within narrow limits, and therefore, for the present, pass over many pieces of great merit. We must not, however, leave this subject without expressing our conviction, that considering this exhibition comprises only the works of living artists, and such as have never before been exhibited by the Academy, it is the best one they have ever offered to the public. An ordinary interest in the progress of the art of painting in this country will impel our fellow-citizens to bestow upon so deserving an institution a liberal patronage.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE P. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, JUNE 2, 1832.

The Cholera.—Our correspondents, both in France and England, have described, from ocular examination, the state of affairs in those countries, respecting the much talked of, much dreaded cholera. That this plague is of a very serious and dangerous kind to those who take it, no one can deny; but both Mr. Willis and Mr. Cox, writing actually from the scenes where it is said to rage most, furnish accounts materially different from those published in the newspapers. Their versions of the matter coincide with each other, and also with that of several private letters which we have seen; and, from the whole tenor of their representations, we are induced to believe, that if this disease should appear among us, dreadful as it is to its victims, a much greater panic would prevail than would be warranted by the occasion. We are a strange people to take fright. Every evil startles the whole community. A mad dog flings a gloom over two or three hundred thousand beings; and the yellow fever almost dissolved the bands which kept our population together. During the mania which prevailed respecting this latter scourge, many thriving tradesmen, to our personal knowledge, fled away from their advantageous business, and have not even yet returned. Let it not be for a moment imagined, that we advocate any neglect of those rules which prudence may dictate. The streets should be cleansed with scrupulous care; a system of examination and purification should be adopted; and all the lanes, yards, cellars, indeed every unhealthy part of this much neglected city, should be ferreted out, so that cleanliness may be secured at any expense; and, in our opinion, we should find in that a friend most potent in disarming the tyrant of half his terrors, should he ever cross the broad Atlantic; which, by the way, we very much doubt. If neither the newspaper press, with prayers and satire, nor the wants, plainly expressed, of all the thinking classes of our fellow-citizens, can goad on the corporation to move in this affair, a public meeting should be called, and subscriptions entered into, as a last method of carrying it into effect. Action is what we want on the part of the authorities, in whose charge our interests are entrusted; and this, as well to guard against whatever danger may actually exist, as to calm the anxiety and alarm running through all ranks, and which a single case of the pestilence here would probably heighten into ridiculous frenzy.

The Philadelphia board of health, having lately appointed delegates to visit New-York, on business connected with sanitary regulations against the cholera, have received, in addition to an official report of their proceedings, a communication comprising an epitome of the most interesting facts on the subject, which, we presume, most of the papers will publish, and which we wish every individual in the Union would read. The object of this document is to allay the ferment among alarmists, by proving the non-contagiousness of the disorder, which it does, we think, most conclusively. The history of the cholera is by no means rightly understood by the people of this country. All the severe examinations, into its nature and progress, which have been made by the governments, medical bodies, and learned men of the old world, result in opinions most favorable to our hopes, viz. that it is not contagious, that its character is mollified as it marches westward, and that its effects are felt most fatally by the intemperate and unclean. The great number of facts cited in support of these positions must carry conviction to every candid mind. Physicians, nurses, and other attendants on the sick in the hospitals generally escaped; and in a hospital at Warsaw, crowded with patients, not a single one of those who handled the sick, the dying, and the dead, suffered an attack themselves. Many considerations favor us at this day, and distance from the original place and period of its ravages, which were not applicable to its early victims. In the first place, the immense population, among which it originally rose, gave it a greater appearance of terror than it would have received under different circumstances. Then no one understood the disease; it baffled all the usual remedies and precautions. Probably the very attempts made to cure it, facilitated its march, and multiplied its victims. Wild terrors took possession of the multitude, who fled from its approach in the most distressing confusion; which, with their changes of air, diet, and general mode of living, rendered them much more susceptible to maladies of every description. Thus, while this state of affairs in reality increased the evil, it also gave rise to the most exaggerated accounts of that which actually existed. Since that time, however, science and intelligence, aided by unceasing perseverance, have been concentrating their powers for the purpose of acquiring a knowledge of the disease, and of the best methods of preventing and curing it. Every part of Europe and Asia, where the scourge has existed, has given the world works of the highest merit on the subject; and, from the sum of all accounts, we deem ourselves quite justifiable in expressing the opinion, that however unwelcome such a visitor may be, we have less to dread from its actual presence than from the dreadful confusion which we fear it would create. This paper of the Philadelphia delegates is well calculated to quiet the public mind; or at least to reduce their fears within the control of reason. In its contagiousness no one can believe, after perusing the report, which furnishes innumerable instances of individuals who have exposed themselves in every possible variety of manner—who have washed and worn the clothes of the dead, who have slept with the sick, who have been wounded while dissecting their bodies, who have used their baths, inhaled breath, fresh from their lungs—and so satisfactory are these testimonials, that the delegates broadly assert, there is not a single positive instance of the cholera having been propagated by other means than some uncontrollable atmospheric peculiarity. We agree with them that such facts are worth a million of speculative opinions. A curious anecdote is related by Dr. Edwards, surgeon of the United States' frigate Congress. He states, that the natives of Manila accused the foreign residents of having poisoned the air and water to destroy them; and, in the violence of their rage, seized Europeans who were well, and confined them for hours in contact with the dying, in order to communicate to them the disease; but even that expedient failed, and all others to establish the opinion of its contagiousness. Another feature on this subject, which should be eagerly seized by the people of this continent, is the fact, that the cholera grows milder as it advances westward, and the report states, that "the mortality of the disease has been much exaggerated in Europe." To prove this, also, a few facts are given. In St. Petersburg, with a population of three hundred thousand, between four and five thousand deaths have occurred, making one in every sixty. In Berlin the deaths were as one to one hundred and thirty-three. In Vienna one to one hundred and fifty. In Hamburg one to five hundred.

If this atmospheric pestilence can cross three thousand miles of ocean, we have every reason to hope that its virulence will be nearly exhausted; that care and science, and a uniform understanding of its nature, will greatly diminish its horrors; and that coming thus upon a population comparatively diffuse, and more intelligent, and better prepared for it than any before them, it will turn out (supposing the possibility of its approach—a doubtful point) by no means so terrible a calamity as we have hitherto suffered from other causes. Many of the European ports have nearly altogether relaxed quarantine regulations. England and France, where it is supposed the most accurate knowledge of the disease prevails, have taken the lead. It is, however, very properly recommended to the authorities to exercise rather too much caution than too little. The greatest detention which is deemed necessary is fifteen days, even under the worst circumstances.

It is to be hoped that the thousand rumors which may be expected to break out on this subject will receive no attention, till their truth shall be acknowledged by competent official authority. The document in question closes with the observation, that "the best protection against all epidemics is a composed and confident state of mind."

The precautions which can be adopted by all are "personal cleanliness, regular habits, and temperance," which, we suspect, will produce more of good than the cholera will of evil.

Campbell and Bryant.—Sometime ago the celebrated author of the "Pleasures of Hope," at a public dinner, was designated by one of the company in such a complimentary manner as called for a reply. He accordingly addressed the assembly, and closed with the observation, that he could not imagine any better way of contributing to their enjoyment than by soliciting their attention to a few stanzas, which he had lately met in an English newspaper, and which he deemed so exquisite a specimen of poetry, that he could not forbear reciting them. He had no idea who the author could be, but, whoever he was, he would venture to predict for him a high destiny. He then repeated some lines to a Water Fowl, and expressed great surprise on being informed that they were from the pen of Bryant, an American poet. Since that he has received the recently published volume, and thus speaks of it in the Metropolitan.

"We think, with Mr. Irving, that these poems are 'gems,'—that their own merits are their best passport. The poetry of Bryant, though 'essentially American,' is most pure as respects style: the language is that of the best writers of the English tongue, and is an excellent model for the author's countrymen. The beauties are various and original—the defects trivial. Bryant is a name of which America may justly be proud. The volume proves to us, that if the sterling spirit of poetry is evaporating here—if that which has charmed our fathers, and been the delight of the most generous part of our existence, no longer finds admirers, or degenerates into that boarding-school sentimentality which is so prevalent at present, we may turn to a nation sprung from our own loins for the refreshing spring to invigorate us, and find in American literature, as refinement increases there, a fount of imaginative delight; we may extract honey, delicious to the taste, and vivifying to the soul."

"There is a solemn spirit of poetry and reverence for the 'First Cause' throughout this volume, most pleasing yet natural. America may glory in the name of Bryant."

Oratorio.—The New-York Sacred Music Society will give an oratorio on Thursday next, in the Sacred Music Hall, late Chatham theatre. That building has been altered, and adapted to the purposes of a music-hall, and has been engaged by the society for its meetings and oratorios. It is admirably calculated to accommodate an audience. The whole area of the building, except the portion occupied by the orchestra of the society, is covered with seats, on a sloping floor, and two of the original tiers of boxes remain. This arrangement enables all to see and hear with ease. It is estimated that it can accommodate two thousand persons with seats, and hold three thousand. It is also formed most admirably to give effect to music. Solos can be heard distinctly in all parts of the house, and the concerted pieces are blended into the finest harmony. It may therefore be considered as one of the best, if not the very best music saloon in the country; and the society deserve all praise for their spirit and enterprise in procuring so fine a place.

The oratorio next week will consist of what is most judicious at this season, a selection of pieces, instead of one entire composition. The names of Mrs. Austin, Mr. Jones, Mr. Earle, Mr. Riley, and Mr. Norton for the trumpet, appear in the bill for the solos. In the orchestra will be found the most eminent professors on their respective instruments, and the strong chorus the society usually bring forward, will be further increased by the great addition of members constantly taking place.

In short, we may expect the whole effect of the oratorio to be greatly superior to that of any performance, of a similar kind, given in St. Paul's church, a building which, for musical purposes, is wholly inadequate, from the columns, archways, and other objects, which interrupt the sound. The situation of the pews also is exceedingly awkward, and a ludicrous sight is presented in a multitude of enthusiastic amateurs with their backs turned to the performers. The efforts of this excellent institution have ever been directed with great care and propriety. They have seldom failed to collect the most powerful musical talent which could be procured, and the critics unite in speaking of them in the warmest spirit of praise.

Exercise.—We commend the Gymnasium established by Mr. Fuller, to the attention of all sedentary folks. The literati should go in a body. Painters, vocalists, every one indeed, except such as are compelled professionally to exercise a great deal, should become a pupil in this establishment. It is situated in Ann-street, near Nassau, adjacent to the most business parts of the city, and will amply repay all for the moderate time and expense required. Many gentlemen accustomed to meet there have acknowledged its beneficial effects.

Literary.—"Swallow Barn, or a Sojourn in the Old Dominion." Carey and Lea have issued two duodecimo volumes bearing this name. It is an original American work, dedicated to William Wirt. Also, "The Alhambra," by the author of "The Sketch Book." They announce the "Heidenmauer, or Pagan Camp," by the author of the Spy, as nearly ready for publication. The brothers Harper have issued "Adventures of a Younger Son," a novel, by Edward Trelawny, Esq. one of Lord Byron's companions. In press, and will shortly be published, "The Little Genius, and other fugitive pieces."

LA PLAISANTRIE.

We are indebted for the manuscript of this exquisite morceau to an amateur, of whose admirable taste the fashionable circles of this city have had numerous proofs. It has never before, to our knowledge, been published here, and we present it to the musical reader as a little gem, full of simple beauty.

BREVITIES FROM BULWER.

BULWER'S writings are full of flashes. He possesses a good deal of that quality which he ascribes to Dr. Young, viz. the power of condensing much in a sentence. In a certain style of passionate, metaphysical, and declamatory composition, he stands prominent among the popular authors of the day; and he pours out his thoughts with a rapidity, and indeed an impetuosity, strongly characteristic of genius. He also displays a mind familiar with all the refinements of literature and sentiment, and his outbursts sometimes of classical erudition are truly fine. We glean for the Mirror a few sententious remarks from certain of his works, which have only been lately republished in this country, being a volume of Essays, &c. issued by the Harpers.

STRENGTH OF AFFECTIONS IN THOSE WHO DIE YOUNG.—Could you but know how forcibly it appears to me, that as life wanes the affections warm! I have observed this in many instances of early death (early, for in the decay by years the heart outlives all its ties). As the physical parts stiffen, so harden the moral. But in youth, when all the affections are green within us, they will not willingly stretch forth their arms from their ruined and falling prison-house—they yearn for expansion and release. "Is it," as Bolingbroke, that divine, though often sullied nature, at once the luminary and the beacon to English statesmen, has somewhere so touchingly asked; "is it that we grow more tender as the moment of our great separation approaches, or is it that they who are to live together in another state (for friendship exists not but for the good) begin to feel more strongly that divine sympathy which is to be the great bond of their future society?"

YOUNG.—Young is, of all poets, the one to be studied by a man who is about to break the golden chains that bind him to the world—his gloom, then, does not appal or deject; for it is the gloom of this earth we are about to leave, and casts not a single shadow over the heaven which it contrasts—the dark river of his solemn and dread images sweeps the thoughts onward to eternity.

QUOTATION FROM GOETHE.—When we have despatched a letter to a friend which does not find him, but is brought back to us, what a singular emotion is produced by breaking open our own seal, and conversing with our altered self as a third person.

AN USHER.—There was a certain usher in the school, a very pink and pattern of ushers. He was hard to the lesser boys, but he had his favorites among them—fellows who always called him sir, and offered him oranges.

QUOTATION FROM GIBBON.—Conversation enriches the understanding, but solitude is the school of genius.

BIRDS.—Birds have often seemed to me like the messengers from earth to heaven—charged with the homage and gratitude of nature, and gifted with the most eloquent of created voices to fulfil the mission.

CHILDE HAROLD.—The fault of the "Childe Harold" is as a whole. There is no grandeur in its conception. Every novel in the Minerva Press furnishes a similar idea of the hero and the plan. A discontented young nobleman, sated and jaded, setting out on his travels—turn the conception as you will, it comes always to that in plain and sober reality. But this poor and hack-nied conception the poet has hid in so magnificent a robe, and decorated with such a costly profusion of gems, that it matters little to the delight and interest of the reader.

YOUNG AS A PREACHER.—Young was usually a powerful and victorious preacher. He is recorded to have once burst into tears on seeing that he could not breathe his own intense emotion into the hearts of a wordy audience.

DEATH.—It is a beautiful sight, even in the midst of its melancholy, the gradual passing away of one of the better order of souls—the passions lulled as the mind awakens, and a thousand graces of fortitude and gentleness called forth by the infirmities of the declining frame.

AMBITION.—No, say what we will, you may be sure that ambition is an error; its wear and tear of heart are never recompensed; it steals away the freshness of life; it deadens its vivid and social enjoyments; it shuts our soul to our own youth; and we are old ere we remember that we have made a fever and a labor of our raciest years.

ARAB SUPERSTITION.—It is the belief of the Arabs, that to the earliest places of human worship there clings a guardian sanctity—there the wild bird rests not, there the wild beast may not wander; it is the blessed spot on which the eye of God dwells, and which man's best memories preserve.

ROYALTY AND WISDOM.—Royalty and its symbols were abolished in France. A showman of wild beasts had (the pride of his flock) an immense Bengal tiger, commonly called the royal tiger. What did our showman do? Why, he knew the world, and he changed the name of the beast from the tigre royal to the tigre national!

YOUTHFUL TALENT.—Congreve had written his comedies at twenty-five; the best anecdotes of the acuteness of Cyrus are those of his boyhood.

KNOWLEDGE OF THE WORLD.—There are men who say they know the world, because they know its vices. So does an officer at Bow-street, or the turnkey at Newgate. This would be a claim to knowledge of the world, if there were but rogues in it.

THEORY AND PRACTICE.—To show wisdom in a book, it is but necessary that we should possess the theoretical wisdom; but in life, it requires not only the theoretical wisdom, but the practical ability to act up to it. We may know exactly what we ought to do, but we may not have the fortitude to do it. "Now," says the shy man in love, "I ought to go and talk to my mistress—my rival is with her—I ought to make myself as agreeable as possible—I ought to throw that fellow in the shade by my bons mots and my compliments." Does he do so? No! he sits in a corner, and scowls at the lady. He is in the miserable state described by Persius. He knows what is good, and cannot perform it. Yet this man, if an author, from the very circumstance of feeling so bitterly that his constitution is stronger than his reason, would have made his lover in a book all that he could not be himself in reality.

VANITY.—Two persons in one of Sir John Suckling's plays are under sentence of execution, and the poet hits off the vanity of the one by a stroke worthy of a much greater dramatist:—"I have something troubles me," says Pellagrin. "What's that?" asks his friend. "The people," replies Pellagrin, "will say, as we go along, 'thou art the properer fellow!'"

CHEERFULNESS.—Montaigne insists upon it in right earnest, with plenty to support him, that continual cheerfulness is the most indisputable sign of wisdom, and that her estate, like that of things in the regions above the moon, is always calm, cloudless, and serene. And in the same essay he recites the old story of Demetrius the grammarian, who, finding in the temple of Delphos a knot of philosophers chatting away in high glee and comfort, said, "I am greatly mistaken, gentlemen, or by your pleasant countenances you are not engaged in any very profound discourse." Whereon Heracleon answered the grammarian with a "Pshaw, my good friend! it does very well for fellows who live in a perpetual anxiety to know whether the future tense of the verb Ballo should be spelled with one l or two, to knit their brows and look solemn; but we who are engaged in discoursing true philosophy, are cheerful as a matter of course!"

INEFFICACY OF AMBITION.—Ask the oldest, the most hacknied adventurer of the world, and you will find he has some dream at his heart, which is more cherished than all the honors he seeks; some dream, perhaps, of a happy and serene retirement, which has lain at his breast since he was a boy, and which he will never realize. The trader and his retreat at Highgate are but the type of Walpole and his palace at Houghton. The worst feature in our knowledge of the world is, that we are wise to little purpose—we penetrate the hearts of others, but we do not satisfy our own. Every wise man feels that he ought not to be ambitious, nor covetous, nor subject to emotion—yet the wisest go on toiling and burning to the last. Men who have declaimed most against ambition have been among the most ambitious; so that at the best we only get wise for the sake of writing books, which the world seldom sees till we are dead—or of making laws and speeches which, when dead, the world hastens to forget. "When all is done, human life is at the greatest and the best but like a froward child, that must be played with and humored a little to keep it quiet till it falls asleep, and then the care is over."

SENSE.—When one of our most popular moralists observed, "that he never knew a man of sense a general favorite," he uttered a sentiment peculiarly adapted to charm the English. In France every man of sense would have aspired to be a general favorite, and every man of literary distinction might have won easily enough to that ambition. But here intellect alone does not produce fashion, and the author, failing to attain it, affects the privilege of railing, and the right to be disappointed.

THE PEOPLE.—Were it not something profane to accuse so glorious a benefactor as Shakspeare of any offence, it might, perhaps, be justly observed, that while his works abound with pithy sarcasms on the foibles of the common people, they have never brought into a strong light their nobler qualities; even the virtues accorded them are the mere virtues of servants, and rarely aspire beyond fidelity to a master in misfortune. But not now, thank heaven, is it the mode, the cant, to affect a disdain of the vast majority of our fellow-creatures—an unthinking scorn for their opinions or pursuits; the philosophy of past times confused itself with indifference; the philosophy of the present rather seeks to be associated with philanthropy.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

THE FICKLE MAN.

Yes—I must confess—in fact there would be no use in denying—every body knows it—I am—I always have been—I always shall be—a fickle man. I have no fixed opinions, no fixed wishes, no fixed passions, no fixed prejudices, or partialities, or antipathies. I am the regular creature that men talk so lightly of, that women hate so. Nature, nature, why didst thou create me fickle? That one fault has swallowed up all my accomplishments, all my virtues.

I am ingenuous, affectionate, talented, well-informed, and, withal, (so people say,) rather peculiar for good appearance and interesting address. But they have a cant way of talking about me, as, "he is certainly a fine fellow, but then" (fancy the face drawn up into an expression of half pity and half contempt,) "but then he has no stability. He is fickle as the wind."

Well! so I am; and I must bear the consequences; and so I will, let hum-drum people with stability and fidelity, and all that, say what they please. I hate stability. Heaven formed me of fine, subtle materials, susceptible to every impression, full of fire and enthusiasm. What they call stability is selfishness, the want of noble and uncontrollable impulses. The existence of such persons is confined within the narrowest circle. They are like certain animals or insects. Your spider, now, is a stable, faithful, precious character. He sits all night and all day in his dark dusty corner, weaving his murderous web, ignorant of all the magnificent operations around him. Suppose he had a heart to feel the glowing charms of nature, would not he oftentimes abandon his lowly task? and then the people would grieve that he had no stability.

As the world is, however, my disposition subjects me to many misconstructions. In business matters I am shunned by all who know me. In affairs of the heart, heaven help me, I fear I have got my reputation up for a sad fellow, but upon my soul I cannot help it. Let me give you a brief account of my last year.

I met Charlotte A— at a jam, in — street. She was the belle of the evening, and her beauty, wit, and animation unmanned me quite. With what taste she dressed! Sure some perukier from Paris had modelled her rich hair so ingeniously. The saucy New-York fashions. What daring spirit set them? They are worthy of the genius of Napoleon. Their audacious elegance appeared to me graceful as the lovely being who wore them, and what with dancing, waltzing, singing and eating ices, I—I—fell in love with Charlotte, and she with me.

She reminded me of those superb lines by the author of Lillian.

"She sketched—the vale, the wood, the beach
Grew lovelier from her pencil's shading;
She botanized—I envied each
Young blossom in her boudoir fading.
She warbled Handel—it was grand,
She made the Catalani jealous
She touched the organ—I could stand
For hours and hours and blow the bellows!"

I should certainly have married Charlotte, had I not the next week met her sister. Fancy can picture no beings more unlike. The first was, I soon found out, a great tall forward girl, who had flirted with all the handsome men in town. But Laura! a rosebud just uncurling its leaves—a dove seeking the loneliest shade—a creature so gentle and pure, that to see her and not to love her, would have been in me—not fidelity, but stupidity. Why should I not love her? She was every way better than her sister, both in person, mind and disposition. When I compared their dress I was compelled to make up my mind at once. Charlotte has a child's passion for finery and gewgaws. I had been dazzled by her complexion. I had looked into her eyes, and taken it for granted that the mind was as beautiful; and I had not seen that her heart was trifling and her soul low—that she had no intellect and no feeling—that she snapped at a good offer of matrimony as a codfish snaps at a baited hook—and that, in short, she was not the woman to make me happy. No Charlotte, I said to myself, thou hast deceived me: I deceived myself, I thought I loved thee, but I loved thee not. It was a spirit of my own imagination, which I conceived dwelt in thy form—to marry thee would make us both miserable. So I abandoned myself entirely to my passion for Laura. Never shall I forget the impression the first sight of her made upon me. After the tinsel and glitter both in the apparel and manners of her sister, how grateful to my observation was her quiet demeanour; the hair parted so simply over her forehead—her dress so proper, and obviously arranged to avoid notice. The dress of a modest woman is the thing after all, however unfashionable such an affair certainly is. I'll tell you he identical moment when I fell in love with Laura. It was one afternoon in summer on a walk. I had been rather interested in watching her actions, but never dreamed of loving her, till a casual remark was made by one of the party. It appeared strange to me; but no one noticed it. I passed my eyes deliberately over every face to detect an expression of that feeling which it had awakened in my breast. No one responded with even a glance, till I came to her. Her eyes were fixed on a flower which she held in her fingers. I observed her face. Did you ever in nature gaze on any thing more beautiful than the expression on a sweet woman's features, while she is quietly engaged in a pleasurable thought? When she looked up, my first thought was that she had precisely my own idea of what had been said. My second—that it was exceedingly strange I had seen her so often, without perceiving how superior her beauty was over that of all her companions. My third—that I wondered if any one was in love with her; and my fourth, that I was actually in love with her myself. I offered her my arm immediately. She accepted it with the sweetest of sweet smiles. By heaven, she was an angel! Her voice—the tone of a running brook was not more full of nature's own melody, and her mind—

Now what was I to do? I was positively engaged to Charlotte. But what of that? Could a contract entered into through a mistake, excuse me for swearing at the altar that I would for ever love her? It would be a downright —. No, I would not "lay perjury to my soul;" so I wrote her a civil note, couched in the most delicate terms, and calculated not to wound her feelings. I felt like a scoundrel when I sealed the letter. Every thing I had ever read about broken hearts came up in my memory; I thought of Mr. W. Irving's delicious bit of poetic prose, and I recollected, "she embarks her whole soul in the traffic of affection, and if shipwrecked, her case is hopeless," &c. I had not well finished my reveries, when the messenger brought her reply, which stated, "that she was extremely happy to find I had taken off her hands the trouble of breaking from a match which must eventuate unhappily." "Gracious heavens!" said I to myself, quite glad to find I was no murderer, but a little piqued, notwithstanding; "what an escape I have had!"

I was soon on such terms with Laura that we had only to name the day. I sat one morning in my office, alone and thoughtful. "Dear Laura," said I to myself, "how happy will thy artlessness make me! Thy pure trusting innocence—thy very ignorance of the world"—(I think ignorance in a woman is becoming; it flings her sounder under the control of her husband.) "Laura knows nothing of the world. She cares for it so little that she has not even taken pains to acquire those accomplishments which would make her appear well in fashionable society. She does not draw—and paint and dance—and play and sing. These are allurements which lead to dissipation. Dear Laura, thou art made for me."

I was interrupted by the entrance of an intimate friend. He knew me well, and I unbosomed myself to him.

"Yes, dear Tom, I am going to marry."

"And whom?"

"Dear Tom, the loveliest of her sex."

"Fiddlesticks, so you said of Mary B.—ditto, Henrietta L.—ditto, Anna V.—ditto, —"

"But, Tom, these feelings were merely the ebullitions of a boyish fancy; they were bubbles which broke—dreams—all nonsense: but now, I am not only in love, but actually engaged—engaged; and I am this very morning waiting to receive from her, sole object of my everlasting love, a letter, naming the day that is to make us happy—and, by Jupiter, here it is!"

A boy entered, and handed me the letter. It was the first I had ever received from her. I kissed it—pressed it to my bosom—kissed it again, then opened it, and read—

"MY DEER W.—I am now thine forever and ever—so shall not make no bones of saying that next Tuesday night two weeks shall be the period of our union.—Yours affectionately,—LAURA."

I put up the letter. I recollected at that moment that I had been told something of her sickness in early life, and backwardness in education. My friend wished me joy, and as soon as he had gone, I answered the letter, saying, that some inexplicable accidents in my pecuniary matters had reduced me so far as to render matrimony out of the question. She never replied to the letter. These are a few of the disadvantages we fickle men feel.

I am ashamed to confess how little pain I suffered from this disappointment. I foreswore all womankind however, as I had done several times before, and resolved to apply myself to mathematics, so I shut myself up in my study, resolved to admit no one, and to spend all my leisure moments there alone. I had just moved into the house. Some one tapped at the door—heavens, what a lovely creature! fresh as a full-blown rose. She curtsied, blushed, and spoke very prettily to tell me her master had sent her to know whether I "wanted anything." "By Jove," said I, as I closed the door, "Is it possible I am in love again?" W. DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

ADVICE TO A BRIDE.

BY A LADY.

"Who is she that winneth the heart of man, that subdueth him to love, and reigneth in his breast? Lo! yonder she walketh in maiden sweetness, with innocence in her mind, and modesty on her cheek. She is clothed with neatness, she is fed with temperance; humility and meekness are as a crown of glory circling her head. Her eye speaketh softness and love; but discretion, with a sceptre, sitteth on her brow. The troubles of her husband are alleviated by her counsels, and sweetened by her endearments; he putteth his heart in her bosom and receiveth comfort."

"Love guard thee, gentlest! and may every woe
Be far from thy young heart,—and sorrow not
For me, sweet daughter, in my lonely lot
God will be with me."
This was a mother's parting with her child,
A young meek bride on whom fair fortune smiled,
And wooed her with a voice of love, away
From childhood's home."—MRS. HEMANS.

You are, at this moment, the happiest woman in existence. The visions of bliss that have long floated over your imagination are now about to be realized; and the cares, anxieties, (and regrets, that have heretofore thrown shadows over your path now vanish, and are dissipated by the bright sun of rapture that beams so joyously upon your heart. But in the midst of all this brightness, all this happiness, do not forget the fable of the boy, who, enraptured with the delightful flowers that were springing up around him, abandoned his allotted task, to wile away his hours in the midst of their fragrance. In other words, let not the fairy joys that now surround you, induce you to forget the task which you have voluntarily undertaken, or allow your present happiness to render you neglectful of the DUTY of a WIFE.

The task appears light, and it will be found light if you enter upon it in time; a day, an hour's neglect is important, we know not what an hour may produce. It is necessary for you to commence with those reflections, and the ideas which they inspire will lead you on to the consummation of that happiness which you so ardently aspire to and expect. You are the wife of one whom you have reason to believe is the best disposed, and the most honorable of men; he appears passionately devoted to you, and, in all probability, he himself imagines that his affection will endure, in all its strength and purity, to the latest moment of life. But there is not a greater contradiction in nature than the character of man. Made up of passions and prejudices, his merits are mostly negative, and consist not in the actual presence of good, but in the fortitude with which his more endured nature enables him to withstand evil. Thus he becomes the creature of circumstances, and is swayed and biassed by associations.

The great endeavor of a wife must be, therefore, to fix the disposition of her husband by increasing and persevering attentions; there is nothing more easy, if the task is assumed upon the outset in the marriage state; it is then a pleasure—the bride thinks no exertions too great to promote the happiness of the man she loves, and she perseveres in the task, until the very task itself becomes connected with her habits and manners of life, and consequently with her happiness. But if she neglects this opportunity, it can never be regained; the favorable moment will not return, and then, when the excitement of the occasion has abated, and the novelty of the new situation worn off, she discovers the fallacy of her expectations, and that all her high-built hopes are castles in the air. The early hours of married life glide on so felicitously, that the proper energies of the wife are lulled, as it were, into repose; a state of blissful repose certainly, but the more dangerous the nearer it approaches bliss. She fondly imagines the same happiness which attends her wedding-day, and continues for some time after, will be permanent; that her husband's enthusiasm will continue, and that, therefore, she may remain a passive participator in the enjoyment, which will last forever! This is the idea of most newly-married ladies, but the experience of every day proves their error. It is upon this belief that the foundation of most unhappiness is established. A bride must never encourage it. She must not regard marriage as the perfection, but as the means of happiness; she must commence the new condition of life as if she were about to commence a journey, the destination to be arrived at with difficulty, although roses and bright flowers enliven the way.

Man, as I have before said, is the creature of circumstances, and unless his disposition is naturally depraved, it is in the power of a wife to render him a source of perfect enjoyment. She must not abandon those little artifices which she so successfully exerted in winning a heart, now that heart is entirely her own; for when it finds the attraction is gone, it will rebel. The common way of wives is to resign themselves to utter heedlessness and negligence. Then the husband finds his way home wearisome. He sees in his walks, beautiful women, dressed and adorned with choice attractions; and when he returns home, he finds his wife en deshabille. Then his imagination institutes comparisons between the carefully adorned beauties, that have met his glance in the morning, and the neglectful wife, who has received him at home. Then that home becomes wearisome; perhaps he may prove his wife's negligence; if she is what is termed spirited, a quarrel ensues; if her disposition is sullen, she turns her back upon her husband, and plays with her lap-dog, or sits in silence, contemplating the fire-tongs and shovel, or some such interesting piece of furniture.

Conclusion in our next.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE F. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, JUNE 9, 1832.

The Irving dinner.—To the exclusion of almost every thing else, we make room for the entire proceedings at the dinner, given on the thirtieth ultimo. It was one of the most interesting entertainments ever offered in this country. The name of Washington Irving is familiar to every lip, and his delightful writings to every heart. His celebrity has been of a nature so unalloyed and universal, as to rank him with Addison, Goldsmith, and Steele; and the younger part of our community have been so long accustomed to hear of him, and to read his thoughts, without the hope of seeing his person, and listening to his voice, that the appearance of the man among us is almost like the coming to life of some of those departed poets and authors whose works enrich our libraries, and whose names are cherished as something sacred and apart from those of the living. In every way, to all parties, all ages, this festival teemed with extraordinary interest and associations. It is, indeed, seldom the lot of any one to be so warmly, so perfectly and generally beloved, as the object of these remarks. The old recollected him as a boy. The young had, at their school-desks, drunk in the inspirations of his genius, and read him by stealth behind Homer and Virgil. When we entered the drawing-rooms adjoining the apartment where the tables had been set, and singled out the author of Rip Van Winkle, the Legend of Sleepy Hollow, the Wife, and those other beautiful creations in the Sketch-book, Salmagundi, Bracebridge Hall, and excellent old Deidrich Knickerbocker—when we followed him farther in his course over foreign lands, collecting the materials for "The Tales of a Traveler," and "Columbus," and when we ran over in our mind the many a hearty laugh, the many an hour of pleasant melancholy, which we owed to him, we felt that he truly deserved the lively gratitude and admiration which beamed from every face.

At six the company, now increased to nearly three hundred, entered the large assembly-room, where a splendid dinner had been spread. We give the account below, not as news, but with the view of securing its preservation for future reference, several thousand copies of the Mirror being annually bound in volumes.

At the right hand of Mr. Irving, sat his old friend and literary associate, Mr. Paulding; and on the left, our venerable and gifted countryman, Chancellor Kent. When Mr. Irving arose to speak, we found ourselves under the influence of a strong excitement, which, indeed, pervaded the whole assembly, hushed every breath, fixed every eye upon him. There was a moment's pause—deep and impressive in the extreme—and, after his first few words, which were low, and would have been inaudible but for the perfect silence around, there ran through the whole crowd a murmur of delight. As he continued he grew gradually warm and enthusiastic; if he paused again, it seemed only to select from the throng of ideas which pressed upon his mind; and we certainly never witnessed more graceful embarrassment, more eloquent hesitation. The effect of his few, and evidently unpremeditated remarks, surpassed that of any other we ever heard.

In the course of the evening one of the speakers observed, that while Mr. Irving had been doing honor to his country abroad, Mr. Paulding had been doing honor to his country at home; and the health of the author of the "Dutchman's Fireside," was drunk with acclamations. Much sparkling wit and eloquence were displayed, and toasts enough sent up by the numbers present to fill a small duodecimo, drunk en masse, and consequently not collected.

In common with our fellow-citizens, we can scarcely express how sincerely we participate in this spontaneous burst of feeling, which welcomes back the distinguished wanderer to his native city. We have not, it is true, such allurements to offer him as have lighted his steps over other lands—the wonders and luxuries, the high refinements, and classical associations of our mother country—but we offer him the homage of a free nation, on which he has shed splendor, as well by the purity of his private life as by the brilliancy of his literary reputation. While indulging in the loose reflections natural to the occasion, we are led to an animating and irrepressible conviction that there are around us, in the daily routine of life, and, especially, in those paths which are thronged with aspirants after professional distinction, many others capable of illustrating the genius of our country. It must have struck others, as well as our ourselves, that our literary talent, with a few brilliant, and we may add, accidental exceptions, has not received sufficient encouragement either from the gentle hand of friendly criticism, or the fostering care and inspiring attention of a liberal public. We hope these times are passing away. We hope this high model will at once cheer our youth and awaken the minds of the community to the real importance of the subject. There are, doubtless, under the obscure names about us, many intellects, amply competent to enter upon the literary arena, and cope with the mightiest of the old world, were their powers developed by stimulants to action. We have the fervid poetry of Moore, the all-comprehending genius of Scott, the classical taste of Bulwer, and the chaste elegance and exquisite humor of Addison, pleading at the bar, lecturing in our medical colleges, and passing away from the earth without ever appearing in their proper element. If we are not mistaken, the honored guest who elicited the present expression of public sentiment, after having been himself educated for the bar, was, by the accident of ill health, led to those pursuits, whose triumphant success in every part of the civilized world, his ardent friends met together to celebrate.

As not an inappropriate offering in this place, we copy the following "literary treasure" from the American, written many years since:

My Dear Sir—I beg you to accept my best thanks for the uncommon degree of entertainment which I have received from the most excellently jocose History of New-York. I am sensible, that, as a stranger to American parties and politics, I must lose much of the concealed satire of the piece; but I must own, that, looking at the simple and obvious meaning only, I have never read any thing so closely resembling the style of Dean Swift as the annals of Diedrich Knickerbocker. I have been employed these few evenings in reading them aloud to Mrs. Scott, and two ladies who are our guests, and our sides have been absolutely sore with laughing. I think, too, there are passages which indicate that the author possesses power of a different kind, and has some touches which remind me much of Sterne. I beg you will have the kindness to let me know when Mr. Irving takes pen in hand again; for assuredly I shall expect a very great treat, which I may chance never to hear of but through your kindness. Believe me, dear sir, your obliged humble servant,

WALTER SCOTT.

Abbottford, 23d April, 1813.

We now proceed to present the details of the dinner, which commenced with the following correspondence:

New-York, May 23, 1832.

Washington Irving, Esq.—Sir: A number of your townsmen, many of them the associates of your youth, impatient to evince to you their feelings of gratification at your return among them, to express the interest they have felt in your career in every period of its increasing brilliancy, to pay a just tribute to private worth, and to give you a warm and cordial welcome to your native city, beg that you will appoint some day when you will honor them with your company at a public dinner. We are, with great regard, your friends and servants.

New-York, May 24, 1832.

Gentlemen—It is with feelings of the most gratified pride and affection that I accept of your kind and flattering invitation. It is one of the many testimonials of cordial welcome on the part of my townsmen and early friends, that have made my return to my native land and city the happiest moment of my life. As you have had the kindness to leave to me the naming of the day for the honor you propose to confer on me, I will, if suitable to your convenience, appoint Wednesday next for that purpose. I am, gentlemen, with the deepest feelings of gratitude and affection, your friend and townsman,

WASHINGTON IRVING.

The great saloon of the City-hotel was thrown open, and three lines of tables were covered with all the substantial and delicacies of the season. Chancellor Kent officiated as president, assisted by Messrs. J. Hone, J. Duer, Professor Renwick, T. L. Ogden, Samuel Swartwout, and Charles Graham, as vice-presidents. After the company was seated, the guests entered, preceded by the president and Mr. Irving, who, on taking his seat at the table, was received with loud acclamations. Among the guests were W. A. Duer, LL.D., Bishop Onderdonk, the Rev. Dr. Wainwright, General Santander, president of the republic of New Grenada; Edward P. Livingston, Esq., lieutenant-governor of the state; the venerable Mr. Gallatin; Mr. Behr, the representative of the Belgian government; Senor Don Thomas Gener, formerly president of the Constitutional Spanish Cortes; General Scott, of the U. S. army; Commodore Chauncey, of the U. S. navy; M. Le Ray de Chaumont, of Jefferson county; Chancellor Walworth, Vice Chancellor McCoun, Judges Jones, Oakley, Irving, and Hoffman, James K. Paulding, Esq. G. S. Newton, Esq., and several other distinguished individuals. Many more were invited, but were unable to attend: among the number, were the governor, the mayor, Joseph Bonaparte, Jacob Sutherland, H. G. Otis, S. Jones, and G. C. Verplanck.

The Right Rev. Bishop Onderdonk asked a blessing upon the feast, and the Rev. Dr. Wainwright briefly returned thanks, in which he alluded to the influence of literature and science upon the cause of religion.

When the cloth was removed the president read the following letters of apology:

POINTE BREEZE 29th MAY, 1832.

Messieurs—Je ne reçois qu'à cette heure, seulement, la lettre que vous avez bien voulu m'écrire le 25 du courant. Il ne me reste que le temps de vous exprimer mes regrets de ne pouvoir me rendre à votre invitation, et vous prier d'agréer mes remerciements et ma considération la plus distinguée.

JOSEPH CTE. DE SURVILLIERS.

Messieurs du Comité de New-York, à l'occasion de l'arrivée de Mr. W. Irving.

New-York, May 26, 1832.

Gentlemen—I have had the honor of receiving your note enclosing a card of invitation to the dinner to be given to Washington Irving, on the 30th instant. I regret exceedingly that I am obliged to leave town before that day, and that it will therefore not be in my power to unite with you in that testimonial of respect to our distinguished fellow-citizen. In addition to the consideration to which his private character and virtues entitle him, I feel that I owe him a debt of gratitude for his unremitting and successful efforts in the cause of literature, and particularly for the distinction which those efforts have conferred upon the literary character of our country. I am, with great respect, your obedient servant.

JACOB SUTHERLAND.

To Messrs. J. G. King, Samuel Swartwout, and others, Committee.

New-York, May 29, 1832.

Sir—It is with extreme regret that I am obliged to decline the invitation of the committee for the dinner to our distinguished fellow-citizen, Washington Irving, on Wednesday, the thirtieth instant. It would have given me great pleasure to meet this our much esteemed fellow-citizen, who has been so long absent from us, but whose feelings have been so uniformly true to the land of his nativity, and the friends of his youth. We recur with delight to our recollections of his genius in early life; and we follow him, with high gratification, in his literary career in foreign countries, where he has won rich, imperishable fame for himself, and has contributed so largely to the honor and glory of his native land. I join most cordially with my fellow-citizens in greeting his return to us, and in tendering to him the assurance of our confidence in his love of country, and of our gratification in the proud eminence he has gained for himself and for his country in the republic of letters. Be pleased to accept for yourself and your fellow-members of the committee, my thanks for the honor of the invitation I am thus obliged to decline, and assure them and our mutual friends, who may assemble on this great occasion, that although personally absent from them, my liveliest feelings and best wishes attend them. I have the honor to be, dear sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

S. JONES.

M. C. Patterson, Esq.

Washington, May 27, 1832.

Dear Sir—I tender my thanks to yourself and your friends, for their kind invitation to participate in the dinner proposed to be given to Washington Irving, on the 30th instant.

The recollection of an early and uninterrupted friendship, as well as the pride which I have, for many years, cherished in the constantly increasing literary honors which he has conferred upon our country; and let me add, upon his and my native city, would not permit an ordinary cause to prevent my meeting with you on this joyous occasion. But I am compelled, reluctantly to forego this pleasure, by the urgency and importance of the great subjects now before congress at this late and busy period of the session.—I am, very truly, yours, &c.

G. C. VERPLANCK.

M. C. Patterson.

After the above letters were read, and toasts given, the president, (Chancellor Kent) rose, and delivered the following address:

We have met to express to a distinguished fellow-citizen, our gratitude for the exalted rank to which he has raised the literary reputation of this country; to testify our admiration of his genius, and to show that we cordially partake of the kindly and generous sympathies which pervade and have been diffused by his works. The mention of this subject calls up a crowd of associations and recollections, which even adequately to refer to, would carry me far beyond the limits of the time and the occasion; but on which my feelings compel me, for a few minutes, to linger.

When the gentleman alluded to, commenced his brilliant career (and which we trust is far from its termination,) by a display of the wit and humor, the keen satire and sprightly portraits which distinguish his earliest production (in which it is understood he was assisted by a kindred genius) we had scarcely any literary character as a nation, though we were entitled to claim the exhibition of a due share of national energy and enterprise. Our taste and manners were greatly in need of improvement. The admirable work to which I have referred, partook largely of a dramatic character, and being armed with wit and powers of the highest order, it undertook to chastise folly, correct false taste, reform bad manners, and mend the heart. The effort was well received, and the public judgment had no reason, in anywise, to be offended. No composition of this kind was ever more distinctly stamped with the impression of sterling morals, and invariable good feelings, or more free from envy, hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness. The work even abounded with touches of sentiment and pathos, and with fictitious scenes, calculated to awaken the deepest sympathy. The legend of the first colonization of this city, and of the adjacent shores, must at this moment be vivid in the memories of us all. Such a mock-heroic history; written in the finest strain of burlesque gravity, and of witty and ludicrous description, and of playful, but pointed satire and ridicule. It has rarely, perhaps never, been surpassed, not even by Rabelais or Swift, in its power, spirit, and effect. It was, at the same time, written with so much good temper and humanity, that there is nothing in it justly chargeable with a tendency to make one worthy man its foe. The materials of both those satirical productions were of a lively growth. They partook of no transatlantic flavor. They were original and inimitable creations of American genius, in all its freshness, fullness and strength, and solely erected upon American topics. But the mind that produced them was soon destined to display in another hemisphere its powers of thought and invention, amidst the beautiful scenes of English rural life, and the magnificent remains of Gothic grandeur.

In the sketches and essays of Geoffrey Crayon, we have a series of liberal, moral and pathetic reflections, interwoven with legendary tales of fascinating interest, and adorned with the utmost purity of taste and elegance of style. Many of the stories possess the charm of the finest fictions in the English classics. The liberality, the gentleness, the philanthropy, the taste, the sound judgment and varied accomplishments of the writer seem to have at once surprised and delighted the English reader. Those sketches were attended with magical effects. Arrogance stood rebuked and ashamed, and prejudice was subdued and succeeded by admiration and love.

We rejoiced to behold one of our own native sons rival on English ground, the grace and elegance, the pathos and lofty morals of Addison, Goldsmith, and Mackenzie; we shared equally with our transatlantic brethren in the pleasure afforded by his graphic descriptions; and hung with an equal intensity of interest over the descriptions of some of his matchless English scenes and incidents. But we are free to admit that we took a far deeper interest in those enchanting visions which brought us back to the borders of the romantic Hudson; "to the blue hills of our own country, which we love so dearly," and to the "deep mountain glens" of the Kaatskills, and to the "twilight superstitions" of the Sleepy Hollow. Through all the writings of our distinguished countryman, even in his earlier and sprightlier productions, we meet with occasional sentiments of high and grave import, the genuine growth of ardent feelings which go directly to the heart. Nothing can be more soothing and gratifying to meditative minds than such pensive, chaste and mellowed reflections, arising from views of autumnal scenery, the ruins of ancient art, and the monuments of departed greatness. The gentleman who favored the world with these productions, not contented with enjoying the admiration of the republic of letters to a very eminent degree, was in the mean time busy in earning for himself a title to a still higher niche in the temple of fame. Having access to original and fresh documents relating to the life of CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS, he was encouraged and enabled to undertake and execute a great historical work, and on a subject the most rich in its details, and the most magnificent in its results, of any that ever employed the pen of the historian. He brought to the task all his great and diversified powers. His materials were selected with judgment and studied with diligence, arranged with skill and exhibited with fidelity, polished with taste and recommended by finished specimens of a graceful, flowing and dignified composition. The discovery of America was essentially a domestic theme. Though the enterprise was begun in Europe, it was consummated on this side of the Atlantic. The settlement of this new world seems to be a subject peculiarly appropriate to the pen of an American writer, who would naturally feel and appreciate most deeply and justly, the inestimable value of the discovery and the mighty consequences of the establishment of great nations on this continent, with their languages and institutions, their freedom of religion, their arts and sciences, spreading themselves over its surface. The choice was most propitious, and the History of the Life and Voyages of Columbus, will probably become the standard work on that subject through all succeeding ages. It equals the most distinguished historical compositions, not only in the dignity of the subject, but in the judgment, skill, spirit and felicity of its execution. This eminent historian, honored and beloved abroad, now returns with joy to the home of his youth, and to the beloved companions and scenes of his earliest glory. Let us then drink to

Our illustrious guest—thrice welcome to his native land.

When the applause with which this toast was received ceased, Mr. Irving rose, greatly agitated by the warm cheers with which he was hailed. He observed, that he believed most of his hearers were sensible of his being wholly unused to public speaking, but he should be wanting in the feelings of human nature, if he were not roused and excited by the present scene. After renewed cheering he proceeded in, as nearly as can be recollected, the following words:

"Mr. President and gentlemen—I find myself, after a long absence of seventeen years, surrounded by the friends of my youth—by those whom in my early days I was accustomed to look up to with veneration—by others, who though personally new to me, I recognise as the sons of the patriarchy of my native city. The manner in which I have been received by them, has rendered this the proudest, the happiest moment of my life. And what has rendered it more poignant is, that I have been led, at times, to doubt my standing in the affections of my countrymen. Rumors and suggestions had reached me (here Mr. I. betrayed much emotion) that absence had impaired their kind feelings; that they considered me alienated in heart from my country. Gentlemen, I was too proud to vindicate myself from such a charge; nor should I have alluded to it at this time, if the warm and affectionate reception I have met with on all sides since my landing, and the overpowering testimonials of regard here offered me, had not proved that my misgivings were groundless. (Cheers and clapping here interrupted the speaker for a few moments.) Never, certainly, did a man return to his native place, after so long an absence, under happier auspices. On my side I see changes, it is true, but they are the changes of rapid improvement and growing prosperity; even the countenances of my old associates and townsmen, have appeared to me but slightly affected by the lapse of years, though perhaps it was the glow of ancient friendship and heartfelt welcome beaming from them, that prevented me from seeing the ravages of time. As to my native city, from the time I approached the coast, I had indications of its growing greatness. We had scarce descried the land, when a thousand sails of all descriptions gleaming along the horizon, and all standing to or from one point, showed that we were in the neighborhood of a vast commercial emporium. As I sailed up our beautiful bay, with a heart swelling with old recollections and delightful associations, I was astonished to see its once wild features brightening with populous villages and noble piles, and a seeming city, extending itself over heights I had left covered with green forests (alluding, probably, to Brooklyn and Gowanus.) But how shall I describe my emotions when our city rose to sight, seated in the midst of its watery domain, stretching away to a vast extent; when I beheld a glorious sunshine lighting up the spires and domes, some familiar to memory, others new and unknown, and beaming upon a forest of masts of every nation, extending as far as the eye could reach? I have gazed with admiration upon many a fair city and stately harbor, but my admiration was cold and ineffectual, for I was a stranger, and had no property in the soil. Here, however, my heart throbbed with pride and joy as I admired—I had a birthright in the brilliant scene before me:

"This was my own, my native land."

Mr. Irving was here interrupted by immense applause: when the cheering had subsided he went on as follows. "It has been asked, 'Can I be content to live in this country?' Whoever asks that question must have but an inadequate idea of its blessings and delights. What sacrifice of enjoyments have I to reconcile myself to? I come from gloomier climes to one of brilliant sunshine and inspiring purity. I come from countries lowering with doubt and danger, where the rich man trembles and the poor man frowns—where all repine at the present and dread the future. I come from these to a country where all is life and animation; where I hear on every side the sound of exultation; where every one speaks of the past with triumph, the present with delight, the future with glowing and confident anticipation. Is this not a community in which one may rejoice to live? Is this not a city by which one may be proud to be received as the son? Is this not a land in which one may be happy to fix his destiny, and ambition—if possible to found a name? (A burst of applause, when Mr. Irving quickly resumed)—“I am asked how long I mean to remain here? They know but little of my heart or my feelings who can ask me this question. I answer, as long as I live.” The roof now rung with bravos, handkerchiefs were waved on every side, “three cheers” again and again, and plaudits upon plaudits following in such quick succession, begun, ended and begun again, that it was some time before the toast with which Mr. Irving concluded, could be heard. It was as follows:

Our City—May God continue to prosper it.

Mr. Hone, the first vice-president, being called upon for a toast, addressed the meeting in a neat and appropriate speech, of which we add a sketch:

I rise for the purpose of proposing as the next toast—The memory of the first settlers of our city.

This sentiment is always acceptable on occasions of this kind; for those of us whose blood has flowed from other fountains are ever ready to acknowledge their virtues, and to express our veneration for the foundation on which the superstructure of our prosperity has been erected. But there is a peculiar propriety in its introduction at this time, when we see around us so many of their lineal descendants, who furnish in their own characters the best eulogium on the virtues of their ancestors, and when we are assembled to do honor to our distinguished townsman, whose youthful associations were connected with that race of men, and who has happily illustrated the history of former days in some of his earliest productions. I am warranted in saying, that during his sojourn in foreign countries, he has never forgotten his first love, (applause,) and while partaking of the hospitality of England, and describing, in terms at once glowing and just, the beauties of her scenery and the proud traits of her national character; and, while seeking amongst the archives of Spain materials for the history of the illustrious navigator who brought a new world to light, he has never ceased to cherish an affectionate remembrance of his native land; (cheers;) and so deeply is this feeling implanted in his heart, that even now (he) will excuse me for betraying family secrets, I hope, on the morning after his arrival, when the fatigues of a sea-voyage, and the excitement arising from this meeting after an absence of seventeen years, he arose with the sun, and sallied out in search of places endeared to him by early recollections. And although I suspect he may have felt it incumbent upon him to visit “the Independent American Hotel in Mulberry-street,” formerly kept by one Seth Handaside, for the purpose of paying off certain scores for sourcrot, (a laugh,) krullekes and olykoekjes, which were left unpaid by his friend Diederich Knickerbocker, at the time of his sudden and mysterious disappearance from that respectable hotel, I have no certain information that he extended his perambulations on that occasion farther than William-street, and the vicinity of the North Dutch church, a classic ground to him and our youthful associates. And here, sir, I must ask your indulgence for a few moments, while I defend my pronunciation of the name of “the little brick old gentleman, dressed in a rusty black coat, olive velvet breeches, and a little cocked hat,” who albeit he did leave his bill unpaid at the “Independent American Hotel,” left a treasure in his saddle-bags, which insured him the gratitude of the present generation. (Bravo.) I am quite sure it is correct, for Miss Nancy Bowles, who “taught my young idea how to shoot,” instructed me to pronounce knave, and knock; and if I failed in giving the full aspiration to the initial letter of each of these words, she was sure to supply the first to me as an epithet, and to inflict the other upon my offending pate. Moreover, I am informed, that the respectable family of Knickerbockers, of Scaghticoke, still adhere to that pronunciation. I have spoken of the attachment which our guest evinces for the relics of the days of our Dutch ancestors, and the avidity with which he has been seeking for memorials of their former existence. I hope he will not be discouraged from his pursuits by the difficulty of tracing them; for, although the ruthless hand of modern improvement has nearly obliterated them, and he may seek in vain Verlatenburg Hill, Smith’s Vile, and the Incleburgh, he may still find Coenties-slip, Dutch-street, and the Hell-gat. But to return to the subject of my toast. It will be allowed that the introduction of the laws of England, with her valuable improvements in the arts, sciences, and literature, and the powerful auxiliaries furnished by the ingenuity and enterprise of our eastern brethren have added greatly to the prosperity of our city. Yet the success of their transplanting proves the goodness of the original soil, and the names of the Russels, the Howards, the Sidneyes, the Stanleys, the Percys, and the Beauchamps of old England, do not call up feelings of more honest pride in the bosoms of her sons, than do the names of the Stuyvesants, the Brinckerhoffs, the Schermerhorns, the Van Schaicks, the Van Wageningen, the Van Rensselaers in ours. (Hearty cheering.) I propose the following toast:

To the First Settlers of New-Amsterdam; their virtues are illustrated in the correct conduct and sound principles of their descendants.

Mr. Duer, the second vice-president, being called upon for a toast, began by prefacing it with a few remarks, which, as their eloquent diction and refined humor kindled the attention of his hearers, and their murmurs of applause excited the speaker, he imperceptibly swelled into the following brilliant and finished essay:

It is expected, I presume, sir, (the presumption is at least convenient) that I should follow the example of my senior colleague, and preface the toast for which you call, with some remarks. Indeed, without the explanation I mean to give, I fear the toast I have to offer would be hardly understood—I fear also, that not only an explanation is requisite, but in some degree an apology. There is no vanity, I hope, in saying that I yield to no one who is present, in a sincere desire to do honor to our friend and guest. No one will or can suspect that I have any wish to wound his feelings—any desire (were that possible) to injure his fame. Yet I am by no means certain that my intended toast, even explained and justified, as it shall be, will be entirely agreeable to him—nor am I certain that the explanation itself may not tend in the estimation of some, to reduce him from the high rank he now holds, still more proceeded; a paramount regard to truth forbids me to be silent; imperative reasons of duty and conscience urge the disclosure I am about to make; which in truth has been already too long deferred. This disclosure I shall certainly manage with all possible consideration and delicacy towards the feelings of our guest; but to suppress it is impossible. It is necessary to dispel an error so prevalent as to be nearly universal. It is necessary to relieve the public mind from a delusion—a very serious delusion, on a very serious subject.—That our guest has contributed by his own acts to create this delusion, I do not assert, yet it cannot be denied, that by his silence he has permitted it to exist. You doubtless well recollect, sir, (most who are present recollect) that sometime in the year 1808 or 9, a work in two volumes was published in this city, containing a very minute and interesting narrative of the early and golden era of our colonial history—I mean the period when the colony was blessed with Dutch rulers, the Dutch language and the Dutch manners. The work bore the title, somewhat ambitious, of a History of New-York, and on its title-page the name of Diederich Knickerbocker, as its author. This book, you will remember, was not only received with general applause, but for many months continued to be read with implicit faith. It was universally regarded as containing a narrative equally authentic and curious, not only of the sufferings and exploits of our ancestors, but of the literature, manners, dress, modes of living—I had almost said of thinking—of those primitive times. I correct the error as to thinking, for I believe that habit, not very prevalent in any age, had then scarcely commenced. After the lapse, however, of those few months, during which the “History of New-York” was considered by all competent critics as the most valuable addition that had yet been made to the serious literature of our country—after the lapse, I say, of these few months—a report was invented and circulated, with unusual rapidity and success, denying to Knickerbocker the authorship of his own work, and even the fact of his own existence—a report improbable and scandalous; that the book was not, as it claimed to be, a history, but was a work merely of imagination and fiction—in short, that it was not the matured result of the long continued and successful diligence of Diederich Knickerbocker, but was the sudden fruit of the creative genius of Washington Irving. The author of this report I cannot name, as I have never been able to discover him, but I confess that at first I suspected, and for very obvious reasons, that it had an eastern origin. A friend, however, to whom I communicated my suspicions, (a friend, on whose judgment I had much reliance,) observed, in reply, that it was hardly probable that the laurel would be plucked from the brows of Diederich Knickerbocker, of Rensselaer, by eastern hands, to be fixed on those of Washington Irving—not of Boston, but of New-York; and I own the reply put an end to my suspicions. Leaving, however, the author, and returning to the report, we all know that it passed rapidly from private circles into the public prints, from newspapers into magazines, from magazines into reviews, and that it has since been monthly and daily repeated, in every form of assertion, and in every mode of publication, until it has at last obtained entire and absolute possession of the public mind, so that, at this time, and in this large assembly, there is not, I am persuaded, a single person, with the exception of myself, who does not believe, with an undoubting faith, that Washington Irving is as truly the author of this “History of New-York” as of the Sketch-Book or of the Life of Columbus. That your own mind, sir, shares deeply in this strange delusion, has already appeared by your opening address, in which (you will pardon me for saying) you have not only entirely mistaken the true character of the work, but have publicly ascribed its merits, such as you conceive them, to the guest whom we are met to honor. Were this a question of law, I should, as we are all accustomed to do, defer to your authority and be silent; but on a question of fact, sir, and where conscience is concerned, even your authority must not subdue me. I have a duty to perform, as we lawyers are somewhat apt to say, when addressing a court or jury, and must proceed—proceed, though I provoke the ridicule or incur the derision of all who hear me.

Yes, gentlemen of the jury, for to you I now direct myself, I know that all of you, numerous as without precedent you are, and it was fitting you should be—that all, every man of you are against me, but strong in the armor,—not as some of you seem disposed to hint “that rings when struck with brazen sounds,” but in the armor of truth and evidence, I fear not to approach you. I know your determined, obstinate, long-cherished partiality for your townsman; ye are all of you lovers of Washington Irving—be it so; but ye are ye not also lovers of truth? If ye are, ye will not, because ye cannot, resist the force of the evidence, the power of the argument, I mean to produce—ye listen to me now with impatience, perhaps indignation, but continue to listen, and even from you, obstinate, incredulous, pre-determined and prejudiced as ye are, I shall yet extort a unanimous verdict. All I ask is your attention—hear me—open your ears, and I promise to reach your consciences, if, pardon the doubt—if consciences ye have.

I resume my address to you, sir, as the most convenient mode of addressing others. The position I lay down, and mean to establish is this: that the work, entitled the “History of New-York” in two volumes, published at the time I have mentioned, with the name on the title-page of Diederich Knickerbocker as the author, is a genuine and authentic work—genuine, as actually written by the man whose name it bears—authentic, as a faithful narrative of the characters and events of the times to which it relates. I hope this is plain, and is understood. The first question I admit to be, did Diederich Knickerbocker ever exist at all? And here I have to regret, that the witness I had summoned from Scaghticoke, and on whom I relied, by some strange accident, are none of them in court. Following therefore, a not unfrequent, and sometimes successful practice, no one doubts its propriety—I offer myself as a witness. Certainly Diederich Knickerbocker has existed. My recollection is clear and distinct—I have seen the man. Cross-examined—I cannot exactly fix the time and place—I cannot state how I knew, and where I conversed with him, but these are trifling particulars; my forgetfulness does not do at all shake the certainty of my belief in the main fact, the man I have seen. Nay, I go farther. Task your own recollection, sir, for it is upon you that I may next call as a witness. Task your own recollection, by the process I shall mention, and you will not refuse to join me in bearing testimony. You have read, I doubt not, frequently the preface to the first edition of the “History of New-York.” Do you not remember, sir, the description it contains of the person, appearance, and dress of Diederich Knickerbocker—the few scattered gray hairs, the bending form, the humble and thoughtful look, the rusty black coat, the tarnished green vest, the olive-colored breeches, and the blue stockings? Have you not seen that man, sir? For myself, I never read this preface, but Diederich stands before me, and so distinct is the image that I know at once, with an intuitive certainty, that it is an image recalled by my own memory, not impressed by the fancy of another. I pass now from the external proof, rigid as you are, sir, you may think it is somewhat weak; be it so; strike it out of the case. The chasm is far more than supplied by the abundance and certainty of internal evidence, to which I shall now appeal.

I begin by stating the question in its true form—Why should we doubt the authenticity of Knickerbocker’s History of New-York? When a work is published with such a title, having on its title-page a christian and surname, as of the author—these, too, the well-known appellatives of an ancient and respected family, the presumption is, that the work is what it purports to be, and the stress of the argument plainly lies on those who impeach its authenticity. I start, then, with this presumption in my favor, and I put again the question, why should we doubt? Are not all the grand, the most important facts related in this history confirmed to us, by every other historian—by every account and tradition that has reached us, of that remote age? Did not Hendrick Hudson discover the Hudson? Was not the colony first settled by emigrants from Holland? Did they not bring with them a language called the Dutch, a very corrupt and dissimilar dialect which is still spoken in various parts of the state? Did they not land on this island, then called by the native Indians Manhattoe, or Manhattan, and adopting the usual process—a process in good repute to the present day—did they not without delay, put out the savages and put in themselves? Were they not, shortly after their establishment, and did they not for a series of years, continue to be vexed, harassed, and put beside their patience, by the encroachments, inroads, proclamations, reasonings and questions of their eastern neighbors? Were not the character and pursuits of those neighbors, such as Diederich Knickerbocker has described them, and such, as to a considerable extent, those of their descendants remain? Were they not talkative and long-winded, inquisitive and subtle, disputations and devout? Did they not fatten pork, import molasses, raise in quantity inordinate, onions and pumpkins, and delight and excel in psalmody? In spite of this persevering, puritanical and most perilous race, did not our ancestors, sir—I say our, for “Io ancho sono Pittore.” I also have a spice of the Dutchman, and in spite I say of this restless and locomotive race—did not our ancestors continue to maintain this goodly city in their own exclusive possession, thereby accomplishing a feat that has utterly baffled the skill of their degenerate sons? Did they not so retain, not the city only, but the state, and were they not for many years, to all intents and purposes, a Dutch community, a Dutch colony, and were not Wouter Van Twiller, Wilhelmus Kieft and Petrus Stuyvesant, in succession their rulers? Now, sir, in all this extended narrative, full of events so various and important, has any incongruity, any inconsistency, yet been detected? Has any one discovered or pretended to discover any mistake or blunder in geography, chronology, or genealogy? You, sir, accustomed to reason, see the force of the argument; you see, sir, there is a consistency here that truth only can give, truth only preserve—a consistency never found in any work of fiction, professing to adopt the events and follow the train of history. Look, for example, at the historical novels of Sir Walter Scott; yet his books abound with flagrant inconsistencies and gross anachronisms, and so abound, even by his own confession.

[Mr. Duer next proceeded to show that the very circumstantial character of the narrative was no objection to its authenticity—he explained the means by which Knickerbocker was enabled to prepare the materials of his history, the details of which, though very minute, he contended were precisely such as the diligent lover of truth was likely to collect, and such as the most lively imagination could never invent, but in this and in other parts of his speech, we feel authorized to condense our report. He resumed as follows.]

I pass now, sir, as rapidly as I can, to another head or branch of my argument. It is amazing to me, sir, amazing that any man can read this “History of New-York”—any man, I mean, of ordinary mind, can read it with ordinary attention, and not be satisfied that it was written by a Dutchman, and not only, sir, that it was, but that it could only have been written by a genuine, full-blooded, unsophisticated Dutchman. Is there not a manifestation—an overflowing of Dutch opinions, and feelings, and prejudices in every page? Open the book where we may, do we not find the Dutch jealousy of Yankee acuteness? the Dutch dread of Yankee audacity? and the Dutch horror of Yankee innovations? But above all, sir, I appeal, with exultation appeal, to that honest Dutch enthusiasm, I repeat it, Dutch enthusiasm, that meets us at the very commencement of the narrative—that deepens and brightens as we advance, until it bursts forth, so gloriously at the close, to illuminate with a never-dying splendor the heroic Dutch obstinacy of Peter Stuyvesant! (The company seemed struck with the force of his reasoning, and manifested their assent rather loudly.) I see, sir, my cause advances. I am yet doomed to be victorious—for how triumphantly do I now put my question—Could Washington Irving have written thus? Washington Irving have felt thus? Is there a single drop of Dutch blood in his veins, a single Dutch opinion in his mind, or Dutch feeling or prejudices in his heart? Why, sir, the Irvings are Scotch, I repeat it, sir, Scotch, and not a little proud are they, as I have some reason to know, of their Scotch descent. It was near the debateable land, not in the fens of Holland, that their ancestors dwelt, and to this day, the imagination of an Irving dwells with far more delight on the ricks and forays of the reivers and moss-troopers of the border, than on that ever-memorable expedition to the Delaware, in which, by Dutch valor, the pride of Sweden was so effectually humbled. It is needless, sir, to need your approbation, I know you are now with me. Your mind is disciplined to yield its preconceived opinions to the force of demonstration, and my reasoning I cannot deny is demonstration. But, sir, there is an obstinacy in that other end of the tables, who are still incredulous, and to drive scepticism from its last refuge, it is necessary that I should produce my last and most conclusive argument. If, when it is heard and considered, any heretics shall remain, I can only say, their case is desperate. They should be marked, sir, as men not to be reasoned with in future.

Let us go back, sir, to the History of New-York, and let me recall your attention to the first five chapters, forming the first book of this immortal work. I mean the chapters which commence with a scientific description of the globe we inhabit—of the matter and magnitude of the sun—the revolutions of the planets—and the errors of comets—which proceed to treat of the cosmogony or creation of the world, of the discovery and peopling of America, and of those vexed questions in the law of nations, the rights acquired by conquest or discovery, and which conclude with a most interesting account of the names, characters, dispersion and adventures of the sons of Noah.—I do not now, sir, call your attention to the very original and profound speculations of the author on these various topics, or to the admirable skill and still more admirable impartiality with which he weighs and balances, and in succession demolishes the rival hypotheses of rival philosophers; but I do call, earnestly call your attention to the learning, extensive, vast, accurate and profound, which these chapters exhibit. Why, sir, in this respect they are absolutely without a parallel. Not only in the literature of our own but any country. Without a parallel in the mass of erudition which in the compass of a few pages they concentrate and condense. It is evident, sir, in reading these chapters that the author is well acquainted with all writers, illustrious and obscure of every country, age, nation, and tongue, and was more particularly conversant with the Hebrew, Arabic, Sanscrit, and Greek literature, in all their branches. He quotes from writers in all these languages, (I have, of course, verified the quotations) with an ease, precision, and fidelity that marks his perfect knowledge of their contents. Why, sir, in these few chapters, in the compass of these few pages, he quotes Plato, Aristotle, Xenophon, Timæus, the Locrian, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Diogenes Laertius, Polybius, Plutarch, Strabo, Stobæus, Photius, Porphyry, Proclus, and Jamblichus, Cassiodorus and Jordanes, Ben-Manasseh, Ben-Leda, and Ben-Er, Abal-Manzar, Abul-Feda, and Abul-Pharagius, with a host of others, not forgetting the favourite authors of Ephraim Jenkinson, Sanchoamath, Maneth, and Berosus. You see, sir, the argument is at an end. I smile in the pride of conscious victory—I smile, when I ask could Washington Irving have written these chapters? Did he ever possess, was he ever suspected to possess, I will not say a tithe, but the smallest imaginable fractional part of that dark, difficult, and abstruse lore, and in which these chapters show their author was so deeply versed? Mr. Irving himself, if I can catch his eye—I have it, sir—Mr. Irving himself shall and does smile when I put the question, when and where he acquired his knowledge of Hebrew, Arabic, and Sanscrit? As to the Greek, I do not push him; he may have read Homer, Pindar, and Anacreon, but he will not, I am sure, assert that he has ever wasted the oil of his midnight lamp over the visions of Plato or the subtleties of Aristotle. But I ask not, sir, that Mr. Irving himself should reply, I ask not his confessions, I refer, sir, to his own works, his acknowledged writings, those to which his title as author is not disputed, and they shall furnish all the evidence I desire. Take, for example, the Sketch Book, Bracebridge Hall, the Tales of a Traveller. Do all, any or either of these productions, or any other of his productions, exhibit any, the slightest trace of that “prodigious erudition,” which would have called forth the special wonder of Dominie Sampson himself, and which Diederich Knickerbocker in the first book of immortal history actually displays? That these writings of our friend and guest manifest considerable talent, I am not disposed to deny. The world seems disposed to attribute to them merits of a very high order; but their merits, whatever they are, I affirm with confidence, are not such as books have supplied, or ever will or can supply. The writer, it is evident, depends too much on his own resources. His sentiments are such as his own observations, reflections and feelings have suggested—and his books, far from being a transcript of the words of other men, are the transcript merely of the mind and heart of their author. Rate then as high as you please, the merits and excellencies of these acknowledged writings of our guest, my answer still is, their excellencies have nothing in common with those of my inimitable chapters, and it would be absurd therefore to attribute to them a common origin. What avails it then to tell me, sir, that in the production to which I have referred, our guest has evinced a mastery almost unrivalled of our noble language; that his English is not only rich and copious, but genuine and idiomatic—manifesting his intimate familiarity with the best writers of the best age of our literature—the age of Elizabeth and Shakespeare—showing with what delight he has bathed in those “living founts of poetry and thought”—with what delight he has drawn from those “pure wells of English undefiled.” What avails it to tell me of the varied structure, the rhythmical flow, the harmonious cadence of his sentences, of all those thousand nameless beauties of style, which taste and feeling can alone suggest, taste and feeling alone appreciate? What avails it, I persist, to tell me of those higher qualities of his mind, which his productions are by his partial friends supposed to exhibit—his deep knowledge of the human heart, his nice discrimination of character, his exquisite moral sensibility, his racy and original humour, his keen and delicate wit, his bright and boundless fancy? (much cheering)—I am not so foolish, sir, as to take this applause, any portion of it to myself, nor so weak as to permit it to divert me from my argument.—You mean, all of you to say, that these praises of our guest are well deserved and true. Be it so. Endeavoring to conquer your prejudices, I am on my guard against my own—wishing you to be just to Knickerbocker, I would not be myself unjust to Irving. The praises may be true, but they concern me not. I listen to them calm and unmoved, for they touch not my argument. They do not prove—they have nothing to prove—that Washington Irving ever did, ever could write, the unequalled chapters on which I rest my cause. I resume then—how does it affect my argument, that in some of these writings of our friend, and guest, and townsman, (I grow, I confess, more and more fond of our right to call him so,) that in some of them we find a vein of grave and effective irony, that reminds us irresistibly of the happiest efforts of Cervantes and Fielding—that in some he has rivalled the humour of Swift, unpolluted by an atom of his grossness—in others, the pathos of Sterne redeemed from any mixture of affectation and quaintness? how does it affect my argument, that in some of his productions he fixes our attention and steals into our hearts with all those unobtrusive graces, that unpretending and quiet, yet, most bewitching and intelligent simplicity that gives to the writings of Goldsmith their peculiar charm, whilst in others, he melts and elevates and purifies our affections by a strain of moral sentiment, so true and lofty and refined as to leave in the whole circle of English literature, Addison and Mackenzie as his only rivals? (Loud and repeated cheers.) Again, gentlemen, I understand you. Again, whilst I disclaim the applause, you compel me to say, you move me not. You mean to re-echo and ratify the praises that others have bestowed and I repeat. Be it so—but, planted within the circle of the Five Chapters, the praises and the echo “pass by me as the idle wind,” for they shake not the lightest outwork of the impregnable fortress in which I am stationed. Some, however, of the friends of our guest may think it possible to refute me by referring to what they may deem the greatest and most valuable of his works, the Life of Columbus. They may assert that this work contains evidence that our friend is capable of the application, and may therefore well possess the acquirements of the scholar, not of an ordinary and superficial, but of a thoroughly instructed, a deeply learned scholar. They may tell me that the information contained in this work, is fuller, more curious, authentic, and original, than is to be found in any similar work, in any language on the same subject. That they show the researches of the author to have been most extensive, and prove him to have explored with an untiring and successful zeal, every possible source whence light and knowledge could have been derived or expected. All this may be admitted; but when admitted, what does it prove? Does it prove that Washington Irving ever possessed that abstract love of study, for the sake of study, those habits of unintermitting plodding diligence, which Diederich Knickerbocker must have possessed and exercised for years, to enable him to acquire those stores of literature which in his first book he pours forth with all the profusion of unbounded wealth? Not at all. Any man, when stimulated by a powerful motive, may evince for a time the application of a student; any man engaged in the composition of a work, which he hopes may extend his own fame or the fame of those he wishes to

As I was getting out of a fiacre this morning on the Boulevard, I observed that the driver had the cross of the Legion of Honor, worn very modestly under his coat. On taking a second look at his face, I was struck with its soldier-like, honest expression; and with the fear that I might imply a doubt by a question, I simply observed, that he probably received it from Napoleon. He drew himself up a little as he assented, and with half a smile pulled the coarse cape of his coat across his bosom. It was done evidently with a mixed feeling of pride and a dislike of ostentation, which showed the nurture of Napoleon. It is astonishing how superior every being seems to have become that served under him. Wherever you find an old soldier of the "emperor," as they delight to call him, you find a noble, brave, unpretending man. On mentioning this circumstance to a friend, he informed me, that it was probably a man who was well known, from rather a tragical circumstance. He had driven a gentleman to a party one night, who was dissatisfied with him, for some reason or other, and abused him very grossly. The cocher the next morning sent him a challenge; and, as the cross of honor levels all distinctions, he was compelled to fight him, and was shot dead at the first fire.

Honors of this sort must be a very great incentive. They are worn very proudly in France. You see men of all classes, with the striped ribbon in their button-hole, marking them as the heroes of the three days of July. The Poles and the French and English, who fought well at Warsaw, wear also a badge; and it certainly produces a feeling of respect as one passes them in the street. There are several very young men, lads really, who are wandering about Paris, with the latter distinction on their breasts, and every indication that it is all they have brought away from their unhappy country. The Poles are coming in now from every quarter. I meet occasionally in society the celebrated Polish countess, who lost her property and was compelled to flee, for her devotion to the cause. Louis Philip has formed a regiment of the refugees, and sent them to Algiers. He allows no liberalists to remain in Paris, if he can help it. The Spaniards and Italians, particularly, are ordered off to Tours, and other provincial towns, the instant they become pensioners upon the government.

I was presented last night, with Mr. Carr and Mr. Ritchie, two of our countrymen, to the king. We were very naturally prepared for an embarrassing ceremony—an expectation which was not lessened in my case, by the necessity of a laced coat, breeches, and sword; matters which I had contended with our excellent minister, Mr. Rives, were neither necessary nor becoming to American citizens. I was overruled, however, and we drove into the court of the Tuilleries, as the palace clock struck nine, in the costume of courtiers of the time of Louis the twelfth, very anxious about the tenacity of our knee-buckles, and not at all satisfied as to the justice done to our unaccustomed proportions by the tailor. To say nothing of my looks, I am sure I should have felt much more like a gentleman in my costume bourgeois. By the time we had been passed through the hands of all the chamberlains, however, and walked through all the preparatory halls and drawing-rooms, each with its complement of gentlemen in waiting, dressed like ourselves in lace and small-clothes, I became more reconciled to myself, and began to feel that I might possibly have looked out of place in my ordinary dress. The atmosphere of a court is certainly very contagious in this particular.

After being sufficiently astonished with long rooms, frescoes, and guardsmen, seven or eight feet high, (the tallest men I ever saw, standing with halberds at the doors,) we were introduced into the Salle du Trône—a large hall, lined with crimson velvet throughout, with the throne in the centre of one of the sides. Some half dozen gentlemen were standing about the fire, conversing very familiarly, among whom was the British ambassador, Lord Grenville, and the Brazilian minister, both of whom I had met before. The king was not there. The Swedish minister, a noble-looking man, with snow-white hair, was the only other official person present, each of the ministers having come to present one or two of his countrymen. The king entered in a few minutes, in the simple uniform of the line, and joined the group at the fire, with the most familiar and cordial politeness; each minister presenting his countrymen as occasion offered, certainly with far less ceremony than one sees at most dinner parties in America. After talking a few minutes with Lord Grenville, inquiring the progress of the cholera, he turned to Mr. Rives, and we were presented. We stood in a little circle around him, and he conversed with us about America for ten or fifteen minutes. He inquired from what states we came, and said he had been as far west as Nashville, Tennessee, and had often slept in the woods, quite as soundly as he ever did in more luxurious quarters. He begged pardon of Mr. Carr, who was from South Carolina, for saying that he had found the southern taverns not particularly good. He preferred the north. All this time I was looking out for some accent in the "king's English." He speaks the language with all the careless correctness and fluency of a vernacular tongue. We were all surprised at it. It is American English, however. He has not a particle of the cockney drawl, half Irish and half Scotch, with which many Englishmen speak. He must be the most cosmopolite king that ever reigned. He even said he had been at Tangiers, the place of Mr. Carr's consulate. After some pleasant compliment to our country, he passed to the Brazilian minister, who stood on the other side, leaving us delighted with his manner; and, probably, in spite of our independence, much more inclined than before to look indulgently upon his bad politics. The queen had entered, meantime, with the king's sister, Lady Adelaide, and one or two of the ladies of honor; and, after saying something courteous to all, in her own language, and assuring us that his majesty was very fond of America, the royal group bowed out, and left us once more to ourselves.

We remained a few minutes, and I occupied myself with looking at the gold and crimson throne before me, and recalling to my mind the world of historical circumstances connected with it. You can easily imagine it all. The throne of France is, perhaps, the most interesting one in the world. But of all its associations, none rushed upon me so forcibly, or retained my imagination so long, as the accidental drama of which it was the scene during the three days of July. It was here that the people brought the Polytechnic scholar, mortally wounded in the attack on the palace, to die. He breathed his last on the throne of France, surrounded with his comrades and a crowd of patriots. It is one of the most striking and affecting incidents, I think, in all history.

As we passed out I caught a glimpse through a side door of the queen and the princesses sitting round a table, covered with books, in a small drawing-room, while a servant, in the gaudy livery of the court, was just entering with a waiter of tea. The careless attitudes of the figures, the mellow light of the shade-lamp, and the happy voices of children coming through the door, reminded me more of home than any thing I have seen in France. It is odd, but really the most aching sense of home-sickness I have felt since I left America, was awakened at that moment—in the palace of a king, and at the sight of his queen and daughters!

We stopped in the antechamber to have our names recorded in the visiting-book—a ceremony which insures us invitations to all the balls given at court during the winter. The first has already appeared in the shape of a printed note, in which we are informed by the "Aide-de-camp of the king and the lady of honor of the queen," that we are invited to a ball at the palace on Monday night. To my distress there is a little direction at the bottom, "Les hommes seront en uniforme," which subjects those of us who are not military, once more to the awkwardness of this ridiculous court dress. I advise all Americans coming abroad to get a commission in the militia to travel with. It is of use in more ways than one.

I met the Countess Guiccioli, walking yesterday in the Tuilleries. She looks much younger than I anticipated, and is a handsome blonde, apparently about thirty. I am told by a gentleman who knows her, that she has become a great flirt, and is quite spoiled by admiration. The celebrity of Lord Byron's attachment would, certainly, make her a very desirable acquaintance were she much less pretty than she really is; and I am told her drawing-room is thronged with lovers of all nations, contending for a preference, which, having been once given, as it has, should be buried, I think, for ever. So, indeed, should have been the Empress Maria Louisa's, and that of the widow of Bishop Heber; and yet the latter has married a Greek count, and the former a German baron!

I find I was incorrect in the statement I gave you of the duel between Mr. Hesse and Count Leon. The particulars have come out more fully, and from the curious position of the parties (Mr. Hesse, as I stated, being the natural son of George the Fourth, and Count Leon of Napoleon) are worth recapitulating. Count Leon had lost several thousand francs to Mr. Hesse, which he refused to pay, alledging that there had been unfair dealing in the game. The matter was left to arbitration, and Mr. Hesse fully cleared of the charge. Leon still refused to pay, and for fifteen days practised with the pistol from morning till night. At the end of this time he paid the money, and challenged Hesse. The latter had lost the use of his right arm in the battle of Waterloo, (fighting of course against Count Leon's father,) but accepted his challenge, and fired with his left hand. Hesse was shot through the body, and has since died, and Count Leon was not hurt. The affair has made a great sensation here, for Hesse had a young and lovely wife, only seventeen, and was unusually beloved and admired; while his opponent is a notorious gambler, and every way detested. People meet at the gaming-table here, however, as they meet in the street, without question of character.

Carnival is over. Yesterday was "Mardi Gras"—the last day of the reign of Folly. Paris has been like a city of grown-up children for a week. What with masking all night, supping, or breakfasting, what you will, at sunrise, and going to bed betwixt morning and noon, I feel that I have done my devoir upon the experiment of French manners. I desire to be regular, and follow a grave vocation for the rest of my life.

It would be tedious, not to say improper, to describe all the absurdities I have seen and mingled in for the last fortnight; but I must try to give you some idea of the meaning the French attach to the season of carnival, and the manner in which it is celebrated.

In society it is the time for universal gaiety and freedom. Parties, fancy balls, and private masques are given, and kept up till morning. The etiquette is something more free, and gallantry is indulged and followed with the privileges, almost, of a Saturnalia. One of the gayest things I have seen was a fancy ball, given by a man of some fashion, in the beginning of the season. Most of the distingués of Paris were there; and it was, perhaps, as fair a specimen of the elegant gaiety of the French capital, as occurred during the carnival. The rooms were full by ten. Every body was in costume, and the ladies in dresses of unusual and costly splendor. At a bal costumé there are no masks, of course, and dancing, waltzing, and galloping followed each other in the ordinary succession, but with all the heightened effect and additional spirit of a magnificent spectacle. It was really beautiful. There were officers from all the English regiments, in their fineshowy uniforms; and French officers who had brought dresses from their far off campaigns; Turks, Egyptians, Mussulmen, and Algerine rovers—every country that had been touched by French soldiers, represented in its richest costume, and by men of the finest appearance. There was a colonel of the English Madras cavalry, in the uniform of his corps—one mass of blue and silver, the most splendidly dressed man I ever saw; and another Englishman, who is said to be the successor of Lord Byron in the graces of the gay and lovely Countess Guiccioli, was dressed as a Greek; and between the exquisite taste and richness of his costume, and his really excessive personal beauty, he made no ordinary sensation. The loveliest woman there was a young baroness, whose dancing, figure, and face so resembled a celebrated Philadelphia belle, that I was constantly expecting her musical French voice to break into English. She was dressed as an eastern dancing-girl, and floated about with the lightness and grace of a fairy. Her motion intoxicated the eye completely. I have seen her since at the Tuilleries, where, in a waltz with the handsome duke of Orleans, she was the single object of admiration for the whole court. She is a small, lightly-framed creature, with very little feet, and a face of more brilliancy than regular beauty, but all airiness and spirit. A very lovely, indolent-looking English girl, with large sleepy eyes, was dressed as a Circassian slave, with chains from her ankles to her waist. She was a beautiful part of the spectacle, but too passive to interest one. There were sylphs and nuns, broom-girls and Italian peasants, and a great many in rich Polonaise dresses. It was unlike any other fancy ball I ever saw, in the variety and novelty of the characters represented, and the costliness with which they were dressed. You can have no idea of the splendor of a waltz in such a glittering assemblage. It was about time for an early breakfast when the ball was over.

The private masks are amusing to those who are intimate with the circle. A stranger, of course, is neither acquainted enough to amuse himself within proper limits, nor incognito enough to play his gallantries at hazard. I never have seen more decidedly triste assemblies than the balls of this kind which I have attended, where the uniform black masks and dominoes gave the party the aspect of a funeral, and the restraint made it quite as melancholy.

The public masks are quite another affair. They are given at the principal theatres, and commence at midnight. The pit and stage are thrown into a brilliant hall, with the orchestra in the centre; the music is divine, and the etiquette perfect liberty. There is, of course, a great deal of vulgar company, for every one is admitted who pays the ten francs at the door; but all classes of people mingle in the crowd; and if one is not amused, it is because he will neither listen nor talk. I think it requires one or two masks to get one's eye so much accustomed to the sight, that he is not disgusted with the exteriors of the women. There was something very diabolical to me at first in a dead, black representation of the human face, and the long black domino. Persuading one's self that there is beauty under such an outside, is like getting up a passion for a very ugly woman, for the sake of her mind—difficult, rather. I soon became used to it, however, and amused myself infinitely. One is liable to waste his wit, to be sure; for in a crowd so rarely bien composée, as they phrase it, the undistinguishing dress gives every one the opportunity of bewildering you; but the feet and manner of walking, and the tone and mode of expression are indices sufficiently certain to decide, and give interest to a pursuit; and, with tolerable caution, one is paid for his trouble, in nineteen cases out of twenty.

At the public masks, the visitors are not all in domino. One-half at least are in caricature dresses, men in petticoats, and women in boots and spurs. It is not always easy to detect the sex. An English lady, a carnival-acquaintance of mine, made love successfully, with the aid of a tall figure and great spirit, to a number of her own sex. She wore a half uniform, and was certainly a very elegant fellow. France is so remarkable indeed, for effeminate looking men and masculine looking women, that half the population might change costume to apparent advantage. The French are fond of caricaturing English dandies, and they do it with great success. The imitation of Bond-street dialect in another language is highly amusing. There were two imitation exquisites at the "Variétés" one night, who were dressed to perfection, and must have studied the character thoroughly. The whole theatre was in a roar when they entered. Malcontents take the opportunity to show up the king and ministers, and these are excellent, too. One gets weary of fun. It is a life which becomes tedious long before carnival is over. It is a relief to sit down once more to books and pen.

The three last days are devoted to street masking. This is the most ridiculous of all. Paris pours out its whole population upon the Boulevards, and guards are stationed to keep the goers and comers in separate lines, and prevent all collecting of groups on the pavé. People in the most grotesque and absurd dresses pass on foot, and in loaded carriages, and all is nonsense and obscenity. It is difficult to conceive the motive which can induce grown up people to go to the expense and trouble of such an exhibition, merely to amuse the world. A description of these follies would be waste of paper.

On the last night but one of the carnival, I went to a ball at the palace. We presented our invitations at the door, and mounted through piles of soldiers of the line, crowds of servants in the king's livery, and groves of exotics at the broad landing places, to the reception room. We were ushered into the Salle des Maréchaux—a large hall, the ceiling of which rises into the dome of the Tuileries, ornamented with full-length portraits of the living marshals of France. A gallery of a light airy structure runs round upon the capitals of the pillars, and this, when we entered, and at all the after hours of the ball, was crowded with loungers from the assembly beneath—producing a splendid effect, as their glittering uniforms passed and repassed under the flags and armor with which the ceilings were thickly hung. The royal train entered presently, and the band struck up a superb march. Three rows of velvet-covered seats, one above another, went round the hall, leaving a passage behind, and in front of these the queen and her family made a circuit of courtesy, followed by the wives of the ambassadors, among whom was our countrywoman, Mrs. Rives. Her majesty went smiling past, stopping here and there to speak to a lady whom she recognized, and the king followed her with his eternal and painfully forced smile, saying something to every second person he encountered. There was not a passably handsome woman in the train, our dignified countrywoman, Mrs. R., alone excepted. The princesses have good faces, and the second one has an expression of great delicacy and tenderness, but no beauty. As soon as the queen was seated, the band played a quadrille, and the crowd cleared away from the centre for the dance. The duke of Orleans selected his partner, a pretty girl, who, I believe, was English, and forward went the head couples to the exquisite music of the new opera—Robert le Diable.

I fell into the little cortège standing about the queen, and watched the interesting party dancing in the head quadrille for an hour. The duke of Orleans, who is nearly twenty, and seems a thoughtless, good-natured, immature young man, moved about very gracefully with his handsome figure, and seemed amused, and quite unconscious of the attention he drew. The princesses were vis-à-vis, and the second one, a dark-haired, slender, interesting girl of nineteen, had a polytechnic scholar for her partner. He was a handsome, gallant-looking fellow, who must have distinguished himself to have been invited to court, and I could not but admire the beautiful mixture of respect and self-confidence with which he demanded the hand of the princess from the lady of honor, and conversed with her during the dance. If royalty does not seal up the affections, I could scarce conceive how a being so decidedly of nature's best nobility, handsome, graceful and confident, could come within the sphere of a sensitive-looking girl, like the princess Christine, and not leave more than a transient recollection upon her fancy. The music stopped, and I had been so occupied with my speculations upon the polytechnic boy, that I had scarcely noticed any other person in the dance. He led the princess back to her seat by the dame d'honneur, bowed low, colored a little, and mingled with the crowd. A few minutes after I saw him in the gallery, quite alone, leaning over the railing and looking down upon the scene below, having apparently abandoned the dance for the evening. From something in his face, and in the manner of resuming his sword, I was certain he had come to the palace with that single object, and would dance no more. I kept him in my eye most of the night, and am very sure that he did not. If the little romance I wove out of it was not a true one, it was not because the material was improbable.

A very plain, ill-dressed young man, was dancing soon after with the elder princess. I asked an English officer of my acquaintance who he was. "Lord Harry Vane," was his answer. You should see the unknightly shoulders on which this gallant name has descended! I expressed my astonishment, and my friend pointed to a low-browed, ill-natured, inferior looking man, standing by the wall opposite. "There," said he, "is a duke, the lineal descendant and heir to the titles of the Cardinal Richelieu." It was a young man, whom I had seen very often at parties, and had uniformly wondered how so ordinary and unattractive a person could ever have found his way or kept his footing in the gay world. I have made the acquaintance of one gentleman, however, since I have been in France, who seems to have inherited the talent with the name and blood of his ancestors. He is a Villiers of the Buckingham and Clarendon race, and just now a colleague with Dr. Bowring, in his private political embassy to the French court. He is a radical, and certainly knows more of America than all the other foreigners I have heard speak upon the subject together. I have found such universal ignorance of America among all classes of people here, that I begin to be astonished at even a knowledge of the names of our capitals. That a young man, of the highest blood of England, should possess a minute knowledge of our politics and social distinctions, surprised me as much as an ignorance on the subject would have done six months ago. A traveler from the moon would find it much easier, than an American, to make the existence and geography of his country comprehended.

As I was looking still at the quadrille dancing before the queen, Dr. Bowring took my arm and proposed a stroll through the other apartments. I found that the immense crowd in the Salle des Maréchaux was but about one-fifth of the assembly. We passed through hall after hall, with music and dancing in each, all crowded and gay alike, till we came at last to the Salle du Trône, where the old men were collected at card tables and in groups for conversation. My distinguished companion was of the greatest use to me here, for he knew every body, and there was scarce a person in the room who did not strongly excite my curiosity. One-half of them at least were maimed; some without arms, and some with wooden legs, and faces scarred and weather-burnt, but all in full uniform, and nearly all with three or four orders of honor on the breast. You would have held your breath to have heard the recapitulation of their names. At one table sat Marshal Grouchy and General Exelmans; in a corner stood Marshal Soult, conversing with a knot of peers of France; and in the window nearest the door, General Bernard, our country's friend and citizen, was earnestly engaged in talking to a group of distinguished looking men, two of whom, my companion said, were members of the chamber of deputies. We stood a moment, and a circle was immediately formed around Dr. Bowring, who is a great favorite among the literary and liberal people of France. The celebrated General Fabvier came up among others, and Cousin the poet. Fabvier, as you know, held a chief command in Greece, and was elected governor of Paris pro tem. after the "three days." He is a very remarkable looking man, with a head almost exactly resembling that of the bust of Socrates. The engravings give him a more animated and warlike expression than he wears in private. Cousin is a mild, retired looking man, and was one of the very few persons present not in the court uniform. Among so many hundred coats embroidered with gold, his plain black dress looked singularly simple and poet-like.

I left the diplomatist-poet conversing with his friends, and went back to the dancing rooms. Music and female beauty are more attractive metal than disabled generals playing at cards; and encountering in my way Mr. H., an attaché to the American legation, I inquired about one or two faces that interested me, and collecting information enough to pass through the courtesies of a dance, I found a partner and gave myself up, like the rest, to amusement.

Supper was served at two, and a more splendid affair could not be conceived. A long and magnificent hall on the other side of the Salle du Trône, was set with tables, covered with every thing that France could afford, in the royal services of gold and silver, and in the greatest profusion. There was room enough for all the immense assemblage, and when the queen was seated with her daughters and ladies of honor, the company sat down and all was as quiet and well regulated as a dinner party of four.

After supper the dancing was resumed, and the queen remained till three o'clock. At her departure the band played cotillons or waltzes with figures, in which the duke of Orleans displayed the grace for which he is celebrated, and at four, quite exhausted with fatigue and heat, I went with a friend or two into the long glass verandah, built by Napoleon as a promenade for the empress Maria Louisa during her illness, where tea, coffee, and ices were served to those who wished them after supper. It was an interesting place enough, and had my eyes and limbs ached less, I should have liked to walk up and down, and muse a little upon its recollections, but swallowing my tea as hastily as possible, I was but too happy to make my escape and get home to bed.

[After the foregoing letter was in type, we received new communications from the same hand. The subjoined, being on a subject which greatly occupies and interests the public mind, we are unwilling to detain from our readers, and accordingly add it in the present number.]

NUMBER EIGHTEEN.

Cholera—Universal terror—Flight of the inhabitants—Cases within the walls of the palace—Difficulty of escape—Deserted Streets—Cases not reported—Dryness of the atmosphere—Preventives recommended—Public Baths, &c.

Cholera! cholera!—It is now the only topic. There is no other interest—no other dread—no other occupation, for Paris. The invitations for parties are at last recalled—the theatres are at last shut or languishing—the fearless are beginning to be afraid—people walk the streets with camphor bags and vinaigrettes at their nostrils—there is a universal terror in all classes, and a general flight of all who can afford to get away. I never saw a people so engrossed with one single and constant thought. The waiter brought my breakfast this morning with a pale face, and an apprehensive question, whether I was quite well. I sent to my bootmaker yesterday, and he was dead. I called on a friend, a Hanoverian, one of those broad-chested, florid, immortal-looking men, of whose health for fifty years, violence apart, one is absolutely certain, and he was at death's door with the cholera. Poor fellow! He had fought all through the revolution in Greece; he had slept in rain and cold, under the open sky, many a night, through a ten years' pursuit of the profession of a soldier of fortune, living one of the most remarkable lives hitherto, of which

I ever heard, and to be taken down here in the midst of ease and pleasure, reduced to a shadow with so vulgar and unwelcome a disease as this, was quite too much for his philosophy. He had been ill three days when I found him. He was emaciated to a skeleton in that short time, weak and helpless, and, though he is not a man to exaggerate suffering, he said he never had conceived such intense agony as he had endured. He assured me, that if he recovered, and should ever be attacked with it again, he would blow out his brains at the first symptom. Nothing but his iron constitution protracted the disorder. Most people who are attacked die in from three to twenty-four hours.

For myself, I have felt and still feel quite safe. My rooms are in the airiest quarter of Paris, facing the gardens of the Tuileries, with windows overlooking the king's; and, as far as air is concerned, if his majesty considers himself well situated, it would be quite ridiculous in so insignificant a person as myself to be alarmed. With absolute health, confident spirits, and tolerably regular habits, I have usually thought one may defy almost any thing but love or a bullet. To-day, however, there have been, they say, two cases within the palace walls, members of the royal household, and Casimir Perier, who probably lives well and has enough to occupy his mind, is very low with it, and one cannot help feeling that he has no certain exemption, when a disease has touched both above and below him. I went to-day to the messagerie to engage my place for Marseilles, on the way to Italy, but the seats are all taken, in both mail-post and diligence, for a fortnight to come, and as there are no extras in France, one must wait his turn. Having done my duty to myself by the inquiry, I shall be content to remain quiet.

I have just returned from a social tea-party at a house of one of the few English families left in Paris. It is but a little after ten, and the streets, as I came along, were as deserted and still, as if it were a city of the dead. Usually, until four or five in the morning, the same streets are thronged with carriages hurrying to and fro, and always till midnight the brocttoirs are crowded with promenaders. To-night I scarce met a foot-passenger, and but one solitary cabriolet in a walk of a mile. The contrast was really impressive. The moon was nearly full, and high in the heavens, and the sky absolutely without a trace of a cloud; nothing interrupted the full broad light of the moon, and the empty streets were almost as bright as at noon-day; and, as I crossed the Place Vendôme, I could hear, for the first time since I have been in Paris, though I have passed it at every hour of the night, the echo of my footsteps reverberated from the walls around. You should have been in these crowded cities of Europe to realize the impressive solemnity of such solitude.

It is said that fifty thousand people have left Paris within the past week. Adding this to the thousand a day who are struck with the cholera, and the attendance necessary to the sick, and a thinned population is sufficiently accounted for. There are, however, hundreds ill of this frightful disease, whose cases are not reported. It is only those who are taken to the hospitals, the poor and destitute, who are numbered in the official statements. The physicians are wearied out with their private practice. The medical lectures are suspended, and a regular physician is hardly to be had at all. There is scarce a house in which some one has not been taken. You see biers and litters issuing from almost every gate, and the better ranks are no longer spared. A sister of the premier, M. Perier, died yesterday; and it was reported at the Bourse, that several distinguished persons, who have been ill of it, are also dead. No one feels safe; and the consternation and dread on every countenance you meet is enough to chill one's very blood. I went out to-day for a little exercise, not feeling very well, and I was glad to get home again. Every creature looks stricken with a mortal fear. And this among a French population, the gayest and merriest of people under all depressions ordinarily, is too strong a contrast not to be felt painfully. There is something singular in the air, too; a disagreeable, depressing dryness, which the physicians say must change, or all Paris will be struck with the plague. It is clear and cold, but almost suffocating with dryness.

It is very consoling in the midst of so much that is depressing, that the preventives recommended against the cholera are so agreeable. "Live well," say the doctors, "and bathe often. Abstain from excesses, keep a clear head and good spirits, and amuse yourself as much and as rationally as possible." It is a very excellent recipe for happiness, let alone the cholera. There is great room for a nice observance of this system in Paris, particularly the eating and bathing. The baths are delightful. You are received in handsome saloons, opening upon a garden in the centre of the building, ornamented with statues and fountains, the journals lying upon the sofas, and every thing arranged with quite the luxury of a palace. The bathing-rooms are furnished with taste, the baths are of marble, and covered inside with spotlessly white linen cloths; the water is perfumed; and you may lie and take your coffee, or have your breakfast served upon the mahogany cover which shuts you in; a union of luxuries, which is enough to enervate a cynic. When you are ready to come out, a pull of the bell brings a servant, who gives you a peignoir—a long linen wrapper, heated in an oven, in the warm folds of which you are enveloped, and in three minutes are quite dry. In this you may sit, at your ease, reading, or musing, or lie upon the sofa without the restraint of a tight dress, till you are ready to depart; and then four or five francs, something less than a dollar, pays for all.

celebrate, may submit with cheerfulness and success to all the labor which the performance of his task requires. In the preparation of his work, it is plain, the author of the Life of Columbus was influenced by strong and peculiar feelings; feelings, that not only incited him to commence his labors, but animated and sustained his toils. He was inspired with a very sincere and deep, I had almost said passionate, many will think romantic admiration, of the character, virtues, talents, of his selected hero. He was desirous to disperse forever the calumnies and misrepresentations, that even when he meditated his work, continued in a manner to obscure his fame, and discover and place in its true light every fact and circumstance that could tend to illustrate and enhance his glory. He was most anxious, in short, that his history should appear as the work (if I may so express myself,) of an intellectual statuary, in which the form and lineaments of his hero should be sculptured forth in all the truth and dignity of the moral sublime, appealing with a restless force to all the higher and holier feelings of our nature, and awakening in every breast congenial sentiments of admiration, reverence, and love. Such were Mr. Irving's wishes in undertaking his work, and all that he wished he may have accomplished. I go farther—no concession can now flatter me—I avow my conviction, all that he wished he has accomplished, and so accomplished, that for myself I firmly believe, that in the hearts and memory of Americans at least, the names and the glory of the hero and the biographer, of Columbus and of Irving, are, and forever will be as inseparable, as in themselves they are imperishable.

I perceive, sir, the difficulty of returning to my subject; our minds are too full of Irving to dwell longer upon Knickerbocker; what, therefore, remains to be said, shall be said briefly. I have now made all the concessions that the advocates of Mr. Irving's claims to be considered the author of the "History of New-York" can possibly desire; and what, as touching my argument, do all these concessions amount to? Nothing, nothing at all; the original demonstration remains: it still remains certain that Mr. Irving could not, and therefore did not write the first five chapters of the work: the whole is evidently the production of one mind. If Washington Irving was not the author of these chapters, he was not the author of the work; consequently, "Quod erat demonstrandum," Diedrich Knickerbocker was, for it is admitted by all that the question lies between them. My argument is therefore closed. The existence of Knickerbocker is proved—the true design of his work explained, and his fame vindicated and established. I had intended, indeed, to have given a narrative (derived from a most authentic source) of the circumstances and causes of his death, (for many years have elapsed since he paid the last debt to nature) but I perceive in the outskirts of the assembly an incipient commotion that admonishes me to forbear; besides, the story, I own, is melancholy, and I would not throw a sudden gloom over the festivities of the day. Suffice it therefore to say, that Diedrich Knickerbocker is dead, but we survive to render at last to his memory the honor it deserves, for I am sure there is none present who will now refuse to join me, and with due reverence, in the tribute I mean to offer. I give you

The memory of the Dutch Herodotus—Diedrich Knickerbocker.

The manner as well as the matter of this address, was really delightful. It was delivered with a flowing ease, a grace of gesture, a perfect gravity, and apparent earnestness to convince, which wonderfully enhanced the effect, and secured the most eager attention of the auditory, only interrupted with sudden peals of laughter, or bursts of acclamation, at some fine stroke of humor or felicitous allusion. Never have we known compliments conveyed with more happy force, yet entire delicacy. Mr. Irving repeatedly betrayed his interest by a hearty laugh. It was indeed a scene to be remembered. The reputed author of Diedrich Knickerbocker—no statue, painting, or engraving, but himself—returned from his long wanderings, and listening to this accusation from one of his old friends, with undisguised merriment.

At this moment an incident occurred, a very mysterious and extraordinary one. We are shocked at the manner in which the daily editors have treated it. The American touches on it rather lightly. We copy his ideas; but his lame explanation at the close is ridiculous. The public—our distant readers—must believe us—we saw it—it was no apparition. It passed within arm's reach of us, and glided through the crowd, after having gained in a threatening manner on Mr. Irving, as stated below. Some laughed—some stared—others spoke—"ask it to sit down," exclaimed one—"heaven preserve us!" murmured another—and then it vanished. We know more of the subject than we have yet expressed to any one. On the morning of the day of the dinner, when we entered our office, we were surprised to find it filled with smoke, through which, after a few moments, we detected this very figure, seated in our editorial chair, with a huge pipe in his mouth, attentively examining those numbers of the Mirror which contained the wood engravings of the old Dutch houses, &c. the likeness of which we have endeavored to preserve from oblivion. On turning over to the mansion of his favorite Peter Stuyvesant, he puffed forth more voluminously the fragrant clouds, then pointing to it, he shook his head mournfully, and muttering an exclamation in low Dutch, which sounded very like "der duyvel," he slowly melted into the general smoke, and floated out of the window. Beside this, reports have reached us that this phantom has made itself visible to many other people in parts of the city quite distant from each other, and almost at the same moment of time. It came into the court of chancery the other day, and audaciously passing by the chancellor, told him in a sepulchral tone, to "speak louder!" The officers approached it in a body, and committed it to prison for a contempt; but to their utterable surprise, on their return with the information that it was safely under lock and key, they found it sitting in the very chair beside the chancellor, with a pipe twisted in its hat-band, whereupon, it being dinner time, the court adjourned in great haste. A number of other incidents of a supernatural kind, have greatly alarmed the city, especially in those parts marked by Dutch vestiges. It is said all the brimstone-colored unmentionables and thunder-and-lightning gaberdines, have suddenly disappeared from the shelves of the ready-made clothes-shops; the water of Hell-gate has exhibited unusual signs of agitation; that there has been the very old Harry to pay among the bricks and timbers of the ancient sugar-house in Liberty-street, and that the little old steep-roofed Dutch edifice down in New-street—but our readers, who are too many of them the incredulous descendants of the yankees and English, laugh at these sacred signs; and here the editors of the American, although we might have expected from it better things, are attempting to glose over the matter as a joke. Their opinions, however, which follow, will now pass only for what they are worth. Just hear them:

"During Mr. Duer's singularly felicitous speech," says that voracious print, "which was frequently interrupted by the murmurs of applause which pervaded the room, as some exquisite touch of whim or humor would call out these marks of approbation, an incident occurred, which has since been the subject of much speculation. Many of the company, that they might not lose one word of an address, in which every word had point, had left their seats, and crowded towards the upper end of the room, and near the speaker. At the moment when he was describing the personal appearance of 'the Dutch Herodotus,' and asking the chairman, 'Have you not seen that man, sir?'—a strange figure, in an antique dress, appeared on the instant, in the midst of the company. How he came there—whence he appeared, and why he did thus start among them, none could tell. But there he stood, with his trunk breeches, brown doublet, and broad-brimmed hat, confronting the author of the Sketch-Book, with a fixed and unearthly gaze! A solemn emotion seemed, for a moment, to pervade the assembly of revellers; and then, as the apparition glided from among them, and disappeared beneath the shadow of the orchestra, a faint and unnatural laugh could be heard from those who were nearest the spot, although it was echoed more cheerily by others, as if every one were eager to pass over the circumstance as lightly as possible, yet men whispered, and looked strangely at each other, as if all were not right, until the orator swept their minds onward with his surpassing eloquence. An attempt has since been made to hush up this affair; and some, when they do speak of it, try to give matters a ludicrous turn; and some would fain make us believe, that the uninvited guest was only a quaker gentleman, who, happening to be in the hotel at the time, could not resist the temptation of getting one look at the historian of Columbus, and therefore thus entered the room but for a moment. The majority of those who were present, however, will smile incredulously when you tell them of this solution of the mystery. It is said that the door-keepers, waiters, and porters of the city-hotel all swear, that they saw no one enter or depart the premises; and some assert, that all the smoke-jacks in the numerous kitchens of the establishment ran down about the time the event is believed to have occurred. Strange rumors too are afloat, that about that hour, sounds such as have not been known 'in the memory of the oldest inhabitants,' were heard in the vicinity of the old Dutch church; and people say that the weathercock upon the brick meeting, which had not moved since the last war, has changed its station at least an inch. All these, however, are mere idle reports; and though as faithful chroniclers of the times, we are bound to record, if not to give currency to them, yet our own particular belief is, that this apparition, about whom there is so much talk, instead of being the veritable spirit of Diedrich, revisiting the glimpses of the moon in the same guise in which the buried majesty of Manhattan did sometime walk, was but a shaping fantasy, conjured into our seething vision by the magical description of the orator who vindicated his fame."

Professor Renwick, the third vice-president next rose, and said:

Mr. President—I shall give you as my toast, a name that would be well received on any literary occasion; and which, I doubt not, will be peculiarly acceptable on this. Fifty years have not gone by, since it was gravely maintained that the powers of the human species both physical and mental, degenerated on this side of the Atlantic. We can all of us remember the time when it was tauntingly asked, "Who reads an American Book?" The success of the Sketch Book of Geoffrey Crayon has furnished a triumphant answer to this question. But there was a time when that success, high as are the merits of that work, was doubtful. We therefore owe a debt of gratitude to those Europeans who aided in overcoming inveterate prejudices, and rendered the triumphs of the genius of our guest, more rapid and immediate. This first European reader and admirer, he it said to their mutual honor, was Walter Scott; and this admiration was not confined to simple expressions, but was evinced in active services at a time when such services were of real value. Such are the claims of Walter Scott to remembrance on the present occasion; and here I would conclude, were it possible that his name should pass the lips without drawing forth some tribute to his transcendent merits. All, however, who hear, are too familiar with his works to require their admiration to be stimulated by such feeble praise as I can bestow. It is sufficient for me to say, that in the delineation of human character, not by cold and diffuse description, but by the vivid delineation of thoughts, words, and actions, he particularly excels. By such delineations, instinct with life, and replete with vivid reality, he has enlarged the limits of our social circles, and brought us acquainted with friends in whose converse we may luxuriate without any of the alloy that too often mingles with the communion of mere flesh and blood. If the mind of man be the noblest work of the Creator, the delineation of the workings of that mind, in all its varieties of character and culture, is the highest effort of poetic genius. However, ages have produced but two writers who have possessed this creative talent in perfection; these are Homer and Shakespeare; the present era will add a third to the list, in the person of Walter Scott. I shall therefore propose that we drink to

Walter Scott—Non, ei priores Maronius tenet Sedes Homerus, Pindarice latent —Camenæ.

(Drunk standing with cheers.)

Mr. Thomas L. Ogden, the fourth vice-president, addressed the chair, and said:

"I will not trespass on the time of this company, by any remarks in elucidation of the toast I am about to offer. It certainly needs no vindication, for civilized nations in all ages have sought to cherish and perpetuate the fame of the great and good men among their countrymen. The lustre shed by such men on the nation of their birth, is reflected upon all its citizens, and equally demands of all the expression of their homage; but the toast I have to propose addresses itself more particularly to the hearts of those who in by-gone days have chanced to share the friendship of our distinguished guest, and they I am persuaded will readily respond to the sentiment conveyed in it.

The Memory of Early Associations; identifying names, now the pride of a nation, with the objects of our own youthful friendships.

Mr. Samuel Swartwout, the fifth vice-president, rose and addressed the chair as follows:

What subject shall I select? To whom shall I address myself? To you, my friend, the oldest and dearest, and most cherished of my youth. Welcome, thrice welcome, to your native country, your native city; and the hearts of your friends and fellow-citizens! Gentlemen, after the display of learning and eloquence which you have just heard, it is hardly to be expected that any thing new or interesting could be said by me, in relation to the subjects which have been so ably discussed, and which so appropriately belongs to the occasion—I shall not attempt it. But, gentlemen, there are associations and reminiscences which may be indulged in at this moment, with pleasure by the company, and with pride and delight by our guest. Surrounded as we are by the earliest and dearest associates of our youth, welcoming with the renewed feelings of other years, the long absent traveler, I cannot but consider the occasion peculiarly appropriate to record some mark of respect to the character and talents and virtues of an old and cherished friend, fondly esteemed, and affectionately remembered by all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance. I will detain you no longer, gentlemen, but give you

The health of PETER IRVING.

Which was drunk with much applause.

Substance of Mr. Vice President GRAHAM's remarks on proposing his toast:—

Mr. President—I am flattered by your calling upon me for a toast, and regret my inability to do justice to your choice. As I propose, sir, to change the subject of remark from our friend to the other gentlemen who honored us with their company on this occasion, I beg your indulgence, to preface my toast with some remarks, which will make it better understood. At these tables, Mr. President, are assembled, not merely the friends and companions of Mr. Irving's early life, but distinguished and respected strangers from other countries, and distinguished magistrates, officers, and citizens of our land; among the former we recognize one, who having presided over the deliberations of one of the most august assemblies of modern times, (the Cortes of Spain) now prefers banishment among us to submitting to tyranny in his own land; another only lately in banishment among us, now elected to the presidency of a powerful republic in our hemisphere: this last is about to leave us to impart to our South American neighbors just ideas of our character and institutions; another, the first diplomatic representative of a new kingdom (Belgium) which has for the last few months, indeed for the last year, excited all our sympathies. Among the distinguished citizens of our own land, we recognize the patriotic Lieut. Governor of our State, and near him, one who has ably and faithfully represented his adopted country, both abroad and at home; some who have fought the battles of the Revolution, have gained for us that freedom and independence which are now our boast; others in that second war of Independence (which commenced in 1812, and terminated in 1815) equalled the valor of our sires, and nobly sustained the fabric of our free institutions, and I see with satisfaction almost the whole body of our judiciary, those judges who now administer the legal and equitable jurisdiction of this state with so much usefulness to the people and credit to themselves. It appears to me proper, highly proper, Mr. President, to acknowledge and to record so far as may be in our power, that such distinguished individuals have united with us (his early companions) in paying respect to our guest and friend; it is a tribute paid to literary merit, alike honorable to those who confer it and him to whom it is offered; it is a pure offering, and on that account more worthy of estimation and most appropriately to be noticed. Under these impressions I propose the following:

The distinguished strangers and citizens who have united with us in this tribute of respect to Washington Irving.

REGULAR TOASTS.

1. The President of the United States.
2. Literature, commerce and the fine arts—their union, the glory of our parent land—soon destined to adorn our own.
3. The triumphs of intellect, which even the vanquished rejoice to celebrate.
4. The trio of Salmagundi.
"Ay, rare, rare fellows,
Full of quips and turns, and jeers, and swift conceits,
Yet veiling still their mischievous intents
With most provoking gravity."
5. The pilgrim of genius, who worships at distant shrines with incense from his own domestic altar.
6. The men of genius in England—the associates and friends of our townsman—They forgot he was not their countryman, they felt he was their brother.
7. Christopher Columbus and his biography—the hero and the record alike immortal.
12. Hume and Dugald Stewart—they also were members of an embassy—but all official dignity fades before literary renown.

VOLUNTEER TOASTS.

After the speech and toast of Col. Graham, the Rev. Dr. Wainwright requested that he might be permitted to offer a sentiment. He said:

"In enumerating those who have assembled to do honor to the distinguished person whom we rejoice to see amongst us, my worthy friend who has just addressed you, omitted to mention that profession of which I am an humble member. Knowing the respect and affection which he entertains for my much esteemed friend the Bishop of this diocese, who has just left us, and who so worthily represented that profession, I could not attribute this omission to any thing like design. We, certainly, as a class of men, have every reason to unite with our fellow-citizens in doing honor to him whose return to his native city has called forth this expression of public feeling. And should any one demand the reason, it will be found in the sentiment which I beg leave to propose:

"Our distinguished guest—in all the pages which he has written for our instruction, amusement and delight, he has put forth no line which, dying, he would wish to blot."

Mr. Graham briefly explained, that his omitting to notice the right reverend gentleman, and the profession to which he belongs, was purely accidental. Mr. Hone, in a few appropriate remarks, proposed the health of our countryman, Mr. Newton, who during his sojourn in Europe, had been the warm personal friend of Mr. Irving, and had, by his talents, done honor to our country.

Mr. Newton in reply said:

I feel greatly honored by the compliment that is paid me in drinking my health, and by the obliging terms in which it has been proposed, especially so, in associating my name with one which I not only join with the world in honoring, but which is also endeared to me by long and close intimacy; accustomed as I am, however, to convey my impressions by another vehicle than that of language, I feel on this occasion particularly, how much the latter fails me in expressing my sense of this flattering distinction, and will therefore trust to the kindness which confers it on me, to understand the gratified feelings with which it is received.

I have the honor, gentlemen, to pledge you most cordially in return, and to wish you, individually and collectively, all happiness and prosperity.

By William Turner—The return of Rip Van Winkle—"Why, sure enough, it is Rip Van Winkle; it is himself! Welcome home again, old neighbor. Why, where have you been these twenty long years?"—[Sketch Book.]

Judge Irving being called on for a toast said, that his emotions were too strong to allow him to say any thing on this occasion, but that he would give them.

"The feelings of the heart, which may be conceived, but cannot be expressed."

By the President—Our distinguished countryman, James Fenimore Cooper, Esq.

Mr. Charles King rose and said:—

Called upon, Mr. President, for a toast, I cannot do better on this occasion of honor to literary renown, than to offer you the name of one, a native of our city, who, by his talents as a writer, has illustrated both it and the gallant navy to which he belongs. I refer, sir, to the author of A Year in Spain. Forbidden, happily forbidden, by the state of peace which exists among nations, from achieving glory in the shock of battles, that gentleman has sought it in the fields of literature—and the work I name bears witness of his success. But it is not, sir, for the merits of that work, eminent as they are, that I ask to add his name to the list of those whom we have to-day so freshly remembered; but because he is, in some degree, associated with our distinguished guest in that great work, which, among Americans at least, will, to the latest time, constitute his most lasting memorial—the History of Columbus. While that was in progress, Lieut. Silldell was in Spain, and joining Mr. Irving at the Athens, there labored with him in tracing the daring and perilous career of the Great Navigator over unknown seas. He is the unnamed young American officer—unnamed because his modesty refused permission to Mr. Irving to name him—to whom that gentleman acknowledges his obligation for much aid derived from his personal skill and experience, in reconciling difficult, and oftentimes, contradictory accounts, respecting the course followed by Columbus in his voyages. He is, too, the writer of the clear and lucid critique, published in the Appendix to the Biography, particularly referring to the first voyage and the place where the Discoverer first landed in the new world. This critique, I venture to say, no one can read without being satisfied, notwithstanding the opinion of an eminent Spanish writer to the contrary, that Mr. Silldell has proved his case; and, aided by the advantage of having cruised much, and with intelligent attention, among the Bahama Islands, has established beyond dispute the precise spot of this Western World, which first received Columbus. With these explanatory remarks, Mr. President, I beg to propose as a toast:—

Lieutenant Alexander Silldell, of the United States' navy, who with the skill of a sailor, and the taste of a scholar, has illustrated the voyages of Columbus.

By General Santander, the president of New-Grenada—The city of New-York—Distinguished by her commercial activity, honored by her patriotism, and illustrated by the writings of her intelligent son.

By Lieut. Gov. Livingston—A freeman's duty and a freeman's pride—To defend liberty, promote virtue, and honor genius.

By Chancellor Walworth—The triple emancipation of mind—From the bonds of ignorance and superstition, from the chains of civil despotism, and from the iron fetters of moral degradation.

By General Scott—The republic of letters—The only one which gives to its members a passport to all countries and to all hearts.

By Com. Chauncey—The memory of Washington.

By William A. Duer—The memories of Addison and MacKenzie—More strongly associated through the medium of that living author who combines their excellence.

By Mr. Handy—Our countryman Washington Irving, like the great original whose immortal name he bears, has won for his country unfading laurels, which will be transmitted from sire to son until the last hour of recorded time.

By a gentleman—Charles R. Leslie—The friend of our friend. How increasing the ties which bind them to each other! those of a common country, a kindred genius and a pure and elevated fame.

By M. M. Noah—"The Dutchman's Fireside" and its able and patriotic author.

By P. M. Wetmore—The author of Thanatopsis and the Ages—The favorable judgment of his own countrymen has been sustained by the unanimous verdict of foreign criticism.

By Mr. Sullivan—Our distinguished guest—May he also be distinguished for founding the Irving Literary Fund for the honor of his country.

By James Lawson—Samuel Rogers, the poet and banker—the friend and admirer of American literature; to whom our guest dedicated a volume of one of our most distinguished poets.

By Charles de Behr—Holland and Belgium—May they soon be united by the tie of friendship, and father and son never contend in opposite ranks.

Mr. Jesse Hoyt said,

He should not have obtruded himself upon the attention of this assembly, if the President had not honored him by a call for a toast. He had expected that some one more entitled to command attention than he felt himself to be, would have alluded to one of our citizens now abroad in a public station, and who was honorably connected with the literary character of the age and of his country. He alluded to Mr. Wheaton, who is a ripe scholar, and one who, like the distinguished individual we had met to honor, had searched the archives of a distant country to add to the literary reputation of his own. He would therefore offer to the company the name of Henry Wheaton—The accomplished author of the Northmen.

By Judge Hoffman—Louis M' Lane, the friend to our guest—Endeared to his country by his public virtues, and equally distinguished by his private worth in all the relations of domestic life.

By James K. Paulding—Old times, old friends, and old associations.

By Le Ray de Chaumont—James Madison—Equally conspicuous in literature, agriculture, and politics.

By Vice-chancellor M'Coun—Our countryman; alike distinguished at home or abroad.

By a guest—General Lafayette.

By Ogden Hoffman—The only useful Absentee—who gathers the intellectual treasures of other lands, to embellish and adorn his own.

By J. W. Francis—Columbus and Irving; the one made known the new world, the other its genius.

By a guest—The memory of Anthony Bleecker, one of the companions of Washington Irving.

By Mr. Gener—The last good luck of Columbus, his late historian.

By C. W. Sanford—The New-York Mirror—a gallant pioneer in the cause of American periodical literature.

By William A. Mercein—Washington Irving; the illustrious hero whose name he bears, and to which he does honor, achieved the liberty and secured the prosperity of his country; our distinguished guest has, by his genius and virtues, shed a lustre on the literature and exalted the name of America in the estimation of mankind.

By Captain De Peyster—"Jonathan Oldstyle" put to sea with fame at his mast-head—his biographer comes into port under the broad pennant of immortality.

By W. P. Hawes—William C. Bryant; a kindred spirit of our Irving; their names are bound up in the same book.

By William Leggett—James Fennimore Cooper.

By William H. Maxwell—May the homage this night rendered to genius and literary attainments prove an incentive to the rising youth of our country.

By J. Watson Webb—Our countryman, Charles Robert Leslie; like our distinguished guest, the productions of his genius during a long residence abroad, have done honor to the land of his fathers.

By a gentleman—Gulian C. Verplanck, a laborer in the same vineyard with our guest.

Mr. Price in offering his toast remarked, that

He should not attempt to dwell on all the topics which had been so skillfully addressed to our distinguished guest. There was one, however, of which he might be permitted to speak in his presence. During his residence abroad, he constructed his History of Columbus—"that link which connects the history of the old world with that of the new." His execution of this great work was the offspring of filial duty, and the monument of unfading glory to his country. It stands unparalleled amidst the efforts of men upon that theme during three hundred years; and it is now, and will be the elementary work in the teaching of American history throughout the world. I offer you, Mr. President,

The History of Columbus—A filial offering of the author to his native land.

Several speeches were delivered, of which we have not been able to procure any report.

The company separated about twelve o'clock, all highly delighted with the fete. It is rumored that, in the ensuing autumn, the ladies, who so far have but slightly participated in the pleasure of welcoming their favorite bachelor home, intend to give him a grand fancy-ball, at which all the characters in his works are to be represented. An entertainment of this description was given, we believe, in magnificent style, to Sir Walter Scott, at Naples. We wait the denouement of the plan with much interest.

SECOND NOTICE.

"Dost thou love pictures? we will fetch thee straight
Adonis painted by a running brook;
And Cytherea all in sedges hid,
Which seem to move and wanton with her breath,
Even as the waving sedges play with wind."—Shaks.

We refer again to this exhibition, in which we find so much to occupy and amuse us. There is a pleasant charm in a room of paintings, of which one is sensible even before he has had time to examine each deliberately. The idea alone that we are surrounded by the various results of intellect, genius, and long solitary silent labor, fills the mind with elevated thoughts. The fancy first pictures the artist's still chamber, the light shed down upon him through the half-opened shutter; and the workman himself, bending hour after hour, day after day, month after month, perhaps year after year, to his lonely task. It is beautiful, also, to remark the different imaginations thus rendered visible in the various works, and they present a study every way appropriate and delightful, especially for youth. It is a good sign to see a young boy fond of paintings; they offer pure subjects for his reflection, and he will, after perusing them carefully, be a better observer of the things around him, will be more alive to the wonderful forms and charms of nature, and, consequently more enthusiastic in his adoration of the Great First Cause. It would be humiliating to an American to find his own countrymen dead to such influences, to behold the fine ardor of the artist chilled by neglect; to witness the gallery where the products of young genius are hung up, deserted and still, while the circus and the theatre, and every ordinary resort of profit or pleasure is crowded. If such should prove the case, no artist from abroad will visit our shores; and they who are among us, (and such there are, who only want the assistance of public patronage, and the inspiration of public praise, to run a career as honorable and brilliant for themselves as it would be gratifying to us,) they will depart from our society, and take refuge in other lands, and the sneers against our taste and our liberality will never cease. It is very certain we shall never have arts or sciences or literature, unless we know and reward those who devote themselves to their promotion. There is no excuse for apathy among us. Our country is flourishing, our people are free, peaceful, and happy. The earthquakes, both moral and physical, which shake the eastern continent to the centre, are not felt on these shores. We have neither tyrants, nor revolutions, nor want; our public coffers are overflowing. When shall we reach a more proper period for cherishing those elegant embellishments of civilization, among which the art of painting holds such a prominent rank? A good painter here in want, unless from his own idleness or extravagance, is a rebuke to the taste and liberality of the whole city; and, we may add, an exhibition like the present, comprising the works of so many talented men, and not noticed by the editors, visited by the community, and honored with ample encouragement, is a proof that we are progressing much more slowly towards the real refinements of cultivated life than we are willing to allow.

We shall in this number designate several other paintings of the catalogue.

24. Portrait of T. Hamilton, Esq. Weir. The property of the artist. A fine head of the author of Cyril Thornton. The resemblance is marked, and the execution masterly. Likenesses of such men adorn the academy.

93. Sketch from nature. Mount. Owned by A. B. Durand, Esq. A pretty piece, representing a country lad resting himself on an old rail fence. Mr. Mount is very young in years, but his productions display a decided natural bias, which we think peculiar. A dash too of the humorous is generally visible in most of his conceptions; and he paints, evidently, from his own impressions. There are some rare touches in his "Ball after the sleigh-ride," exhibited last year. Perhaps his ideas are rather exaggerated on the canvas. He is fearful lest his meaning will not be readily detected. It is the fault of many artists as well as authors, both young and old.

201. Interior of a barn, with figures. Mount. Much broad comic power is thrown into this piece, and in the peculiar style of the artist. A country lad is playing the violin, another is dancing on the "seedy floor," and the faces of both have the expression of persons listening to enlivening music. We observe this picture is for sale.

54. Juliet. C. R. Leslie. Owned by G. Storm, Esq. There is here the talent of our distinguished countryman very perceptible, but the idea of the beautiful Capulet is not well represented. Juliet should be soft, youthful, artless, innocent, and lovely. Weir's Bianca comes much nearer to the description. Leslie's lady has boldness and hardihood, which, notwithstanding the many merits of the work, fail to touch the heart. There is too little tenderness and imagination.

56. Portrait of Miss Gillingham. J. Paradise. The likeness really excellent, and one of the best from the same hand.

10. Landscape. (Composition.) T. Cole. For sale. It is rather difficult to say precisely what this is intended to represent. It is, however, a striking scene. Water and abrupt crags, a wild deer bounding desperately over a shallow stream, and savages bending their bows in eager pursuit.

7. Family piece of James Lorimer, Esq. of London. Sir William Beachy. Owned by Colonel James L. Graham. A pleasing family group, delightfully painted.

2. Portrait of Mr. Hackett. H. Inman. Owned by Mr. Hackett.

Every one knows the success of this gifted artist in whatever he undertakes. His portraits are eminently striking. He is totally free from affectation in his coloring, and seeks neither to dazzle nor deceive in his portraits, but simply paints to the life, and with the most admirable facility. This is the original of the engraving published in the last impression of this journal.

220. Landscape. Weir. Owned by C. March, Esq. We know of few who light up their landscapes so well as Weir. The sunshine and shadows here are exquisite. It is a charming evidence of the artist's skill; and we are really gratified to observe that such pictures are owned by somebody, besides those who painted them.

200. Portrait. Twibill. Owned by Mr. Miller. This youthful aspirant after distinction surprises us, by the ability he displays both in the productions from his hand in the academy, and in others which we have casually met abroad. He is exceedingly skillful in the accuracy of his likeness, and his pieces would reflect no discredit on names with which the public is much more familiar.

142. Portrait of E. Forrest. S. H. Gimber. You can trace the expression of the tragedian, but not so forcibly as to be flattering either to the artist or the original. The drawing is good.

1. Ship Natchez, of New-Orleans, scudding under a reefed foresail, and close reefed main-topsail. James Pringle.

22. Position of the ship Sampson, immediately after the rudder was carried away, December, 1831. J. Pringle.

91. Wreck of the schooner Charles. J. Pringle.

These three sea-pieces are marked by the admirable representation of the water and the excellence of the drawing. The heaving and swelling of those stupendous ocean surges, the lowering of the atmosphere, the beautiful vessel holding its way daringly onward through the surrounding horrors, are fit subjects for the pencil, and are here delineated in a manner which must convey to an inexperienced spectator a tolerable idea of the "vasty deep."

81. Another sea-piece. Birch. Owned by Mr. Clover.

A most magical effect is produced here, in the breaking of the transparent green waves on the stony shore. It is really beautiful, and every thing but sound and motion. The billows curl "their monstrous heads" with a singular look of reality.

97. View of Governor's Island. Thompson. Full of good drawing, but the water is too stiff and regular, and the war-ship out of proportion for the distance.

We have left some very charming pictures for another notice. The landscapes are among them. Also miniatures, engravings, pencil drawings, &c. In fine weather the city does not afford a more delightful resort for a morning or afternoon lounge. It is also beautifully lighted up in the evening.

THE DRAMA.

THE NEW-YORK STAGE, ETC.

WHAT an opportunity is now afforded the managers of the Park to treat the town to a succession of fine musical entertainments. They have the most efficient band in the Union, and the talents of Mrs. Austin, Miss Hughes, Messrs. Jones, Sinclair and Horn, entirely at their command. A selection of operas, by the best masters, might be made, cast to the strength of these performers; and, if they should be produced under the superintendence of the amateur to whom we are indebted for Cinderella, the White Lady, &c. they would, unquestionably, attract the public in large numbers, and thereby, which is of far more consequence to them, enrich the coffers of the establishment. It is seldom that managers have so fair a chance of accomplishing their great end—that of putting money in their purse, and of contributing to the reputation of their establishment at the same time; and we advise them to improve it while it lasts. "Make hay while the sun shines,"—"strike while the iron is hot,"—"there is a tide in the affairs of men," and other homely scraps of worldly wisdom are none the worse for being old; and when Mr. Simpson puts on his "considering cap," he is very apt to con them over to some advantage. If Gilfert were only alive, and had such materials in his hands, how he would make the Bowery ring with his "little arrangements!" But we have no room for speculations of this kind, and it is not our business to suggest what ought to be, so much as to criticise what is done upon the boards.

At the American theatre the managers continue to produce new attractions. Among recent ones are Miss Clifton's Count Belino. Mr. and Mrs. Barrymore are also engaged, both exceedingly well calculated to raise the character of the theatre; the former being inestimable as a getter-up of dramas, and the latter admirable in a variety of ways—a neat and graceful dancer, an intelligent and animated actress, and probably the best pantomime performer among us. Another prodigy is announced in the person of Master Mangeon.

The company at the Richmond Hill is now quite strong. Mrs. Hilson is still the same lively, charming, girlish actress as ever, and is invaluable; and Mr. Hilson, as Paul Pry, puts every feeling of gravity to flight. The name of Mrs. Barnes is also, a sufficient inducement to many visitors to this house; and her Myrtillo in the Broken Sword, to Mr. Hilson's Estivan, was emphatically excellent. They can now perform the most interesting comedies in the language, at this theatre. John Bull, for instance: Green is Dennis Bulgruddery himself, and Hilson's Job Thornberry one of his most happy efforts.

THE BROKEN HEART.

An affecting Ballad, founded on a distressing occurrence in the neighborhood of Basingstoke, Hampshire, England. Set to music by Mr. E. MERRIOTT. The style is chaste and appropriate, adding to the words a melancholy strain of melody in perfect unison with the subject.

WITH FEELING.

I saw that the glow of her beau-ty had fad-ed, The eye that il-lum'd it gazed wild-ly and de-ar, Her tress-es neg-lect-ed hung loose and un-braid-ed, And shroud-ed a cheek dew'd with me-mo-ry's tear! Yet she breath'd not the name of her tru-ant de-ceiv-er, The so-lace of friend-ship 'twas vain to im-part, She had loved with the warmth of a guile-less be-liev-er, But man had been faith-less and bro-ken her heart.

The dwelling is lone where she wither'd in sadness,
The bower deserted, her harp is unstrung,
The roses she twined, and the light notes of gladness,
No longer shall blossom—no more shall be sung!
The dove hath a refuge—a house of protection,
When rent is the storm-cloud, and vivid its dart;
But desolate wanders the maid of affection,
Whose truth has been slighted, and broken her heart.

She is gone, and her relics the willow weeps over—
In the grave's quiet slumber are hush'd her deep woes—
She hears not the sigh of a recreant lover—
No promises blighted disturb her repose.
Her spirit, too pure for the bonds that enchained it,
Now hallow'd in realms whence it ne'er shall depart,
Looks radiantly down on the wretch who disdain'd it,
On him who has rifed and broken a heart.

ADDRESS TO CUPID.

Why dip thy shafts in poison, god of Love?
Lo! twanging idly from thy sportive bow,
'Tis thine dread tumults in the heart to move,
And make it throb with unaccustomed woe.
Small pleasure mingles with the cloud of pain
Which settles round the subjects of thy reign.
The poets feign thou art of heavenly birth—
But this thy victims idle fiction deem;
Can minds celestial agonize the earth,
And needless anguish add to life's sad dream?
Wert thou of heaven, thou hadst not left thy sphere
Of endless bliss to cause distraction here.
Why dip thy shafts in poison? why in smiles,
Playful, yet false, conceal thy dangerous art?
To thee belong the scaly serpent's wiles,
To cheat the eye and crush the trusting heart.
Alike is felt the anguish of thy power,
In peasant's cot or high-born beauty's bower.
Thou art not of the skies, as poets feign,
Deceitful archer! yet thy conquering bow
Hath sent its shafts into their bright domain,
And made immortals taste of human woe.
Beloved of Venus! thy presumptuous dart
Left not unscathed e'en her own beautiful heart.

And still thou roam'st, a harbinger of ill,
Torturing with wicked pranks the maiden's brain;
The bashful youth, obedient to thy will,
Thou goadest on with strange, delirious pain.
Time lessens not the arrows in thy quiver—
Like thine own freaks, they shall endure forever.
E'en age to thee a subject homage pays,
Mischievous boy! Not e'en can wrinkled years
Arrest thee on thy wild fantastic ways;
Thou shoot'st, and lo! antiquity appears,
In form of bachelor or maiden hoary,
Writhing with pain—at once thy shame and glory.
All climates are thine own: with tyrant sway
Thou rul'st. Alike the icy polar sphere,
And the warm regions where the god of day
Most loves to linger in his bright career.
In every land thy glittering altar starts—
Its offerings—idle vows and broken hearts.
The same to thee is day or starry night;
For rambling, like the borealis' beams,
Thou holdest on thy mad eccentric flight,
And cheat'st the slumberer's soul with idle dreams—
Raising delusive forms before his eyes,
And pleasures which he ne'er shall realize.
And monarchs, too, thy matchless archery
Hath stricken, as the hunter strikes the doe;

The flames of Dido's pile were lit by thee;
And Troy—majestic sepulchre of woe—
Fell from her high estate, in evil hour,
A monument of thy stupendous power.

Conquerors have owned thy sway—the sons of song,
And daughters too have pined beneath its spell;
Immortal Tasso, Dante, Petrarch long
Bowed at thy shrine; and Lesbian Sappho fell
Victim of love's insufferable load,
Beneath thy arrows, all-subduing god.

Why dip thy shafts in poison? why invade,
With such dread arms, "the palace of the soul?"
Why veil the sunshine of the heart in shade?
Lo! steep'd in tears beneath thy fierce control,
Pale beauty like a phantom fades away,
And manhood's sterner spirit knows decay.

Dread are thy triumphs, Love! The maniac's cry—
The poisoned cup—the broken heart—are thine,
Alas! too often. Therefore, let us fly
From the false flowers that strew thy gilded shrine
And on the icy wings of cold disdain,
Escape at once thy snares and all their pain.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

ADVICE TO A BRIDE.

[Concluded.]

THIS she considers a fine stroke of domestic policy or retaliation. Alas, alas! she dreams not that the stroke is aimed alike at her own happiness. For though her husband may endure this conduct for a season, every recurrence serves to wean away his affection, and then he seeks that gratification in the society of others, which is denied him in that of his wife. At this period it is difficult, nay, I may say, it is impossible to call the wanderer back; or if it were, you have too much self-esteem to attempt it; you have suffered vanity to master your better feelings, and you cannot stoop, then, to acknowledge yourself in error.

This is the general course of wedded life—the parties set out erroneously, and, in the rapture of the moment, forget their duty to each other. The ardor of man's disposition leads him to very romantic professions; this you are aware of, but still you act as if you were not at all conscious of it. The protestations of the newly-married man are, without doubt, sincerely intended—but he professes more than humanity can accomplish—yet you believe it. This is your first error. You are flattered into vanity and self-esteem; the romance of the lover is regarded by you as truth, and, certainly, if you still continue the same means of excitement, you may experience its truth as far as such romance can possibly be true; but believing, from his asseverations, that you have a most powerful hold upon him, you abate every means of retaining that hold, and then that wearisome monotony is experienced which too generally characterizes the marriage-state.

The nature of man is such, that where there is no excitement, there he is faithless; like the bee, he is constant to no flower after the charm has worn off. It is your task to preserve a perpetual charm; or rather a variety of charms, by which your husband, always finding pleasures at home, will never wish to roam abroad for others. You must consult his taste and his partialities. Whatever he may commend in another, that you should strive to imitate, or if that is not practicable, then atone for it by something else for which you have the capability. If he is a well-disposed and honorable man, these are the means he will adopt in order to insure your affection; but should he find all those attentions unrepaid by similar exertions on your part, he will abandon them altogether, and you will prove the truth of the vulgar expression, "courtship and matrimony are different things."

It will be your plan, in order to inspire perfect connubial happiness, to regard all the expressions of your lover, not as true, but as only expressed with a sincere intention of fulfillment; your exertions, therefore, must be directed to preserve your lover. From the first hour of your marriage, you must regard your husband as the means of happiness, but which is only to be insured by a strict course of conduct. You must, in reality, make him your study; and what employment can you have more pleasurable? If his temper is faulty, then strive to amend it by kindness; if he be a good man, kindness will shame him from his error. I have heard many women termed 'spirited,' all the 'spirit' of whom consisted in their irritable disposition, and their desire to talk louder and faster than their husbands. The true "spirit" of a wife is of a gentler nature; spirit is not vehemence, but that soft and tender feeling which is ever most effectual in its appeal to the honorable mind; a spirit which inspires, not riot, nor outrageousness, not threats, but mild forbearance, merciful reproof—that feeling which induces a wife to weep over the errors of her husband—to take the hand of the faulty one, to lay the other kindly upon his shoulder, and, looking up into his face, urge her remonstrance in the plain and unadorned—the calm but expressive language of a tear.

If he be worthy of your love, the husband so addressed will not be addressed in vain.

The love of woman is very different from man's love; there is more devotion, more reality in it. Man, in his connexion with society and the world, passes through scenes calculated to alienate the kinder feelings of humanity: woman has no such trials of her faith; thus, her love is more pure and devoted. Mrs. Norton has very powerfully delineated it:—

"To worship silently at some heart's shrine,
And feel, but paint not, all its fires in thine;
To pray for that heart's hopes when thine are gone,
Nor let its after-coldness chill thine own;
To hold that one, with every fault, more dear
Than all who whisper fondness in thine ear:
To joy thee in his joy, and silently
Meet the upbraiding of his angry eye;
To bear unshrinking, all the blows of fate,
Save that which leaves thy sorrow desolate;
To bide with him, and for him, through every ill:
To smile on him,—nor weep, save when apart,
God, and God only, looks into thine heart!
Oh! THIS IS WOMAN'S LOVE!"

The task of a wife is thus comprised, and nothing can be more easy of accomplishment; but to be pursued successfully, you must never allow anger, nor any other evil feeling or disposition to rise into predominance. Bear always in mind your true situation, and have the words of the apostle perpetually engraven on your heart. Your duty is submission—"submission and obedience are the lessons of your life, and peace and happiness will be your reward." Your husband is, by the laws of God and of man, your superior; do not ever give him cause to remind you of it. If he be an honorable man, he will never exert his authority, but rather seem to yield submission—never exert authority over him, but, remembering the wayward nature of man, still act and demean yourself according to the duty of a wife. Your husband will love you more for that denial, and your happiness will proportionably increase. Milton has defined the duty of a wife in the following beautiful poetry, which I quote from an address by Eve to her partner Adam.

"My author and disposer, what thou bidd'st
Unargued I obey: so God ordains;
God is thy law, THOU MINE: to know no more
Is woman's happiest knowledge and her praise.
With thee conversing, I forget all time;
All seasons and their change, all please alike."

Let all your enjoyments centre in your home. Let your home occupy the first place in your thoughts; for that is the only source of happiness. Let all your endeavors be directed towards the promotion of your husband's welfare, and he will reward your faithful zeal. May heaven prosper those exertions, and bless your union with perpetual felicity; that after years may witness no diminution of your happiness, which has been inspired on this—your wedding-day.

"Happy then will be the man that hath made you his wife, Happy the child that shall call you mother."

JEAN JACQUES TARDEE.

Of the many diversities of men who compose the great stream of emigration annually setting towards the western world, few comparatively are natives of France. Whether the love of home be stronger in them than in the men of other lands, or that the land of labor has no charms for the man accustomed to the lighter employments of the vineyard, the toy-shop, and the camp, it is certain that the roadside inquiries of the traveler in the western world are seldom answered by the voice of a Frenchman. Of the few natives of that country, none are in circumstances of laborious poverty; and, whilst nationality is traced in the crowds from Ireland, toiling as at home, in the most degrading employments of human life, the wealthy and intelligent Frenchman is usually encountered at the wharf, the gaming-house, or the tavern.

Of the latter description of men was Jean Jacques Tardee, of whom during a recent sojourn in the United States of America, I learned the following dark history. He was a native of Paris, and emigrated to America about the year 1816, a dentist by profession; and though possessed of many fine accomplishments of person, manners, and knowledge of languages, he yet preferred, to the steady exercise of a lucrative and useful profession, to grasp at fortune by the most iniquitous means. His first exploit was at Charleston, in South Carolina. In that port was a newly-built, fast-sailing, and valuable pilot-boat, the most superb of that class of vessels that grace the harbors of America. Jean Jacques there formed the design of carrying off this vessel from the wharf, and having corrupted the negroes employed in the navigation of the boat, a night was appointed, when this villain rightly judged, that once unmoored and under way, pursuit was in vain even by the fastest sailing vessel in the port, and that the circumstance of a pilot-boat passing out at night, would excite no suspicions from the fortifications at the mouth of the harbor. But slight circumstances often frustrate the most skilful projects of human villany. A mercantile gentleman of Charleston had observed Tardee in conversation with the negroes attached to the vessel, and with that watchful spirit which pervades all residents in slave countries, he communicated his suspicions to the master of the boat, when, by a separate examination of the negroes, it was discovered that the Frenchman had prevailed upon them, by promises of liberty, a large sum of money, and a share in his future adventures, to carry off the vessel to the island of Cuba. Being resolved to secure the Frenchman in his own toils, the negroes were enjoined, upon promise of forgiveness for the past, to carry on the plot; and accordingly, on a certain night, the master was informed that Tardee would arrive at midnight in a wherry from a neighboring wharf, to which his baggage was already conveyed, for the purpose of eluding the vigilance of the police by night. True to the appointed time, a boat with muffled oars crept stealthily along at midnight to the side of the vessel; its only tenant was Tardee, who handed up a trunk and mounted upon deck. The pilot first met him. Tardee instantly discharged a pistol at his breast but without effect, and was soon overpowered, secured, and conveyed to the guard-house. When taken before the magistrates on the following morning, his fine address did not forsake him, and in answer to the charge, he described himself as a dentist, who, being engaged to go down to Sullivan's Island, to perform an operation on the teeth of a lady resident there, the negroes attached to the pilot-boat had offered to convey him to the island for a small remuneration, and upon coming accordingly to the vessel, he had been met and assaulted by the owner, and was compelled, in his own defence, to fire the pistol. The plausibility of this account, and his manner, assumed as that of an injured and much-outraged man, added to the inadmissibility of the evidence of the negroes in support of the charge, had almost ensured his dismissal, when search was thereupon made in his trunk, from which was produced a deed of transfer of the pilot-boat, with her tackle, furniture, and negroes, to Jean Jacques Tardee, bearing the forged signature of the complainant himself, and a large and most imposing seal. At sight of this the confidence of the Frenchman deserted him; he attempted no explanation of the document, and was immediately committed to prison. It being subsequently thought that the charge of piracy could not be supported, owing to the incompleteness of any overt act, the vessel not having been unmoored, the indictment was accordingly founded upon a conspiracy to have stolen and feloniously carried away the vessel; upon which charge Tardee was arraigned, convicted, and sentenced to imprisonment for the term of two years.

These transactions brought to the remembrance of the citizens of Charleston the melancholy particulars of an affair then of recent occurrence, in which the captain and several of the passengers and crew of a packet-ship, trading thence to the port of New-York, had been carried off by poison. This tragic event had happened at sea, and a negro cook being suspected under circumstances of extreme probability, upon the arrival of the vessel at Charleston, the unfortunate man was tried, condemned, and executed. It now, however, was remembered that Tardee had been a passenger in the vessel at the time, that he and two fellow-passengers, having the appearance of Spaniards of fortune, had not partaken, upon pretences of religious scruples, of the food which had contained the deadly adulteration; and it was moreover known, that Tardee had been a witness of a quarrel which had occurred between the captain and the cook upon the morning in question, when the latter had declared his intention to be revenged in consequence—a circumstance which, upon his trial, had sealed his condemnation. There now remained little doubt that Tardee and his accomplices were the perpetrators of the murderous deed, that an artful advantage had been taken of the occurrence of the quarrel and declarations of revenge, to ensure the success of the plot for which they had embarked as passengers, and none doubted now that the unfortunate negro had died an innocent man. This is the case related by Captain Hall, in the year 1817. He was present in Charleston at the time of the trial of the negro; and, though his impressions of the innocence of the man were only founded in a feeling of humanity, it is now certain that he was too correct in his narrative of an affair which he has treated with such power and pathos. With all this accumulation of crime upon his head, still, Tardee was imprisoned but a short time, and he was added to those criminals too easily pardoned by the executive, the list of whom does undoubtedly sully the administration of justice in America. After a confinement of a few months, a remission of the remainder of his sentence was granted by the new governor of South Carolina, and this dark demon was once again let loose upon the world.

In a few weeks he was heard of again, and his fatal and final exercise of his black art covered him with destruction. Being rejoined by the two Spaniards, mentioned as his fellow-passengers in the former voyage from New-York, he had departed from Charleston for the port of New-Orleans on the Mississippi river; thence they embarked again as passengers in the brig Crawford, bound to the Chesapeake. Towards the conclusion of the voyage, poison was again administered in the food, and the captain, crew, and every human being, excepting the three passengers and the mate of the vessel, lay dead upon the deck! Tardee then assumed the command; the mate had been preserved for the purpose of navigating the vessel, and as it was not expedient to enter any of the harbors of America, and the cargo consisted of merchandise suitable to a European market, it was determined to sail for Hamburg. It was found, however, that the remaining water and provisions were insufficient for a voyage across the Atlantic, to procure a supply of which, the vessel stood into the Chesapeake, and anchored in Hampton Roads, opposite to a small fort and country town. Here the two Spaniards were dispatched to the shore in a boat, for the requisite supplies, and Tardee and the mate were now alone in the vessel. His dreadful situation flashed across the mind of the mate; he was now for the last time in sight of his native shores; in a few hours he would again be on the lonely waters of the ocean, his companions pirates, and at any hour he might convey to his own lips the cup of death. The vigilance and ready weapons of Tardee forbade the risk of an encounter; the return of the Spaniards would be a signal for the departure of the vessel; another boat containing only a single oar was alongside; the Frenchman had retired for a moment to the cabin; and the mate, descending to the boat, had sculled beyond the reach of the pistols of Tardee, who was at last seen rushing frantic upon deck. In his boat, and with a single oar, the mate soon reached the shore, and having communicated the affair to the commander of the port, the Spaniards were secured in the village, and a party of soldiers were soon dispatched to the brig. Upon the floor of the cabin Tardee lay dead, his throat severed, in despair, from ear to ear. The Spaniards were afterwards tried, condemned, and executed; the vessel is now peacefully trading along the coasts of America, and I recently was in that cabin where ended the crimes and existence of Jean Jacques Tardee!

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

SOME PASSAGES IN THE LIFE OF A GENIUS.

BY BOLLEY MC PHERSON, ESQ.

"He was not of the herd—in childhood lone,
He mixed not, even when his wondrous powers
By sage maturity were fully ripe,
In such concerns as engage the world.
In infancy he prattled to the moon,
And with most rare device his cunning showed
In divers structures, formed of pictured cards;
The which did trace upon his early brow,
The lines of thought precocious."—MS. tragedy.

A BRIGHT autumnal morning, the successor of a night of storm and terror, was distinguished by the birth of the gifted subject of this article. The angry elements seemed hushed, and the blackness dispersed, either by the sun of heaven or the son of my father, on that memorable morning; that it was the latter, I have little reason to disbelieve, as my whole life has appeared a commentary on such an auspicious augury; inasmuch, as it has shown itself peculiarly fitted to dispel the mists of this age of doubt,

"And gild a world of darkness with its rays."

To describe here the joy of my father, or the rapture of my mother, would be a superfluous task. I grew up as children who are decreed to be spoiled, generally do—that is, I was petted and grew fat, scratched the nurse's face, broke every thing I could lay my hands upon, and soon became distinguished among the old ones of the neighborhood, as the smartest boy with the shrillest voice in the whole country. My eyes were gray, large, and peculiarly wild—when I was in a passion; an unerring proof, so said my father, that I was destined to immortality. My forehead was remarkably high, deep and expanded—that is, before my hair was perfectly grown; another indubitable mark of genius. My nose was (and, alas! now is) something "of a snub," that resisted all the kind and well-meant pinchings of my dear mamma, assisted by the forefinger and thumb of my excellent nurse, (whose good intentions I have, however, since then somewhat doubted,) in their endeavors to fashion it into somewhat of a Roman character. It is a terrible thing to have a snub nose; there is, however, a consolation in knowing that such a nose does not offer that prominent temptation to the digitals of one's particular friends, that is presented by those of either a Grecian or Roman formation. I was sent to school at an early age, at which time I distinguished myself, not so much by my progress in Corderii, as by some other matters which shall be related. My father had impressed upon me the caution, as soon as I could understand any thing, (which was not remarkably early,) to avoid mediocrity; or, in his own expressive words, for he was a Kentuckian, to "go the whole or nothing." In pursuance of this excellent advice, I generally, unless by accident, stood number one in my class, counting from the bottom; while I looked with supreme contempt on those boys whose mediocrity kept them between me and the head of the form. I considered myself superior to them all, and only second to the boy at the top—it was merely turning the file about and I was even his superior; while the middle boy, the mediocres, would neither gain nor lose much by the change of position. They had told me at home that I was a genius, and I had no sort of desire to contradict the assertion; indeed, I began to flatter myself that such was actually the case. I had a high forehead—I was as lazy as Diogenes himself—I was careless about my dress—my face was not always clean, and I was abstracted even at this early age; indeed, so far did absence of mind incommode me, that I often entirely forgot that I had a lesson to learn, and the fact that I was expected at school, so completely slipped my memory, that for an entire week at a time I have not crossed its classical threshold. On such occasions I was generally found by my affectionate parents, either up to my knees in the mud of a fish-pond, engaged in the elegant occupation of catching eels—or amusing myself by throwing stones from behind a hedge at the passengers, or perhaps asleep under a hay-stack. My most usual occupation, however, during these fits of absence, and one to which I was particularly attached, was angling. I believe all great geniuses are, more or less, addicted to the "gentle science." I was a great angler. These peculiarities, which my beloved parents called "eccentricities," together with an inherent good opinion of myself, strengthened the belief I began to entertain of my own genus. The pedagogue, under the terrors of whose birchen rod I was first initiated into the mysteries of "Etic, hæc, hoc," was one of those itinerant mediciners of the mind that are found almost every country village, boarding in every body's house, with all their "worldly contents in a pocket handkerchief," and whose ostensible occupations are somewhat multitudinous. The delightful task of teaching "the young idea how to shoot," was not therefore the only occupation of the excellent Doctor Quipes. He was singing master of the parish, and would often, on Sunday morning, amuse himself by ringing the bell of the meeting house: he was a sort of physician, likewise, as his style signified; and in the matter of curing a lame spaniel, or splintering the limb of a crippled chicken, was without an equal. The learned gentleman was somewhat lengthy, his height being a fraction over six feet; and being tolerably lean withal, and with legs that were almost interminable, he was well calculated to perform the pedestrian feats he sometimes accomplished—in walking to and from the school. The doctor's sojourn was, of course, by turns taken up at my father's; at such times I had the satisfaction of hearing my genius extolled, and my astonishing precocity expatiated upon, by this "learned pundit"—most particularly whenever the honest gentleman was desirous of increasing his privileges. My father being one of the trustees of this literary establishment, a good word in his ear concerning his very hopeful progenitor, was sure to work wonders in behalf of the disinterested doctor. On such occasions he was truly eloquent; and I have actually blushed, "albeit unused" thereunto, at the flights of fancy in which this sober minded gentleman would at such times indulge. According to these private accounts, I was the best—the most promising scholar in the school—whereas, I had often, before the whole literary posse, the satisfaction of hearing myself dubbed, "the greatest dolt it had ever been his ill fortune to fall in with." The doctor was peculiarly partial to the system of Solomon in training up youth, and whenever he gave any of us a lecture, he generally finished the same with an appropriate flourish of his stick, and a warm greeting thereof with the shoulders of the offender. This he called "driving it in;" "for," said he, "there are two parts to a lecture, the subject and the application,"—the flogging we understood to be "the application." In a short time my genius began positively to display itself in a variety of projects and contrivances, which evinced that peculiar character of intuition which is ever the attendant of precocious talent. It is true, the products of my ingenuity were not generally known, but were confined principally to such uses as they could be applied to, within the immediate vicinity of their origin. The first effort in which my inventive genius particularly displayed itself, was in the construction of a machine for catching flies. Being possessed of that sensitiveness that is generally the concomitant of true genius, it had ever appeared to me, when I saw one of those little innocents put out of the world, that the manner in which their exit was consummated must be attended with unnecessary pain to the victim. I had seen fly-traps that gave me a sensation of infinite horror whenever I thought of them; and among these, the kind generally in use in the country houses of the neighborhood, was particularly revolting to my delicate sensibilities. This cruel machine consisted of two shingles, placed one above the other, and joined with a sort of hinge at the ends; to the upper piece a string was attached, while upon the surface of the under one was spread a thick coat of molasses. The flies, enticed by the smell of the luscious sweet, would rush in swarms to the bait, and the moment their toes touched the adhesive consistence, their hopes of life were over, for the more they endeavored to extricate themselves, the deeper they became immersed in the mire: and there they stuck "in medio laborare." At such moments, I could not but pity these innocent unsophisticated insects; their struggles for release—their supplicating countenances—their silent agony—their piteous gestures—all tended to show the utter misery, the absolute murder of such a death; perhaps for half a day they would linger in this state of torture, before some friendly hand pulled the string and released them from pain and life together. To remedy these cruel evils it was, that I first set about the invention of a machine, that should accomplish the death of the flies, without committing an act of murder upon the souls and bodies of the sufferers. The instrument that I planned and executed, while it effectually did the work of death upon its victims, sent them to the land of shades, without the accompaniment of prolonged torture, or mangled carcasses. It was modelled something after the manner of a guillotine, and decapitated its subjects with astonishing celerity. But I was a poet—a born poet—"Poeta nascitur," &c. A most precocious instance of this spirit was displayed in my first effort, entitled, "Lines on a deceased Canary bird." The unhappy exit of this feathered favorite was accomplished through the means of a certain four-footed feline savage, of the Maltese species, under very melancholy circumstances. This cat flourished under the patronage of a maiden sister of my father, and was boarded and lodged for the ostensible purpose of catching rats; but an abominable thirst for blood, inherent in the animal, caused her sometimes strangely to mistake her victims, as the ghosts of some dozens innocent goslings and that of the unlucky canary can testify. In these lines, therefore, I set forth in strong relief, the contrast between the ravenous, blood-thirsty disposition of the assassin, and the gentle, playful and unoffending character of the defunct. It contained a truly feeling and pathetic appeal to the consciences of all the cats in the neighborhood, and was concluded by an appropriate moral application. This affecting lucubration was read before the parson and Doctor Quipes, at a family dinner, just after the second bottle, and was by them likened to some of the early productions of Shelley. I remember that my father was so delighted with their remarks, that he instantly called for the third bottle. My collar was worn carelessly open, after the manner of Byron, and I conceived a particular fancy for biscuit and soda-water—two propensities that essentially belong to the poetic character. No man can be a poet without eccentricity. No one can write good poetry, who is not fond of soda-water; and any person guilty of the act of imbibing a heavier fluid than "gin and water," may consider himself as having nought of the spirit of poetry in his soul. The poetic temperament is full of romance, and, of course, I became enraptured with the romantic. I was fond of sallying forth at night in the clear moonshine—straying through silent groves—meditating among the tombs—listening from some mighty steep, to the deep booming thunder—or in watching the forked lightning as it darted from the black shroud of the storm. So enamored did I become of solitude, that I have actually for hours been seated on a three-cornered rail in the neighborhood of some waterfall, and in an attitude so rural and picturesque, that I was once shot at, being mistaken for a bear in the act of stealing into a corn-field.

FINE ARTS.

NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

THIRD NOTICE.

We claim the indulgence of our readers, and feel confident that it will be cheerfully awarded, while we glance once more at the pictures exhibited in this institution. A number of admirable pieces remain, which we have not yet named. Of those mentioned heretofore we have only taken a cursory view. Many contemporary journals have, however, solicited the public attention to this display by our untiring artists, and we sincerely congratulate the academy on the increasing numbers of visitors who are in daily attendance.

No. 3. Portrait of Signor Da Ponte. Frothingham. This well-known artist possesses strong claims to attention as a portrait painter. His usual skill is clearly visible in this resemblance of our venerable and highly-esteemed fellow-citizen.

11. Landscape. Gerardi.

17. Landscape. Gerardi. This and the foregoing are small but strikingly pretty, expressing a great deal of imagination, if they are fancy pieces, and much power and taste whether they are or not. They are by an Italian artist.

12. Portrait of the late Colonel Fairman. T. Sully. This is done in a pleasing and lively style, by a successful artist, who makes a sweet toil of copying the faces of our fair friends in Philadelphia.

13. View on the North river. A. Richardson. For sale. A dijn scene, of hill and river, in "Cynthia's lonely, lovely light."

14. Lady Beatrice Cenci, in the castle of St. Angelo, in Rome, about being conducted to the place of execution. G. Marsiglia. For sale. The lofty columns and ceilings have here an imposing look, and the whole is well done; but the smallness and indistinctness of the figures make the piece rather a likeness of the castle than of the lady.

15. Italian Kitchen. Beautiful, beautiful, indeed. The spectator will admire the Italian sky gleaming through the window, and the clear light and soft shadows which fill the apartment, and the fine accuracy with which the whole is finished. We suppose this is from the same hand as the small but striking picture, entitled, in the catalogue "Interior view," and also anonymous. They are both worthy a careful and minute examination. Are the members of the academy unacquainted with the name of the artist?

16. Portrait of Colonel Childs. H. Inman. Full of life and character, and admirable; as are all from the same source.

18. Landscape—evening. Richardson. For sale.

20. Portrait of the late Dr. Mitchell. Frothingham. A strong likeness, and, both from the merits of the piece and the esteemed character and profound learning of the lamented original, a highly appropriate and valuable embellishment to the exhibition.

23. Landscape. W. Allston. Owned by E. Weeks. The reputation of Mr. Washington Allston is extended. He is at present residing in Boston. This is a dark-looking group of buildings and stretch of landscape, without any particular merit.

25. Composition (a sketch) for a larger picture. Weir. The execution of this design would afford the artist a capital opportunity to illustrate his warm imagination. A young painter is seen in the midst of a hall, gazing in mute rapture on a lovely Italian girl, whose portrait he has come to paint. The story goes on to state, that when he paid his second visit he found her dead.

70. Spalatro's vision of the Bloody Hand. W. Allston. This fine and spirited production continues to excite general admiration. We recur to it again, however, to rectify an error in the first notice, when we stated that it was the property of W. Bull. It is owned by Mr. H. S. Ball, of South Carolina, for whom it was originally painted, and who, we learn, recently brought it from Charleston, for the purpose of loaning it to the academy.

28. Portrait of John Lang, Esq. A. L. De Rose. Owned by Colonel Gamble. Mr. De Rose is indefatigable in his profession, and continues to improve. Some of his portraits are exceedingly accurate.

31. View in Trimble Valley, near Newburgh. Hoyle. Owned by Mr. John Parker. We cannot say precisely that we are familiar with Trimble Valley; but we do say, that the vicinity of Newburgh presents specimens of landscape, of hill and valley, wood and meadow, river and mountain, of a rich luxuriance, of a gorgeous beauty and magnificence, probably surpassed by few in the world. The present is a soft and pretty scene, marked by Mr. Richardson's peculiar manner.

34. Landscape. G. W. Tyler. We have before spoken of the merits of this young artist as a landscape painter. He must subdue the brightness of his coloring, and his pieces will be much better.

39. Landscape. W. M. O. We presume some one enamored of the art. He need not be ashamed of this effort. It is a quiet, pleasant-looking picture of rural beauty, rich tufts of foliage, the turn of a road, and soft scenery in the distance. It is very well imagined and executed.

46. Fruit piece. G. Marsiglia. The jar and fish are not well done; the fruit rich and natural; the cut orange has a pretty transparency, and the grapes are admirable, but slightly tinged with a propensity this artist discovers for coloring too highly. After all there is nothing like nature, which is often brilliant, but not always.

58. Sketch for a larger picture. Weir. Owned by W. M. Oddie. Here again the hand of Weir is easily recognized. A lady looking from a balcony over a soothing scene.

104. Coast scene. Richardson. Owned by J. F. Burrell.

105. Coast scene. Richardson. Owned by J. F. Burrell.

Both charming. The misty atmosphere, the rocky coast and ocean dimly seen through, are finely represented.

106. Engraving. (Convent gate.) Smillie. The great merit of this skilful artist is now becoming generally acknowledged. He has few equals, and we think no superiors, in the country.

107. Young Artist. Johnson. Truly comic. A little boy has persuaded his companion to stand for his portrait. The attitude and expression of the original is ludicrous enough, but the portrait drawn by the young artist on the board is inimitable. The droll resemblance of the picture, the effort of the one child to stand still, and the eagerness of the other, are all admirable.

211. Portrait. C. Ingham. The sunshiny face of a smiling girl, with golden ringlets. Ingham's pictures combine softness and brilliancy delightfully, but sometimes to a fault. His old men are occasionally too smooth complexioned and rose-lipped. The artist, we think, should subdue his propensity for high and warm coloring, when he paints those faces which are "written down old with all the characters of age;" but a lovely woman or a happy child cannot be too strikingly soft and clear for nature. The present is done with his usual skill, and cannot fail to secure to itself a favorable notice.

205. Full-length portrait. Weir. Owned by Dr. Hosack. A graceful female, the head and face quite prettily finished.

199. Portrait. Ingham. The bonnet is almost reality. The hand is either badly painted or the position badly chosen. The coloring, as usual, appears more beautifully finished the more closely it is examined.

190. Full-length portrait. De Rose. We must compliment this artist on a visible improvement, but we do not admire the design of this at all. The attitude of the gentleman, "armed cap-a-pie," is ungraceful and unnatural. There is, however, a good deal of merit displayed in the face, which we learn is a strong likeness.

207. Brother and Sister. F. Agate. H. Tolman. Very pretty, but the heads much better than the figures.

4. Scotch Pensioner. Weir. A fine venerable head, "blasted with antiquity" and long-past battles.

5. View of Ponte de la Trinta. Weir. Owned by Miss M. Glover. A fine city view—battlements, bridges, a stone pier, a stream, a statue—and the moon shining down dimly over all. A very charming piece. Every wealthy American should own a picture or two of this kind. They are, indeed, rich and elegant ornaments for the drawing-room.

6. Woodland scenery. Weir. For sale. A track of brown heath. The vast distance stretches away to the horizon, like nature itself.

8. Family piece of the late James Lorimer, Esq. of London. Sir William Beachy. Owned by Colonel J. L. Graham. We have noticed this once previously, but not with sufficient care. It improves wonderfully on acquaintance. The animated yet easy and natural grouping, the sweet infantile faces of the children, the quiet expression of paternal pride and satisfaction in the countenance of the father, are altogether worthy of a second look.

18. Landscape. (Evening.) A. Richardson. (For sale.) Will not bear a close inspection. As a mere sketch it is one of his best.

21. Portrait. Syms. Owned by A. Richardson. Well-painted and natural.

26. Landscape. Hoyle. Owned by Mr. Weir. A soft view, a winding river, rich foliage, distant hills, and all glowing in a mellow light, which falls very effectively on the foreground.

30. View on the North river. Richardson. For sale. There is a whiteness about some of Mr. R.'s pictures, which strikes the eye unpleasantly. The scene here is lovely but for this.

33. Lake Sebago. C. Codman. For sale. A charming landscape, and well lighted.

36. A landscape. Richardson. More whitish hills and trees; but truly beautiful as a sketch.

37. The Two Sisters. W. Page. Owned by S. Dewitt Bloodgood, Esq. A pretty domestic scene. The interior of a room, book, bust, table, sofa, &c. The light streaming through a window, and two dear little girls at play.

38. Portrait. Furguson. Very fair portrait—of marked merit, of a little boy in blue.

40. Portrait. R. Peale. Spirited female face.

45. Portrait. Peale. Said to be a head of Greenough, whose admired "Chanting Cherubs" stand in the opposite side of the room.

49. View near Worcester, Mass. Hoyle. Owned by James J. Mapes, Esq. A luxuriant piece of landscape, seen from the brow of a hill.

53. La Berretta. Weir. Owned by Philip Hone, Esq. Really beautiful; a female face, much in the style of the Greek. By the same artist.

61. Portrait. Leslie. Owned by S. Ward, jun. Admirable. The head of our friend, Dr. Francis, taken many years ago.

63. View on the Lake of Bolsena. Weir. Owned by Mr. Parker. A beautiful, rich view, with figures.

73. Landscape. Smith. A fine rural scene; cottages and distant country; dark, but imposing, and finely executed.

75. Landscape. Hoxie. Fault in the coloring; a want of discrimination and distinctness.

76. The Rose. A. Smith, jun. Owned by Allen Smith, Esq. If by a young artist, this has merit, though without taste or expression.

77. Landscape. Cole. For sale. A daub, but by a masterly hand; careless, but betraying a fine conception.

Besides the above enumerated paintings, there are several portraits of great merit, by Inman, Ingham, Dunlap, Mount, Morse, Sully, Twibill, and others.

Several cases of admirably executed wood engravings, by Mason, are also exhibited; many of them were done for, and have appeared in this journal.

Some able drawings in pencil also are displayed, highly creditable to the artists. We observe likewise a large view of the City—hotel and a part of Broadway, by Mr. C. Burton; and some exquisite engravings on steel, by Smillie. We would particularly designate the small plate, "Garden of Eden," from Cole's large oil painting; some humorous burlesque sketches by Johnston, (his militia muster is capital;) and a large number of elegant miniatures, by Cummings, Mapes, Badger, Newcombe, Bartlet, Winter, Dodge, Shumway, &c. Mr. W. G. Wall, of Newport, has contributed several peculiarly pleasing landscapes. We may have casually omitted the mention of others of equal merit. The artists have our congratulations upon the favorable notice taken of this exhibition by the public. We are indebted to them for several hours of delightful recreation, and we sincerely trust they may, both as individuals and academicians, persevere and prosper.

MUSIC.

THE SPRING ORATORIO.

The New-York Sacred Music Society, to which we are indebted for whatever of advance has been made in the cultivation of the noblest and most sublime branch of the musical art, gave their usual spring performance, on Thursday, the seventh instant, at the chapel in Chatham-street, which has been rented for the express purpose of producing oratorios at stated periods. The building is admirably adapted for this praiseworthy purpose, and has been converted, with considerable judgment, into a convenient and handsome apartment, with a spacious orchestra, well calculated either for the purpose of devotion, or of a grave musical performance.

The selection was not an entire oratorio, by some great master, as at the last performance, but two acts of a miscellaneous description, embracing choice morceaux, the compositions of Handel, Haydn, and Mozart. Mrs. Austin led the soprano department, Mr. Jones, the tenor, and a Mr. Riley, for the first time, appeared as the principal bass singer. We cannot encourage the latter in the hope that he can ever succeed as a vocalist.

We refer with pleasure to the merits displayed in this performance, and they were neither few, nor of a common description. Mr. Jones, for the first time in our remembrance, introduced Handel's unrivalled recitative and air from the oratorio of Jephthah, descriptive of that patriarch's rash vow, and the immolation of his daughter. It is certainly one of the most difficult of Handel's compositions, and the recitative is allowed by the musical world to be the most refined and beautiful description of compunction and remorse which the union of sentiment and sound is capable of producing. Braham, in England, has raised an imperishable name by his touching description of the father's misery; and those who have ever heard him will remember, that it is scarcely possible to conceive a more sublime musical effort than his rendering of that recitative, and the prayer which follows for the immortality of his child, commencing, "Waft her, angels, through the skies." We can call to mind no equal to this splendid performance by Braham, unless it be the various passions described by the inimitable Pasta, in the opera of Media, when about to put the children of Jason to death.

Mr. Jones really did himself honor by his finished mode of singing the prayer; and the recitative was highly creditable to his conception of the author. His "Lord, remember David," was a smooth and pleasing performance; but that in which he least excelled was Martin Luther's Judgment Hymn. We prefer Mr. Horn's performance of this piece. It is but justice, however, to add, that when we had the pleasure of hearing Mr. Horn, he was supported by the fine organ at St. Paul's church, whereas Mr. Jones and Mr. Norton were assisted by an instrument not capable of the same effect. Of Norton, we can only lament that he is the only professor of the trumpet in the country who really develops the beauty of the instrument. He is indeed, far beyond all competition.

Mrs. Austin's "Angels ever bright," is too well known, and too well appreciated by the amateurs of the city, to need comment. To our mind, it is one of her happiest efforts: the liquid quality of her voice—the facility with which each note glides after the foregoing one—the pleasing contour of her countenance, unmoved by exertion, and betraying no contortion, the only peculiarity being the inclination of her head rather on one side—her studied and unvaried attention to the business of the evening, as well in the chorusses as in her own department—altogether form an agreeable picture of a practised and finished vocalist, which is not often realized. The spirited air, "Let the bright Seraphim," accompanied by Norton, caused an evident sensation among the audience, and which burst forth in plaudits, and were only checked by one of the directors addressing them, and requesting them to desist. The band, on the whole, played well. Mr. Hill mistook the time of the overture of Sampson, by leading the first movement much too slow; he, however, made amends by throwing a good deal of fire into the fugue. The chorusses were really admirable. The fine double chorus, "The horse and his rider," was beautifully precise. The ladies of the society we have had occasion to speak well of in former articles. Their appearance and performance on this evening were alike praiseworthy; the former being remarkable for a neatness and uniformity of dress, which produced a fine effect; the latter displaying a knowledge of music, creditable to their talents and industry. We conclude by offering the society our best wishes, and recommending them not to relax in their exertions.

THE DRAMA.

THE NEW-YORK STAGE, ETC.

Mrs. Austin concluded her engagement and took her benefit at the Park theatre, on Monday evening. The selections made on that occasion, were parts of the White Lady, the Tempest and Cinderella. A crowded and fashionable audience manifested their delight by judiciously bestowed and enthusiastic applause. Mr. Charles Horn, and Mr. Norton with his trumpet, added greatly to the evening's attractions. Mr. Hackett appeared on Tuesday, in Nimrod Wildfire. We learn the report, that the Kentuckians had "looked down stentendicular," at the humorous points in this character, is without foundation. His sketches of this description are strong, though peradventure, exaggerated likenesses; not precisely of a species, but of individuals to be met not unfrequently, and his Yankee stories are full of spirit and truth. No one has ever approached him in this department. This is great but deserved praise. On Wednesday Mrs. Austin and Miss Hughes sang the sweet music of the Marriage of Figaro. We most cordially greet the return of the latter lady to our boards.

We were much gratified with "Artaxerxes," an opera which presented us with the blended efforts of Mrs. Austin, Mr. Horn and Mr. Jones, as Mandane, Artaban, and Artabace. It was indeed an unusual and delightful treat. Mr. Horn is a spirited and sweet singer, with a smaller voice than Jones, but nevertheless, treading often near him on his path. Between the play and farce, his "Deep, deep sea," with the admirably soft and brilliant accompaniment, were first-rate, and rapturously encored. Jones sang "Water parted from the sea," with a rich tenderness and effect that put criticism out of the question. By the way, we have a remark to make here. Jones does too much work. We claim him as our own vocalist—the pride and ornament of American opera. If the managers make a hack horse of him, as they are doing, both he and they will be eventual losers. As Artaxerxes we should do injustice, were we to omit complimenting Mrs. Sharpe's style of giving her music.

We have seen two prodigies at the American theatre. Miss Clifton's Belshazzar, and Master Mangeon's Richard. The first was an extraordinary undertaking, for which the lady did not possess a solitary requisite qualification. The latter was better though not so pleasing to us, as it seemed to be to the audience. The line, "Well, as you guess," (to which Cooke's famous burst of sarcastic passion has given an additional interest) was delivered by this young lad with great force and truth. His other points were not good. He is too audacious in his appropriation of the regular stage tricks, and carries them to a degree bordering on caricature. He, however, went through his part with a very commendable fluency, and if not aspiring to be a prodigy now, may make a fine actor in time.

The Richmond Hill attracts increased attention and respect. There is really excellent acting there. Mrs. Hilson, Mrs. Barnes, Mr. Hilson, and other sterling performers, insure every visitor against disappointment.

We learn that the female vocalist selected to support Mr. Sinclair in Baltimore is Mrs. Keppel!

LITHOGRAPHY.

Endicott and Swett have issued, on an imperial sheet, a most admirable lithographic full-length portrait of Charles Carroll, of Carrollton. It is the best executed and most interesting plate we have seen for many a day. The venerable old revolutionary veteran is sitting in his easy chair, with a countenance finely expressive of age and reflection. Every one must be gratified with the sight of this likeness of the last surviving signer of the Declaration of Independence.

A lithographic print has been issued by Peabody and Co. representing the saloon of the city-hotel, and the company assembled at the Irving dinner.

LETTERS FROM PARIS.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF EUROPE.

NUMBER NINETEEN.

Morning view from the Rue Rivoli—the Bois de Boulogne—Guiccioli—Simondi the historian, &c.

It is now the middle of April, and sitting at my window on the Rue Rivoli, I look through one of the long, clipped avenues of the Tuileries, and see an arch of green leaves, the sun of eight o'clock in the morning just breaking through the thin foliage and dappling the straight, even gravel-walk below, with a look of summer that makes my heart leap. The cholera has put an end to dissipation, and one gets up early from necessity. It is delicious to step out before breakfast, and cross the street into those lovely gardens, for an hour or two of fresh air and reflection. It is warm enough now to sit on the stone benches about the fountains, by the time the dew is dry; and I know nothing so contemplative as the occupation of watching these royal swans in the dreamy, almost imperceptible motion with which they glide around the edges of the basins. The gold fish swim up and circle about the breast of the imperial birds with a motion almost as idle; and the old wooden-legged soldier, who has been made warden of the gardens for his service, sits nodding on one of the chairs, or drawing fortifications with his stick in the gravel; and so it happens, that in the midst of a gay and busy city one may feel always a luxurious solitude; and, be he ever so poor, loiter all day if he will, among scenes which only regal munificence could provide for him. With the Seine bounding them on one side, the splendid uniform façade of the Rue Rivoli on the other, the palace stretching across the southern terrace, and the thick woods of the Champs Elysées at the opposite gate, where could one go in the world to give his taste or his eye a more costly or delightful satisfaction?

The Bois de Boulogne, about which the Parisians talk so much, is less to my taste. It is a level wood of small trees, covering a mile or two square, and cut from corner to corner with straight roads for driving. The soil is sandy, and the grass grows only in tufts, the walks are rough and either muddy or dusty always, and, barring the equipages and the pleasure of a word in passing an acquaintance, I find a drive to this famous wood rather a dull business. I want either one thing or the other—cultivated grounds like the Tuileries, or the wild wood.

I have just left the Countess Guiccioli, with whom I have been acquainted for some two or three weeks. She is very much frightened at the cholera, and thinks of going to America. The conversation turned principally upon Shelley, whom, of course, she knew intimately; and she gave me one of his letters to herself as an autograph. She says he was at times a little crazy—"fou," as she expressed it—but that there never was a nobler or a better man. Lord Byron, she says, loved him like a brother. She is still in correspondence with Shelley's wife, of whom also she speaks with the greatest affection. There were several miniatures of Byron hanging up in the room, and I asked her if any of them were perfect in the resemblance. "No," she said, "this was the most like him," taking down an exquisitely finished miniature by an Italian artist, "mais il était beaucoup plus beau—beaucoup!—beaucoup!" She reiterated the word with a very touching tenderness, and continued to look at the picture for some time, either forgetting our presence, or affecting it. She speaks English sweetly, with a soft, slow honied accent, breaking into French whenever she gets too much interested to choose her words. She went on talking in French of the painters who had drawn Byron, and said the American, West's, was the best likeness. I did not like to tell her that West's picture of herself was excessively flattered. I am sure no one would know her from the engraving of it at least. Her cheek bones are high, her forehead is badly shaped, and altogether, the frame of her features is decidedly ugly. She dresses in the worst taste, too, and yet, with all this, and poetry and celebrity aside, the Countess Guiccioli is both a lovely and a fascinating woman, and one whom a man of sentiment would admire even at this age, very sincerely, but not for beauty. She has white and regular teeth, however, and her hair is incomparably the most beautiful I ever saw. It is of the richest and glossiest gold, silken and luxuriant, and changes, as the light falls upon it, with a mellow softness, than which nothing could be lovelier. It is this and her indescribably winning manner—which is lost in a picture, and therefore, it is perhaps fair that she should be otherwise flattered. Her drawing-room is one of the most agreeable in Paris at present, and it is one of the chief agréments which console me for a detention in an atmosphere so triste as well as dangerous.

My bed-room window opens upon the court, in the interior of the hotel Rivoli, in which I lodge. In looking out occasionally upon my very near neighbors opposite, I have frequently observed a gray-headed, scholar-like, fine-looking old man, writing at a window in the story below. One does not trouble himself much about his fellow-lodgers, and I had seen this gentleman at his work at all hours, for a month or more, without curiosity enough to inquire even his name. This morning the servant came in, with a Mon Dieu! and said M. Simondi was frightened by the cholera, and was leaving his lodgings at that moment. The name startled me, and making some inquiries, I found that my gray-headed neighbor was no other than the celebrated historian of Italian literature, and that I had been living under the same roof with him for weeks, and watching him at his classical labors, without being at all aware of the honor of his neighborhood. He is a kind, benevolent-looking man, of about sixty, I should think; and always had a peculiarly affectionate manner to his wife, who, I am told by the valet, is an Englishwoman. I regretted exceedingly the opportunity I had lost of knowing him, for there are few writers of whom one retains a more friendly and agreeable remembrance.

*"But he was much more beautiful—much—much."

In a conversation with Mr. Cooper, the other day, he was remarking of how little consequence any one individual found himself in Paris, even the most distinguished. We were walking in the Tuileries, and the remark was elicited by my pointing out to him one or two celebrated persons, whose names are sufficiently known, but who walk the public promenades, quite unnoticed and unrecognized. He said he did not think there were five people in Paris who knew him at sight, though his works were advertised in all the bookstores, and he had lived in Paris one or two years, and walked there constantly. This was putting a strong case, for the French idolize Cooper; and the peculiarly translatable character of his works makes them read even better in a good translation than in the original. It is so all over the continent, I am told. The Germans, Italians, and Spaniards prefer Cooper to Scott; and it is easily accounted for when one remembers how much of the beauty of the Waverley novels depends on their exquisite style, and how peculiarly Cooper's excellence lies in his accurate, definite, tangible descriptions. There is not a more admired author in Europe than Cooper, it is very certain; and I am daily asked whether he is in America at present—so little do the people of these crowded cities interest themselves about that which is immediately at their elbows.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

THE MELANCHOLY MAN.

Mac.—I feel 'tis so.
Thus have I been since first the plague broke out,
A term, methinks, of many hundred years!
As if this world were hell, and I condemned
To walk through woe to all eternity.
I will do suicide.
Astrologer.—Thou canst not, fool!
Thou lovest life with all its agonies;
Buy poison, and 'twill lie for years untouched
Beneath thy pillow, when thy midnight horrors
Are at their worst. Coward! thou canst not die.
Wilson's City of the Plague.

I HAVE been all my life haunted with a desire to commit suicide. It has crossed me—it still does cross me continually. It is partly the result of constitution, and partly of early and frequent misfortunes, and a habit of brooding over them. This dreadful disease has forever caused me to look with sickly eyes on the charms of life and the beauties of nature. I shall not here write any history of myself. It would not interest others. Those incidents which have made me wretched, happier dispositions would soon forget. I can never forget them. I feel that my game of life has been played and lost. Those secret springs of joy and hope, which give elasticity to other minds, in me are broken. I have been always struggling against the current; and sometimes, nay often, it has appeared to me as if some awful and inexorable power were present at my undertakings, and took a mysterious delight in bringing them to ruin. True, my reason often teaches me that this is merely an absurd fancy, and that it cannot be. Yet I think it is, and that is sufficient to make me wretched. Sometimes, in the endeavor to combat this opinion as a superstition, I have compelled myself to embark in a design, or to entertain an affection; but invariably I have met with such severe disappointments, that I have long since ceased to hope. When I first reached the years of manhood, I found this in all my pecuniary business. Stock fell if I touched it; banks broke as soon as I became interested. The fable relates, that whatever the celebrated king of Phrygia touched, turned to gold; wherever I laid my hand, I was sure to produce destruction. At length I have grown so timid, that I am afraid to love, afraid to form a friendship, afraid to offer advice. He who peruses this will, doubtless, smile incredulously on me; he will say it is impossibility. Well, let him. Indeed it seems equally so to me. I have racked my brain to believe it merely an accidental train of unfavorable events, which to-morrow may change; yet it has not changed, and I am half fain to abandon myself to the startling and terrible thought, that I am branded with some mysterious curse. Whatever may be the cause, I am miserable, and always have been so beyond description. I look for nothing this side the grave.

I became acquainted some time ago with a little girl, eight or nine years old, with unusual powers of mind and charms of person. The sight of her face positively dispelled the shadows which brooded over my mind. She discovered a singular attachment to me. I was delighted with her thousand winning ways. I was almost happy while under the influence of her irrepressible happiness. It was a joy for me to meet her in the street. I have caught a gleam of her beautiful light countenance, amid a group of her companions going to school early in the morning, which haunted me all day.

"Shall I love this creature?" said I to myself; "will it not be bringing down upon her sweet young head the dark influence which has ever pursued me and mine? Yes," I said, "I will love her. I will once more try this fearful experiment. I will watch to see in what form the effects of my interests in her welfare will fall on her; to what doom it will consign her? Will the turf soon press her tender breast? Will some mournful doom darken her living heart?"

I made these reflections one morning as she passed me, with a smile, in the street.

One week after, a single line in the newspaper answered my interrogatories. She had died of a sudden and painful attack of the scarlet fever. As I perused the information I positively thought I heard the laugh of a demon in my ear, whispered on the passing breeze.

It is not one, two, nor indeed twenty circumstances of this kind which could have alone prostrated my love of life so utterly. I never had a real friend, except my mother, and she died just when I was old enough to mourn for her acutely. Among my other tortures, disease has not been wanting. A violent pain in my chest has, at certain intervals, incapacitated me for all employment. Sometimes my head grows dizzy, or burns with shooting pains. I feel like Caliban, forever contending against a supernatural enemy, whose spirits appear busy about me. That speech of the deformed monster ever haunts my memory:

"For every trifle they are set upon me:
Sometimes like apes, that mow and chatter at me,
And after, bite me; then like hedgehogs, which Lie tumbling in my barefoot way, and mount
Their prick at my foot-ball. Sometimes I am
All wound with adders, who, with cloven tongues,
Do hiss me into madness."

The idea of being perpetually encumbered with a disease, which, while it takes from your heart the secret hope that leads to action, does not exclude you from the necessities of toil, is one of the most benumbing and wretched evils that man can suffer. He wanders through the crowd, without participating in their gladness. He gazes on nature with an admiration, which only heightens his inward anguish. In the most soft and alluring periods of pleasure, the loathsome image of a grave continually obtrudes itself upon his imagination; the icy hand of death is ever on his shoulder, and he hears the phantom whispering, "Victim of my unrelenting power, haste ye through these sunny scenes; in a short time you must quit them forever." I have felt all this; who can wonder that I am tired of life? I have loved in this world but few, and none successfully. No man nor woman nor child has ever been other than as gleamings of what my fellow-creatures have enjoyed. I recoil from one who excites in me any feelings of affection. No one shall suffer the fatality of my friendship who is shocked to learn that I covet my last sleep? Death, mysterious power! language cannot express the intense curiosity with which I have watched every thing appertaining to it. Yes, I have pursued the ghastly phantom in all its forms. I have gone to the prison-house, and pried into the mind of the felon who was at the break of day to expiate his crimes on the scaffold. I have planted myself there to behold him take his last gaze forever and forever on the sky, the green earth, the river, the light. How strange it has seemed that he, that being, that breathing living creature, formed as I am, who speaks, and thinks, and utters requests, and walks, and takes me by the hand to say farewell; how difficult to conceive, how awful, how deeply thrilling to reflect, that in one minute more he will not exist! That which addresses you now will not be. Its semblance only will remain, to mock you, with a vivid recollection of the original nature you had held communion with. I once formed a vague resolution of suicide, and I thus strengthened it. I wished to become familiar with death. I would gaze quietly on him, and apply what I saw concerning him to myself. I strained my fancy to conceive how I should feel, and act, and appear in such a crisis. I have held a loaded pistol to my brain sometimes, or a viol of poison to my lips; or I have stood leaning over the edge of a dizzy height; or I have looked down into the clear ocean billows, and goaded myself on to pass the dreadful gulf. Alas! coward that I was. I feared to die as well as to live, and have turned to my lonely walk with a relief, and put off till some other period the execution of the design.

One day I met a fine fellow, from whom I had been separated many years. He was a scholar and an observer, and, somehow or other, he had the art to draw from me an account of the true state of my feelings.

"Pray," said he, when I had finished pretty much what I have related above; "pray what time do you rise?"

"At ten," said I, rather surprised at the oddity of the question.

"And what time do you retire to bed?"

"At one, two, or three o'clock," said I, "just as it happens."

"What time do you devote to cheerful exercise?"

"Devote?" asked I, "why, no time. I exercise just as I happen to feel."

"And how is your appetite?"

"Enormous."

"And you gratify it to—"

"The full extent."

"What do you drink?"

"Brandy and water, gin and water, &c."

He laughed heartily, although it made me angry; also, I confess, it made me excessively ashamed of my talk about suicide.

"Do you know what ails you?" said he.

"Yes," I replied, "I have a broken heart."

"Broken fiddlestick," said he, "you have the dyspepsia. Diet yourself; go to bed early; rise early; exercise much." I have done so; I am now a healthy and a happy man. I smile to think I was going to blow my brains out, because I had the dyspepsia.

HUMORS OF A YOUNG MAN ABOUT TOWN.

NUMBER NINE.

RHYMES ON WEST-POINT.

I've trod thy mountain paths, thy vallies deep,
Through mazy thickets, and through tangled heath;
I've climbed thy piled up rocks, from steep to steep,
And gazed with rapture on the scene beneath.

The noble plain that lies embosom'd there,
The jutting headlands in thy mimic bay—
The stream impatient of his curbed career,
Sweeping through mighty mountains far away.

His bosom burnished by the setting sun,
Who, loth to leave his own illumined west,
Dyes with his hues the wave he shines upon,
And gilds the clouds which cradle him to rest.

I love West-Point, and long could fondly dwell
On scenes which must through life my memory haunt,
But you, too, reader, have been there as well
As I, if not—you'd better take the jaunt.

You rise at six, and by half after ten
You're at the Point—I was when last I went—
You rest awhile at Cozens's, and then
May stroll toward the upper Monument.

At two you dine—(you'll think it not too soon,
Being sharpset from the morning's ramble)—
And to Fort Putnam in the afternoon,
O'er rocks and brushwood up the mountain scramble.

The view which this majestic height commands
Repays the trouble of its rough access;
For he beholds, who on the rampart stands,
A scene of grandeur and of loveliness:

The chain of mountains, sweeping far away—
The white encampment spread beneath his feet—
The sloop, slow dropping down the placid bay—
Her form reflected in its glassy sheet.

And where the river's banks less boldly swell,
Villas upon some sunny slope are seen;
And white huts buried in some wooded dell—
With chimnies peering through their leafy screen.

'Tis sweet to watch from hence at close of day,
While shadows lengthen on the mountain side—
The sunbeams steal from peak to peak away,
And white sails gleam along the dusky tide.

And sweet to woman's eye at evening hour,
The gay parade that animates the plain,
When martial music lends its kindling power,
To thrill the bosom with some stirring strain.

Who, when they to their gleaming ranks repair,
Delight to gaze upon the bright array
Of young, good-looking fellows marshal'd there
In pigeon-breasted coats of iron-gray.

For girls the glare of warlike pomp adore,
Since, cased in steel with lance and curtle-ax on,
Bold Cœur de Lion led his knights to war,
Down to the days of Major General Jackson.

At night, when home returning, it is sweet,
While stars are twinkling in the fields above;
And whispering breezes in the foliage meet,
To move in such a scene with one we love.

To feel the spell of woman's witchery near,
And while the magic o'er our senses steals,
Believe the being whom we hold most dear,
As deeply as ourselves that moment feels!

* * * * *

The dolphin's hues are brightest while he dies,
The rainbow's glories in their birth decay,
And love's bright visions, like our autumn skies,
Will fade the soonest when they seem most gay.

In "true love" now I am an arrant sceptic,
My heart's best music is forever hushed;
Perhaps because I'm thirty, and dyspeptic,
Perhaps my hopes were once too rudely crushed.

But to return—to those who are too poor,
Leaving their duns and business to a friend,
To take the northern or the eastern tour,
This short excursion I will recommend.

'Tis but two dollars and a day bestowed,
And far from town, its dust and busy strife,
You'll find the jaunt a pleasing episode
In the dull epic of a city life.

Western landscape.

"In the 'far west,' most things wear a character of a higher grandeur and intensity than on the east side of the mountains. Nature has a deeper and richer dash of poetry in her composition. Her domain is wider and wilder; and if her attire is less trim and symmetrical, it is more opulent in color, and magnificent in drapery. She is enthroned in more queenly pomp and splendor; and the beauty and gorgeousness of her gardens, parks, and pleasure-grounds, not only satisfy the senses, but feast them to satiety. Being free from the haze of the ocean, and other large bodies of water, the atmosphere is more pellucid than along the Atlantic border. Hence the blue of the heavens is purer and deeper, and their arch loftier and of wider compass to the eye. For the same reason, the moon and stars have greater brilliancy. This is known to be still more remarkably the case in latitudes nearer to the path of the sun, until, within the tropics, the atmosphere assumes its greatest transparency."

Whirlwinds of the west.

"The equinoctial gales and rains do not occur so regularly in the Mississippi Valley, as they do east of the mountains. But the country is more frequently visited by tornadoes, or a sort of typhoons, which sweep along, in narrow veins, with a force that prostrates forests, demolishes houses, and scatters, like chaff, other fabrics of art, in common with the products of the field. The traveler often meets with the paths of those wild and terrible gushes of wind, where scarcely a tree has withstood their fury. They are sometimes accompanied, along their edges, by eddy-currents, which dash down trees in the opposite direction to that of the main stream."

Western rivers.

"The Atlantic states have nothing to compare with the rivers of the west. The length and depth of those mighty streams, the boldness of their present shores, and the loftiness of the cliffs, which run parallel to them, and once constituted their banks, are matters of peculiar majesty. When swollen by the floods of spring, overflowing their usual boundaries, inundating their low grounds, at times to the width of miles and leagues, uprooting trees like grass, and bearing them, as stubble, on their bosoms, they present a scene of fearful sublimity, which can scarcely be surpassed. On these occasions they frequently sweep off whole acres of their banks, loaded with gigantic timber, from some points, and pile them up, in majestic confusion, on others. Now, they cover their shores, to a great depth and distance, with sand or rich vegetable mould, and again wash them away, leaving their beds ragged and bare. In other instances they form for themselves new channels, converting their old ones into stagnant ponds, or waterless canals. Such are their power, and the ravages and mutations they often produce."

Western trees.

"The trees of the west have no equals in size; and, in depth and magnificence, the forests are unrivalled. Whether it be viewed while under the blossom of spring, the leafy luxuriance of summer, or the variegated and splendid garniture of autumn, the western landscape is unmatched in beauty. When glowing, in particular, in its autumnal garb, it is scarcely surpassed in richness and radiance by the splendors of the morning or evening sky. Those who have gazed on it when gilded with sunbeams, will perceive no just ground to charge this representation of it with extravagance."

Plains of the west.

"Another sort of landscape, not so picturesque and romantic, at least not so bold in its outline, and so diversified in its features, yet scarcely less delightful to the eye, is formed by the great western prairies. To communicate to readers who have never seen them, a just conception of those resplendent and illimitable flats, on whose distant borders the arch of the heavens seems to rest, is impossible. But the attempt, however hopeless, may be made. Let us fancy ourselves, then, in the midst of one of them, in a clear summer day, when vegetation is in its prime. Above, is the blue sky, radiant with the sun, and, on every side, the eye reposes on an ocean of blossoms, gorgeous in color, delicious in fragrance, and, for aught that is discoverable, without a shore. Is it calm? The surface is unruffled, and all is still and silent, as if nature were at rest. Does a breeze spring up? Every thing is in motion; and the living sea around us, thrown into easy and graceful fluctuations, presents a succession of fleeting pictures, which seem to chase each other in sport, and, varying at the pleasure of the capricious wind, fascinate the eye with their ever-changing forms. There is one plant in particular, the product of some of the prairies, which, when in abundance and perfection, constitutes one of the richest ornaments of the landscape. It is the wild heliotrope, with large flowers of gold and bronze. Its growth is lofty, and thousands of acres are, at times, so densely covered by it, that other plants are scarcely visible. Like all its congeners, it inclines toward the sun, the circumstance from which it derives its name. An entire wilderness of so splendid a production, thus bowing in homage to its parent luminary, and gracefully following him as he moves along his path, forms a pageant, not only of beauty, but eloquent in expression, and rich in moral suggestion. To those who delight in such scenes, the sight of it is worth a journey to the west."

WOOD'S TREATISE ON RAIL-ROADS,

WITH NUMEROUS ENGRAVINGS.

One of Carey and Lea's substantial publications, in one volume, pages five hundred and ninety-eight. It also embraces an intelligent view of interior communication in general, an account of the performances of the different locomotive engines, and at subsequent to the Liverpool contest, and other interesting matters. This is the first American from the second English edition, with notes, and an appendix, containing a detailed account of a number of rail-roads in Europe and the United States. The American editor, in his preface expresses his intention of hereafter compiling a detailed statement of the cost, length, plan, and character of every rail-road in Europe and America, exceeding five miles in extent; and also an accurate list of the canals in this country and Great Britain. The work will be read with interest. We subjoin several gleanings from the preface of Mr. George W. Smith, the American editor.

Importance of rail-roads.

"The public attention is, at the present moment, powerfully attracted by the importance of rail-roads: immense investments of capital have been made, and expenditures far more enormous are contemplated, throughout every part of the United States, for the construction of these important roads, which are destined to revolutionize the inland commercial intercourse of the civilized world. In a few years they will extend from the St. Lawrence to the Gulf of Mexico, and from the Atlantic to the Mississippi—connecting the extremities of our widely extended republic, and binding our population by links stronger than iron, by lines extending thousands of miles, and thereby promoting our intercourse, facilitating our commerce, and strengthening our means of defence.

"Rail-roads were probably invented by the ancient Egyptians; their origin can be traced to a period of the most remote antiquity. Rail-ways, composed entirely of massive blocks of smooth stone, and adapted to the passage of wheeled carriages, are still in existence in the vicinity of the quarries whence the stupendous stones were extracted which were used in the construction of the Pyramids. These roads have been incidentally mentioned by the French and Italian savans who have visited that cradle of the arts; but none of them have hitherto imagined that they were, in fact, rail-ways. Their preservation for three thousand years, notwithstanding their exposure to the assaults of time, the havoc of war, and the ravages of barbarians, is remarkable; whilst every vestige of the numerous canals which were constructed by the Ptolemies, or the Caliphs, in Egypt, has long since been obliterated from the face of the earth. In Palmyra and Balbec, similar rail-ways still exist: and in Cyrene, in Africa, long lines of such rail-ways, composed of stone blocks, may yet be traced for many leagues, connecting the ruins of the once splendid cities which the modern desert contains."

Their inventor.

"The world is indebted to Oliver Evans, a native citizen of Pennsylvania, for the discovery of their latent and hitherto unsuspected value and pre-eminent importance. In 1784, he first conceived the idea of his high-pressure steam-engine, and the application of it to carriages, on common roads, as a motive power. He foresaw the superiority, and strenuously urged the adoption of rail-ways and locomotive engines in lieu of canals, some time before it had entered into the imagination of any other human being. His zealous efforts to promote this favorite scheme, were in advance of the opinions of the age; he attracted no attention, and was charged with insanity for believing in the possibility of effects which are now daily witnessed."

GIORDANO—A TRAGEDY—BY JAMES LAWSON,

AUTHOR OF TALES AND SKETCHES.

A late English writer on our dramatic literature remarks, that we have few tragedies; but adds, the mere attempt shows a laudable spirit, and should be greeted with every indulgence. The present play is from the pen of one of the editors of the Mercantile Advertiser, the author of "Tales and Sketches." It is recently published by E. B. Clayton and the Carvills, although it was produced at the Park theatre as long ago as November, 1828. The scene is laid in Florence, and the plot illustrates one of those civil commotions of which history affords so many examples, and which have long been deemed peculiarly appropriate themes for dramatic composition. We shall run through a brief recital of the plot, and offer some remarks on the style and general execution, with a few hints to the author as well as observations to the public.

It seems the duke of Florence, blessed with several real friends, (one of whom is a generous and brave young soldier, and lover of his daughter Emelda,) is the object of hate and envy among Giordano, Neri, Cosmo, and other of his subjects who conspire against his authority, and endeavor to end at once his reign and existence by violence and bloodshed. The rebellion is detected, and the conspirators fall. The interest of the story is considerably enhanced by an under plot, comprehending the affection of the rival suitors, the noble Conradine and the base Giordano, for Emelda.

The play opens with news of a great victory just obtained by the seemingly virtuous Giordano—the rejoicing of the duke, &c. The second scene lets the audience a little more into the character of Giordano, who has been the assassinator of his rival Conradine, and the ruin of Manari, by accusing him of the murder; and closes with a soliloquy in which the audacious traitor unfolds his wicked intentions.

The third act shows the actual conspirators about the duke, who seems a person very easily taken in, and is made to believe by his companions, that the good Manari murdered Conradine, and that he is the author of a dreadful plot to overthrow the state. He is of course a good deal alarmed, but Giordano tranquilizes his spirits, assuring the company,

"Knowledge gives us time for preparation;
And in the sinews of this happy realm,
A strength immortal lives, that will, my liege,
Crush the foul traitor in his vaunted power."

We think Mr. Lawson has drawn the character of the duke really to admiration. He makes him what dukes as well as common men very often are, when suddenly placed in any crisis of importance or danger, a weak and shallow-minded gentleman, unfit to mingle in public affairs. We quote an observation by the duke, which proves clearly that he must have possessed a kind of character calculated to encourage the wild and daring plans of his treasonable and ambitious subjects. On learning that several had it in contemplation to put him out of the way, and assume the government himself, instead of proceeding imme-

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE AMERICAN QUARTERLY REVIEW,

NUMBER TWENTY-TWO—FOR JUNE.

THE present is an excellent number. All the reviews are written with spirit, candor, and ability—a strong evidence that none of them were furnished by the author of the article entitled "American Lake Poetry," which lately disgraced the pages of this work. The praise bestowed upon the "History and Geography of the Mississippi Valley," is well merited, and will be responded to by the whole country. Mr. Flint has never had justice done him by the American press, and we are glad to find the Quarterly so zealous in his cause. We make a few desultory extracts from the admirable paper referred to, and regret that we have not space for more.

diately to action he tells what he dreamt the night before, and interprets his dream, thus proving that he was not only imbecile but superstitious.

Duke. I saw a serpent in my dream last night,
With double head and most venom'd sting;
Its eyes seemed brighter than two balls of fire,
Which flashed upon me with so wild a glare,
They tortured e'en my soul. I am an old man;
My blood is cold, imagination tame,
And seldom do I conjure fancies up,
But look on things with calm and thoughtful eye.
Yet in this case, despite all former rule,
I think my better angel hovered near,
To wake my mind against some threatened ill.
Now is my dream explained—but I shall be Prepared to meet the serpent, and to crush it.

Again there is a touch of character in him, when he nearly went out without bidding those that remained "good night;" evidently betraying that he was not sufficiently strong-minded for his situation.

Duke. Didst thou speak?
We do forget ourselves—so does this plot
On our imagination fix withal,
That we are bankrupt in each thought beside,
And lack all courtesy. Good night.

The fourth scene discovers Emelda weeping for the loss of her lover Conradine, who she, with all the world, supposes has fallen by the hand of the hero. After having given vent to her grief, she is addressed by Bella, her chambermaid, who goes on consoling her very prettily in the fashion of such things.

Bella. Wo, wo! he is no more: but, pray thee, turn
Thy thoughts away from melancholy themes.
Think of the living; for there breathes the one,
Who loves thee well, and well deserves thy love.
Emel. O, Bella, none.
Bella. The pride of all the realm,
Thy brother's friend—thy father's proudest boast:
The brave Giordano.
Emel. Thou dost talk ill-timed;
He ne'er can fill a corner of my heart,
For now my love and lover both are dead.
Pray thee, leave me.

Notwithstanding this resolution, which being merely made by a woman, does not get much credit with Giordano—he goes through a well imagined love scene with her—she refuses his entreaties—he vows revenge, and leaves the room, when Conradine himself, escaped by a miraculous accident from the steel of the assassin, comes in and relieves her anguish.

Scene first of act second. A crowd of conspirators plotting treason, and making their last preliminary arrangements for the rebellion.

Scene second. The senate house. Manari, the supposed murderer of Conradine, is sentenced to perpetual imprisonment, and they proceed to elect some one to hold his office, "of chief adviser in our happy realm." Giordano, upon whom it is expected the dignity will fall, is requested to withdraw, when the following scene takes place. The ideas are excellent; the rhythm good, and the language easy and flowing.

Duke. The weighty trust which late the traitor held,
By one more worthy must with speed be filled—
That one, my judgment and my heart proclaim
To be our own victorious general.
Grave senators, how stand you all disposed?
Speak freely each: meets this your approbation?
Col. It does, my sire—their silence gives approval.
Cav. No! I oppose: I will not lend my vote
To raise a victor to such high control:
I fear the sway his office might insure
Over the people's mind. Success in war
Circles the hero in a glare of light,
That dazzles those who move within his sphere.
Civilians, soldiers, all might bow to him;
Pause at his word, or at his bidding move.

Duke. False are thy fears; I know Giordano well.
Col. As I can vouch! from boyhood we have been
In friendship strong as fable ever told.
Give him your voices, friends. Why sit you mute?

Cav. I prize him dearly, and I hold his deeds
The proudest records on our history's page;
For these would yield him all becoming honor.
What is becoming? Give him wealth immense—
The arch triumphal, titles proud, and love,
Yea boundless as the realm, or as his fame—
But dress no hero in our civil robes.

Duke. Why should you fear? Does history not record
Examples parallel, and where renown,
As great in council as in tented field,
Has brightly marked the warrior-statesman's course?
Ay, in a land as brave and wise and free,
As the wide globe contains, there's proof supreme.

Cav. I grant you this, but does not history, too,
Record, that heroes by their country prized,
(And man is prone to love the brave in war)
Have made, without a stepping-stone like this,
Their martial deeds a claim to civil rule,
And won it too? Then tyranny hath marched
With ruthless vengeance, and with sword unsheathed,
Drenching the frightened land in native blood.
Why should I bring you instances to prove,
From ancient times, or e'en in modern days,
The truth and force of my asseveration?
I say, what has been once may be again;
And, though I speak not present fears, I would Avoid all possibility of fear.

Col. Who else opposes? Silent all!—then none.
Duke. Yea, answer us! who does oppose our choice?
Who will refuse all honor to the man
That's won his country's battles, and subdued
An insolent foe? Let him arise and speak.

Cav. Will none support me in the vote I give?
Grave senators, to you I speak; hear me:
I pray ye all, beware. Lend not your votes
To yield such power to an ambitious man,
A daring soldier and the people's idol—
There's danger in't. Who speaks? None! I'm resigned.

Emelda then, to the great astonishment of all present, brings Conradine himself, who relates the chance whereby he was preserved.

Conrad. The battle is o'er, it was my first desire
To view the bleeding pictures on the field,
And hear the tales related by the serfs.
With this intent, I changed my dress for that
My valet wore; and, thus disguised, set out.
An hour thereafter the report went round,
That I was murdered and my servant fled;
Or whom suspicion rested of the deed.

On hearing this, I judged how it might be—
And 'twas—the servant for his master fell.
Unknown to all I changed my dress again,
(Remember, 'twas my first essay in arms,
The sooner then you will forgive this act.)
To test what soldiers would report of me,
For truth is always spoken of the dead;
But, when I learned, that couriers were sent
To Florence and my father—I resolved
To gladden those who might lament my fall.
Last night in haste and secret I arrived;
Yet, still disguised, an audience I obtained
With fair Imelda—she, my friends, may tell
Why the revelation was postponed till now.

Scene third reveals another conspiracy to kill Conradine. In the first scene of the third act, Conradine and Emelda are enjoying each other's society together. There is a gradual rise here in the beauty of the language. For example:

Conrad. Leave blood and battles to ambitious minds.
Emel. Who knows what's love?
Conrad. The world is full of it;
There's not a living thing but loves its kind,
And nothing is 'twixt heaven and earth so true.
Sweet ever-living love! and oh! as pure
As waking zephyrs, or as opening flowers!
Emel. It ne'er was praised by man so much before.
Conrad. It is great nature's first and sweet conception:
It is God's gift, to prove he thinks of man;
It is the link that binds us to Himself!
And in those hearts which have such cause as I,
To feel its heavenly power and influence,
It lives supreme: it rules in every thought,
It dwells in every vein—by day, by night,
In fiery youth and chilly age the same—
Heaven's first and best, and aye-enduring blessing!

They are interrupted by a forged letter, which calls the unsuspecting Conradine forth upon a long journey, when his life is again attempted, and his servant again slain in his stead. We think this similarity in the catastrophe a fault. The servant should not have been killed both times.

In the course of the second scene, the heart of the criminal hero is displayed with its dark workings and agonizing remorse.

Giord. Now I repent of all my deep designs,
And curse ambition, which has urged me on.
Could I recall my pristine state of mind,
With feelings pure and conscience undelied,
How gladly then would I lie down to die,
And leave dominion to the bolder soul.

The annexed is quiet and pensive, and does credit to the talents of the author.

Giord. I've often thought upon this world—and wondered!
What is ambition, why are men ambitious,
And what avail their petty hopes and fears,
Their brief authority and baseless pride?
A few years pass—then, where are the renowned?
Ask the dank charnel-house—no voice responds:
Ask the vain living—we may hear, they were,
But now are gone, and with them is entombed
Each aim and action of life's fretful hour:
The world has spared them, and regrets it not!
The mausoleum proud, and towering pile,
Crumble to dust; yea, all memorials die.

True to nature, however, notwithstanding his moralizing, he proceeds in his plans, like many people to be seen every day, who "know the right but still the wrong pursue," and the conspirators fix upon that very night as the period for the consummation of their nefarious designs.

Neri. Now art thou worthy of the coming glory.
Giord. Ay! here I cast all pity and remorse
To the infernal gods—and freight my mind
With strength, revenge, with cruelty and daring;
All of that manly and immortal cast,
Which now becomes the ambition of my soul;
From which, if I do wince, great Jove, forgive me!
Neri. Amen!
Giord. Speak out; by thee I will be ruled.
Neri. All are convened within the Sibyl's cave:
Let's thither go, and not a moment lose.
Giord. Ev'n fate's despite, I am resolved to dare.
Neri. To-night, to-night—our watch-word be, to-night.
Giord. To-night, to-night—to glory or to death.

Act fourth, scene first, shows the conspirators in assembly. Scene second, the servant of Conradine is brought back to the duke.

Duke. My son!
Col. A wounded man is hither brought,
So much with gaping stabs and blood disguised,
By none around has he been recognised.
Duke. Well, what of that? For such unruly times,
Is aught unnatural, although to nature
It speaks rebellion?
Col. Sire, he strangely talks;
In broken accents, and by gestures vague,
(For scarcely hath he breath to speak or live,)
Reveals all is not right.
Duke. So! lead us to him.
Col. Come, question quickly, else he may be dead.

In scene fourth, act fourth, Manari is discovered in chains. We shall copy this entire.

Man. Who could have thought that this would be my doom!
That I, who from green youth to wintry age
Had served the state, would in a dungeon close
A life of useful toil. No traitorous aim
Had ever being here. O that the world
Might, from my undeserved fate, behold
The ingratitude of man. Perchance I stood
Before the sun and an ambitious mind,
Who, for my place, had charged me with rebellion.
Hark! hark! the door unbars; some one approaches,
I know not what new doom awaits me now.

Enter the Duke.
Duke. Canst look us in the face?
Man. Through the dim light
That sickly lives within my prison-house,
I gaze on thee; yea, were the brilliant sun
Shedding his golden beams full on thy brow,
Should not avoid thine eye.
Duke. Is guilt so bold?
Man. I never wronged thee: by my hoary hairs,
And by name, which spotless was till now;
Yea, by the love I bore and bear thee still,
Before high heaven's all-searching eye, avouch
That in intent or act, I never wronged thee.
Duke. Not in reality—thy hireling failed.
Duke. Failed! what failed?
Man. Yes! and Conradine still lives.
Man. Upon my knees, protecting powers, I thank thee!
Now will my innocence be proved, for he
Can speak how I have loved him, and can tell
That I have doted on him as my son.

O, thanks, kind heaven! for now, indeed, there's hope,
I may not in my wintry age descend
Into the grave, stained with a traitor's name.
Where is he now?

Duke. Alas! we cannot say;
To learn from thee, has been our errand hither.
Man. From me! what do I know? I'm ignorant.
Duke. Thou know'st he scarcely had returned from war,
(Ere he could turn a thought to thee, or else,)—
When he set out to see his father die—
For such a hapless message was received—
And thither bound, he was in Arno's vale
This day attacked by some rebellious band:
Thank heaven! he 'scaped, although his servant fell.
Man. Returned from war! I attacked in Arno's vale!
Mysterious all! I do not comprehend.

Duke. Why did ye this?
Man. It was no act of mine.
I am amazed! Think, what converse had I,
Or could have had, with villains, here pent up?
As I am guiltless of the last attempt,
So was I also of the first, my liege.
Duke. [Aside.] Is this the face of guilt? it cannot be!
If thou didst not, who could have been so base?

Man. That I am guiltless, I again aver,
But who is guilty, there's no certain proof:
Yet, look to my accuser.
Duke. Ha! what's this?
Man. Yes, look to him.
Duke. What! know'st thou aught? Speak out.
Man. I say no more.
Duke. Unfold thy heart before us.
Man. 'Tis ever yours, yet nothing certain knows;
But I have watched him with a lynx-eye gaze,
And read his thoughts, and therefore do suspect.
Duke. Tush, tush! suspicion merely: not one charge
Canst bring against his sun-encircled name?
Think'st that aspersing him, will prove thee guiltless?

Man. I shall say nothing further of myself;
I am adjudge guilty by my peers,
And quietly yield unto my hapless fate.
Duke. [Aside.] More, and still more, our heart inclines to him.
Each word and look assures us he is wronged.
We are resolved. My ancient friend.
Man. My sire!
Duke. Doubts have this day so settled on our mind,
That we believe thou mayst be innocent:
On one condition, therefore, we will ope
Thy dungeon bars.
Man. Sire, what is this? name it.
Duke. That thou before the senate wilt appear,
To establish here, not plead, thy innocence,
Which, if thou fail to do, thy doom is death.
Man. Is there a chance that I may yet be free,
And stand acquitted of this horrid crime?
To live to see that day, were life enough!
Duke. Dost thou consent?
Man. With thanks and gladness, sire.
Duke. Jailor, attend!
Man. Bless thee, my revered monarch!

In the last scene of this act, the guilt of the hero is manifest. He is confronted before Manari, and the jailor who is about relating that he had been offered a bribe to kill his prisoner, by the villain Giordano, is stabbed by him before the face of the duke. This act closes in a confusion very natural, when we consider the manner in which the author has wrought up the plot.

The fifth act unravels all the mysteries—brings the lovers together—clears the duke of his enemies, and drags the malefactors to condign punishment. We make room for the following graphic description of a great city, on the eve of a revolution.

Col. A feeling strange prevails throughout the city;
Some move with stealthy step, and speak by signs;
Some whisper and start back, as if observed;
While others pale or redder, as they gaze
Upon the firmament, and watch the stars
Twinkling their fires as darkness thickens round.
Old men appear as if distressed in thought,
And to inquiring looks, show doubt and fear.
Women address a prayer to heaven, and sigh,
Then hug their infants closer to their breasts;
While children, seeing them, do weep and tremble.

The hero is killed in open fight by the noble Conradine, and the four lines with which the play closes, spoken by the duke over the body of the bleeding traitor, are really beautiful.

Duke. Lo! how ambition and unlawful pride
Have lost a stately bark.—Look where it lies—
Forced by the waves of passion's stormy sea,
Upon the shoals of crime—a worthless wreck.

We have made the foregoing extracts in order to let the work speak for itself. We think it creditable to the talents of Mr. Lawson. There is much to admire, and much to condemn. A more careful revision would have purified it from many defects. Of them we would instance the declaration made by the ambitious Giordano, in the second scene of the first act, in his soliloquy.

"Yes! I remember that an eaglet thrice
Forsook his lofty eyry in the sky,
To light upon my head, when but a boy,
And seemed delighted with its perching place."

If this is historical, we have nothing to say, but if it is merely the exuberance of the author's imagination which thus breaks out, regardless of strict probability, we must regret its admission. These and similar instances, however, are errors easily avoided in future compositions, and corrected in a future edition. We are glad to perceive the attention of literary men turned towards the regular drama, and therefore welcome every attempt to write a play as meriting encouragement.

We have to Giordano also, a neat and appropriate prologue, from Mr. William Leggett, of the Post, and a spirited epilogue by Mr. P. M. Wetmore. The volume is dedicated in the following words:—"To Prosper Montgomery Wetmore, as a record of his worth, as a tribute to his genius, and as a token of esteem, this tragedy is inscribed, by his friend, the author."

MEMOIRS OF THE DUCHESS D'ABRANTES.

A large octavo volume, under this title, neatly bound and printed, and from the Harpers, has afforded us several hours' amusement. They are by the duchess herself, (Madame Junot,) who declares—"I may fearlessly affirm, that of all the individuals who have written about Napoleon, few are so competent as myself to give a detailed account of him." These sketches, for they may be appropriately termed such, are full of grace and animation; with a feminine liveliness and untiring observation at many characters and events, of intense interest, during and subsequent to the period of the revolution. They possess claims upon attention which, we doubt not, will be universally allowed.

JOURNAL OF A NATURALIST.—We perceive that this well-conducted journal, which has been for some time printed in Boston, and which we have already mentioned in terms of commendation, is for the future to be published simultaneously at that city, New-York and Philadelphia. In accordance with this design, a circular has been issued, presenting the most favorable opinions respecting the high character of the work, from a number of eminent literary gentlemen, among whom we perceive our fellow-citizens, the Rev. J. F. Schröder, and Joseph Delafield, president of the New-York Lyceum of Natural History.

THE COOK'S OWN BOOK.—Containing two thousand six hundred receipts. Boston, published by Monroe and Francis. We have not, of course, perused this volume; but, in turning over the leaves, we certainly were struck with many pleasing reminiscences, with much to improve the taste and provoke the imagination. A hungry man would enjoy an equivocal satisfaction in wandering through the savory labyrinths which overspread these pages. How he would linger upon the introductory essays on boiling, baking, frying, broiling and roasting! Peruse the observations on asparagus and eggs, sausages royal, and Scotch dumplings! Young wives and housekeepers, get the "Cook's Own Book," and practise its precepts, as the best method of retaining the affections of your husbands and families.

POEMS BY THE LATE MRS. SMITH.—A friend has presented us with an exceedingly pretty edition of the poems of Mrs. S. Louisa P. Smith. This lady has never been properly appreciated beyond a certain private circle of warm admirers. She possessed a strong poetical talent, and we shall, at some future period, endeavor to do justice to her memory in a careful review of her book. Although it may be a melancholy one, no task can be more grateful than that of rescuing the name of a young, lovely, and amiable woman from unmerited oblivion.

THE CABINET CYCLOPEDIA.—A new volume of Dr. Lardner's invaluable publication is just out from the press of Carey and Lea. It comprises a treatise on the origin, progressive improvement, and present state of manufacture of porcelain and glass.

THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY.—The Harpers have recently published the first number of a theological library, comprehending the life of Wyckliff, by C. W. Le Bas, with a steel plate.

THE SHRINE.—The first number of a new monthly, conducted by a number of undergraduates in Amherst college, and published by J. S. and C. Adams, has just been issued. It is neatly printed, and filled for the most part with lively and well-written matter. The plan is laudable, exceedingly so, and modestly expressed. Let us warn these young gentlemen against the chronic disorder of nearly all periodicals, namely, puffing; and, doubtless, they will both improve and amuse themselves, and gratify their readers.

POETRY.—Burnett and Smith have published "The origin and course of Intemperance: a poem, in five cantos; by John Thomas." The work is ornamented with an engraving.

SELATHIEL.—This neat volume is just published by Peabody, and is dedicated by the author ("yet in his teens,") to his mother. In addition to the principal poem, we have a number of smaller pieces. A cursory glance has discovered to us several poetic thoughts which do credit to a juvenile author.

A SERIES OF MAPS FOR A GENERAL ATLAS, COMPILED BY DAVID H. BURR.—The third number of this publication has appeared. As it progresses it justly receives numerous complimentary notices from scholars and critics.

THE ALHAMBRA.—A review of these long-expected sketches has been unfortunately crowded out of our paper to-day. It shall appear in our next.

IN PRESS.—New Gazetteer of the United States of America. The editors of this forthcoming work are Mr. William Darby, of Maryland, and Mr. Theodore Dwight, of this city, both of whom have already afforded ample evidence of their peculiar competency for the task before them. This volume will be published by Mr. Hopkins, of Hartford. It will be handsomely printed, and will contain much information valuable to all classes of society, and which cannot be obtained elsewhere in a condensed form. A volume of Tales, by Mr. James Hall, of Illinois, is about being published at Albany, by Mr. Hanson Hall. We have observed the talent of Mr. J. Hall with great pleasure, and feel assured his book will do him honor.

LETTERS FROM CORRESPONDENTS.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

GENTLEMEN—As one of the vice-presidents commenced his speech, at the Irving dinner, I also say, "to whom shall I address myself? which way shall I look?" I have been waiting to see your paper take notice of a piece of ungallant negligence on the part of the gentlemen, which took place at the above-mentioned festival. You, however, are silent on the subject. So I must en take up the cudgels myself in the cause of my sex. I am one of those who believe women rank higher in the scale of creation than most men are willing to allow. In this country it is they who preserve the seeds of taste and literature. It is they who cherish the arts and courtesies which adorn and elevate the character of human nature. Who is it, gentlemen, that attend your exhibitions of paintings? The women. Who grace the theatre, on the performance of a fine opera? The women. Who are the soul of every delightful ball—every social party—every brilliant jam—every heavenly excursion to the country—every mellow summer day in the city? The women. Who shed happiness on your homes—soothing you in trouble—watching by you in sickness—inspiring you in health? Who but the women? Ye who have mothers, sisters, sweethearts, and wives, must acknowledge their sweet and potent influences? My opinion on this theme may be rather peculiar, but I shall adhere to it nevertheless; it is that but for the pure taste and feeling displayed by our sex, you would lose the last relics of elegance in all the walks of life. The gentlemen here have no literary taste. It is the women who buy your books, or make their fathers, husbands, and brothers buy them. Pray what would Mr. Irving have been but for the women? What would all the publishers be but for us? There would be no work of sentiment and fancy, no romances, no poems, no books at all, except now and then a treatise on mathematics—an essay on the steam-engine—or a pamphlet containing some stupid stuff about the tariff. Notwithstanding this palpable debt of gratitude due to us, I have to complain, that on the entertainment with which the author of the "Sketch Book" was complimented on his arrival in his native city, the ladies received no more notice—were honored with no more signs of recollection, than if they had never existed! Yet who more than they have hung enamored over the enchanting pictures of the master hand of Geoffrey Crayon, and upon the delineation of whose character has that hand been more successfully engaged? We shall endeavor to give our fortunate countryman and favorite author a welcome more appropriate to his genius. Please to let me add, Messrs. Editors, notwithstanding the commendation which you and many others have bestowed so lavishly on the style of this dinner, I think there were many other omissions among the toasts, and much less literary feeling prevailing, than befitted the occasion. Excuse me for saying, that after an attentive perusal of the account published in your paper, I am clearly of opinion that a proper literary dinner had never before been given in this city, and has never been given yet. For my part, I wonder they did not go into a committee of the whole, and discuss the tariff question at once—nominate some candidate for the presidency, and ask the new comer for his vote. With greater respect, gentlemen, for yourselves than your literary dinner, I am, &c. ELLEN B.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE P. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, JUNE 16, 1832.

The streets.—We have been so long, in common with our brother editors, accustomed to mention this subject only in a tone of complaint, that the rare opportunity of praise and congratulation must not be omitted. The committee of the board of assistants have handed in their report on the matter, accompanied by an ordinance, which has passed that board. The inspector of each ward is authorized to employ, twice a week, as many sweepers as may be required; and the masses of filth, which have been so long accumulating, are to be carried off in carts. We unite with a morning journal in the suggestion, that this operation be commenced at daybreak. This is of importance to the comfort of the citizens. We earnestly entreat that there will be no delay in carrying this plan into execution; although the middle of June is something late, under existing circumstances.

Ever-pointed pencils.—The most highly wrought and admirable specimen of the ever-pointed pencil, we have lately seen from the manufactory of William H. Hale (Woodwards and Hale) of Brooklyn. It is not only superior, we believe, to all others in usefulness, but exceeds in beauty any thing of the kind we ever saw. The point through which the lead passes is of steel, a decided improvement, rendering it more durable and complete; and the wreath of flowers and foliage entwined around the surface is really brilliant. We learn that the original inventor of this article is Mr. John J. Hawkins, civil engineer, and formerly a citizen of the United States. He sold the patent right for a trifling sum, to Mr. Mordant, without being aware how profitable it was destined to become. The Physiognotrace, and also the Manifold Letter Writer, were invented by the same individual. The great perfection to which this indispensable requisite to a gentleman's pocket, and a lady's desk, has been brought in the manufactory of Woodward and Hale is certainly creditable to those artisans, and to the country, which has long been far behind France and England in similar works of elegance and taste.

The Wurttemberg Biblical Library.—A literary friend has handed us the following. It is interesting to the biblical scholar. "In the king of Wurttemberg's library, there are more than four thousand different editions of the whole bible, or distinct parts of it, in European and foreign languages; of the former it contains—thirty-five upper German, eighteen Portuguese, fifteen Spanish, forty-three Italian, two hundred and ninety French, one Rhetian, one hundred and fifteen Saxon, two hundred and fifteen English, two hundred and seventy-four Dutch, one hundred and sixteen Danish, fourteen Icelandic, three Greenlandic, forty-five Swedish, six Finnish, three Lapponic, eight Russian, three Croatian, twenty-one Bohemian, ten Wendish, twenty Polish, six Lithuanian, seven Lettonian, four Esthonian, seven Hungarian, five Welsh, one Irish, and one Contabarian, or Base."

Foreign items.—A London paper of the fifth ultimo states, that the Rev. C. C. Colton, the author of Lacon, lately put a period to his existence, at Fontainebleau. The dread of undergoing a surgical operation, is the cause assigned for committing this melancholy act.

The cholera has greatly abated in Paris. There were but forty-eight deaths during the twenty-four hours ending at midnight on the seventh ultimo, and thirty-five on the preceding day. It continued its ravages, however, in the provinces.

A letter, dated tenth of April, from Havre, written by a respectable commercial house there, has a postscript which says, "We just learn that young Napoleon, the duke de Reichstadt, is dead."

The following strange occurrence has taken place at Champignolles, France. An inhabitant of the village having dug a hole to entrap a wolf, put upon it a live goose, as a bait for the voracious animal. Another inhabitant, on perceiving the fluttering goose at a distance, approached it, and fell into the ditch, which was eight feet deep, the sides being cut out so as to form an inverted cone. He vainly attempted to get out, and was patiently waiting for the return of day. But he had not waited long when something very heavy fell upon his shoulders. This was a wolf attracted by the bait. The fright of the man may be easily imagined; that of the wolf was equally great, for he immediately got into a corner whence he did not stir all night. When the day appeared, the man who had made the trap came up for his prey, and was not a little surprised to find his two prisoners. The man was taken out more dead than alive. No forbearance was shown to the wolf, who was killed for his forbearance during the night.

Poor Tray!—The annexed appears in one of the daily journals. What can it mean? Is it a hoax—a fable—or an allegory? We sincerely hope, for the sake of our fraternity, that it is not literally true. "A gentleman called at our office on Saturday morning with a dog-collar he had just caused to be filed off the neck of a fine terrier dog, which, while harmlessly passing the office of the Journal of Commerce, was killed by one of the editors, Mr. Hale, with a club he snatched from a cart standing by."

Western poetry.—Here are several verses from the Illinois Patriot, quite entitled to a place in our columns, and also in the memory of the reader. We make no apology for presenting them. They are one example, among many others which have lately met our view, of the great talent existing among our western brethren.

THE EMIGRANT.

My native hills! far, far away,
Your tops in living green are bright;
And meadow, glade, and forest gray,
Bask in the long, long summer light;
And blossoms still are gaily set
By shaded fount and rivulet.
Oh, that these feet again might tread
The slopes around my native home,
With grass and mingled blossoms spread;
Where cool the western breezes come,
To fan the fainting traveller's brow—
Alas! I almost feel them now.
Would that my eyes again might see
Those planted fields and forests deep—
The tall grass waving like a sea—
The white flocks scattered o'er the steep—
The dashing brooks—and o'er them bent
The high and boundless firmament.
Fair are the scenes that round me lie,
Bright shines the glad and glorious sun,
And sweetly crimsoned is the sky
At twilight when the day is done;
And the same stars look down at even,
That glitter in my native heaven.
On wide savannahs, round me spread,
A thousand blossoms meet mine eye;
The red rose meekly bows its head,
As balmy winds go dancing by;
And wild deer on the green bluffs play,
That rise in dimness far away.
Majestic are these streams, that glide
O'er shadowed by continuous wood,
Save where the lone glade opens wide,
Where erst the Indian hamlet stood;
But sweeter streams, with sweeter song,
In home's green valley glide along.
And there, when summer's heaven is clear,
Sweet voices echo through the air;
For children's feet press softly near,
And joyous hearts are beating there,
While I afar from home and rest,
Thread the vast rivers of the west.
Oft, in my dreams, before me rise
Fair visions of those scenes so dear—
The cottage home, the vale, the skies;
And rippling murmurs greet mine ear,
Like sound of unseen brook, that falls
Through the long mine's unlighted halls.
As down the deep Ohio's stream
We glide before the whispering wind,
Though all is lovely as a dream,
My wandering thoughts still turn behind—
Turn to the loved, the blessed shore,
Where dwell the friends I meet no more.

I'LL ONLY HEAR THE WORD FAREWELL.

A BALLAD—COMPOSED BY JOHN BARNETT—THE WORDS BY T. H. BALLY.—FROM THE MUSICAL RIJOU, FOR 1832.

ANDANTINO MOLTO ANIMATO.

I'll on-ly hear the word fare-well, I will not now be told, That when you come a-gain, you'll bring A store of gems and gold. To o-ther who love you less, That pro-mise you may tell; At such a mo-ment let me hear That one sad word, fare-well! At such a mo-ment let me hear That one sad word, fare-well!

SECOND VERSE.

Yes, breathe no other word but that,
Unless it be the vow
That promises a safe return,
With love as fond as now.
Say you'll be true, though in the halls
Of splendor you may dwell;
Oh! let me hear you tell me this—
Or only say—farewell!

MISCELLANY.

LOGAN.—An old officer of the United States' army, who, soon after the close of the revolutionary war, was ordered to make surveys of the country watered by the Alleghany river, informed me that Logan's nephew, a remarkably fine young Indian, dined with him one day in his tent, and that he asked him what became of Logan. "I killed him," was the reply. "Why did you kill him?" "The nation ordered it." "For what reason?" "He was too great a man to live; he talked so well, that although the whole nation had intended to put any plan in execution, yet, if Logan did not approve of it, he would soon gain a majority in favor of his opinions." "Was he not, then, generally in the right?" "Often; but his influence divided the nation too much." "Why did they choose you to put him to death?" "If any one else had done it, I would certainly have killed him: I, who am his nephew, shall inherit his greatness." "Will they not, then, kill you also?" "Yes; and when I become as great a man as Logan," (laying his hand on his breast with dignity,) "I shall be content to die!" He added, that he shot him near the Alleghany river. "When informed of the resolution of the council of his nation, Logan stopped his horse, drew himself up in an attitude of great dignity, and received the fatal ball without a murmur.—Vigne's Six Months in America.

SALE OF LITERARY WORKS.—A contemporary print alludes to the great sale of the Waverley novels, and of Lord Byron's works, as being almost unprecedented. Two or three other publications, however, might be mentioned, which have equalled, if not surpassed them, in point of number. As a single instance, we might mention "Washington Irving's Sketch Book," of which we have the best authority for believing that not less than twenty-five thousand copies have been sold up to the present time; and we believe that from the new Sketch Book which is forthcoming from the same author, the publishers calculate, allowing for the altered state of the times, on a sale of twenty thousand.—London Globe.

A CHILD KILLED BY A RAT.—An inquest was lately held at Ecclesfield, England, on view of the body of an infant about seven months old, which had met with its death in the following most extraordinary manner:—It appeared in evidence, that between one and two o'clock in the morning, John Nicholson and his wife went to bed with their twin children Mathew and Mark, at their dwelling-house, in Rotten-row, one of the infants sleeping in the same bed with the father and mother, and the other in a bed adjoining, in the same room. Near three o'clock in the morning the mother waked her husband, and asked him if it did not rain, as she thought she heard something drop. After listening awhile, she fancied she heard a rat muttering, or scraping, as if in the meal box. The husband immediately got up, and heard a rat run across the floor and down stairs, and on obtaining a light, discovered that the greater part of the left cheek of his child (Mark) had been much lacerated, and nearly all eaten away. The infant survived little more than an hour. Mr. Shearman, surgeon, of Rotherham, was examined, and he was decidedly of opinion that the injuries received by the child were sufficient to procure death, and the jury returned a verdict accordingly.—York Courant.

GOETHE.—A medal in memory of Goëthe has been struck in Germany. The principal side represents the image of Goëthe crowned with laurel, and bearing this inscription—"Goethe Nat. D. XXXI. Aug. MDCCCXXXIX." The other side presents the apotheosis of the poet; a swan bears him on its wings to the starry circle, to which the poet's eyes and arms are directed. Below are these words: "Ad astra rediit D. XXII. Mart. MDCCCXXXII."

LOVE.

There's a love which, born
In early days, lives on through silent years,
Nor ever shines but in the hour of sorrow,
When it shows brightest—like the trembling light
Of a clear sunbeam, breaking o'er the face
Of the wild waters in their hours of warfare.

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE ALHAMBRA.

A SERIES OF TALES AND SKETCHES OF THE MOORS AND SPANIARDS, BY THE AUTHOR OF THE SKETCH BOOK.*

Most people are disappointed, at the first glance of the falls of Niagara. They have so long heard of them as an immense wonder; they have pictured to themselves a stupendous mass pouring from the clouds upon the shaking earth; and, extraordinary and sublime as the scene actually is, they find it tame and common-place, when compared with the exaggerated image of their fancy. All greatness, and beauty, and skill, of every description, which have been long previously talked of, produce, in the same way, inadequate impressions on many people. If Demosthenes could be brought among us by a miracle, he would not come up to our pre-existing opinion. If Venus herself were once more to rise from the deep, she would, ten chances to one, be eclipsed by some Broadway belle, with bishop sleeves, and a jewel on her forehead. In the same way, a popular writer has a serious disadvantage to contend against in those unmeaning and vague expectations elicited by a brilliant fame; and we should not be surprised to learn, that many individuals have perused the volumes now under consideration, without that glow of delight—those bursts of laughter—that soft tenderness, into which one is surprised by a sudden gleam of wit, or an unexpected touch of pathos. He who writes with chasteness and simplicity, will fail to arrest the admiration of many a reader. Some pass over his unobtrusive charms, either from carelessness, or want of taste, as they would over the modest, but exquisitely beautiful flowers which gem the meadow, eclipsed by the glare of others more gaudy, but less fragrant and lovely. How many prefer the striking powers of Mrs. Radcliff to the simple nature, wit, and wisdom of Addison. Such will find little to admire in these pages. The world in this, as well as in many other respects, is unreasonable. It is, in a measure, injurious to a literary reputation, for a writer to produce a very perfect and popular composition. The "Pleasures of Hope" was the death of Mr. Campbell, and Mr. Moore was never thoroughly convalescent from the effects of Lallah Rookh. Walter Scott survived his superb poetry only by energetically entering upon an entirely new and uncultivated field where he got along tolerably well, till he had the misfortune to produce Ivanhoe, from which he survived only to lead a lingering and unequal career. Even Geoffrey Crayon, is something of a valetudinarian in these respects. His Sketch Book, and Bracebridge Hall, are the greatest enemies his future productions will probably ever meet; and we have every reason to fear that his Columbus has put an end to hopes of his succeeding hereafter in the department of history.

Yet the tales of the Alhambra are brilliant and striking, told with the most delightful grace of language, and addressed to the imagination of all classes. The preliminary sketches, relating the author's ramblings over Spain, his approach to the palace, from which the volumes derive their title, his drawings of character, his minute household observations, his moonlight thoughts on that interesting scene, his reveries from the various points of prospect, are, in our estimation, really delicious. Their very familiar and easy simplicity makes them so. They are impressed in every page, every line, every word, with the reality of truth and the glow of nature. They are evidently no inventions, but transcripts. His scenes stretch away before you; his people move, look, and walk, with an individuality and a force only to be produced by the hand of a master. Indeed, these opening pages are full of those delightfully graphic and pleasing delineations, peculiar to this author, and worthy of the best parts of the Sketch Book. The want of nationality is balanced by the richness of their historical associations; some of these will make the heart of the student beat, as he sits in his narrow and obscure chamber, tied down, peradventure, forever, to one single spot of the globe. Nothing can exceed the pleasure with which we accompany the author in his peregrinations. We are no half-way admirer of the former writings of Crayon, Knickerbocker, and Jonathan Old Style. We have been led by the same warm and gentle heart, the same refined and cultivated mind, the same soft and melting, yet disciplined imagination for many a year long gone by. We have been with him in the pit of our theatre, through the crooked lanes and antiquated Dutch houses of our town, along the windings of the blue Hudson, and among the luxuriant valleys and heaving hills, which deepen away and swell up from her emerald banks. We have followed, delighted observers, in the train of his Dutch heroes, on their sublime and warlike expeditions; and we have been ushered, by his welcome and potent rod, into many a rich and mellow and melancholy scene in "merry England;" by her ancient piles, her meandering rivers, her magnificent palaces, and gardens: now, indeed it is pleasant to keep still onward with such a companion, over distant and more strange scenes, to the banks of the streams of Spain; by her mountains, topped with silver; to her old cities and romantic towers. We are there actually, while reading the Alhambra. We see the summit of the Sierra Nevada; we hear the rills and fountains playing through the palace; we see the moon, pouring her floods of light into every court and hall and ruined decoration; and we are surprised to perceive what strong impressions are made on us, and by how few words. We are charmed, completely, to follow him in his quiet observations through those lofty and dilapidated towers; and to be so well beguiled by the flowing fancies which gleam along his pages; and by that continual and sweet play of all the most delicate and beautiful lights and shades of pathos and humor. He is as fresh as ever in his feelings. He looks upon the wonders around him with the enthusiastic ardor of a glowing boy.

There is not a string in his soul but is tuned for the true harmony of poetry. It still vibrates responsive to every passing impression, to every moral or natural beauty. Indeed his perceptions of nature and the world, which we were prepared to find blunted by travel and years, are yet alive in all their pristine vigor, and are exercised with a grace and a discrimination peculiar to himself, upon every golden sunset—every dim mountain-top—every light incident of real life. Who but he could have so wrought up the trifle of the pigeon. There is another remark to be made, en passant, on our author. One cannot help smiling at the right hearty enthusiasm with which he rouses himself to paint every pretty woman he meets. It is positively delightful to come suddenly, (as we continually do, by the way,) upon one of his "plump little black-eyed Andalusian damsels," with her "bright looks and cheerful disposition;" or some other rosy cheeked maiden, with dark eyes, and round and pleasant form. When he lays hold of such an one, he does it with a downright sincerity, and an outbreathing of gladness and spirit, which actually do our heart good, and he never lets her loose without bestowing upon her such a list of sweet adjectives as refresh our ideas most wonderfully.

We have selected below several extracts, illustrative of these observations. The reader must admire them as the perfection of refined and elegant writing. He will not find a word out of place—a deficiency, or a superfluity. He will find imagination chastened by taste—humor purified by delicacy, and blended with pathos. In perusing these volumes, many will have smiles on their lips, and tears in their eyes, and in their hearts will be an increased pride, that our humble literature can quote such a writer, as a sufficient comment on the baseness of vagabond and venal bookmakers, who at once slander our country and disgrace their own.

We confess the error mentioned below. Spanish scenery has generally figured differently in poems and romances.

The interior scenery of Spain.

"Many are apt to picture Spain to their imaginations as a soft southern region decked out with all the luxuriant charms of voluptuous Italy. On the contrary, though there are exceptions in some of the maritime provinces, yet, for the greater part, it is a stern, melancholy country, with rugged mountains and long, naked, sweeping plains, destitute of trees, and invariably silent and lonesome, partaking of the savage and solitary character of Africa. What adds to this silence and loneliness, is the absence of singing birds, a natural consequence of the want of groves and hedges. The vulture and eagle are seen wheeling about the mountain cliffs and soaring over the plains, and groups of shy bustards stalk about the heaths; but the myriads of smaller birds, which animate the whole face of other countries, are met with in but few provinces of Spain, and in them chiefly among the orchards and gardens which surround the habitations of man. * * * * *

"But though a great part of Spain is deficient in the garniture of groves and forests, and the softer charms of ornamental cultivation, yet its scenery has something of a high and lofty character to compensate the want. It partakes something of the attributes of its people, and I think that I better understand the proud, hardy, frugal and abstemious Spaniard, his manly defiance of hardships, and contempt of effeminate indulgences, since I have seen the country he inhabits."

"There is something, too, in the sternly simple features of the Spanish landscape, that impresses on the soul a feeling of sublimity. The immense plains of the Castiles and La Mancha, extending as far as the eye can reach, derive an interest from their very nakedness and immensity, and have something of the solemn grandeur of the ocean." * * * * *

A graphic description of Spanish travelling. How grateful should be the citizens of our peaceful country that they may wander from Maine to Mexico unarmed and fearless.

The muleteer.

"The muleteer is the general medium of traffic, and the legiti-mate wanderer of the land, traversing the Peninsula from the Pyrenees and the Asturias, to the Alpujarras, the Serran de Ronda, and even to the gates of Gibraltar. He lives frugally and hardily; his alforjas (or saddle bags,) of coarse cloth, hold his scanty stock of provisions; a leathern bottle hanging at his saddle-bow, contains wine or water for a supply across barren mountains, and thirsty plains; a mule cloth spread upon the ground is his bed at night, and his pack-saddle is his pillow. His low but clear-voiced and sinewy form betokens strength; his complexion is dark and sun-burnt; his eye resolute, but quiet in its expression, except when kindled by sudden emotion; his demeanour is frank, manly, and courteous, and he never passes you without a grave salutation—"Dios guarda a usted!"—"Vay usted con Dios, caballero!"—"God guard you!"—"God be with you, cavalier!"

"As these men have often their whole fortune at stake upon the burden of their mules, they have their weapons at hand, slung to their saddles, and ready to be snatched down for desperate defence. But their united numbers render them secure against petty bands of marauders, and the solitary bandalero, armed to the teeth, and mounted on his Andalusian steed, hovers about them, like a pirate about a merchant convoy, without daring to make an assault."

There is a constant propensity in our author to illustrate his subject with some humorous stroke, which delights the reader, while it adds force to the picture. How perfectly Irving is the mule as described below, "who seems to listen with infinite gravity" to the drawing cadence of his rider.

Singing and improvising.

"The Spanish muleteer has an inexhaustible stock of songs and ballads, with which to beguile his incessant wayfaring. The airs are rude and simple, consisting of but few inflexions. These he chants forth with a loud voice, and long drawing cadence, seated sideways on his mule, who seems to listen with infinite gravity, and to keep time with his paces, to the tune. The couplets thus chanted are often old traditional romances about the Moors; or some legend of a saint; or some love ditty; or, what is still more frequent, some ballad about a bold contrabandista, or hardy bandelero; for the smuggler and the robber are poetical heroes among the common people of Spain. Often the song of the muleteer is composed at the instant, and relates to some local scene, or some incident of the journey. This talent of singing and improvising is frequent in Spain, and is said to have been inherited from the Moors. There is something wildly pleasing in listening to these ditties among the rude and lonely scenes they illustrate, accompanied as they are, by the occasional jingle of the mule-bell.

"It has a most picturesque effect, also, to meet a train of muleteers in some mountain pass. First you hear the bells of the leading mules, breaking with their simple melody the stillness of the airy height; or, perhaps, the voice of the muleteer admonishing some tardy or wandering animal, or chanting, at the full stretch of his lungs, some traditional ballad. At length you see the mules slowly winding along the craggy defile, sometimes descending precipitous cliffs, so as to present themselves in full relief against the sky, sometimes toiling up the deep arid chasms below you. As they approach, you descry their gay decorations of worsted tufts, tassels, and saddle cloths; while, as they pass by, the ever ready trabuco, slung behind their packs and saddles, give a hint of the insecurity of the road."

A forcible sketch of the strange and interesting objects which arrest the attention of the traveller in the kingdom of Granada.

Kingdom of Granada.

"The ancient kingdom of Granada into which we are about to penetrate, is one of the most mountainous regions of Spain. Vast sierras or chains of mountains, destitute of shrub or tree, and mottled with variegated marbles and granites, elevate their sun-burnt summits against a deep blue sky, yet in their rugged bosoms lie engulfed the most verdant and fertile valley, where the desert and the garden strive for mastery, and the very rock, as it were, compelled to yield the fig, the orange, and the citron, and to blossom with the myrtle and the rose.

"In the wild passes of these mountains, the sight of wall-d towns and villages built like eagles' nests among the cliffs, and surrounded by Moorish battlements, or of ruined watch-towers perched on lofty peaks, carry the mind back to the chivalrous days of Christian and Moslem warfare, and to the romantic struggle for the conquest of Granada. In traversing their lofty sierras, the traveller is often obliged to alight and lead his horse up and down the steep and jagged ascents and descents, resembling the broken steps of a staircase. Sometimes the road winds along dizzy precipices, without parapet to guard him from the gulfs below, and then will plunge down steep and dark and dangerous declivities. Sometimes it struggles through rugged barrancos, or ravines, worn by water torrents; the obscure paths of the contrabandista, while ever and anon, the ominous cross, the memento of robbery and murder, erected on a mound of stones at some lonely part of the road, admonishes the traveller that he is among the haunts of banditti; perhaps, that very moment, under the eye of some lurking bandalero. Sometimes, in winding through the narrow valleys, he is startled by a hoarse bellowing, and beholds above him, on some green fold of the mountain side, a herd of fierce Andalusian bulls, destined for the combat of the arena. There is something awful in the contemplation of these terrific animals, clothed with tremendous strength, and ranging

There is a good deal of characteristic humor in the author's bestowing upon their guide the appropriate name of Sancho. With the true spirit of enjoyment they started for the Alhambra.

Travelling through Spain.

"We set out on our journey with a genuine disposition to be pleased; with such a disposition, what a country is Spain for a traveler, where the most miserable inn is as full of adventure as an enchanted castle, and every meal is in itself an achievement! Let others repine at the lack of turnpike roads and sumptuous hotels, and all the elaborate comforts of a country cultivated into tameness and common-place, but give me the rude mountain scramble, the roving hap-hazard wayfaring, the frank, hospitable, though half wild manners, that give such a true game flavor to romantic Spain!"

Here is a pretty and dramatic scene for a painter.

Spanish Inn.

"While we were supping with our Andalusian friend, we heard the notes of a guitar and the clink of castanets, and presently, a chorus of voices, singing a popular air. In fact, mine host had gathered together the amateur singers and musicians and the rustic belles of the neighborhood, and on going forth, the court-yard of the inn presented a scene of true Spanish festivity. We took our seats with mine host and hostess and the commander of the patrol, under the archway of the court. The guitar passed from hand to hand, but a jovial shoemaker was the Orpheus of the place. He was a pleasant looking fellow, with huge black whiskers and a roguish eye. His sleeves were rolled up to his elbows; he touched the guitar with masterly skill, and sung little amorous ditties with an expressive leer at the women, with whom he was evidently a favorite. He afterwards danced a fandango with a buxom Andalusian damsel, to the great delight of the spectators. But none of the females present could compare with mine host's pretty daughter Josefa, who had slipped away and made her toilette for the occasion, and had adorned her head with roses; and also distinguished herself in a bolero with a handsome young dragoon."

They pursue their journey in a wandering, romantic style, worthy of Don Quixote, and here we have a Spanish guide and dinner.

"What luxurious noontide repasts have we made on the green sward by the side of a brook or fountain under a shady tree, and then what delicious siestas on our cloaks spread out on the herbage!"

"We paused one day at noon, for a repast of the kind. It was in a pleasant little green meadow, surrounded by hills covered with olive trees. Our cloaks were spread on the grass under an elm tree, by the side of a babbling rivulet; our horses were tethered where they might crop the herbage, and Sancho produced his alforjas with an air of triumph. They contained the contributions of four day's journeying, but had been signally enriched by the foraging of the previous evening, in a plentiful inn at Antequera. Our Squire drew forth the heterogeneous contents one by one, and they seemed to have no end. First came forth a shoulder of roasted kid, very little the worse for wear, then an entire partridge, then a great morsel of salted codfish wrapped in paper, then the residue of a ham, then the half of a pullet, together with several rolls of bread and a rabble route of oranges, figs, raisins, and walnuts. His beta also had been recruited with some excellent wine of Malaga. At every fresh apparition from his larder, he could enjoy our ludicrous surprise, throwing himself back on the grass and shouting with laughter."

"Nothing pleased this simple-hearted varlet more than to be compared, for his devotion to the trencher, to the renowned squire of Don Quixote. He was well versed in the history of the Don, and, like most of the common people of Spain, he firmly believed it to be a true history."

"All that, however, happened a long time ago, Signor," said he to me, one day, with an inquiring look.

"A very long time," was the reply.

"I dare say, more than a thousand years?"—still looking dubiously.

"I dare say? not less."

"The squire was satisfied."

In the midst of their merry-making they are overtaken by a mendicant, who drank their wine, but refused their solicitations to eat, saying, "No, signors, the wine I drink or leave; but the bread I must take home to share with my family." We have afterwards an elegant description of this individual, quite expressive of the national character.

Spanish beggar.

"Still he was not a regular mendicant, it was not until recently that want had driven him to this degradation, and he gave a touching picture of the struggle between hunger and pride, when abject destitution first came upon him. He was returning from Malaga, without money; he had not tasted food for some time, and was crossing one of the great plains of Spain, where there were but few habitations. When almost dead with hunger, he applied at the door of a venta, or country inn. 'Perdona usted per Dios hermano!' (excuse us, brother, for God's sake!) was the reply;—the usual mode in Spain of refusing a beggar. 'I turned away,' said he, 'with shame greater than my hunger, for my heart was yet too proud. I came to a river with high banks and deep rapid current, and felt tempted to throw myself in; what should such an old worthless, wretched man as I live for? But, when I was on the brink of the current, I thought on the blessed Virgin, and turned away. I travelled on until I saw a country seat, at a little distance from the road, and entered the outer gate of the court-yard. The door was shut, but there were two young signoras at a window. I approached, and begged; 'Perdona usted per Dios hermano!' (excuse us brother, for God's sake!) and the window closed. I crept out of the court-yard; but hunger overcame me, and my heart gave way. I thought my hour was at hand. So I laid myself down at the gate, commended myself to the holy Virgin, and covered my head to die. In a little while afterwards, the master of the house came home. Seeing me lie at his gate, he uncovered my head, had pity on my gray hairs, took me into his house and gave me food. So Signors, you see that we should always put confidence in the protection of the Virgin."

At Loxa, the author again finds a motley groupe, which he paints with his usual felicity. The reader will smile at the portrait of the braggadocio with which this extract closes.

Inn at Loxa.

"Our inn was suited to the place. It was kept by a young, handsome, Andalusian widow, whose trim busquina of black silk fringed with bugles, set off the play of a graceful form, and round pliant limbs. Her step was firm and elastic, her dark eye was full of fire, and the coquetry of her air, and varied ornaments of her person showed that she was accustomed to be admired."

"She was well matched by a brother, nearly about her own age; they were perfect models of the Andalusian majo and maja. He was tall, vigorous, and well formed, with a clear, olive complexion, a dark beaming eye, and curling, chestnut whiskers, that met under his chin. He was gallantly dressed in a short green velvet jacket, fitted to his shape, profusely decorated with silver buttons, with a white handkerchief in each pocket. He had breeches of the same, with rows of buttons from the hips to the knees; a pink silk handkerchief round his neck, gathered through a ring, on the bosom of a neatly plaited shirt; a sash round the waist to match; botinas or spatterdashies of the finest russet leather, elegantly worked and open at the calves to show his stockings, and russet shoes setting off a well shaped foot."

"As he was standing at the door, a horseman rode up and entered into low and earnest conversation with him. He was dressed in similar style, and almost with equal finery. A man about thirty, square built, with strong Roman features, handsome, though slightly pitted with the small-pox, with a free, bold, and somewhat daring air. His powerful black horse was decorated with tassels and fanciful trappings, and a couple of broad-mouthed blunderbusses hung behind the saddle. He had the air of those contrabandistas that I have seen in the mountains of Ronda, and, evidently, had a good understanding with the brother of mine hostess; nay, if I mistake not, he is a favorite admirer of the widow. In fact, the whole inn, and its inmates had something of a contrabandista aspect, and the blunderbuss stood in a corner beside the guitar. The horseman I have mentioned, passed his evening in the posada, and sang several bold mountain romances with great spirit."

"As we were at supper, two poor Asturians put in in distress, begging food and a night's lodging. They had been waylaid by robbers, as they came from a fair among the mountains, robbed of a horse, which carried all their stock in trade, stripped of their money and most of their apparel, beaten for having offered resistance, and left almost naked in the road. My companion, with a prompt generosity, natural to him, ordered them a supper and a bed, and gave them a supply of money to help them forward towards their home."

"As the evening advanced, the dramatis personæ thickened. A large man about sixty years of age, of powerful frame, came strolling in, to gossip with mine hostess. He was dressed in the ordinary Andalusian costume, but had a huge sabre tucked under his arm, wore large mustaches and had something of a lofty swaggering air. Every one seemed to regard him with great deference."

"Our man, Sancho, whispered to us that he was Don Ventura Rodriguez, the hero and champion of Loxa, famous for his prowess and the strength of his arm. In the time of the French invasion, he surprised six troopers who were asleep. He first secured their horses, then attacked them with his sabre; killed some, and took the rest prisoners. For this exploit, the king allows him a peçeta, (the fifth of a duro, or dollar,) per day, and has dignified him with the title of Don."

"I was amused to notice his swelling language and demeanor. He was evidently a thorough Andalusian, boastful as he was brave. His sabre was always in his hand, or under his arm. He carries it always about with him, as a child does a doll, calls it his Santa Teresa, and says, that when he draws it, 'tembla la tierra!' (the earth trembles!)"

After journeying some time in this way, our wanderers—(the author, with his friend David Wilkie, Esq. to whom the volumes are dedicated,) at length reach Granada.

Approach to Granada.

"Journeying in this manner, we at length emerged from the mountains, and entered upon the beautiful Vega of Granada. Here we took our last mid-day's repast under a grove of olive trees, on the borders of a rivulet, with the old Moorish capital in the distance, dominated by the ruddy towers of the Alhambra, while far above it the snowy summits of the Sierra Nevada shone like silver. The day was without a cloud, and the heat of the sun tempered by cool breezes from the mountains; after our repast, we spread our cloaks and took our last siesta, lulled by the humming of bees among the flowers, and the notes of the ringdoves from the neighboring olive trees. When the sultry hours were past, we resumed our journey, and after passing between hedges of aloes and Indian figs, and through a wilderness of gardens, arrived about sun-set at the gates of Granada."

They who are familiar with the writings of our author, will follow him impatiently, and be pleased to look in upon him and his

Guide through the Alhambra.

"At the gate were two or three rugged and superannuated soldiers dozing on a stone bench, the successors of the Zegris and the Abencerrages; while a tall, meagre varlet, whose rusty brown cloak was, evidently, intended to conceal the ragged state of his nether garments, was lounging in the sunshine, and gossiping with an ancient sentinel, on duty. He joined us as we entered the gate, and offered his services to show us the fortress."

"I have a traveller's dislike to officious ciceroni, and did not altogether like the garb of the applicant:

"You are well acquainted with the place, I presume?"

"Ninguno mas—pues, señor, soy hijo de la Alhambra."

"(Nobody better—in fact, sir, I am a son of the Alhambra.)"

"The common Spaniards have certainly a most poetical way of expressing themselves—A son of the Alhambra! the appellation caught me at once; the very tattered garb of my new acquaintance assumed a dignity in my eyes. It was emblematic of the features of the place, and became the progeny of a ruin."

Spanish superstition.

"The great vestibule, or porch of the gate, is formed by an immense Arabian arch of the horse-shoe form, which springs to half the height of the tower. On the key-stone of this arch is engraven a gigantic hand. Within the vestibule, on the key-stone of the portal, is engraven, in like manner, a gigantic key. Those who pretend to some knowledge of Mahometan symbols, affirm, that the hand is the emblem of doctrine, and the key, of faith; the latter, they add, was emblazoned on the standard of the Moslems when they subdued Andalusia, in opposition to the Christian emblem of the cross. A different explanation, however, was given by the legitimate 'son of the Alhambra,' and one more in unison with the notions of the common people, who attach something of mystery and magic to every thing Moorish, and have all kinds of superstitions connected with this old Moslem fortress."

According to Mateo, it was a tradition handed down from the oldest inhabitants, and which he had from his father and grandfather, that the hand and key were magical devices on which the fate of the Alhambra depended. The Moorish king who built it was a great magician, and, as some believed, had sold himself to the devil, and had laid the whole fortress under a magic spell. By this means it had remained standing for several hundred years, in defiance of storms and earthquakes, while almost all the other buildings of the Moors had fallen to ruin and disappeared. This spell, the tradition went on to say, would last until the hand, on the outer arch should reach down and grasp the key, when the whole pile would tumble to pieces, and all the treasures buried beneath it by the Moors, would be revealed."

Of course the spot is redolent with historical, poetical and romantic meditations, and at every turn his eyes fall on scenes of the most striking interest and beauty. Among others, we take his picture of the Court of Lions in the Alhambra.

"From the lower end, we passed through a Moorish arch-way into the renowned Court of Lions. There is no part of the edifice that gives us a more complete idea of its original beauty and magnificence than this; for none has suffered so little from the ravages of time. In the centre stands the fountain famous in song and story. The alabaster basins still shed their diamond drops, and the twelve lions which support them, cast forth their crystal streams as in the days of Boabdil. The court is laid out in flower beds, and surrounded by light Arabian arcades of open filigree work, supported by slender pillars of white marble. The architecture, like that of all the other parts of the palace, is characterized by elegance, rather than grandeur, bespeaking a delicate and graceful taste, and a disposition to indolent enjoyment."

"When we look upon the fair tracery of the peristyles, and the apparently fragile fret-work of the walls, it is difficult to believe that so much has survived the wear and tear of centuries, the shocks of earthquakes, the violence of war, and the quiet, though no less baneful pilferings of the tasteful traveller. It is almost sufficient to excuse the popular tradition, that the whole is protected by a magic charm."

Here are paragraphs which may well raise envy in the bosom of a New-Yorker.

Streams and fountains of the palace.

"An abundant supply of water, brought from the mountains by old Moorish aqueducts, circulates throughout the palace, supplying its baths and fish-pools, sparkling in jets within its halls, or murmuring in channels along the marble pavements. When it has paid its tribute to the royal pile, and visited its gardens and pastures, it flows down the long avenue leading to the city, tinkling in rills, gushing in fountains, and maintaining a perpetual verdure in those groves that embower and beautify the whole hill of the Alhambra."

"Those, only, who have sojourned in the ardent climates of the South, can appreciate the delights of an abode combining the breezy coolness of the mountain with the freshness and verdure of the valley."

"While the city below pants with the noontide heat, and the parched Vega trembles to the eye, the delicate airs from the Sierra Nevada play through the lofty halls, bringing with them the sweetness of the surrounding gardens. Every thing invites to that indolent repose, the bliss of southern climes; and while the half shut eye looks out from shaded balconies upon the glittering landscape, the ear is lulled by the rustling of groves, and the murmur of running streams."

After describing the interior of the Alhambra, our author ascends the tower of Comares, in order to gain an idea of its vicinity.

Reveries on the summit of the Tower of Comares.

"The airy palace with its tall white towers and long arcades, which breast yon mountain, among pompous groves and hanging gardens, is the Generalife, a summer palace of the Moorish kings, to which they resorted during the sultry months, to enjoy a still more breezy region than that of the Alhambra. The naked summit of the height above it, where you behold some shapeless ruins, is the Silla del Moro, or seat of the Moor; so called from having been a retreat of the unfortunate Boabdil, during the time of an insurrection, where he seated himself and looked down mournfully upon his rebellious city."

"A murmuring sound of water now and then rises from the valley. It is from the aqueduct of yon Moorish mill, nearly at the foot of the hill. The avenue of trees beyond, is the Alameda, along the bank of the Darro, a favorite resort in evenings, and a rendezvous of lovers in the summer nights, when the guitar may be heard at a late hour from the benches along its walks. At present there are but a few loitering monks to be seen there, and a group of water-carriers from the fountain of Avellanos."

"You start! 'tis nothing but a hawk we have frightened from his nest. This old tower is a complete brooding-place for vagrant birds. The swallow and martlet abound in every chink and cranny, and circle about it the whole day long; while at night, when all other birds have gone to rest, the moping owl comes out of its lurking place, and utters its boding cry from the battlements. See how the hawk we have dislodged sweeps away below us, skimming over the tops of the trees, and sailing up to ruins above the Generalife."

"Let us leave this side of the tower and turn our eyes to the west. Here you behold in the distance, a range of mountains bounding the Vega, the ancient barrier between Moslem Granada and the land of the christians. Among the heights you may still discern warrior towns, whose gray walls and battlements seem of a piece with the rocks on which they are built; while here and there is a solitary atalaya or watch-tower, mounted on some lofty point, and looking down as if it were from the sky, into the valleys on either side. It was down the defiles of these mountains, by the pass of Lope, that the christian armies descended into the Vega. It was round the base of yon gray and naked mountain, almost insulated from the rest, and stretching its bald rocky promontory into the bosom of the plain, that the invading squadrons would come bursting into view, with flaunting banners and the clangor of drums and trumpets. How changed is the scene! Instead of the glittering line of mailed warriors, we behold the patient train of the toiling muleteer, slowly moving along the skirts of the mountain.

"Behind that promontory is the eventful bridge of Pinos, renowned for many a bloody strife between Moors and Christians; but still more renowned as being the place where Columbus was overtaken and called back by the messenger of queen Isabella, just as he was departing in despair to carry his project of discovery to the court of France.

"Behold another place famous in the history of the discoverer; yon line of walls and towers, gleaming in the morning sun in the very centre of the Vega; the city of Santa Fe, built by the catholic sovereigns during the siege of Granada, after a conflagration had destroyed their camp. It was to these walls that Columbus was called back by the heroic queen, and within them the treaty was concluded that led to the discovery of the western world."

His reflections on viewing the distant peaks of the Sierra Nevada, are fraught with the spirit of poetry.

The Sierra Nevada.

"Now raise your eyes to the snowy summit of yon pile of mountains, shining like a white summer cloud on the blue sky. It is the Sierra Nevada, the pride and delight of Granada; the source of her cooling breezes and perpetual verdure, of her gushing fountains and perennial streams. It is this glorious pile of mountains that gives to Granada that combination of delights so rare in a southern city. The fresh vegetation, and the temperate airs of a northern climate, with the vivifying ardor of a tropical sun, and the cloudless azure of a southern sky. It is this aerial treasury of snow, which melting in proportion to the increase of the summer heat, send down rivulets and streams through every glen and gorge of the Alpuxarras, diffusing emerald verdure and fertility throughout a chain of happy and sequestered valleys.

"These mountains may well be called the glory of Granada. They dominate the whole extent of Andalusia, and may be seen from its most distant parts. The muleteer hails them as he views their frosty peaks from the sultry level of the plain; and the Spanish mariner on the deck of his bark, far, far off, on the bosom of the blue Mediterranean, watches them with a pensive eye, thinks of the beautiful Granada, and chants in low voice some old romance about the Moors."

Here is a paragraph worthy the richest and mellowest touches in the Sketch Book, and a true dash of Washington Irving.

Hall of Ambassadors.

"One of my favorite resorts is the balcony of the central window of the Hall of Ambassadors, in the lofty tower of Comares. I have just been seated there, enjoying the close of a long brilliant day. The sun, as he sank behind the purple mountains of Alhama, sent a stream of effulgence up the valley of the Darro, that spread a melancholy pomp over the ruddy towers of the Alhambra, while the Vega, covered with a slight sultry vapor that caught the setting ray, seemed spread out in the distance like a golden sea. Not a breath of air disturbed the stillness of the hour, and though the faint sound of music and merriment now and then arose from the gardens of the Darro, it but rendered more impressive the monumental silence of the pile which overshadowed me. It was one of those hours, and scenes in which memory asserts an almost magical power, and, like the evening sun beaming on these mouldering towers, sends back her retrospective rays to light up the glories of the past."

The annexed contains a forcible and poetic figure, worthy the author of Columbus.

The Moors.

"Potent and durable as was their dominion, we have no one distinct title by which to designate them. They were a nation, as it were, without a legitimate country or a name. A remote wave of the great Arabian inundation, east upon the shores of Europe, they seemed to have all the impetus of the first rush of the torrent. Their course of conquest from the rock of Gibraltar to the cliffs of the Pyrenees, was as rapid and brilliant as the Moslem victories of Syria and Egypt. Nay, had they not been checked on the plains of Tours, all France, all Europe, might have been overrun with the same facility as the empires of the east, and the crescent might at this day have glittered on the fanes of Paris and of London."

Our author now proceeds very much after the fashion of Bracebridge Hall, and lets us into all the pleasant matters around him. How little those obscure simple people who waited on him, suspected that they were sitting for their portraits before an immortal artist, and that they would actually form a family group, and be gazed on with delight by all the world, and posterity into the bargain? He soon discovers a pretty "plump little girl and a nephew," and that "a quiet courtship is going on." But he himself is soon plunged into an odd dilemma.

A Dilemma.

"With the good dame Antonio I have made a treaty, according to which, she furnishes me with board and lodging, while the merry-hearted little Dolores keeps my apartment in order, and officiates as handmaid at meal times. I have also at my command a tall, stuttering, yellow-haired lad, named Pepe, who works in the garden, and would fain have acted as valet, but in this he was forestalled by Mateo Ximenes, 'The son of the Alhambra.' This alert and officious wight has managed, somehow or other, to stick by me, ever since I first encountered him at the outer gate of the fortress, and to weave himself into all my plans, until he has fairly appointed and installed himself my valet, cicerone, guide, guard and historio-graphic esquire; and I have been obliged to improve the state of his wardrobe, that he may not disgrace his various functions, so that he has cast off his old brown mantle, as a snake does his skin, and now figures about the fortress with a smart Andalusian hat and jacket, to his infinite satisfaction, and the great astonishment of his comrades. The chief fault of honest Mateo is an over anxiety to be useful. Conscious of having foisted himself into my employ, and that my simple and quiet habits render his situation a sinecure, he is at his wit's end to devise modes of making himself important to my welfare. I am, in a manner, the victim of his officiousness; I cannot put my foot over the threshold of the palace to stroll about the fortress, but he is at my elbow to explain every thing I see, and if I venture to ramble among the surrounding hills, he insists upon attending me as a guard, though I vehemently suspect he would be more apt to trust to the length of his legs than the strength of his arms in case of attack. After all, however, the poor fellow is at times an amusing companion; he is simple-minded and of infinite good humor, with the loquacity and gossip of a village barber, and knows all the small talk of the place and its environs."

Is not this pretty?

Geoffrey Crayon in the Alhambra.

"Though fond of passing the greater part of my day alone, yet I occasionally repair in the evenings to the little domestic circle of Doña Antonia. This is generally held in an old Moorish chamber, that serves for kitchen as well as hall, a rude fire-place having been made in one corner, the smoke from which has discolored the walls, and almost obliterated the ancient arabesques. A window with a balcony overhanging the valley of the Darro, lets in the cool evening breeze, and here I take my frugal supper of fruit and milk, and mingle with the conversation of the family. There is a natural talent, or mother wit, as it is called, about the Spaniards, which renders them intellectual and agreeable companions, whatever may be their condition in life, or however imperfect may have been their education; add to this, they are never vulgar; nature has endowed them with an inherent dignity of spirit. The good Tia Antonio is a woman of strong and intelligent, though uncultivated mind, and the bright-eyed Dolores, though she has read but three or four books in the whole course of her life, has an engaging mixture of naiveté and good sense, and often surprises me by the pungency of her artless sallies. Sometimes the nephew entertains us by reading some old comedy of Chaldeon or Lope de Vega, to which he is evidently prompted by a desire to improve as well as amuse his cousin Dolores, though to his great mortification the little damsel generally falls asleep before the first act is completed."

We must give the next graceful little chapter entire. Ye who have never read it, read it; now ye who have, read it again.

The Truant.

"Since writing the foregoing pages, we have had a scene of petty tribulation in the Alhambra, which has thrown a cloud over the sunny countenance of Dolores. This little damsel has a female passion for pets of all kinds, from the superabundant kindness of her disposition. One of the ruined courts of the Alhambra is thronged with her favorites. A stately peacock and his hen seem to hold regal sway here, over pompous turkeys, querulous guinea-fowls, and a rabble rout of common cocks and hens. The great delight of Dolores, however, has for some time past been centered in a youthful pair of pigeons, who have lately entered into the holy state of wedlock, and who have even supplanted a tortoise-shell cat and kitten in her affections."

"As a tenement for them to commence housekeeping, she had fitted up a small chamber adjacent to the kitchen, the window of which looked into one of the quiet Moorish courts. Here they lived, in happy ignorance of any world beyond the court and its sunny roofs. In vain they aspired to soar above the battlements, or to mount to the summit of the towers. Their virtuous union was at length crowned by two spotless and milk-white eggs, to the great joy of their cherishing little mistress. Nothing could be more praiseworthy than the conduct of the young married folks on this interesting occasion. They took turns to sit upon the nest until the eggs were hatched, and while their callous progeny required warmth and shelter. While one thus staid at home, the other foraged abroad for food, and brought home abundant supplies."

"This scene of conjugal felicity has suddenly met with a reverse. Early this morning, as Dolores was feeding the male pigeon, she took a fancy to give him a peep at the great world. Opening a window, therefore, which looks down upon the valley of the Darro, she lunched him at once beyond the walls of the Alhambra. For the first time in his life the astonished bird had to try the full vigor of his wings. He swept down into the valley, and then rising upwards with the surge, soared almost to the very clouds. Never before had he risen to such a great height or experienced such delight in flying; and, like a young spend-thrift, just come to his estate, he seemed giddy with excess of liberty, and with the boundless field of action suddenly opened to him. For the whole day he has been circling about in capricious flights, from tower to tower, and from tree to tree. Every attempt has been made in vain to lure him back, by seat-ter grain upon the roofs: he seems to have lost all thought of home, of his tender helpmate, and his callow young. To add to the anxiety of Dolores, he has been joined by two palomas ladrones, or robber pigeons, whose instinct it is to entice wandering pigeons to their own dove-cotes. The fugitive, like many other thoughtless youths on their first lanching upon the world, seems quite fascinated with these knowing, but graceless, companions, who have undertaken to show him life, and introduce him to society. He has been soaring with them over all the roofs and steeples of Granada. A thunder-shower has passed over the city, but he has not sought his home; night has closed in, and still he comes not. To deepen the pathos of the affair, the female pigeon, after remaining several hours on the nest without being relieved, at length went forth to seek her recreant mate; but stayed away so long that the young ones perished for want of the warmth and shelter of the parent bosom."

"At a late hour in the evening, word was brought to Dolores that the truant bird had been seen upon the towers of the Generalife. Now, it so happens, that the administrador of that ancient palace has likewise a dove-cote, among the inmates of which are said to be two or three of these inveigling birds, the terror of all neighboring pigeon-fanciers. Dolores immediately concluded that the two feathered sharpers, who had been seen with her fugitive, were these bloods of the Generalife. A council of war was forthwith held in the chamber of Tia Antonia. The Generalife is a distinct jurisdiction from the Alhambra, and of course some punctilio, if not jealousy, exists between their custodians. It was determined, therefore, to send Pepe, the stuttering lad of the gardens, as ambassador to the administrador, requesting, that if such fugitive should be found in his dominions, he might be given up, as a subject of the Alhambra. Pepe departed, accordingly, on his diplomatic expedition, through the moonlight groves and avenues, but returned in an hour with the afflicting intelligence that no such bird was to be found in the dove-cote of the Generalife. The administrador, however, pledged his sovereign bird, that if such vagrant should appear there, even at midnight, he should instantly be arrested, and sent back prisoner to his little black-eyed mistress."

"Thus stands this melancholy affair, which has occasioned much distress throughout the palace, and has sent the inconsolable Dolores to a sleepless pillow."

"Sorrow endureth for a night," says the proverb, 'but joy ariseth in the morning.' The first object that met my eyes on leaving my room this morning was Dolores, with the truant pigeon in her hand, and her eyes sparkling with joy. He had appeared at an early hour on the battlements, hovering shyly about from roof to roof, but at length entered the window, and surrendered himself prisoner. He gained little credit, however, by his return, for the ravenous manner in which he devoured the food set before him showed that, like the prodigal son, he had been driven home by sheer famine. Dolores upbraided him for his faithless conduct, calling him all manner of vagrant names; though, woman-like, she fondled him at the same time to her bosom, and covered him with kisses. I observed, however, that she had taken care to clip his wings to prevent all future soarings; a precaution which I mention for the benefit of all those who have truant wives or wandering husbands. More than one valuable moral might be drawn from the story of Dolores and her pigeon."

Day Dreams.

"A few days since as I was reconnoitring with my glass the streets of the Albaycin, I beheld the procession of a novice about to take the veil; and remarked various circumstances that excited the strongest sympathy in the fate of the youthful being thus about to be consigned to a living tomb. I ascertained, to my satisfaction, that she was beautiful; and, by the paleness of her cheek, that she was a victim, rather than a votary. She was arrayed in bridal garments, and decked with a chaplet of white flowers; but her heart evidently revolted at this mockery of a spiritual union, and yearned after its earthly loves. A tall, stern looking man walked near her in the procession; it was evidently the tyrannical father, who, from some bigoted or sordid motive, had compelled this sacrifice. Amidst the crowd was a dark, handsome youth, in Andalusian garb, who seemed to fix on her an eye of agony. It was doubtless the secret lover from whom she was for ever to be separated. My indignation rose as I noted the malignant exultation painted in the countenances of the attendant monks and friars. The procession arrived at the chapel of the convent; the sun gleamed for the last time upon the chaplet of the poor novice as she crossed the fatal threshold and disappeared from sight. The throng poured in with cowl and cross and minstrelsy. The lover paused for a moment at the door, I could understand the tumult of his feelings, but he mastered them and entered. There was a long interval—I pictured to myself the scene passing within.—The poor novice despoiled of her transient finery—clothed in the conventual garb: the bridal chaplet taken from her brow; her beautiful head shorn of its long silken tresses—I heard her murmur the irrevocable vow—I saw her extended on her bier; the death pall spread over; the funeral service performed that proclaimed her dead to the world: her sighs were drowned in the wailing anthem of the nuns and the sepulchral tones of the organ—the father looked unmoved without a tear—the lover—no—my fancy refused to portray the anguish of the lover—there the picture remained a blank.—The ceremony was over; the crowd again issued forth to behold the day and mingle in the joyous stir of life—but the victim with her bridal chaplet was no longer there—the door of the convent closed that secured her from the world forever. I saw the father and the lover issue forth—they were in earnest conversation—the young man was violent in his gestures, when the wall of a house intervened and shut them from my sight."

"That evening I noticed a solitary light twinkling from a remote lattice of the convent. There, said I, the unhappy novice sits weeping in her cell, while her lover paces the street below in unavailing anguish."

"The officious Mateo interrupted my meditations and destroyed in an instant, the cobweb tissue of my fancy. With his usual zeal he had gathered facts concerning the scene that had interested me. The heroine of my romance was neither young nor handsome—she had no love—she had entered the convent of her own free will, as a respectable asylum, and was one of the cheer-fullest residents within its walls!"

Sunrise in Spain.

"Scarce had the gray dawn streaked the sky, and the earliest cock crowed from the cottages of the hill-side, when the suburbs gave sign of reviving animation; for the fresh hours of dawning are precious in the summer season in a sultry climate. All are anxious to get the start of the sun in the business of the day. The muleteer drives forth his loaded train for the journey; the traveler slings his carbine behind his saddle, and mounts his steed at the gates of the hotel. The brown peasant urges his loitering donkeys, laden with panniers of sunny fruit and fresh dewy vegetables; for already the thrifty housewives are hastening to the market."

"The sun is up and sparkles along the valley, topping the transparent foliage of the groves. The matin bell resounds melodiously through the pure bright air, announcing the hour of devotion. The muleteer halts his burdened animals before the chapel, thrusts his staff through his belt behind, and enters with hat in hand, smoothing his coal black hair, to hear a mass and put up a prayer for a prosperous wayfaring across the Sierra."

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

CRANIOLOGY.

I WAS sitting the other day, conversing with a friend, when suddenly he fixed his eyes on my forehead, and with a singular earnestness exclaimed, "It is really extraordinary. I never saw it so strongly developed before." On inquiry, I found that he was an amateur craniologist—a great looker-on of every body's head—a professed seeker out of bumps. He tells you such a person is affectionate, and such an one witty. One is contemplative, and another musical, according to the little protuberances on their skull. I was really gratified to find myself possessed of divers qualities, which had before been hidden, even from suspicion. I find myself a great lover of music, and gifted with an immense genius for that species of composition, and that there is nothing in the world which I dislike more than contemplation! I am not an admirer of women, but am of a most merry disposition!

I told my friend that his art was exceedingly ingenious, by which he was enabled to discover such great secrets, but that, although I have lived to the age of manhood, and every opportunity has been presented of setting my character in a right light, yet that there was not a single one of those qualities he had ascribed to me, but was diametrically opposed to the truth. Music affords me no pleasure, and I cannot even turn a tune; so far from disliking contemplation, it is my weakness to fall into thoughts separate from those of the people about me. As for woman, I am not peculiar either for admiration or hatred of them, and I am seldom merry.

The craniologist answered, with an appearance of triumph, which rather puzzled me—"Why, my dear sir, that confirms my theory."

"I am at a loss to discover how a theory can be disproved and confirmed in the same way."

"That just shows your ignorance," said my companion. "When we say you are musical, we do not mean to imply that you practise or actually like music."

I stared, but he went on with the air of one quite satisfied of being in the right.

"You see, in this world, people's true talents and qualities never are, or seldom are, properly developed; because in their passage through life, they encounter adverse circumstances which cross and sometimes completely destroy or conceal them. Thus a man, intended by nature for a great painter, may be born the son of a blacksmith, and his father may bring him up to the anvil. He may never see a brush or a picture; and consequently, will never be, in reality, a painter; but nevertheless, he may possess the organ which, if it had been properly exercised, would have enabled him to be a Michael Angelo."

"But how are we to prove this?" I asked. "The blacksmith may live and hammer away his life, and never be brought to the test."

"There, too," said my friend, with sparkling eyes, "there, too, I am prepared for you, and this shows the advantage of our art, for unless some one who understands it should meet him, he would be forever but a blacksmith. To be sure some accidental circumstance may awaken his attention to the sacred capacity which lies idle in his bosom and his brain, and he may be tempted to try—but this may not happen often. We have among artists, several whose unextinguishable genius broke out from a cloud of obscurity, poverty and surrounding miseries; but it is my opinion, that no one can calculate what the world has lost in this way. Many an unhappy man has perished without dreaming of his own greatness."

"If this is so—"

"If it is so?" reiterated the craniologist: "it is so."

"Then let me ask you what organ do I possess, which excited your wonder?"

"You have," said he, "that of music. I never saw it more striking. If you were to commence at this time and study the science, there is not the shadow of a doubt but that you would, in a few years, produce a greater sensation in the world than has ever been created? You could coin dollars at your pleasure."

"Now," said I gravely, "I'll tell you what I will do. You are a man of capital."

"Thank heaven," replied he, "I am. I had the organ of prudence, and have not failed to profit by it in business. I am worth one hundred thousand dollars above the world."

"Well, then, if you will take me under your charge, supply me with funds, and cultivate my wonderful genius, I promise not only to immortalize you as the author of my greatness, but also to pay into your hands one half of every thing I receive for my composition."

He seemed a good deal surprised, and a little angry, at my proposition, which he called preposterous, telling me I talked like a madman.

Finding our debate brought abruptly to a conclusion, I did not seek to continue it, and we parted rather ill-naturedly.

Many people advocate things like the craniologist, without in fact believing them. It is so easy to talk; to reply ingeniously, and to lose one's self in the mazes of a discussion, without rule, and almost without object. Some are so fond of hearing their own voices, that they contend for the most absurd conceits, till they gradually themselves believe what they have been unsuccessfully endeavoring to force upon the credit of others. There is a sly discretion vested in every body, which relaxes opinions the moment it becomes their interest to do so, or else fixes upon some cunning method of evading the consequences. I heard a young man at Delmonico's, sometime ago, swearing that something had happened, which another declared had not, and told the first he would bet him five dollars he was in the wrong. The swearer replied, he would take his oath it had, but he did not like to bet.

The confidence in craniology is widely spread, and many intelligent people are converts to it. For my own part, there is more than one reason why I am not one of the faithful, any more in its principles than in that of physiognomy. Nature makes our heads and faces, but she seldom altogether makes our tastes, dispositions, and intelligence, and when she does, she is not such a careful workman as to put her marks on every individual in the shape of a bump on the head. There is, I think, no truth in the outlines of either craniology or physiognomy, although it may sometimes happen that it appears otherwise. The remark said to have been made by Socrates on this subject, I have always thought a little bit pompous, and far fetched. In telling his friends that the physiognomist who had described his features as belonging to a drunkard, or a passionate and malicious man, &c. was right, he rather betrayed an inconsistency in himself, or the person who had made the assertion. If the science of physiognomy was authentic, the professor should have also added, "but although I see those evil propensities, I also see a great and god-like power of mind by which they will be ruled, and made subservient to wisdom and virtue."

SKETCHES BY A BRIEFLESS LAWYER.

TAXING COSTS.

If there is any branch of the legal science which is more talked of and less understood than another, it is that of costs. Like the idea entertained of conscience, by the author of Lacon, it is like a ghost—every body talks of it—yet nobody knows what it is. It is a sort of terra incognita, or undiscovered country, which few feel a disposition to explore, and from which, when those who have been tempted to venture, return, they know as little as when they went. It is, in short, the raw head and bloody bones of the law, and like most bugbears, is magnified in extent and ferocity, precisely in the ratio that it is unknown. The consequences resulting to contending parties from this cause, have been a theme of constant satire, and the ruin incident even to success in legal warfare, on this account, has become proverbial. The old caricature which has graced the window of every print shop, presenting a double view—on one side of a man bending under the weight of a bag of gold hung over his shoulders, with the inscription, "I am going to law," and on the other of a thin, half-starved ragamuffin, shivering through the street with the significant motto, "I have been to law," affords one, among a thousand illustrations, of the truth of this remark. Scarcely a day passes that some incident of a similar character is not presented to the public gaze; and even while I am now writing, the following epigram upon this favorite topic meets my eye:

"An upper and a lower mill
Fell out about their water;
To war they went, that is, to law,
Resolved to give no quarter.
A lawyer was by each engaged,
And hotly they contended;
When fees grew slack, the war they waged,
They judged, were better ended.
The heavy costs remaining still,
Were settled without pother:
One lawyer took the upper mill,
The lower mill the other."

In a word, whenever law is mentioned, however incidentally, "costs" follow close at its heels, as the shadow pursues the substance; or perhaps, I should rather say, in reference to the present subject, as the substance pursues the shadow, and by an irresistible association of ideas, the one comes to be considered the cause, while the other is viewed as the natural and necessary effect. An attorney trudging to the Hall, with his bundle of papers neatly tied up with red tape in one hand, and his cost-book in the other, presents in general acceptance, the very beau ideal of this "chief end" of the law. In him we are taught to behold a personification of the quibbling art, which, like the old hound, true to the scent, hunts down its victim, pursues it into a corner, and after preying upon its vitals, leaves it to expire; while in the clients we see two luckless wights, who have supposed that the trusty lawyers are all the while contesting and asserting their respective rights, when in reality, they are only concerting the most effectual method of picking their pockets.

The profession of the law is divided into attorneys and counsellors. The duty of the former is to conduct all the proceedings in a cause on paper, so as to reduce the question in dispute between the parties to a single point, and thus prepare it for trial; while the business of the latter is confined simply to the trial of the cause. These two branches of the profession, although they are frequently united in the same individual, are nevertheless distinct. When the cause is determined, each attorney makes up his bill of costs, which is an account of all the proceedings in the cause on his side, and of all the services rendered by him, charged for, according to the rates fixed by law, and both of which, after being taxed, are to be paid by the losing party. This taxation, as it is called, consists in submitting the bills to a judge of the court, in which the cause was contested, who strikes out all charges which are illegal, then taxes or approves the bill.

Among the thousand quibbles for which our profession has such ample credit, there is none which attaches to it with so much truth as that which relates to cost-making. Formed as an attorney's bill is of numberless small items, which in no two cases have ever been known to resemble each other, it is not to be wondered at that this subject should afford so much room for caviling as it does. Judges and taxing officers are continually employed in adjusting these differences, and day after day is spent in adjudicating with solemn gravity upon a charge of two shillings for a paltry notice, or in determining the equally dignified question, "how many folios," (that is, how many hundred words,) "are contained in a declaration." These are matters to which every tyro feels himself adequate; and the consequence is, that the time of judges, which might not only be better employed, but is actually required for important purposes, is in many cases almost wholly engrossed by these petty wranglings of the small fry of our profession. Courts have repeatedly expressed their regret, and the liberal and enlightened of the bar have exerted themselves to the utmost to obviate the evil, but in vain. The same restless spirit of contention still exists, and for want of an opportunity to exhaust itself upon matters of moment, contents itself with worrying in the mire about the two-penny concern of a fictitious notice, or an overcharged folio in a bill of costs. Often have I had occasion to blush for the littleness which enters into these contentions, and I have never been able to imagine a stronger contrast than that which is presented by our most honorable profession in its different extremes. When we regard it as sustaining and enforcing the rights of the citizen, as interposing the shield between the oppressor and the oppressed, and as extending its benign influence over every relation of civil society, who can withhold from it his admiration? But when we see its noble attributes entirely overlooked by those who presume to pursue it, and its comprehensive principles frittered down into a paltry squabble about words, who, however devoted in his attachment, but must acknowledge its degradation?

I recollect an anecdote, illustrative of this remark, which I cannot withhold. I happened one morning to enter the office of Judge —, which was as usual crowded with attorneys, eagerly pressing forward for the transaction of what is technically called "chamber business." Among those who presented themselves was one, whose crookedness of intellect and repulsiveness of manner had provoked towards him the hostility of all who came within his range. He presented for taxation, as soon as he could obtain the floor, a bill of costs, written upon a small piece of blotting paper, amounting to a little over eleven dollars. As he approached the judge, another individual, no less celebrated than himself as a "sharp practitioner," advanced, announcing, with peculiar bitterness, that he "opposed." Knowing the calibre of the combatants, I prepared myself for a keen encounter; and it was not long before I was gratified. It seemed that the former, whom I shall designate as L—, had for some time been lying in wait for an irregularity in practice on the part of D—, with the intention of availing himself of it, and thus involving his adversary in costs. The wished-for opportunity had at length arrived, and L— had succeeded in setting aside some proceeding of D—'s, and had obtained an order that he should pay the costs of his irregularity. These were the costs which were now presented for taxation. From the temper of the parties, as I have described them, the reader will readily imagine that nothing was conceded on either side. Crimination and recrimination, assertion and contradiction, followed each other in quick succession; and, after a wrangle of half an hour, the judge had gone through the bill, and was just about signing the taxation, when D— exclaimed, that he had yet another objection.

"He has charged," said he, "two folios for drawing his rule; it is but one."

"Count it," said the judge.

They went aside, and with great eagerness separately commenced counting the number of words contained in the rule.

"Just one folio," exclaimed D—, who had finished counting before his antagonist.

"A hundred and one words," shouted L—, in triumph.

I should here inform the reader, who is, perhaps, ignorant of such matters, that but a single word over a hundred makes another folio, as the law allows no division of a folio.

"I am right," said D—.

"I will count again," retorted L—; and in the midst of a roar of laughter from all quarters, they commenced another count with unmitigated vigor.

"A hundred exactly," bawled D—, in the highest state of excitement.

"A hundred and one," still persisted L—.

The judge now interfered and directed one of them to count in his presence, while the other looked on. L— accordingly commenced, and went on without interruption, until he came to "19th," which he counted as three words.

"There," said D—, "it is but two words; each figure being but one."

"The 'th' is another word," said L—; "each figure is a word," and these letters are no part of either of the figures."

Here commenced a furious discussion, which lasted some ten minutes, as to whether the "th" was a word or not; for upon this depended the question whether the rule was one folio or two, making a difference of two or three shillings in the bill. The judge, with as much gravity as so ridiculous a scene would permit him to put on, decided to allow the charge, and the belligerents left the office, the victor triumphing in the defeat of his adversary; and the latter, vowing by all that was good, that he would appeal from the decision.

The matter passed off as a good joke; and, although, it occurred some years ago, is probably remembered to this day by many of my brethren. It is but one of a thousand similar scenes with which my observation has furnished me, and which, were it not for the veneration I entertain for my profession, would have almost reconciled me to the indifference with which clients seem to have regarded me. It is one of the incidents with which a noble and learned profession seems irreclaimably beset, but it is one of so inconsiderable a character as not in the least to dim its lustre; and, for my own part, as often as I have had occasion to contemplate scenes such as these, I have turned with pride to the contrast which that profession so powerfully presents, and have consoled myself with the reflection, that if, like the Nile, it be sometimes lost in the meanderings of a muddy brook, like that noble river it broadens and deepens into a majestic stream. G.

WHO COULD HE BE?

In the summer of the year, ever memorable on account of the short interval of peace, which at the commencement of the present century existed between England and France, a person arrived by the mail at the small town of Barnstaple, in Devonshire. From his accent and manners he was evidently a foreigner. He was neither accompanied by servant nor encumbered by baggage, with the exception of a small leathern valise, barely large enough to contain a change of linen. Nevertheless, it was soon discovered that he possessed, in the shape of sundry bank post-bills and notes, to a large amount, that which surpasseth show; consequently, his presence at the Golden Lion was no annoyance to the host. But the latter was soon doomed to be disappointed in his prospect of reaping the rich harvest which he had anticipated from the ample expenditure of his guest; for the stranger shortly intimated to him his intention of residing for some time in the vicinity of Barnstaple, and evinced his bad taste by expressing his wishes for relinquishing the comforts and independence of an inn for the more quiet and friendly intercourse of a family circle. In short, he requested his host to procure for him accommodations in a private house. However unwilling friend Boniface felt, to be the means of depriving himself of such a valuable customer, yet he was not unmindful that any unwillingness on his part might only tend to deprive him of occasional future favors, and he therefore neglected not to comply with the request of his stranger friend. This, however, he soon found to be a task more easily undertaken than accomplished; for at this period prejudice ran so high against any thing in the shape of a Frenchman, that no respectable family was to be found willing to receive such an individual for an inmate. Indeed it is a question of some doubt, whether the d—l himself would not have been, to the generality of the good people of Barnstaple, as welcome a guest as a Frenchman. At length, a Captain L—n, whose residence was within a few miles of the town, consented to find an apartment for him. For this imprudent conduct he was most severely censured by his friends. In fact, the heretical opinions of Captain L—n respecting Frenchmen had oftentimes awakened the displeasure of his more sagacious neighbors. There were many even who, from the liberality of his opinions, doubted his loyalty and attachment to the king and constitution; and at this period nothing was more particularly the boast of every Briton. Nevertheless, as if in defiance of public opinion, the stranger found himself welcomed into the house, and comfortably seated at Captain L—n's fireside. From this moment he seemed studiously to avoid the society of all persons without the family circle into which he had entered. With these, by numerous little acts of kindness and generosity, particularly to the younger branches of the family, he soon became a great favorite. Captain L—n was his only companion; with him he would perambulate the adjacent country; and, seated upon the loftier hills, take sketches of the surrounding coast. In one of these excursions, when his host had left him for a few moments, and suddenly returned, he heard him exclaim, in his native language, "What an admirable position would this be for the French to effect a landing; the coast is totally defenceless."

The numerous plans and sketches which he took upon these occasions, were regularly dispatched to London by the mail. He soon extended his rides and walks, and ere long his singular appearance attracted universal observation, and various rumors began to be whispered about among the astonished town's folk, as to the individual in question. In short, the stranger seemed to engross the entire attention of the neighbourhood, when an accident occurred, which appeared likely to restore tranquillity, by ridding them of the presence of this dreaded Frenchman.

In one of the extended trips which he was now in the habit of making, he was discovered by a sapient Welsh magistrate, in the neighbourhood of Swansea, taking sketches of the coast. He was required to give an account of himself, and as he did not think this necessary, a warrant was issued, and he was apprehended for a spy. The few documents which he possessed tended strongly to confirm the suspicion which had already been excited, for they were written in a language which the united learning of the Swansea magistrate, and all his friends, was unable to translate. The papers were therefore carefully sealed up, and dispatched to his majesty's secretary of state, together with a full detail of the suspicious circumstances which led to the apprehension and detention of the writer.

While the worthy mayor was indulging himself in the prospect of the immortal honors which he imagined this public display of zeal was sure to win for him, he received an answer from the home department, with a severe reprimand for having detained any individual, under such shallow pretences.

At length the time for the departure of the stranger arrived, and sincerely sorry were the family thereat; for though he had shown himself at all times affable and kind, yet he had latterly more frequently joined in the family circle, and endeavored to amuse them by singing to them various songs of his native country. However, he consoled each of his young friends for his departure by some valuable souvenir.

The moment previous to his departure, he took Captain L—n aside, and addressed him thus:

"It is possible, captain, that you may sooner or later see me again, perhaps under very different circumstances. As I have experienced such kindness and liberality from you and your family during my residence among you, it may be in my power at a future period to render you some return, and therefore if from length of time or the multiplicity of the affairs in which I may be involved your person should escape my recollection, I shall esteem it as a particular favor if you will make yourself known to me."

The stranger departed with his little valise, no one knowing whence he came or whither he went. In the neighborhood he left no pleasing recollections, he came as an unbidden guest, and the tidings of his departure were listened to with joy. Who could it be? Surely not NAPOLEON.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE WARRIOR'S STEED.

From Fraser's Magazine.

With my glittering helm and my corselet of steel,
The sword on my thigh, and the spur on my heel,—
How light was the touch on my steed's jetty mane,
As I leaped to the saddle, and loosened the rein!

"My courser, my courser! how gladly we fly
From the quiet of home to the shrill battle cry,—
From the spot where my childhood contentedly strayed
To the thrust of the lance and the jar of the blade!"

"The shriek of the wounded comes borne on the gale,—
The poor orphan's sob, and the sad widow's wail:
And soon may my father and mother deplore,
A son and a brother they'll welcome no more!"

"My courser, my courser! dash gallantly on,
Where the havoc is reeking and glory is won;
Unheard is the prayer and unheeded the woe,
When vengeance is sought at the breast of the foe!"

He bore me through field, and he bore me through flood,
O'er the ranks of the slain where the bravest had stood;
And spurned was the breach by my steed's foaming pride,
Where the desperate struggled, and noble had died.

But that victory gained, by the just and the strong,
And the joys which to conquest and glory belong,
Are swept from the mind; for new conquests and spoil
Since have honored the freeborn, who fought for their soil.

The soldier's brow wrinkles with badges of war,
And his horse's broad chest will show many a scar;
But both can remember their first bloody field,
Where the patriot taught the proud foeman to yield.

A wife now reclines on her warrior lord,
Who won what he hath by the blade of his sword;
And those parents are watching their children, who feed
With crumbs from the casement their father's old steed!

The eye of the horse will ne'er lighten again,
Yet it glows as the child strokes the long silken mane;
And the son of the soldier already will dare
To mount the old charger, in mimic of war!

Years! years! that have crippled the hardy and fleet,
That have sprinkled the brow of the soldier with alet,—
Ye have not divided, nor lessened, the force
Of affection which rivets the knight to his horse.

SOME LOOSE REMARKS ON A DELICATE SUBJECT.

From Talbot's Edinburgh Magazine.

KISSING is a delicate subject, and must be handled accordingly. Kisses are of various kinds. There is the kiss infantile, and the kiss parental, the kiss friendly, the kiss amatory, &c. &c. We exclude from our catalogue the Judas kiss—a perversion of the nature of the institute, which, even leaving out of consideration the awful depth of impiety with which the designation associates it, can only rank with that class of crimes, the bare attempt to name which palsies the tongue.

First in dignity is the kiss parental. This kiss is witnessed in its purest and most amiable state in young mothers—matrons, so little faded from the free maiden bloom, that the stranger hesitates in what class of femininity to rank them. They have the rich blushing grace of the girl, and her coy timidity, most like to the caresses of a greyhound, insinuating fondness by approaches of serpentine grace, yet ready to bound away, startled even by an anticipated response. But in the midst of this softness we are aware of a growing dignity—a statelier bearing—a prouder consciousness and self-possession, not yet developed, but throwing herald beams before it. A being such as we have attempted to describe, bending over her first child with a love which no created being but herself can ever feel for another—so intense, so pure, so utterly devoid of selfishness—bathing its cheeks, chin, eyes, and brow in a flood of kisses, is a picture which earth cannot surpass. If, at times, a thought of self do cross her devotion, it is but a slight tinge of vanity, so graceful as to lose every alloy of littleness that attaches to the feeling.

The kiss parental also includes that of the father. If it be less beautiful, less winning than that of the mother, it is on the other hand more impressive. The arrangements of society—perhaps also a natural tendency in women to bestow their affections upon men somewhat their seniors—the wish to temper in the pure draught of matrimonial happiness a feeling of awe and veneration with the more tumultuous throb of love—bring it about that the husband, in general, rather exceeds his wife in years. At all events, there is something in the tenor of man's life that gives a hardness to his outward bearing—an habitual repression of the utterance of his feelings—the very reverse of the graceful, wave-like yielding of woman's heart, voice, and features to the pressure of every breeze. When we see the face which never blenched at danger, which strives to mantle even the joy of its heart, as the smooth ocean the treasures which lie fathoms beneath its surface, soften, as his wife holds out the helpless one to woo his embrace, then relent into a grim smile, as he holds at a distance its little caressing hands, and finally imprints a long and deep kiss upon its cheek, or pouting lips, with a "God bless thee, my boy!"

So glad at this as he, we cannot be,
—but our rejoicing
At nothing can be more.

We have spoken of the kiss parental, unmixed with any associations. It assumes, under certain circumstances, the aspect of sublimity. It is easy to picture how the mother's instinctive love must grow, in the event of a worthy object, with every succeeding year; how the beautiful or manly form, the warm generous heart, and the frank bearing must heighten and ennoble her affection. It is impossible to imagine the full extent of a mother's agony, when deprived of such an object. "My son, my son, my beautiful, my brave!" Rachel weeping over her infants, and refusing to be comforted, because they were not, is a faint type of such a desolation. Yet there have been mothers who, when their country or their faith called for the sacrifice, could stamp a burning kiss on their son's brow, and motion him forth—there was no voice, nature so far asserted her supremacy—to the battle or to the stake.

Turn we to a less mournful subject, the kiss amatory. On writing this word, we feel our breast fluttering beneath a clogging weight of fear, just as it did—we care not to say how many years ago. It is a strange and a beautiful thing—first innocent love. There is that in female beauty that delights merely to gaze upon; but beware of looking too long. The lustrous black pupil contrasting with the white of the eye and the carnated skin—the clear placid blue, into which you see down, down into the very soul—the deep hazel, lustrous as a sunlit stream, seen through an opening in its willowy banks—all may be gazed upon with impunity ninety-nine times, and the hundredth you are a gone man. On a sudden the eye strikes you as deeper and brighter than ever; or you fancy that a long look is stolen at you beneath a drooping eyelid, and that there is a slight flush on the cheek—and at once you are in love. Then you spend the morning in contriving apologies for calling, and the days and evenings in playing them off. When you lay your hand on the door-bell your knees tremble, and your breast feels compressed; and when admitted, you sit, and look, and say nothing, and go away determined to tell your whole story the next time. This goes on for months, varied by the occasional daring of kissing a flower with which she presents you—perhaps in the daring intoxication of love wasting it towards her; or in an affection of the Quixote style, kneeling with mock heroic emphasis to kiss her hand in affected jest; and the next time you meet with her, both are stately and reserved as ever. Till at last, on some unnoticeable day, when you find yourself alone with the lady, you quite unawares feel her hand in yours, a yielding shudder crosses her, and, you know not how, she is in your arms, and you press upon her lips delayed but not withheld.

A long, long kiss, a kiss of youth and love.

The kiss conjugal is of a severer cast of beauty. During the first years of matrimony it approaches, according to circumstances and the dispositions of the individuals, to the character of the kiss amatory. Othello, when he rejoins his "fair warrior" at Cyprus is still all the lover. For a time his bliss is speechless; but as soon as he finds words—

If I were now to die,
'Twere now to be most happy; for I fear
My soul hath her content so absolute,
That not another comfort like to this
Succeeds in unknown fate.

Imogene's meditations upon the kiss of which her cruel step-mother had defrauded her, though less intensely passionate, have still more in them of the lover than the wife:

I did not take my leave of him, but had
Most pretty things to say: ere I could tell him
How I would think on him, at certain hours,
Such thoughts and such; or, I could make him swear
That she of Italy should not betray
Mine interest and his honor; or have charged him
At the sixth hour of morn, at noon, at midnight,
To encounter me with orison; (for then
I am in heaven for him); or ere I could Give him that parting kiss, which I had set
Betwixt two charming words, comes in my father;
And, like the tyrannous breathing of the north,
Shakes all our buds from growing.

It is in Coriolanus that we find the pride, depth, and glory of the kiss of wedded love best exemplified. In the Volscian camp he at first affects to receive his wife and mother coldly. "These eyes are not the same I wore in Rome." But nature will not be gainsaid:

Like a dull actor now
I have forgot my part, and I am out
Even to a full disgrace. Best of my flesh,
Forgive my tyranny; but do not say,
For that, "Forgive our Romans." Oh, a kiss
Long as my exile—sweeten my revenge!
Now, by the jealous queen of heav'n, that kiss
I carried from thee, dear; and my true lip
Hath virgin'd it e'er since.

The kiss friendly is extremely graceful among girls. Among men we cannot endure it. Great rough-bearded carles slaving each other, is enough to turn one's stomach. For this reason, and because we esteem it a desecration of the ordinance to make a woman's lips common to every stray customer, we are averse to the "salute," (using the word in its old English acceptation,) which still remains the accustomed mode of greeting on some parts of the continent. "What you've touched you may take."

These four are the principal species of kisses—all the rest being mere combinations or varieties of them. A practical treatise on kissing would lead us into a wide field of discussion; but we regard this essay as standing in the same relation to such a dissertation as Euclid's Elements to a course of physical and mechanical science. Such a treatise is still a desideratum, although valuable and plenteous materials are scattered through the literature of various nations. Among the most important sources of information to which we may refer our readers are—Anacreon, Sappho, and Longus, among the ancients; the Sacontala among the orientals; and the dialogue between Orlando and Rosalind, together with that between Falstaff and Doll Tearsheet among the moderns. In conclusion, we have only to remark, that the state of the science of kissing in any nation may be assumed as a pretty accurate standard of its civilization. The inhabitants of the Tonga Islands know neither the practice nor a name for it. In Greek, the various kinds of kissing have as many distinctive designations as the various kinds of epicures in French.

CURIOUS ANECDOTE OF A DOG.

From Jess's Gleanings.

The captain of a trading vessel, who now resides at Brighton, picked up lately a dog at sea, more than twenty miles from land. This circumstance may throw some light on the fact of dogs, which have been sent to France or Ireland from England, finding their way back. The present earl of L— sent some drafted hounds from his kennel in Cumberland to Ireland, where they were safely received, and a receipt given for them to the person who brought them over. Three weeks afterwards, two of those hounds made their appearance at Lord L.'s kennel, though in a very exhausted state. A gentleman also informed me, that a pointer dog, which had been left at Calais, made its way over to England. The most amusing fact of this kind that I know of, is one that was related to me by a gentleman on whose veracity I can place the most implicit reliance; and, though it may appear to some of my readers to border upon the marvellous, I think it too entertaining to withhold it. He informed me that a friend of his, an officer in the forty-fourth regiment, who had occasion, when in Paris, to pass one of the bridges across the Seine, had his boots, which had been previously well polished, dirtied by a poodle-dog rubbing against them. He in consequence went to a man who was stationed on the bridge, and had them cleaned. The same circumstance having occurred more than once, his curiosity was excited, and he watched the dog. He saw him roll himself in the mud of the river, and then watch for a person with well-polished boots, against whom he contrived to rub himself. Finding that the shoeblick was owner of the dog, he taxed him with the artifice; and, after a little hesitation, he confessed that he had taught the dog the trick, in order to procure customers for himself. The officer, being much struck with the dog's sagacity, purchased him at a high price, and brought him to England. He kept him tied up in London some time, and then released him. The dog remained with him a day or two, and then made his escape. A fortnight afterwards, he was found with his former master, pursuing his old trade on the bridge.

FINE ARTS.

THE MUSICAL FUND CONCERT.

In addition to the late performances of opera and oratorio, with which our amateurs have been regaled, the Musical Fund Society, a charitable institution for the relief of indigent and incapacitated musicians, gave a concert on Tuesday at the Chatham-street Saloon. Before we proceed to remark on the selection of the evening, we shall beg to offer a few observations on the management of the musical concerns of this society; for by the success of the entertainments offered to the public their financial prosperity must be greatly influenced, and, therefore, we conceive that every possible attention ought to be paid by the governor and directors to the getting up of their biennial concerts. We think we have much cause to complain in this respect, and the slovenly performances which have frequently taken place are a fair theme for criticism. Surely a society, which embraces the services of so many professors, and is instituted for their immediate benefit, ought to present an example of precision and excellence of execution, and of good taste in selection, and be a standard for the taste of the town. The Sacred Music Society offers a precedent worthy of imitation, their performances being conducted in such a manner as to evince foresight in the direction, and industrious perseverance on the part of the members. Nothing can be perfect in concerted music, whether vocal or instrumental, without practice together of the members of either choir or band; and to the want of attention to this well-known musical axiom, the inferiority of the Fund concerts are to be mainly attributed. Zeal and liberality are qualities which the directors of the late concert have manifested to the fullest extent; had their prudence or practical knowledge been commensurate, the effect would have been much more decisive. We offer to the society the following hints, founded on our knowledge of the constitution of two of the best musical societies in England, perhaps in the world. A committee of management should be appointed, of the most experienced professors and amateurs, who should select not only the vocalists and solo instrumental performers, but the music to be performed. Care should then be taken that the copied parts of this music should be procured, and put into immediate rehearsal; the band then would be prepared to do justice to each morceau; for it is certain that, however able musicians may be on their respective instruments, yet that the art of accompaniment is only to be acquired by constant habit; and it is equally a fact, that unless at the Park theatre, and the French theatre at New-Orleans, sufficient practice is not afforded to any body of men that we know of in the Union, to enable them to attend upon and watch a vocalist, and give at once the effects which different singers produce in different manners. In selecting the music by committee we quote the example of the Philharmonic, and ancient concerts in London; and our professional readers at once will feel that this is the only way of excluding trash, and assisting the cause of pure taste. The committee might be instructed to wait upon the various vocalists engaged, and even to consult their wishes as to songs, retaining always a power of negation, to be exercised at discretion. The concerts thus would consist of a sufficient quantity of solo and concerted music, with an occasional concerto by some eminent performer, and would shortly give the entertainments of the society the stamp of first-rate excellence. Novices, and personages who rely more on long names than actual talent, would be rejected; and nothing but the compositions of great masters would be admissible, executed by competent talent, assisted by a band who thoroughly knew their business; and this, we submit, is a state of things highly to be desired, and certainly tending to the welfare of the society.

For the present concert more talent was engaged, and certainly less trash sung, than on former occasions; but the band in accompaniment was shamefully defective. The duets, "The master and scholar," by Fioravanti, sung by Mr. Horn and Mrs. Austin; and that of "Together let us range the fields," by Mr. Jones and Miss Hughes, were literally distressing; and a song, composed and sung by Mr. Jones, was ruined in the same way. Of the overtures, the first by Rossini was tolerably executed, but the tuning of the various instruments was defective. The second overture, by Mozart, was well performed, and the same fault was not perceptible. In the concertos M^r. Pentland, on the clarinet, was tolerable; his tone sweet, intonation correct, and taste that of a good school—his execution not brilliant. A gentleman, with an almost impracticable name, played with great zeal and industry on the violin, but with very little effect. Mr. Norton favored us with a fantasia, concerto we cannot call it, on the trumpet, introducing a couple of vulgar airs, arranged with great tact, and executed with his admitted ability; but, with due submission, Yankee Doodle and the British Grenadiers, although highly ornamental to Niblo's or the Castle gardens, added nothing to the clat of such a concert, notwithstanding Mr. Norton was applauded to the echo, and honored with the only encore of the night. Miss Sterling performed a concerto on the piano-forte, with a brilliancy, fire, and precision that astonished and delighted us. This young lady's performance is beyond all praise, and would be an ornament to the most refined concert in any country; but four concertos on one evening, and but one first-rate, evince bad judgment in selection. Mrs. Austin sang a ballad, and an air with difficult variations—"The Soldier's Tear," and "Sul margine d'un Rio"—both good in their way, and both sweetly executed. Miss Hughes also sang a ballad and a bravura, "Savourneen Deelish," with feeling; and the other by Rossini, from the Maid of Judah, with precision and good execution. Mr. Horn sang Beethoven's beautiful air Rosalie, accompanying himself admirably; and a song composed by the present musical star—the Chevalier Neukomin—an amateur, whose compositions at present are highly esteemed in Europe—a fine rattling composition, but written for a bass voice evidently. Mr. Jones manifested his usual superiority of voice and method to all the vocalists we have yet heard in America, of course excepting Garcia; but we should have preferred a different selection of music. The quartette, "Mild as the moonbeams," was sung by Mr. Jones, Mrs. Austin, and Miss Hughes as a finale, but, alas! as a trio, and accompanied by Mr. Horn. We had nearly omitted a Spanish lady, whose name looked most formidable in the bills, as having astonished all Mexico. She sang and acted into the bargain, but without a very decided effect upon the audience, that we could discover; her voice is a contra alto, of some power, but little cultivation, and we doubt the correctness of her auricular membrane. The concert was well attended.

THE DRAMA.

The heat of the weather, and the rapid flying reports of danger and alarm—the cholera—the comet—Indian wars—and other of those shadows which will, ever and anon, darken the path of nations as well as individuals, have thinned the theatres, and we fear, blasted the long-expected harvest of our good friends, the players, in more than one instance. The benefits have not, generally, been crowded. We have heard of some fortunate French performer who congratulated himself greatly on his progress in public estimation. "I have had de fine benefice dis year, mon ami, much better than de last. Last year I lose forty pound—now I only lose thirty!" How many have been equally favored in this city we cannot say, but we fear the number is not small. Mr. C. Kean played Richard the other evening at the Park with his usual discrimination and occasional force. Mr. Thorne's benefit was attractive, but injured by the sudden news of the cholera. Mrs. Sharpe quite forgot the respect due from every performer to the audience, in the total absence of every effort to sustain her part. It was a general theme of notice and disapprobation. It would have spoiled the piece, but for Miss Hughes, whose fine voice and excellent spirits carried her through delightfully. Master Mangeon has left the American theatre. The Richmond is in the course of great improvement, and will probably run a brilliant season when the alarm now existing shall subside. This, however, now must be our apology, for so brief and cursory a glance, and for the substitution in place of a larger notice, the following from a London paper.

FRANCIS THE FIRST.

The grand attraction at Covent-garden theatre has been the tragedy of Francis the First, by Miss Fanny Kemble. It is astonishing with what varied comments it has been hailed; by some it is extolled as a chef d'œuvre of genius, by others it is barely allowed to possess the form without the spirit of dramatic excellence—we coincide with neither. We regard it certainly as a successful performance, particularly when we recollect that it is the work of a lady, a very young one too, who, however eminently gifted, can hardly be supposed to possess that daring originality of thought, that fitful and fiery energy of mind and passion, which appear to us to belong peculiarly to tragedy. "Women," said Byron, in one of his letters, "women cannot write tragedy; they have not seen nor felt enough of life for it." There are thoughts and there are actions with which they cannot sufficiently familiarize their contemplations, and which are, nevertheless, its essential ingredients. Francis the First is, in truth, an historical drama, (although we cannot but think that a stricter adherence to the original in the character of the Duc de Bourbon, a little more of the high-minded infused into his thoughts and actions, would have given us a nobler hero, and, at the same time, a more faithful transcript of the man;) and the success with which, in representation, it has met, must be extremely gratifying to its amiable and accomplished author. She is deservedly a favorite with the public, and she has not a more enthusiastic admirer than our humble self; yet we cannot accord so extravagant a meed of praise to her production as has been lavished on it by some critics, who, if we may judge from their chivalrous advocacy, are ready to mount their jaded rosinantes, and, setting lance in rest, to challenge every opponent to their literary fiat, for, in sooth, this is not the way to nourish genius. We are willing, however, to assure our readers that it possesses many marks of future greatness—much promise of good to come. It contains many splendid passages, and the extreme youth of Miss Kemble considered, it is, indeed, a surprising work; and we doubt not, that with her powers of observation, and the high discriminating judgment which she possesses, she will yet prove herself capable even of better things.

Miss Kemble represented Louisa of Savoy, the passionate—the proud, and her acting was fine and effective. Miss Taylor appeared as the mild and gentle Margaret of Valois, and did great justice to her part. The character of the feminine and unfortunate Françoise de Foix, which perhaps contains the most felicitous development of Miss Kemble's powers, was charmingly enacted by Miss E. Tree; and Kemble himself, as the haughty, overbearing, ambitious De Bourbon, performed to admiration—he was full of pride, and power, and energy; while Messrs. Mason, Warde, Dibden, Keeley, and Baker, played their parts with considerable éclat. We select, as a specimen of the style, a portion of the scene wherein Margaret visits De Bourbon in prison.

Bourbon. Lady, you speak in vain.

Margaret. I do beseech thee!

Oh, Bourbon! Bourbon! 'twas but yesterday
That thou didst vow eternal love to me;
Now, hither have I wended to your prison,
And, spite of maiden pride and fearfulness,
Held parley with thy guards to win my way.
I've moved their iron natures with my tears;
Which seemed as they would melt the very stones
Whereon they fell so fast. I do implore thee,
Speak to me, Bourbon!—but a word—one word!
I never bowed my knee to aught of earth.
Ere this; but I have ever seen around me,
Others who knelt, and worshipp'd princess' favors:
From them, or rather from my love, I learn
The humble seeming of a suppliant;—
Upon my bended knees, I do implore thee,—
Look not, or speak not, if thou hast sworn,—
But take the freedom that my gold hath bought thee:
Away! nor let these eyes behold thy death!

Bourbon. You are deceived, lady, they will not dare
To take my life.

Margaret. 'Tis thou that art deceived!

What! talk'st thou of not daring;—dost thou see
Yon sun that flames above the earth? I tell thee,
That if my mother had but bent her will
To win that sun, she would accomplish it.

Bourbon. My life is little worth to any now,
Nor have I any, who shall after me
Inherit my proud name.

Margaret. Hold there, my lord!

Posterity, to whom great men and their Fair names belong, is your inheritor.
Your country, from whose king your house had birth,
Claims of you, sir, your high and spotless name!
Fame craves it of you; for when there be none

Bearing the blood of mighty men, to bear
 Their virtues also: fame emblazons them
 Upon her flag, which o'er the world she waves,
 Persuading others to like glorious deeds.
 Oh! will you die upon a public scaffold?
 Beneath the hands of the executioner?
 Shall the vile rabble bait you to your death?
 Shall they applaud and make your fate a tale
 For taverns, and the busy city streets?
 And in the wide hereafter—for the which
 All warriors hope to live,—shall your proud name
 Be banded to and fro by foul tradition,—
 Branded and cursed, as rebel's name should be?
Bowdoin. No! fall on those that curse that made me such—
 Who stole my well-earned honors from my brow,
 And gave such guerdon to whole years of service?
 Light the foul curse of black ingratitude—
 Of shame and bitter sorrow—and the sharp,
 Reproaching voice of after times and men,—
 Upon the heartless boy who knew not how
 To prize his subject's love! A tenfold curse
 Light on the royal harlot—
Margaret. Oh! no more—
Bour. Nay, maiden, 'tis in vain! for thou shalt hear me!
 Drink to the dregs the knowledge thou hast forced,
 And dare upbraid me, even with a look:
 Had I but loved thy mother more—these less,
 I might this hour have stood upon a throne!
 Ay, start! I tell thee, that the queen thy mother
 Hath loved—doth love me with the fierce desires
 Of her unbridled nature; she hath thrown
 Her crown, her kingdom, and herself before me;
 And but I loved thee more than all the world,
 I might have wed Louisa of Savoy!
 Now stare and shudder—freeze thyself to marble;
 Now say where best the meed of praise is due,—
 Now look upon these prison walls—these chains—
 And bid me reign my anger!
Margaret. Oh, be silent!
 For you have rent in twain the sacred 'at veil
 That ever hung upon the eyes of innocence.

SATURDAY, JUNE 23, 1832.

The cholera.—After all our hopes and prayers, a universal thrill of horror, running through the whole nation, has announced that this disease has crossed the broad ocean, the mighty barrier to which we looked for safety, and, like Satan entering Eden,

"With one bound, high overleaped all bound,"

and planted itself upon our shores. Which way will it stalk? Who will be its victims? What time or space will limit its ravages? These are questions trembling at every one's heart. All would fly, but whither shall they fly? What place is secure from the approach of a scourge so awful and so stupendous, which has rolled, as if impelled by an Almighty hand, over all the nations of the world, and left millions of victims in its path? These are the first thoughts of many; but, again, there is much to hope, much to be accomplished by action. The common council are not competent to fulfil the duties which now devolve upon them; they are dilatory and sleepy. We want action—prompt, immediate action. We have been entreating for months that decisive measures should be adopted, relative to the cleanliness of this filthy, and much-neglected city. These measures have not been adopted properly. The apathy of the authorities in this respect is shameful and atrocious. If there is any virtue in the chloride of lime, why have not every street, lane, yard, and shiphold been visited and covered? Why have not the corporation long since advertised for men, bought the material, and roused themselves to do all for the preservation of our health, and to allay the fever of the public mind by such means as are in their hands? We must no longer suppress the opinion, that they are unfit for their stations, and that in suffering the time to pass now unimproved, they are incurring a fearful and guilty responsibility. We trust it is not yet too late for them to do something. All the accounts state that much depends on these measures, and that the cholera, if met with prompt medical aid, is a mild and very manageable disease. In the hope that our common council may at length be goaded on to their duty, we regard the future without that apprehension, that vague and exaggerated terror, which startle many around us. The approach of the plague is a misfortune, which, like all others, may be better endured with calmness and presence of mind. We trust the reality will be less terrible than the anticipation, and that business may go on without any material interruption. It is greatly in favor of the natives, that as yet the attacks appear to have been principally directed against emigrants, as if it were but the eruption of the pestilence which they had already inhaled in their own country. In London the people have quite lost their terrors; and even in Paris, after a tremendous panic, but not one of long duration, the clouds have rolled away, and left them again in safety to resume their ordinary occupations.

It is on occasions like this that the pious mind realizes the grandeur and joy of pure religion, and reposes itself amid the clash and thunder of surrounding dangers upon the faith in that Being who created them, and can support them in the dark hour. It is not that the believer is more safe than others from peril, for on all heads alike the tempest descends, but his heart is higher and calmer, he is readier to submit. The hurry and tumult of alarm and horror agitate not his bosom, but he awaits in quiet and cheerfulness the uncontrollable decree of heaven. Perhaps, against the fury of this terrific disorder no shield is more broad and impenetrable than such a spirit, which seems, like a spell, to guard the peaceful heart and at once to preserve it safe and happy.

Washington Irving.—This gentleman has acted with his characteristic and pervading sense of propriety in declining the polite invitation of our Philadelphia friends to a public dinner. It was quite proper that the invitation should be sent, but equally so that it should not be accepted. The fact that this is his native city, rendered it impossible for him to obviate the difficulty here; but, if he should encourage the practice in a single other place, he would be compelled to eat his way from Canada to Georgia, if not from the Atlantic to the Rocky mountains. It is easy to conceive the reluctance with which such a mind consents to be dragged, even for once, directly and personally into the glare of public notice. Esteem for him may be more appropriately expressed by cherishing that increasing literature, to which he has devoted his genius, to which he has made such large contributions, and to which he has given such a happy impulse. Instead of giving him a dinner, go buy the Alhambra. By the way, of this last work, we learn that the sale will probably not be less than twenty thousand. Right glad we are to learn this. Every individual should purchase a copy, if not out of actual curiosity, then from motives of patriotism; from a desire to show the world that literary labor and literary genius are not regarded here with carelessness; that we are not a dull, tasteless, and mere bargain-driving community. It is also mentioned by a contemporary, that up to the present time about twenty-five thousand copies have been sold of the Sketch Book. When literature begins to be profitable, men of education and intellect will "lend their thoughts" to the world.

The following is the reply of Mr. Irving to the letter of C. C. Biddle, Esq. and numerous other gentlemen, inviting him to the dinner in Philadelphia:

"Washington, June 9th, 1832.

"GENTLEMEN—I cannot feel otherwise than deeply sensible of the distinguished honor you propose to confer on me, in giving me a public dinner, on my return to Philadelphia. Associated as your city is with some of the most agreeable recollections of my early life, and endeared as it is to me by many cherished friendships, I know of no city but that of my birth, where the proffered testimonial of esteem and kindness would be more acceptable. I have, however, so strong and unfeigned a repugnance to being the object of public distinction of the kind, that, with the exception of the first welcome to my native place, I have made up my mind to decline all invitations but those of a private nature.

"Trusting that you will properly appreciate these reasons, and will feel assured of my heartfelt gratitude and perfect respect, I have the honor to be, gentlemen, your very obliged friend and servant,

WASHINGTON IRVING."

Literary prize.—We do not think the sum mentioned below is sufficient for the occasion. The best writers will scarcely enter the lists, for the certainty of such a slender inducement; and, risk and all considered, we fear few will strive. A good essay should be well paid for. Literary labor is too cheap. We copy this from a Southern paper:

"James H. Caldwell, the proprietor of the new theatre in this city, offers a prize of a gold medal, or silver cup, of the value of one hundred dollars, for the 'best History and Defence of the Drama.' Candidates for the prize to send in their essays by the first of August."

Poetry.—We were almost afraid Mr. Clarke had abandoned the muses. He is an old and valued, yet recently, but an indolent correspondent for this journal. May this remind him that we have always a corner at his service, and a hearty welcome into the bargain. We select this last one of his effusions from a Philadelphia paper. It is highly poetic.

The anniversary of the American Sunday School Union was held in Philadelphia, on the twenty-second ultimo—Alexander Henry, president, in the chair. The following beautiful hymn, written for the occasion by the editor of the Philadelphia Gazette, Mr. WILLIS GAYLORD CLARKE, was sung at the opening of the meeting.

We have met in peace, together,
 In this house of God again;
 Constant friends have led us hither,
 Here to chant the solemn strain:
 Here to breathe our adoration,
 While the balmy breeze of spring,
 Like the spirit of salvation,
 Comes, with gladness on its wing?

And, while nature glows with beauty,
 While the fields are decked with flowers:
 Shall our hearts forget their duty,
 Shall our souls neglect their powers?
 Shall not our hopes, ascending,
 Point us to a home above,
 Where, in glory, never-ending,
 He who made us smiles in love?
 There no autumn tempests gather,
 There no friends lament the dead;
 And on fields that never wither
 Fadeless rays of light are shed;
 There, with bright, immortal roses,
 Angels wreath their harps of gold,
 And each ransomed soul reposes
 Midst a scene of bliss untold.

We have met, and time is flying,
 We shall part; and still his wing,
 Sweeping o'er the dead and dying,
 Will the changeful seasons bring;
 Let us, while our hearts are lightest,
 In our fresh and early years,
 Turn to Him whose smile is brightest,
 And whose grace will calm our fears.

He will aid us, should existence
 With its sorrows sting the breast,
 Gleaming in the onward distance,
 Faith will mark the land of rest;
 There, mid day-beams round him playing,
 We our Father's face shall see,
 And shall hear him, gently saying,
 "Little children, come to me."

New works.—Messrs. Carey and Lea have received, and, we learn, will forthwith publish, the three following works:—"A Queer Book, by the Ettrick Shepherd," one volume; "Klosterheme, or the Masque, by the English Opium Eater," one volume; "England and France, or a Cure for the Ministerial Gallomania."

Audubon, the Ornithologist.—J. J. Audubon, the celebrated ornithologist, and his two assistants, arrived at Charleston on the third instant, in the revenue cutter Marion, after a tour through the Florida Keys. They have succeeded in taking five hundred species of birds, some of them entirely unknown heretofore, besides several specimens of minerals, shells, rocks, &c.

Walter Scott.—It is stated that Walter Scott, who is in Rome, is engaged on a new novel, the subject of which is taken from the history of the Knights of Malta.

LAW CASE.

This was an action in a plea of habeas corpus. It appeared in evidence that the plaintiff had written to the defendant, to inquire if he had any green cucumbers to dispose of. The defendant wrote in reply, that he had one thousand green cucumbers, and the plaintiff might have them at the rate of one dollar per hundred. The plaintiff, in consequence, transmitted the defendant the sum of ten dollars, and made a great preparation, inviting all his brethren to a feast of cucumbers; but, when the goods arrived, it was found that the cucumbers were white. The plaintiff contended that the defendant had not fulfilled his part of the contract, and this action was brought for the recovery of the sum advanced.

Stokes, for plaintiff, contended that white cucumbers could not be comprehended under the appellation of green cucumbers; for it is an established principle of law that black is not white; ergo, white is not green. 25 Johns. Rep. 200.

Nokes, for defendant. It is notorious that all cucumbers are white when they are green; as, indeed, that is the best evidence of their greenness. 12 Dow. 289. 6 Ves. 490. 3 Atk. 76. It has also been laid down by Lord Eldon, that blackberries are red when they are green. 36 Ch. Rep. 286.

Stokes. With submission to my learned brother, the case cited is irrelevant. The principles of a court of equity are not applicable at common law, for law is one thing and equity another. 6 Ves. & B. 37. 12 Ves. jr. 30. 3 Blackstone, 145. Besides, green blackberries can be applied to some useful purpose; for instance, to be boiled up into dye-stuff; but I put it to the court, what use in the world can a man make of white cucumbers?

Nokes. He can feed his hogs with them. 3 Chitty, 507.

Stokes. The court must take into consideration the object with which the plaintiff sent for the cucumbers. It appears by the evidence that it was to feast his brethren; now, feasting his hogs would not answer that purpose; for no person can say that the hogs are the plaintiff's brethren, without calling the plaintiff a hog, and that is actionable, and derogatory to the dignity of the court. 4 Starkie, 75. 3 Atk. 6. 2 Jac. 999. 1 Bla. 446. 14 Hopk. 512. 2 Dick. 609.

Nokes. It is considered by the philosophers that there is no such thing as color, that it is something merely imaginary; and of this there can be no doubt; for here's black, white, green, red, and blue; let the court shut their eyes, and they are all one.

Stokes. I put it to my learned brother, whether it would be all one to him whether his nose were red or green?

[Here the nose in question reddened more than ever.]

Nokes. I appeal to the court against personal reflections.

The plaintiff's counsel was called to order, and the court expressed a wish to see the articles in respect to which the controversy was brought. The cucumbers were accordingly produced, and, after minute inspection and profound deliberation, the court delivered the following learned opinion:

Per curiam. This is a case of great importance and some difficulty. On the one hand it is contended that white is not green; and on the other, that all green cucumbers are white. But it appears, that both plaintiff and defendant have mistaken their grounds. Upon inspecting the articles, it is evident that they are neither white nor green, being both. There is a case in point. In the celebrated case of Stradling versus Stiles, it was decided, that pied horses did not come under the denomination of black and white horses, being neither black nor white, but both. As to the suggestion of the defendant's counsel to shut our eyes, and then all colors will be alike, it merits our severest reprehension, as calling upon the court to decide blindly, which is inconsistent with the perfection of human reason, and our known regard to justice. The defendant contends that green cucumbers are all white; then, by his own showing, these cucumbers are not green, inasmuch as they are not all white, but spotted with green in divers places. The defendant, therefore, has not fulfilled his part of the contract, and the money must be refunded. You will accordingly find for the plaintiff.

Motion in arrest of judgment, on the ground that the plaintiff had, in the declaration, erroneously spelled the articles cucumbers, instead of cucumbers.

This motion was resisted by the plaintiff's counsel, on the ground that the defendant had made use of the same erroneous orthography in the pleadings.

Per curiam. The motion is well taken. A word of such importance ought to be properly spelled; but the defendant, having committed the same error, has no right to the remedy he seeks. Even the suggested correction is erroneous, and the court thinks it due to its dignity to reprimand all parties for their disregard of the proper orthography of the word, which is kookumber. The motion is denied.

SHERIDAN'S DEVIL.*

*The devil alluded to above, is neither a printer's devil nor a sinner's devil, but only an epicurean's devil; or, in other words, a provocative for a failing appetite, composed generally of some kind of fish, flesh, or fowl highly seasoned, and then griddled.

Instruction.

The long robe is an emblem of uninterrupted business. The mirror intimates that our actions, in order to render them praiseworthy, should be accommodated to those of other men, with whom we reside; hence the motto which advises us to cast an eye on our own faults, so, that finding blemishes in ourselves, we may not only endeavor to clear ourselves thereof, but likewise to show a little indulgence towards those of others.

The ivy, which never seems satisfied with its elevation, but is always striving to climb, higher and higher, and destroying that from which it gathers its support, denotes ambition; for an ambitious man spares neither friendship, country, nor religion, if they stand in the way of his exaltation. The lion is emblematical of pride.

The maid is represented young, as being thereby more subject to infection, in consequence of the disorderly conduct and want of care common to youth in general. The palidness and languor denote the virulency which consumes by imperceptible degrees: the habit, the mournful condition of the infected, ending often in death. The walnut bough denotes contagion, as does the basilisk, whose breath and very look are contagious.

[Translated and verified for the New-York Mirror.]

He who is foolish when he wives,
Is like to die before he thrives.
He who still works, may, if he please,
Be always thinking of his ease.
Did every fool a white cap wear,
Men would a flock of geese appear.
Wine is a turn-coat, first a friend,
But e'er a traitor in the end.
Who seeks revenge for every wrong,
May live in honor—but not long.

He richer proves, whose wit was bought,
Than he who his obtained for nought.
What charity doth give away,
Heaven will with interest repay.
You ne'er should say, and ne'er should do,
The word or deed wrath prompts thee to.
That pleasure shun, which may to-morrow,
Perthance, become the cause of sorrow.

ORIGINAL TALES.

LAZARILLA, OR THE GIPSEY GIRL.

Initiated from the Spanish.

It was evening. Don Adolar, attended by a single servant, approached the skirts of a forest, in the neighborhood of Toledo. The spot was one of those which lovers would have chosen for their clandestine meetings, combining the wild with the beautiful, the solitude of the desert with the security of a castle. Adolar was dressed in the costume of a Spanish minstrel, with a guitar slung behind him, and Pedrillo, his attendant, wore the dress common to the generality of the peasants of the country. They had no sooner entered the obscurity of the forest, than the sound of a gong was heard. Adolar paused for a moment, in order to discover the direction whence it came, and then commanding Pedrillo to follow him, threaded his way through the entangling briars which interrupted his approach. They soon arrived at a glade in the bosom of the forest, in which the remains of a fire was still slumbering in its embers, surrounded by every appearance indicative of a recent encampment. Adolar stood for a few moments in silent astonishment, wondering at the novelty of the scene, when he was interrupted by Pedrillo, who, after examining the vistas through the neighboring trees, exclaimed, "Oh—oh—I understand—some of the gipsy folks have been here, and yonder they go towards the castle."

"Towards what castle?" inquired Adolar.

"Why that one, under the balcony of which you offered up your evening devotions last night," answered Pedrillo.

"Are we then so near to it?" said Adolar.

"Certainly," replied Pedrillo; "it is not above a quarter of a mile from the skirts of the wood; but do you know, señor, that I am confoundedly hungry."

"Talk not to me of hunger," exclaimed Adolar, "when I hope to behold her for whom only life is worth possessing."

"Well, I have heard that a hungry dog is sharp sighted," rejoined Pedrillo, "and so I expect you suppose that you will see better for going without your meals."

"None of your jests," retorted Adolar, with a portion of severity that he was seldom accustomed to use towards his attendant, "they but ill suit with my present humor."

"Quite as much so as your humor does with my appetite," returned Pedrillo, with the utmost impudence.

"Well, well," said Adolar, "do you away to the village. I will soon join you at the inn."

"I wish I was in it now," rejoined Pedrillo, "but had you not better go with me?"

Adolar shook his head.

"There is no time like the present," continued Pedrillo; "but to tell you the truth, señor, I have never been able to look at you for the last month without thinking of a camelion, for you live upon air, and change your color almost as often: last week you were a pilgrim, a day or two since you were a forester, and now you are a troubadour."

"Away, sirrah," exclaimed Adolar, "and wait for me at the inn."

"And must my appetite also wait?" inquired Pedrillo.

"Leave me, and do what you please," was the reply.

"One thing I can do," was the ready answer, "but not the other. I can leave you if you please, but I cannot do what I please; for I have no money. The five dollars which you gave me yesterday, were weeded out of me last night by a gipsy girl, even to the very last maravedi; so if you would wish me to do what I please, you must please to give me the means to do it with."

"Your extravagance is unbearable," observed Adolar, giving him a piece of silver.

"That is more than your liberality is," rejoined Pedrillo, as he turned the money over in the palm of his hand; "but never mind, this is enough for one day, and to-morrow must provide for itself, so fare thee well, master of mine. I will await for you at the inn."

Saying this, he soon disappeared under the branches of the trees, whereon Adolar turned his steps in the contrary direction, and was immediately followed by a little gipsy, who issued from the shelter of a wood, in the bower of which she had lain secreted during the above conversation.

The castle towards which Adolar had directed his steps, was one of those common in Spain, and had been erected more for the sake of security than beauty. It enclosed within itself all that might be necessary to enable it, in case of extremity, to sustain a siege of some duration, being entirely surrounded by a wall and moat. Over the water hung various balconies and towers, equally adapted for the different purposes of war or peace. The moon had just risen when Adolar appeared beneath its turrets, followed, unknown to him, by the gipsy girl. He had no sooner arrived than he exclaimed,

"Yonder is the terrace on which I last night beheld my lovely Francesca, but she could not possibly recognize me in this disguise. I will endeavor to recall the air which I used to sing to her in the mountains of Andalusia; perhaps it may reach her ear and remind her of her Adolar."

He then struck his guitar, and sung the following song.

I love thee, Francesca—thy tresses of jet,
And the dark glancing light of thine eye,
On my heart an impression of magic hath set,
That will leave thy name there when I die.
But what is mere beauty? The brightness of spring,
Of autumn, when summer's sweet days have gone by;
A flower that once touch'd by Time's blighting wing,
Will be left all neglected to wither and die.

I love thee, Francesca—I doat on thy charms,
But how many have charms like to thine?
How many whom I might enfold in these arms,
And call them this moment all mine?
Yet they have but beauty, the bloom of an hour;
They know not, they feel not the love they impart,
But fade in our arms like a cold, senseless flower,
From its stem torn asunder, and blighted at heart.

I love thee, Francesca—and fondly believe
That my love is as warmly repaid;
Those eyes beaming fondness, they could not deceive,
Some glance had their falsehood betrayed.
Thou shalt be the blossom and I'll be the tree,
And when the cold winter of death shall come o'er,
When its blight, my Francesca, shall fall upon thee,
The tree shall grow sapless and blossom no more.

At the conclusion of the above, the gipsy girl who had, concealed behind a tree, listened with great attention to every word which Adolar had uttered, struck her tambourin, and came dancing towards him. He suddenly turned round and exclaimed,

"Whom have we here?"

"I am called," said she, "Lazarilla. To whom I owe my birth, I know not. I was brought up by a gipsy woman who treated me as her child, and whom I had the misfortune to lose about two months ago. Since then I have seen various changes: sometimes faring well, and sometimes ill: to-day in festivity, to-morrow in misery; but always light-hearted—dancing, singing, beating my tambourin, sounding my castanets and promising good luck to every comer, for which, in return, I get money and good advice. But I am not ungrateful—I prognosticate to the warrior, victory; to the sickly, health; to the maiden, a lover; to the widow, a comforter; to the advocate, a lawsuit; to the avaricious, riches—in short, I scatter around me health, wealth, honor, pleasure, and length of days."

"It is surprising," observed Adolar, "at what an early age you have learnt to profit by the follies of mankind: but here, take this, and leave me."

"Let me first, señor Adolar," said she, as she took the purse, "earn the gift."

"Do you then know me?" inquired Adolar.

"Let me see your hand, señor," said she, taking it, and then looking in his face. "I know that your name is Adolar; that you are in love, and that the hope of seeing your Francesca, brought you to this spot."

"Do you then know who Francesca is?" inquired Adolar.

"She is," said Lazarilla, "a rich and noble orphan, the ward of Don Renuncio de Zapardor, the owner of this castle, who is about to give her hand to a certain Don Antonio."

"Then all my hopes are vain," exclaimed Adolar.

"Why so?" rejoined Lazarilla, "she is not yet married; and if she return your love, and your intentions towards her are honorable, I will endeavor to obtain an interview for you."

"To obtain her hand," replied Adolar, "is the highest object of my wishes; and if you will only be the means of procuring me an interview, there is no reward which I will not readily afford you."

"It is not interest," replied Lazarilla, interrupting him, "which guides me; for I would not, for all the gold in the world, assist you, if I did not think that your intentions towards this maiden were honest and honorable. Do you then return to your servant at the village, and leave me to arrange my plans. You need rest and refreshment, and the sooner you take them both the better, for you must meet me here with the first dawn, as soon as the shepherd's star glitters in the sky."

"Farewell then, my little friend," ejaculated Adolar, "and may heaven aid and protect you."

On this Adolar returned to the village, and Lazarilla to join her companions.

Mischief seldom sleeps well, and thus it was with Don Zapardor and Don Antonio, who, without any preconcerted plans, found themselves up and in the garden long before the sun had risen.

"Good morning to thee, señor," exclaimed Zapardor, as he entered the garden and perceived Antonio. "I am glad I have met with you thus early, for I have been ruminating nearly all night on our projects. And though you have done much in securing your uncle on his return from America, I have my doubts as to the fate of his daughter Maria, who, were she to make her appearance, would deprive you of all title to your uncle's estates."

Ere Antonio had time to reply, Lazarilla entered the garden and secretly approached a grotto flanked with stone seats on either side, and therein secreted herself.

"I must own," observed Antonio, "that the fear of Maria's reappearance has sometimes crossed my mind, but I think that there cannot be the shadow of danger as long as my uncle is an inmate in yonder tower, for no other person would be enabled to identify her."

"You are right," replied Zapardor; "but Alvarez has a friend more powerful, and therefore more dangerous than himself. I mean the viceroy. Now the grand inquisitor is anxious to remove the scandal which his appointment to the supreme power has occasioned. The viceroy has therefore been secretly tried, found guilty, excommunicated, and sentenced to death. Nor will the execution be much longer delayed; but zeal is sometimes obliged to give way to prudence. Know farther, the grand inquisitor has judged you worthy of being the means of delivering Spain from the power of this exalted criminal; obey, and the hand of Francesca, the ward of the viceroy elect, shall be yours; for it was to me that all Spain looked up when the intrigues of Alzirás obtained for him that power which by right ought to have been mine. Yet it heeds not for the past: when Alzirás falls, Zapardor will succeed him. Nay, answer not, but mark me. The secrets of the holy office must not be known to its enemies. At least while they have their liberty and the means of scandalizing the performances of its duties. Therefore, now I have informed you of their decision, if you will not be their friend, they will not let you live to be their enemy. But still there is no necessity that you should yourself be the executioner: there are a hundred bravos in Toledo, that for a little hire would do your duty. So that it be done, matters not how it is done. Let the duke fall, and Francesca shall be yours. He is hourly expected at Toledo. He is fond of hunting. The darkness of a forest might afford the means of completing our wishes; but that heeds not; if one occasion does not offer, we must make another. There is not a moment to be lost: away and prepare for his reception. You have heard my determination. I will now listen to no reply."

"Good heavens!" exclaimed Lazarilla, as she came forth from her hiding-place, as soon as Zapardor and Antonio had departed, "what villainous projects have I overheard? The danger to which the viceroy is exposed, must be immediately warded off, and I will then endeavor to obtain the release of this villain's uncle from yonder tower. But I must away, or I shall be too late for my appointment with Adolar; he might be able to assist me in warning the viceroy of his danger."

Adolar was, as Lazarilla expected, at the appointed place long before she arrived, awaiting her coming with the utmost anxiety. His first question was to inquire about Francesca, but as soon as Lazarilla made him acquainted with the danger to which the viceroy was exposed, he informed her that Don Alzirás was his father, whom he had offended, and was thus compelled to keep himself unknown. He immediately sent off Pedrillo to Toledo, and learnt that his father was hourly expected, and that he had appointed to hunt by torch-light, in Zapardor's forests, on the approaching night. This, from the conversation which Lazarilla had overheard, she knew would be the time chosen for his assassination, and it was therefore arranged that Adolar and Andreas, a favorite companion of Lazarilla, would watch the motions of Zapardor and Antonio. In the meantime, Lazarilla undertook to obtain the release of the prisoner in the tower, and to endeavor to prevail upon Francesca to leave the castle of Zapardor.

As was expected, the viceroy arrived, and the hunting tents were pitched on the skirts of the forest, at a short distance from the castle of Zapardor. As soon as this circumstance became known to Adolar, he, with Andreas, repaired to a spot, which they had previously selected, and whence they might discern every person who came out of the castle of Zapardor. After waiting for nearly an hour, he saw a figure enveloped in a large mantle pass the draw-bridge, and immediately plunge into the deepest recesses of the forest. They followed him to a spot where two men appeared to be waiting his coming.

"Now, my friends," said he, as soon as he came up to them, "the chase has commenced; it therefore remains for you to seek an opportunity of fulfilling your mission. But, hark! some one approaches. Hide yourselves, it may perhaps be the viceroy himself."

Antonio immediately retired, and the two men had no sooner hidden themselves behind some bushes, than the viceroy, with a rifle in his hand, entered without any attendant. The two bravos immediately rushed upon him, and wrested the rifle from his hand, when Adolar and Andreas made their appearance. Thereon the assassins took to flight, and were pursued by Adolar and his companion. The viceroy had scarcely had time to recover himself from the confusion which this sudden attack occasioned, when some of his guards and attendants came up, and among others, señor Zapardor, who coolly asked,

"What may have happened to your highness?"

"Two bravos have just attempted to assassinate me; and, had it not been for the arrival of two strangers, they would have completed their purpose. Away, gentlemen, down yonder path-way. My protectors, for they have followed the villains, may perhaps need assistance. If you discover them bring them hither, that I may reward them according to their deserts."

No sooner had three or four of the viceroy's suit followed the path which he had pointed out to them, than Lazarilla made her appearance, attended by Alziras and Francesca. She exclaimed as she approached,

"I have brought to your highness an unfortunate man, who is not, I believe, utterly unknown to you, Don Alziras."

"Is it possible," said the viceroy, "that this can be my friend Alziras?"

"It is," replied the latter, "but too true. I had no sooner escaped from the dungeons of the inquisition, than I fell into those of the barbarous Zapardor, whence this dear child has just effected my deliverance; yes, this little gipsy girl, who, by the kind interposition of Providence turns out to be my long-lost daughter, my Maria! Her age, the resemblance which she bears to her mother, the time when and the place where she was lost and found, a medal which was around her neck, all prove to me that this is my long-lost daughter!"

"And where," cried the viceroy, "is my poor child? But did you say, my friend, that your captivity originated with Don Zapardor?"

"I did say so," replied Alziras; "but I was waylaid and delivered up to him by my nephew Antonio."

"Nor is this all, your highness," added Lazarilla, "for this Zapardor instigated Antonio to attempt the life of your highness, and the two assassins, from whose daggers you have just escaped, were hired by him for that purpose. The plot I overheard, and communicated to Don Adolar, who was one of those who preserved your life."

"Oh, yes," exclaimed the viceroy, "I know him now; it was—it was my son; and why is he not here, that I may once more take him to my heart!"

He had scarcely uttered this exclamation, when Adolar entered, and was about to throw himself at his father's feet; but he caught him in his arms, and enfolded him to his bosom. Antonio had, in the meantime, rushed to the assistance of the assassins, whereby he received a wound from Adolar, which had caused his death. Zapardor was exiled, and Adolar blest with the hand of his beloved Francesca. Lazarilla was married to Andreas, who turned out to be a nobleman's son, who had, for the love of Lazarilla, forsaken his father's house and joined the gipseys.

REVERIES BY NIGHT.

WHAT a lovely night! I cannot conceive two rivals more equally invested with charms of an opposite description, than a quiet, moonlight night, and a blossomy, fragrant, rich, dewy, still morning in June. For my part, I have ever found the former more tempting to the feet, more soothing to the imagination. I am even now touched by the delicious spell. I have roamed alone over the silent pavements, admiring the depth of shadows which the long wall of buildings casts broadly and with unequal outline upon the street, and the inexpressibly charming and mellow floods of light which the moon is pouring on the opposite side, softly sleeping, like a smile, on the lovely scene. Then moonlight is so exquisite in its picturesque effects—so magical and subduing. Every thing that is touched by it is, etherealized and elevated and softened. Beautiful objects are invested with higher beauty—grandeur rises to sublimity, and sublimity oppresses the mind with a heavy weight of admiration. Whoever looks at yonder church with deep porticos, lofty columns, and high flight of steps, will perceive what I am endeavoring to describe—the wonderful character of poetry which moonlight sheds upon the images of a landscape. The shadows falling at angles across the building—the gleaming light which streams down on the whole—strike the eye and the mind with unusual force. Have you ever been in the woods by moonlight? A scene always so full of romantic picturesqueness—the old heavy knotted vines, twisted and intertwined with each other, like anacondas—the fresh roof of green-leaved branches, and the tall trees, with all their variety—the straight, slender sapling, that rises like a graceful girl—the immense oaks, striking their gnarled roots far and wide, and heaving abroad their sinewy arms like giants—the old stumps—the bowers—the verdant glades—ravines—valleys and other recesses which awaken one's rapture so often, in a forest ramble; and then, peradventure, the brook—that beautiful roamer of the wood—that ever sweet and joyous daughter of the hill—leaping and singing for ever and ever in its fairy journey—taking every shape and form to please the most sportive imagination—now lapsing like liquid glass, then foaming with mimic fury—now winding with noiseless tread by emerald banks, and fringed with flowers; now bubbling on stones, now pouring in a tiny cataract, and now sleeping in a silver lake. These images, always so grateful to the imagination, become, in the mellow moonlight, positively gifted with a fairy beauty; and the rover through a wood, under a bright summer moon, must feel himself drinking in true inspiration at every step. How perfectly still: how hushed is all around, but for the brook and the catydid, and the distant frog and tree-toad. In the shades, how mildly the floating fire-flies flash, gleaming so strangely with their moving red light in the pale moonbeams; and how the light pours itself along the carpet of the wood, marking it with various shadows, and falling through the branches and every little opening of the trees, till it is all over sprinkled with the richest and loveliest of lustre. Then the sky at night! What a wonder; what a boundless profusion of magnificence. To what a stupendous elevation it works up the mind! There is no object in all creation, accessible to human eyes, half so immense in its wonders and splendors, half so calculated to lift the soul from earth, as the moon and sky at night, when the clouds are not so many as to obscure the gaze. Reflect upon it, dear reader, when next you look upon its blue tremulous bosom. Forget the last jam, the new opera, the contemplated excursion to the country, and feel what it is which overhangs you. That azure vault is endless distance. That silver spotted circle—those gems flashing in clusters—they are worlds, habitable worlds, suns, systems, created by the same hand which moulded thy pliant limbs, and gave thee eyes to regard, and mind to wonder at them. The beautiful earth on which thou creepst, a feeble evanescent insect, is nothing to these. It might be rent apart, and with all human pride and power be in an instant destroyed, yet this same star-paved road of heaven would be shining thus still and splendid.

I never, in my life, since I can recollect, looked upon that sight without an involuntary elevation of mind. It never failed to strike me with holy awe; to overwhelm me with calm but oppressive wonder. In my lightest moments it has cast its spell on me, and touched me with sudden thought and silence, even when I have been roaming forth in mirth, with the young and lively. I remember one night at the theatre there was a riot; an unpopular performer was hissed by one party and supported by another. The house was excessively crowded, and it seemed with actual demons—such shouting, screaming, shrieking, yelling and whooping—such swearing, cursing, quarreling and deadly blasphemous imprecations—such struggling, fighting, and diabolical passions were exhibited, that at length, wearied and disgusted, with a depressed heart and throbbing temples, half suffocated with the heated and smoky air, rendered more close and nauseous by the unusual crowd, I made my way to the saloon, and leaned from the window. The effect which the sight of the heavens had on me, I shall never forget. The deep pervading hushed stillness; the calm, holy light and order and beauty reigning there; the round moon, with a flashing diamond riding by her side, and the clusters of other large and trembling stars glimmering along that azure tide, through the slowly moving silver clouds, all combined to charm me forth from the loathsome revel within. I stole out alone, and drank in the fresh air like new wine. There was a pale light in the east before I tore myself away. Nothing is more beautiful than moonlight loneliness in a city. SEDLEY.

THE BAPTISM.

It was the sultry hour of noon. The leaves Hung almost motionless upon the branch That drooped, as it were faint, beneath the sun's Fierce power. From the high hills, where fiery rays Burned the unsheltered earth, the weary flocks Came down into the quiet vales, and stood In the cool places to allay their thirst, From streams whose running waters murmuring Refreshed the heated air. The shepherd lay Upon his grassy couch, beneath the shade Of some o'erarching bough, and so beguiled The tedious hour with his rude lay of love.

The corn was ripe. That beauteous morn had seen The yellow grain spread to the rising sun By groups of joyous reapers; but their toil Was for a while suspended. They had laid Their sickles down, and sought the gushing spring, Whose verdant brink allured them to repose.

The Jordan's waters slept—and not a wave Washed on its flowery bank; and o'er its breast, Which like a sheet of gold lay in the heat Of noontide, and reflected every beam With dazzling brilliancy, the stirring breeze, That bore a freshness scarce perceptible, So lightly passed, it rippled not the stream, Nor shook the slumbering quiet of the leaves And flowers that grew along the river's marge.

The Savior journeyed on. He had not stopped Since early morn to rest his weary limbs Beneath delightful shades, nor often turned From off his sunny path; save when athirst The gushing of a brook in some lone spot Fell sweetly on his ear, inviting thus To stay his footsteps by its plashing waves, And lave his burning lips. He tarried not Beside the crystal waters, but again Resumed his toilsome way, as if his long Hot task were but a pleasant wandering.

The sun hath sunken low behind the hills, Whose shadows stretch far o'er the spicy fields, And darken the deep valleys, where the flocks Have gathered for repose. The air is fresh As morning ere the orient be tinged With gold; and it is redolent of flowers, And frankincense, and myrrh, and passeth o'er Wide orchards of pomegranates, bearing thence A perfume, mingling with the fragrant breath Of ripen'd grain. It is the time when from The harvesting the reapers leave the field, And wend their homeward way. The deep blue sky Is pure as if there ne'er had been a cloud Upon the face of heaven; it is so calm, And so exceedeth nature's fairest mood, That not the first blue arch, which brightly shone On Eden's paradise was lovelier.

John standeth patiently on Jordan's bank. He holdeth in his hand a staff pluck'd from The wilderness, and leaneth for support, Like one fatigued with tiresome journeying. He hath unloosed the leathern zone, and cast Aside his raiment of the camel's hair, As if to woo the kisses of the breeze That stirs the tresses of his unshorn hair. He doth await his Master's presence there; And hath looked back to the far hills, o'er which The way-path leadeth up to Galilee, To mark the Savior's coming; and at length, Descrict him afar, descending slow The green declivity that slopeth down The distant mountain to the river's edge. John lingereth not, but like a gladsome child, That bounds away to greet its coming sire, He hastens forth elate with reverent joy To meet the Son of God.

They stand upon The Jordan's golden sands, and where the clear Blue stream flows with a gentle swell, and makes The water murmur with a pleasant sound, Inviting the warm bather to its cool Refreshing depths, the shore goes down into The crystal element, there Jesus' form Is bowed beneath the waves. The calm bright heavens Unfold their broad blue canopy, while from Th' invisible world God's spirit like a dove Descendeth, shrouded in a cloud of pure, Unspotted brilliancy, whence speaketh thus A voice, unlike the tones of earth, and heard Alone in Eden, and by holy men, To whom His will was spoken—"This is my Beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." BRIEF EXTRACTS FROM WASHINGTON IRVING.

To the Editors of the New-York Mirror.

GENTLEMEN—I have been reading the Alhambra, in common with many thousands, and am wonderfully pleased with the simplicity, grace, and elegance of the style. I am charmed with the description of the birds in the story called the Pilgrim of Love, in the second volume. It is indeed a lively transcript of nature, and truly witty and satirical. Many of the gentle strokes of humor are really delightful, as are also the little sententious remarks and off-handed similes with which the author's writings abound. I send you a few sentences which I have marked with my pencil as I read. As they are very brief, I hope you will admit them into the Mirror, and oblige your old correspondent PORTIA.

RUINED MANSION.—I have often observed that the more proudly a mansion has been tenanted in the day of its prosperity, the humbler are the inhabitants in the day of its decline; and that the palace of the king commonly ends in being the resting-place of the beggar.

THE RICH AND POOR.—There are two classes of people to whom life seems one long holiday, the very rich and the very poor; one because they need do nothing, the other because they have nothing to do.

SPANISH INDOLENCE.—Give a Spaniard the shade in summer, and the sun in winter, a little bread, garlic, oil, and garbanzos, an old brown cloak, and a guitar, and let the world roll on as it pleases.

SPAIN.—The moment it escapes from cultivation, the desert and the garden are ever side by side.

LOVE OF NATURE AMONG THE SPANIARDS.—I have often remarked the sensibility of the common people of Spain to the charms of natural objects. The lustre of a star, the beauty or fragrance of a flower, the crystal purity of a fountain, will inspire them with a kind of poetical delight.

FUNERAL IN THE NIGHT.—The torch-light was perfectly ghastly, as it revealed the countenance of the corpse, which, according to a Spanish custom, was borne uncovered on an open bier.

MATRIMONY.—He who tempers the wind to the shorn lamb, accommodates the yoke of matrimony to the submissive neck.

A GOOD HUSBAND.—Peregril bore all the heavy dispensations of wife and children with as meek a spirit as his donkey bore the water-jars; and, however he might shake his ears in private, never ventured to question the household virtues of his slattern spouse.

COMFORTABLE REFRESHMENT.—Dry blows serve in lieu of pander in Spain for all beasts of burden.

MAN'S LOVE.—What is the love of restless, roving man? A vagrant stream, that dallies for a time with each flower upon its bank, then passes on and leaves them all in tears.

PASSION MORE INFLUENTIAL THAN DUTY.—The plans of a lover are promptly executed.

WITS.—Wits have a great dislike to labor.

A BRUNETTE.—It is true, her complexion was tinged by the ardor of a southern sun; but it was to give richness to the mantling bloom of her cheek, and to heighten the lustre of her melting eyes.

WOMAN'S SHIELD.—The artless maiden, in her own modesty and innocence, had guardians more effectual than the bolts and bars prescribed by her vigilant aunt.

ANOTHER.—Nature had set up a safeguard in her face, that forbade all trespass upon her premises; but ladies who have least cause to fear for themselves are most ready to keep watch over their more tempting neighbors.

FAMILY GROUPE.—The niece had been transferred to the guardianship of her aunt, under whose overshadowing care she vegetated in obscurity, like an opening rose blooming beneath a briar.

PROGRESS OF THE SEASONS.—The pomegranate ripened, the vine yielded up its fruit, the autumnal rains descended in torrents from the mountains, the Sierra Nevada became covered with a snowy mantle, and wintry blasts howled through the halls of the Alhambra.

LUTE PLAYING.—She drew forth such ravishing tones as to thaw even the frigid bosom of the immaculate Fredegonda, that region of eternal winter, into a genial glow.

MORAL EMBLEMS.

PLENTY.—A beautiful woman, crowned with a garland, dressed in a green embroidered gown, and holding a cornucopia in her right hand, and a sheaf composed of ears of corn, bunches of grapes, &c. in her left.

The garland denotes cheerfulness and mirth that inseparably accompany her. The cornucopia and sheaf are emblems of the affluence of all things necessary to human life.

IDLENESS.—An old hag clothed in rags, with her head covered with a black cloth, sitting in a careless posture upon a stone; her left hand, of which the elbow rests upon the knee, supports her reclining head; her right hand holds a torpedo. The motto is "torpet iners."

She is described old, because at that age strength and activity begin to fail; her rags denote that idleness produces poverty; the black cloth about her head signifies her senseless thoughts; the torpedo, which is a fish that even if only touched with a cord or stick, so benumbs the hand that it is unfit for any business, shows her sloth and aversion to labor, as intimated by the motto.

FLATTERY.—A woman dressed in an affected habit, playing upon a flute, a bee-hive is placed at her side, and a buck is sleeping at her feet.

The buck denotes flattery, because he is so charmed with music that he lets himself be taken. The bees are true emblems of the same, for they carry honey as well as a sting.

DESPAIR.—A sorrowful looking man, clothed in a black ragged garment; he holds back the covering from his breast with both his hands, and gazes upon his heart, which is encompassed with serpents.

The raggedness of his garment shows that he undervalues and neglects himself. His open breast, and the serpents, denote the trouble and vexation of worldly things, which are always gnawing the heart.

AGRICULTURE.—A woman with a homely rustic face, but comely notwithstanding! clothed in a green gown, and crowned with a garland, composed of ears of corn. She holds the zodiac in her left hand, and a flowering shrub in her right; a ploughshare lies at her feet.

The verdant robe signifies hope, without which no person would labor. The twelve signs declare the different seasons, which the tiller ought to observe; the plough, is the most useful instrument in agriculture.

EXTRACT FROM AN UNPUBLISHED DRAMA.

SCENE.—A room in antique taste, with folding doors and bay-windows; a harp and piano-forte. Emma alone, in a neat provincial dress of the Tyrolean border country.

SONG.

Emma. Still his image hovers round me,
Meets me still where'er I stray;
Oh what magic spell hath bound me,
Driven the power of flight away?
Why does memory fondly treasure
Hopes that never must be mine?
Why recall those dreams of pleasure,
That o'er me no more may shine?
Still e'en now would I dissemble,
From my heart my thoughts still hide;
But 'tis vain, my limbs all tremble,
Duty sinks 'neath love's deep tide.

Emma. He comes again! I must recall my spirits.
Emma, thou art the servant, he the master.
Remember not what he has been to thee,
But what thou art to him.

Enter Julius, whom she endeavors to escape.

Jul. Does Emma fly me!
What have I done to merit this reception?
Tell me, has childhood's playmate, youth's companion,
No claim, no title to a kinder greeting?

Emma. Count.

Jul. How have I from thee deserved this coldness?
Count! Is it thus that Emma greets her Julius?

Emma. You find a meaning in my words, which I

Ne'er placed thereon; for you were always kind,
Nor ever sought o'er me to play the master.
Believe me, then, I meant not to offend.

Jul. Whence is this coldness of thy words and manners?
Where is the confidence that once could pour
Our hearts' free thoughts into each other's bosoms?
Whence is this change? speak, speak?

Emma. Oh, lock thy memory!
Forget the time when we, like innocent flowers,
Nursed by the morning dews of life's first spring,
Unfolded to each other's gaze the blossoms
Of every thought, that budded in our hearts.
That time has passed away, those flowers have withered,
Or to each other would impart but poison.

Jul. Nay, tell me what has thus disturbed the current
Of thoughts that once together flowed so purely?

Emma. You have become the master, I the servant.

Jul. Ere I, some five years since, did join my regiment,
Did we not interchange our mutual vows
Of love eternal and of constancy?

Emma. We did, but rash vows ne'er should be fulfilled.

Jul. Oh, I to thee have kept mine still unchanged,
Though beauty's daughters, with love-beaming glances,
Have wooed me; though my comrade's taunting jests
Have striven to change my silent heart's religion,
And rob me of the faith I vowed to thee.
Yet thy pure image was my shield: I thought
Of thee, and thus the stormy world's wide waves
Against my heart's fidelity were broken.
When discord spread around, when glory's temple
In thunders opened wide, and for its heroes
My country loudly called, then I was with them.
I fought, I bled—this cross was my reward;
And when my name was ranked among the brave
Who saved their country, then I thought of thee,
And hoped thy heart would proudly beat to hear
The deeds that crowned thy lover's name with glory.
That thought was dearer to my heart than honor,
And louder than the praises of my triumph.

Emma. Oh heaven, look down, and nerve my heart with firmness!

Jul. When peace returned, to thee I flew; for love
Lent wings unto my courser's speed, and strength
To me: no rest I knew nor night nor day,
But deemed delay a robbery on life's spring.
I came: a glance restored exhausted nature,
For in that glance love beamed with all its splendor.
But the first greeting o'er, in vain I sought thee;
The gleam of light, that seemed the dawn of day,
Has settled down into the depth of night.

Emma. Oh do not, count, thus rend my soul with anguish.

Jul. Methought at first it was my parent's presence,
Who knew not of our heart's pure union, darkened
Love's dawn; but now we are alone, and yet
Mine Emma flies th' embraces of her Julius.

Emma. Oh, this is more than mortal heart can bear!
Do not despise me if thy passionate words
O'er-mate my strength, nor scorn me though the visions
That memory wakes master my heart's endurance.
Leave me, then; leave me.

Jul. (pressing her in his arms.) Emma, none beholds us,
And yet thou fain wouldst hurry from my presence.

Emma. Have pity on me, count, nor break a heart
That love and sorrow have already blighted.

Jul. Oh, thou dost shun me now as eagerly
As thou wert wont to seek; let not restraint
Thus overcast the morning of our love.

Emma. Nay, call it not restraint, for it is duty.

Jul. Thou lov'st me still; and though thy lips conceal it,
'Tis glancing in thine eyes; "break not a heart
That love and sorrow have already blighted."

Those were thy words.

Emma. Oh yes, they were; and would
To heaven that I felt not their bitter import!

Jul. If joy or comfort thou wouldst see, behold
In me a friend whose heart and hand would serve thee.

Emma. But I from thee can never hope assistance.

Jul. And why? Perchance, thou fear'st my parents' anger
Would light upon our love, but there you wrong them;
The weeds of prejudice could ne'er take root
Within their noble hearts. Have we not shared
An equal love together?

Emma. Oh yes, I own it;

The child's adoption shared a child's caresses;
But now our fates must sunder us for ever.
Thou art the heir of noble ancestry,
I the poor daughter of a forester.

Jul. Think not thus meanly of thyself.

Emma. I must,

Or others would think meanly of me.
Shall I, by tearing from thy parents' arms
A son, on whom their every hope is fixed,
With black ingratitude reward that love
Which sheltered me in helpless infancy?
No, no, I was not born for that high state,
To which thy love would raise me; no, my home
Is 'neath a cottage, and the massy walls
Of this high castle press upon my heart.
If love can give thee courage to o'erleap
The barrier custom has around thee spread,
Then gratitude shall nerve my arm with courage
To bar the gates which fortune opens before me. [Exit Emma.]

Jul. I follow.

Now she is gone, and absence o'er my soul
Comes like a dark cloud o'er the midnight moon,
To him who sees its glory on the mountains,
While he roams darkling through the vale below.
But let me hence, and strive in gloomy forests
To lose myself, and find the peace I've lost.

FINE ARTS.

GREENOUGH'S CHANTING CHERUBS.

Two communications have been received on this subject, begging us to solicit public attention to these exquisite specimens of sculpture, from the chisel of our countryman, Greenough. This we have done several times before, but very cheerfully comply with the wishes of our correspondents in again expressing our admiration of this group, as a specimen of art probably never surpassed by any American, and which has a strong claim upon the liberal bounty of the community. We insert the remarks of D. and freely acquiesce in their truth.—Eds. N. Y. Mirror.

GENTLEMEN.—Nothing is more common than for us to boast of an ardent zeal for the promotion of the fine arts in this country, and of the progress which we have made towards the power of producing, from our own native resources, those elegant embellishments of life. It is not, however, my opinion, that we are yet advanced much beyond the incipient steps in this career, which may, to be sure, hereafter be brilliant. My reasons for saying so at the present time are, that poetry, painting, music and sculpture, all receive less encouragement and notice than they deserve, and than are necessary to their development and reward. There is too much mechanical calculation on these subjects. There is a too unexpressed eagerness to read horrid stories, to behold striking sights, and to enjoy the marvellous. Simplicity does not yet charm as it should. Calvin Edson, the living skeleton—a giant—a dwarf—these seldom fail to obtain a profuse patronage; but a book of sweet poetry lies on the publisher's shelves, and a charming picture is too often known only to artists and a small circle of amateurs. The highest order of music receives less applause than noisy choruses or comic songs; and I suspect a play actor who should stop at propriety and nature in his representations, would be considered, by the greater portion of the audience, but a dull fellow.

An evidence of the truth of these facts may be found in the fate of the Chanting Cherubs. There is every reason why we Americans should visit this group. In the first place, it is intrinsically and exquisitely beautiful; a choice and delicate piece of work; and all, capable of feeling the power of art, must derive sincere gratification from an examination of it. Secondly, it was executed by a gifted and youthful artist, who is dependent upon his labors, not only for advancement in life, but for his actual support, and the necessary means of improving—perhaps of continuing—in his profession. Thirdly, this artist is an American, toiling in a foreign clime, and cheered by the hope of encouragement and assistance from his countrymen. D.

LITERARY NOTICES.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

"SWALLOW BARN" is the title of a work published not long since, by Carey and Lea of Philadelphia, and, as we perceive, noticed by very few of our contemporaries of the editorial corps. Nevertheless, we are greatly mistaken if it does not merit a very distinguished place among the attempts to delineate the scenery, manners and character of various portions of this country. The author has given one of the freshest, most natural, and agreeable sketches of a group of characters, living in the neighborhood, and frequenting the hospitable board of the proprietor of Swallow Barn, in "Old Virginia," that we have ever seen. The personages introduced are drawn with great truth and nature; the little incidents and events which serve to illustrate them, are apt, and brought about in the most natural way; and the style is remarkably pure and unaffected English. We cannot but predict a warm reception of this work among all persons who have not lost their relish for nature and probability, as well as all those who can properly estimate the beauties of simplicity in thought and expression. There are no marvels in the book, except it may be the marvellous absence of every thing out of the way or impossible.

NEW MAP OF THE CITY OF NEW-YORK.—We have before us a new map, just published by David H. Burr. It is a correct representation of this city from the Battery to Thirty-fourth street, embracing Brooklyn and Williamsburgh. This is the first we have seen, affording an accurate idea of the numerous alterations which the town has undergone during the last several years. Of these, by far the most important is that connecting Broadway with the Fourth-Avenue, as originally proposed in this journal. We have here a wide spacious thoroughfare, in nearly a direct line, nine miles long! three of which run through the centre of the most thickly populated and fashionable part of the city. We take to ourselves no little credit for this improvement, and have but one more suggestion to urge on the subject: the whole distance from the Battery to Harlem river should be known but by the single appellation of BROADWAY. The good effect of this must be obvious. When this street is completed, it may challenge competition with any in the world. On this excellent and beautifully colored map, may be found all the new and proposed squares. It is surrounded by fourteen engraved views of various striking parts of the metropolis, very prettily executed—some of them by Smillie. The whole is neatly framed, and forms a picture at once extremely useful and highly ornamental. There is not a merchant, lawyer, doctor, or indeed any man of business in the city, who should not embellish his counting-room or study with one of these elegant publications.

LETTERS FROM PARIS.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF EUROPE.

NUMBER TWENTY.

General Bertrand—Friend of Lady Morgan—Phrenology—Dr. Spurzheim—His lodgings—Process of taking a cast of the head—Incarceration of Dr. Bowring and De Potter—David the sculptor—Visit of Dr. Spurzheim to the United States.

My room-mate called a day or two since on General Bertrand, and yesterday he returned the visit, and spent an hour at our lodgings. He talked of Napoleon with difficulty, and became very much affected when my friend made some inquiries about the safety of the body at St. Helena. The inquiry was suggested by some notice we had seen in the papers of an attempt to rob the tomb of Washington. The general said that the vault was fifteen feet deep, and covered by a slab that could not be moved without machinery. The mind of the venerable old man is evidently giving way. He has shown this often of late in the chamber of deputies, of which he is a member. He told us that Madame Bertrand had many mementos of the emperor, which she would be happy to show us, and we promised to visit him.

At a party, a night or two since, I fell into conversation with an English lady, who had lived several years in Dublin, and was an intimate friend of Lady Morgan. She was an uncommonly fine woman, both in appearance and conversational powers, and told me many anecdotes of the authoress, defending her from all the charges usually made against her, except that of vanity, which she allowed. I received, on the whole, the impression that Lady M.'s goodness of heart was more than an offset to her certainly very innocent weaknesses. My companion was much amused at an American's asking after the "fender in Kildare-street;" though she half withdrew her cordiality when I told her I knew the countryman of mine who wrote the account of Lady Morgan, of which she complains so bitterly in the "Book of the Boudoir." It was this lady with whom the fair authoress "dined in the Chaussee d'Antin," so much to her satisfaction.

While we were conversing, the lady's husband came up, and finding I was an American, made some inquiries about the progress of phrenology on the other side of the water. Like most enthusiasts in the science, his own head was a remarkably beautiful one; and I soon found that he was the bosom friend of Dr. Spurzheim, to whom he offered to introduce me. We made an engagement for the next day, and the party separated.

My new acquaintance called on me the next morning, according to appointment, and we went together to Dr. Spurzheim's residence. The passage at the entrance was lined with cases, in which stood plaster casts of the heads of distinguished men, orators, poets, musicians; each class on its particular shelf, making altogether a most ghastly company. The doctor received my companion with great cordiality, addressing him in French, and changing to very good German-English, when he made any observation to me. He is a tall, large-boned man, and resembles Harding the American artist, very strikingly. His head is finely marked, his features are bold, with rather a German look; and his voice is particularly winning, and changes its modulations in argument from the deep, earnest tone of a man, to an almost child-like softness. The conversation soon turned upon America, and the doctor expressed, in ardent terms, his desire to visit the United States, and said he had thought of accomplishing it the coming summer. He spoke of Dr. Channing, said he had read all his works with avidity and delight, and considered him one of the clearest and most expansive minds of the age. If Dr. Channing had not strong developments of the organs of ideality and benevolence, he said, he should doubt his theory more than he had ever found reason to. He knew Webster and Professor Silliman, by reputation; and seemed to be familiar with our country, as few men in Europe are. One naturally, on meeting a distinguished phrenologist, wishes to have his own developments pronounced upon; but I had been warned by my friend, that Dr. Spurzheim refused such examinations as a general principle, not wishing to deceive people, and unwilling to run the risk of offending them. After a half-hour's conversation, however, he came across the room, and putting his hands under my thick masses of hair, felt my head closely all over, and mentioned at once a quality, which, right or wrong, has given a tendency to all my pursuits in life. As he knew, absolutely, nothing of me, and the gentleman who introduced me knew no more, I was a little startled. The doctor then requested me to submit to the operation of having a cast taken of my head, an offer which was too kind and particular to be declined; and, appointing an hour to be at his rooms the following day, we left him.

I was there again at twelve the morning after, and found Dr. Potter the Belgian patriot, and Dr. Bowring, with the phrenologist, waiting to undergo the same operation. The preparations looked very formidable. A frame, of the length of the human body, lay in the middle of the room, with a wooden bowl to receive the head, a mattress, and a long white dress to prevent stain to the clothes. As I was the youngest, I took my turn first. It was very like a preparation for being beheaded. My neck was bared, my hair cut, and the long white dress put on. The back of the head is taken first; and, as I was only immersed up to the ears in the liquid plaster, this was not very alarming. The second part, however, demanded more patience. My head was put once more into the stiffened mould of the first half, and as soon as I could get my features composed I was ordered to shut my eyes; my hair was oiled and laid smooth, and the liquid plaster poured slowly over my mouth, eyes, and forehead, till I was cased completely in a stiffening mask. The material was then poured on thickly, till the mask was two or three inches thick, and the voices of those standing over me were scarcely audible. I breathed pretty freely through the two small orifices at my nose; but the dangerous experiment of Mademoiselle Sontag, who was nearly smothered in the same operation, came across my mind rather vividly; and it seemed to me that the doctor handled the plaster quite too ungingerly, when he came to mould about my nostrils. After a half-hour's imprisonment, the plaster became sufficiently hardened, and the thread which was laid upon my face was drawn through, dividing the mask into two parts. It was then gradually removed, pulling very tenaciously upon my eye-lashes and eye-brows, and leaving all the cavities of my face filled with particles of lime. The process is a tribute to vanity, which one would not be willing to pay very often.

I looked on at Dr. Bowring's incarceration with no great feeling of relief. It is rather worse to see than to experience, I think. The poet is a nervous man; and as long as the muscles of his face were visible, his lips, eyelids, and mouth were quivering so violently that I scarcely believed it would be possible to get an impression of them. He has a beautiful face for a scholar—clear, well-cut, finished features, expressive of great purity of thought; and a forehead of noble amplitude, white and polished as marble. His hair is black and curling, (indicating, in most cases, Dr. Spurzheim remarked, activity of mind,) and forms a classical relief to his handsome temples. Altogether his head would look well in a picture; though his ordinary and ungraceful dress, and quick, bustling manner, rather destroy the effect of it in society.

De Potter is one of the noblest looking men I ever saw. He is quite bald, with a broad, ample, majestic head, the very model of dignity and intellect. Dr. Spurzheim considers his head one of the most extraordinary he has met. Firmness is the great development of its organs. His tone and manner are calm and very impressive, and he looks made for great occasions—a man stamped with the superiority which others acknowledge when circumstances demand it. He employs himself in literary pursuits at Paris, and has just published a pamphlet on "the manner of conducting a revolution, so that no after-revolution shall be necessary." I have translated the title awkwardly, but that is the subject.

I have since heard Dr. Spurzheim lecture twice, and have been with him to a meeting of the "Anthropological society," (of which he is the president and De Potter the secretary,) where I witnessed the dissection of the human brain. It was a most interesting and satisfactory experiment, as an illustration of phrenology. David the sculptor, is a member of the society, and was present. He looks more like a soldier than an artist, however; wearing the cross of the legion of honor, with a military frock-coat, and an erect, stern, military carriage. Spurzheim lectures in a free, easy, unconstrained style, with occasionally a little humor, and draws his arguments from admitted facts only. Nothing could be more reasonable than his premises, and nothing more like an axiom than the results, as far as I have heard him. At any rate, true or false, his theory is one of extreme interest, and no time can be wasted in examining it—for it is the study of man; and, therefore, the most important of studies.

I have had several long conversations with Dr. Spurzheim about America, and have at last obtained his positive assurance that he would visit it. He gave me permission this morning to say, (what I am sure all lovers of knowledge will be pleased to hear,) that he should sail for New-York in the course of the ensuing summer, and pass a year or more in lecturing and traveling in the United States. He is a man to obtain the immediate confidence and respect of a people like ours, of the highest moral worth, and the most candid and open mind. I hope, my dear M. and F., that you will make our paper a vehicle for any information he may wish to convey to the public; and that you and all our friends will receive him with the warmth and respect due to his reputation and worth. If he arrive in August, as he anticipates, he proposes to pass a month or so at New-Haven, and then to proceed to Boston, to commence his tour at the North.

P. S.—As I shall leave Paris shortly, you may expect but one or two letters more from this metropolis. I shall, however, as I extend my travels, find a greater variety of materials for my future communications.

SKETCHES BY A BRIEFLESS LAWYER.

TRIAL BY JURY.

It is an undoubted truth, that no fallacy is half so inveterate as that which is stamped by age. You may argue with an individual about his most favorite hobby, and as a reward for your pains, you may almost convince him he is in error; but against a principle which has nothing but antiquity to recommend it, your reasoning is in vain. Like an old oak, which has spread its roots far and wide, your efforts to eradicate it are fruitless; and if you should succeed in tearing it from its parent earth, you still leave behind some portion of its concealed extremities ready to sprout once more into verdant and vigorous existence. The palpable sophism which Jeremy Bentham has so well exposed, that the institutions of former ages are venerable, because they are remote, presents an insurmountable obstacle to the profane intruder, and creates, (if my professional readers will pardon the simile,) a kind of statute of limitations against which no proof will avail. Shutting our eyes and ears to the experience which century upon century has furnished to us, we approach, with a veneration almost ludicrous, the structures, moral as well as others, of ages whose leading characteristics were barbarism and ignorance; and gravely reasoning that our ancestors were old, because they would have been so had they lived till now, shudder at the idea of innovation. Thus, for example, most of our rules of evidence respecting written instruments have been derived from ages when writing was but a rare accomplishment; and when, from the necessity of the case, they were involved in a cloud of what, to a refined modern, cannot appear in any other light than as the most egregious absurdities; and the sanctity with which a sealed instrument is invested, over one that is merely written, has no more substantial foundation than the fact, that from the ignorance of the age in which it originated, a seal was resorted to as a very convenient substitute for the signature of the party. Hence it is, also, that in judging of the difficult question of hand-writing, a witness is compelled to testify from vague and indistinct impressions, formed, perhaps, upon mere casual observation, while he is denied the right of comparing with an acknowledged hand-writing that which is the subject of dispute, and thus arriving at a clear and satisfactory result. It is, in short, to this mawkish veneration for antiquity that we are to ascribe so many of the institutions and rules with which our profession is invested, and in finding a reason for which the most acute and devoted lawyer is so frequently at fault; and it is for a pertinacious adherence to fancies, such as these, that the science of the law so often assumes a character purely technical, instead of appearing to be, as in the main it is, the very essence and perfection of human reason.

These ideas have often occurred to me, and I have never felt their force more strongly than when viewed in connection with trial by jury. There is no branch of the administration of justice which has been more universally cried up; and I hazard little in the assertion, that there is none so undeservedly popular. Notwithstanding it has been blazoned as the "palladium of our rights," "the safeguard of our lives and liberties," and a thousand other such unmeaning rhapsodies, I have always considered it, and, for any thing I can now foresee, ever shall continue to regard it as a kind of legalized lottery, in which the chances of right and wrong are about equally balanced; and, if I were to choose a definition of it, I should prefer, of all I have ever heard, that which describes a jury as "twelve prisoners in a box to try one at the bar."

Many in whose way the following remarks may fall, have possibly been in law. To such I would appeal, whether at the commencement of the campaign they have ever been able to form the remotest idea of what would be the result of the "judgment of their peers?" If they entered upon the strife with the consciousness of justice, has that consciousness emboldened their confidence in the ultimate success of their cause? If, with a full conviction that truth was against them, have they never been encouraged to put in for a chance by the proverbial uncertainty attending legal litigation? Who, however upright his cause, but has trembled before the perjury of witnesses, the ingenuity of counsel, and the ignorance, weakness, or prejudice of a jury? Who has ever been deterred from the pursuit of wrong, by the certainty that that wrong would recoil upon himself by the unerring judgment of a jury of his country? These inquiries may possibly to some indicate an unjustifiable want of confidence in the integrity or good sense of that portion of my fellow-citizens, upon whom the duty devolves of passing upon the rights of others in the capacity of jurymen. This by no means follows. I will grant them the ordinary intelligence and the greatest share of integrity, and the remark will hold equally true. What, after all, is this trial by jury? You have a controversy with your neighbor, about some question of right; you go to law; you each employ able and experienced lawyers; you come before a jury of twelve men, selected promiscuously from society; your witnesses contradict each other upon the facts; your counsel do the same upon the law; the court, with a few very general remarks, leave the facts to the jury, with alternative instructions upon the law; and they are then locked up in a room, without "meat, drink, fire, or candle," until they come to a unanimous conclusion on the complicated mass with which for hours, or perhaps days together, they have been bewildered. They remain out a few hours, wrangling about matters of which, perhaps, two-thirds of them understand nothing; and when, at length, the most hungry have resolved to give way to the rest, they come into the court with a verdict which astonishes even the party in whose favor it is given. Is there a man on earth who would be willing to say that, even upon a fair average, a system such as this can result in justice? Do we not constantly see the ablest judges perplexed in the extreme in deciding upon matters such as are every day thrown upon the helter-skelter opinions of twelve inexperienced laymen? Look at our highest courts, in almost every important case, deciding not as the result of their unanimous opinion, but of an almost equal division among them. Look at the conflicting views which all men will necessarily take of disputed cases, and contrast these with the ease with which the law cuts the gordian knot in the case of trial by jury, by starving them into what is called, as if in mockery, "unanimity."

Thousands of anecdotes might be presented, tending to illustrate the unanimity of juries, and the manner in which it is brought about. I am induced to select the following, however, to which I am persuaded the experience of such of my readers as have been unfortunate enough to be in the situation of jurors, will furnish many a parallel.

The first was a horse cause, recently tried in the north of England:

"The case was a clear one in favor of the plaintiff; but the jury, after having been locked up all night, and to a late hour on the day following, gave, to the astonishment of every body, except those in the secret, a verdict for the defendant. The circumstance was a good deal talked of at the time, and it appeared from the statements made in conversation by some of the jurors, that the result had been produced in the following manner. When the jury had retired to their room, it was immediately ascertained that eleven were for the plaintiff and one for the defendant. All manner of arguments were addressed to the understanding and conscience of the solitary dissident, but utterly in vain. Like Major Bellenden in Old Mortality, he protested that sooner than abandon his position, he would eat up his boots; and, showing a pocket-full of horse beans, he declared that he was provisioned for two or three days. The night came, but he remained inexorable.

"Supperless th' eleven sat," while the jurymen settled himself in a corner, munched away at his horse beans, and looked out with infinite philosophy upon the turmoil around him. The morning, the noon, and the evening drew on; the patience and strength of the eleven were exhausted, but the horse beans were not; and at length the twelve made their appearance in court with a verdict which every man among them knew to be a false one."

The next case was an action of libel, and the following proceedings of the jury in deliberating upon their verdict are taken from the London Times:

"Immediately after the jury were shut up in the Bail Court, the tendency of the alleged libel was warmly discussed. The special jurymen used great abundance of language, if not of argument, for the purpose of convincing Mr. Sawyer, that it was a false, malicious, and injurious publication. That gentleman manfully defended his opinion against all their objections; alleging, that he thought the remarks made upon Mr. Bodkin's conduct to be such as the occasion required, and such as he himself should have written, had he possessed the necessary talent. Several speeches were made upon the subject, which produced no effect except it were that of making the speakers more obstinately attached to the side they advocated. A Mr. Cooke, who was a talesman, was a silent, but not an ineffectual assistant to Mr. Sawyer, in the vast fire of words which his brother jurymen opened upon him. He agreed with Mr. Sawyer, that the paragraphs complained of, formed no libel; and declared that he could not consent to give a verdict which should declare them to be such. The libel was in consequence read over, paragraph by paragraph, several gentlemen commenting upon it as they went along. Still the two jurymen remained unconvinced. Under these circumstances the jury came into court about seven o'clock, and the conversation then took place between Mr. Justice Littledale and Mr. Sawyer, which was reported in our paper of Saturday. The result of it was, that Mr. Sawyer and Mr. Cooke, in consequence of the doctrine laid down by Mr. Justice Littledale respecting constructive malice, gave up their intention of finding a verdict for the defendant, and agreed to join their brethren in a verdict for the plaintiff. They then left the box to consider of the damages which they should give the plaintiff for his loss of character. A question then arose as to damages. The two jurors who had reluctantly consented to find a verdict for the plaintiff, said that nothing should induce them to give more than nominal damages; and not knowing that in an action for a libel, a farthing's damages will carry costs, if the judge does not certify, declared their intention of submitting to starvation before they gave Mr. Bodkin more than the costs of his suit. This declaration was not likely to excite much satisfaction in the minds of any of the jurors, and some of the special jurors, we are informed, evinced great displeasure at it. Their usual hour of dinner had arrived, and the sherry and sandwiches which Mr. Justice Littledale had permitted to be sent in to Mr. Robertson and Mr. Horton, on account of their advanced age, tending only to excite the appetite of their brother jurors, Mr. Godsall, who, we understand, was engaged to dine with his father-in-law, the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, seemed particularly to regret the loss of his dinner. About half past eight o'clock several jurymen wrote to their families stating that they must not expect them that night; and their notes were dispatched by the officer of the court. As it had now become evident to both parties that they could not convince the other, the matter ceased to be one of argument, and became one of starvation. At this stage of the proceeding, the jurors formed themselves into detached groups, and amused themselves as they could in their dark, hungry, and desolate situation. It was a Vauxhall night; and one of the jury attempted to console his fellows by reminding them that, at twelve o'clock at night, they would have the fire-works at Vauxhall to enlighten their darkness. Twelve o'clock came, but the fire-works though they were heard, were not seen, for the towers of the Abby intervened, and interrupted the line of vision. Mr. Godsall, at this hour of the night, was rather obstreperous. He stomped about the room in a great passion, and committed other extravagancies. Mr. Sawyer, having heard all that could be said against him, and having said all that he could say in his own behalf, now prepared himself for sleep, by taking off his coat, rolling it up, and placing it as a pillow upon some chairs, which he had put together to serve him as a bed. His brother jurors expressed dissatisfaction at this proceeding, and urged many objections to his novel mode of discharging the duties of a jurymen. After giving them such answer as he thought proper, and recommending his seconder, Mr. Cooke, to follow his example, on the ground that sleep was the best antidote against the evils of fasting, he proceeded to carry his own advice into execution as rapidly and comfortably as he could under existing circumstances. This was the gentleman who was described in our paper of Saturday as seen lying upon some chairs at one of the periods when the room was open, by the officer to attend to the complaints of the jury. Daylight at last dawned upon these unhappy jurors, but brought with it little relief to their misery. At half past five, Mr. Sawyer, who had been able to sleep soundly, awoke, and told his brothers in thralldom that he was as much refreshed by his sleep as if he had taken a meal. This was not a very delightful announcement to those gentlemen who were suffering under the want of sleep and the want of sustenance. To Mr. Godsall it proved particularly exasperating; he exhibited symptoms of temporary insanity; he jumped upon a bench, and threatened destruction to Mr. Sawyer, for detaining him from his family, by his obstinate opposition. He then seized his cane, which was of considerable thickness, and struck it so forcibly upon the judge's seat as to make several indentations, and did not cease from this violence till he had broken it completely into shivers. He then began to rail with great vehemence against Mr. Sawyer, who had the good sense not to make any answer to his ravings. This appeared to offend him still more: he cried out, 'I shall go mad, I shall go mad, he—he' (pointing to Mr. Sawyer,) 'is cutting my throat with a feather.' He then made a spring at that gentleman, and would certainly have done him some injury, had he not been prevented by the strong arms of those that surrounded him. It has been stated, that he then endeavored to tear up a bench as a weapon, and that he broke a window in endeavoring to escape; but we have reason to believe that there is no truth in either of these statements. He sunk, at last, into a silent melancholy, and was for some time quiet from complete exhaustion.

"Very early in the morning, the question had been narrowed to this point—whether the verdict should be a farthing or forty shillings. Mr. Sawyer was obliged to consort with his silent but effective seconder, Mr. Cooke. Whenever he approached any of the groups into which the other jurors had formed themselves, they fled from him as from a pestilence. The consequence was, that he was flung upon his own resources for amusement, and at seven o'clock was seen seated at the window, gazing very placidly on the passengers in the street. Poor Mr. Godsall could not, however, conduct himself thus quietly; he attempted to force himself out of court, but was unsuccessful, in spite of all his protestations that parties within were driving him to madness."

These are cases to which the parallels are by no means few. To starve a jury into a verdict has become a proverb; and in the administration of justice, as far as this branch of it is concerned, at least, it may be safely asserted that the result depends almost as much upon the constitutions of the jurors as upon the justice of the case upon which they are called to pass.

The length to which these remarks have already extended admonishes me to close; I cannot, however, do so without adverting to one benefit, and I may almost say the only one, resulting from trial by jury. I allude to criminal cases. In such my observation and experience have, I confess, satisfied me that it is an institution of inestimable value. It is undoubtedly just, as well as humane, that where the life or liberty of the citizen is involved, it should be protected by some power as far removed as possible from the reach of technical distinctions; and that the benefit of the generous doubt which the law always interposes in behalf of every prisoner should be administered to him by men whose sensibilities have never been deadened by a familiarity with the details of crime. So far as this is concerned, our feelings and our judgments unite in awarding to every accused the privilege of a trial by his peers. But when we view it as the arbiter upon mere personal rights, turning as they often do upon questions of the most difficult construction, its most devoted admirers cannot but yield at least a doubt of its utility. No man need be told that in the administration of justice every thing depends upon its certainty and uniformity; and, where we find any of its branches calculated to defeat this object, disposing of questions of right through whim, caprice, obstinacy, or ignorance; establishing no precedent; but, on the contrary, tending to set every thing like precedent at defiance, can we hesitate a moment in ascribing to this cause all the uncertainty with which the law has been so universally upbraided?

I do not make these remarks at random; a long course of observation, coupled with at least some experience, has strengthened my conviction of their truth. If it were necessary to go further, I might confidently appeal to the experience of the profession at large, whether they do not regard trial by jury as the most uncertain of all modes of legal proceeding. I might appeal to suitors, whether they have not often shrunk from the doubt in which their rights are involved when centred in a jury-box; and I might even appeal to jurors themselves, whether their own experience has not impaired their confidence in the excellence of this system. An old and intelligent friend of mine, who is well known in our courts as a most conscientious and experienced juror, has often assured me, that he never entered a jury-box without feelings of the most painful character. "Not," said he, "that I doubt either my own integrity or capacity to decide; for with an ordinary share of both, I should have no cause for alarm. But I am placed there under the sanction of an oath, which in its terms, it is true, calls upon me to render a true verdict according to the evidence, but in its effect requires me either to yield my own judgment to the obstinacy of others, or submit to the accumulated horrors of hunger and imprisonment." This is the dilemma in which, in nine cases out of ten, a juror is placed. Who can wonder, then, that to escape from it, he is often compelled to bend the dictates of his conscience to less worthy considerations; or that he should frequently consent to throw upon chance the rights, the liberty, perhaps the life, of a fellow-being?

SPANISH PROVERBS.

He who gives unto the poor,
Does only lend to swell his store.
He who once proves himself a knave,
Does seldom change this side the grave.

SOME PASSAGES IN THE LIFE OF A GENIUS.

"So reeking mists do shade the golden sun,
So is the glowing eye bedimmed with tears;
So love is checked before the goal is won,
And so o'er purest lives, some reckless chance will run."

That expression of a certain great poet, "just as the twig is bent the tree's inclined," may be all very true, in regard to what he calls the "common mind," but it is a positive absurdity, when applied to the growth and culture of a genius. My own manhood is sufficient proof of this; for of a verity, if my maturity was inclined into that variety of twists, that "the twig" my childhood received, I should be at this time a most intolerably crooked stick; whereas, on the contrary, instead of those thousand and one propensities, in which my nonage indulged, and which, according to this maxim, would give promise of a changeful course of life, my disposition has become as intolerant of variety, as it would have been, had I never possessed those early peculiarities of genius.

In consequence of the exceeding merit of the "Lines on a deceased canary bird," mentioned in my last chapter, the interesting fact of the existence and name of their author, soon became known to all the spinsters in the village. As I was the only person in this community known actually to have written poetry, I soon became something of a lion. It is true that Doctor Quipes was suspected of having, in the exuberance of his passion for a certain damsel, once perpetrated some rhymes; but the fact was never positively proven: indeed, the only evidence against the doctor, was a couple of lines, supposed to be the beginning or end of an effusion, in praise of the divine charms of Miss Letitia Scriggins, the amiable object of his adorations. Mistress Scriggins was somewhat of a lean, and rather antiquated appearance, the delicate yellow of whose complexion, coupled with the ruby hue of a tolerably prominent nose, and enlivened by the oblique glances of two very terrible eyes, set the heart of the amorous doctor into such a state of palpitation, as gave me to suppose that the poetic spirit might for a moment have titillated the fancy of the lover into the commission of the lines referred to. Miss Scriggins was unfortunately subject to a depression of mind; common, I believe, to antiquated maidens—a disease which has received the classical appellation of "the blues." It was during a violent attack of this complaint, that the inspiration of the doctor was supposed to have taken place. To show the deep feeling and the sympathetic soul of the poet, I have preserved the couplet to this time. It ran thus—

"Alas! how would this bosom miss ye,
If death should take you off, Letitia!"

This being the only probable case of poetry that had ever excited the admiration of the litterati of B——, I was of course an object of wonder, and was soon pressed on all hands for a copy of the verses; among others, the village apothecary, who was something of a dilettante and editor of the newspaper, (a periodical not exactly literary) called and urged the favor of a copy for publication. In less than a week "Lines on a deceased canary bird" appeared in tolerably legible print, on the first page of the Banner of Independence. On this proud day, and for some time after, I do not think I once condescended to direct my eyes upon any object under an angle of forty-five degrees; indeed, so high did I hold my head, that upon the very next sabbath I was made to feel the truth of the maxim which declares that "pride will have a fall." I was on my way to church, dressed in a very fashionable suit of yellow nankeens, and had nearly reached the house of worship—the doors of which were already filled with the congregation—when, thinking of nothing but myself, and the envy that I imagined I was creating in the hearts of all who saw me, I slipped plump into an old coal-pit, and suddenly found myself up to the chin in its black muddy contents!

"Oh world, thy slippery turns!"

I should certainly have been drowned in this filthy abyss, had it not been for the lucky appearance of Doctor Quipes, whose memory for this one act I shall ever respect. The learned gentleman was on his way to church, and had been behind me for some distance, admiring, no doubt, my very dignified strut, when this lamentable accident occurred. Seeing my plight, his first idea was, as he afterwards observed, that the earth had swallowed me in judgment for my pride; but, soon satisfying himself that this was not the case, he proceeded with what I then thought very easy liberation, to consider on the means of effecting my release from durance. How to accomplish this seemed with him a matter of question. The top of the pit was at least three feet from the surface of the water, in which I was thus unexpectedly immersed, and of course nearly that distance from my head, which was hardly above the surface; this made it impossible for the good doctor to reach me with his hands, even should he condescend to place his lengthy limbs in a horizontal position. There was no ladder handy, nor did any person appear disposed to assist the doctor in the work of liberation. He thought for a moment, a Yankee seldom thinks longer, and then divesting himself of his coat, he proceeded to put his ingenuity to the trial. He seated himself on the brink of the pit, with his feet over the water; then, with his hands stretched over his head, he took a fast grip upon a sapling that grew nigh; then, gently sliding off the brink, he let out his full length into the pit; his legs, of course, were immersed to the thigh; he soon bent them up, and turned in his knees against the side of the vault, making a sort of step, by leaping upon which I reached the edge of the pit, and by another spring from the good doctor's convenient knees, accomplished my liberation. Most forcibly was I reminded of this trite maxim,

"A friend in need, is a friend indeed."

My nankins were in a terrible plight, my coat was a very Joseph, by virtue of its divers colors, and my dignified feelings of self-satisfaction, considerably "below par." My appearance was such that I have been told some of the spectators actually laughed! My amiable deliverer having effected a safe lodgment on the dry sand, "wrapped me up" in a plaid cloak, and I rode home considerably chop-fallen. This mishap was doubly unfortunate, inasmuch as it not only damped the ardor of my poetic soul, but had likewise the regretted effect of depriving the world of some most exquisite sparkles from the exuberant fount of my imagination. Time, however, soothed my wounded pride, and I again favored the Banner of Independence with the outpourings of my muse, in the shape of "verses on a withered rose-bud;" a subject so perfectly original, and so delicately applicable to what was considered my "withered hopes," that my fame was thereby prodigiously increased. I was beset on all hands with albums, and polite requests; but I soon grew tired of these things. I considered within myself that I was born for greater deeds than poetizing for albums, or flourishing in one corner of the Banner of Independence. It might do very well for "moon-struck" young gentlemen, and that sort of genius, but something whispered me that it was immeasurably beneath the gifted soul, whose aspirations even then were for immortality. I decided on some great effort. I would do something that should make me known beyond the narrow precincts of B—; something that should give me a niche in the temple of fame. Not Julius Cæsar in the capitol, surrounded with the greatness and majesty of the world; not Alexander of Macedon, after his first conquest; nay, not even the glorious John Dryden, after penning an immortal dedication, felt that swelling consciousness of a spirit within that "passeth show," more vividly than at this conclusion, did I, Roley McPherson, the humble laureate of B—. The question whether this great effort should be a tragedy or an epic, now occupied all my thoughts, and was the pleasing subject of my dreams. For a week I gave it my serious, close, and undivided attention. I absented myself from all company, and avoided my most intimate friends. At one time, when I had nearly made up my mind, I arose from my bed in the middle of the night, with the intent of taking a stroll in the woods, thinking thereby to have that perfect seclusion so necessary to the great object of my thoughts. As the night, however, was rather cold, and something moist withal, I did not venture farther than the door; here I stood gazing upon the void and double-distilled darkness around me. Sadly and dismally the wind groaned through an avenue of chestnuts, that led from the house. There was no sound to break the deep and dreary moaning of the breeze, except ever and anon a heavy rain-drop, that fell pattering upon the leaves. As I looked upon the black vacancy around me, I thought it no unapt emblem of the future. That, too, was covered with an impenetrable obscurity; and, even as my eye sought to pierce the blackness before me, I found nothing beyond the fringes of the eyelid; even so in my endeavors to look into futurity was I baffled in the attempt. Here a most horrible yell, bursting like the crash of ruin upon my ear, dispersed my thick coming fancies, and some object, with the quickness of light, glided past me. I had but a glimpse; the figure was white, and from the celerity of its motions, left an impression upon my mind that it must be in a hurry. I did not pursue it, but waited in a sort of chilly perspiration of wonder, (not fear,) for the issue. Another moment and again a terrible crash, attended by a scream that pierced into my very soul, (and I had on a great-coat at the time,) came from the suspicious quarter. I seized an umbrella that stood in the hall, determined—not exactly to rush out into the midst of the melée—for that would have been presumption; but to place it across the door-way, as a barrier between me and the devil, or whatever evil spirit might take it into his head to enter. At this instant a second figure, of apparently a darker shade than the first, passed with the like speed, which gave me to think it was probably in pursuit of the other. I raised the umbrella, to fix it across the door-way; but, just at the moment, the white figure darted something quicker than a full-charged flash of lightning, bolt into my face! What I did at this awful moment I know not, neither have I the shadow of a recollection thereof. The next morning I was found lying against the door-post, my face very considerably scratched, and a white cat—the identical assassin of my poor canary—transfixed with the ferule of an umbrella, dead beside me!

I would make no comments on this catastrophe, I would not excite the tender sympathies of the sensitive, or draw salt tears adown the rough cheek of manhood—but the thought has crossed me since, in my daily business; it has haunted me in sleep; it has beset me in my hours of gaiety and sorrow—that the unfortunate animal whose mangled corse was that morning found at my side, the cat whose murderous propensities shortened the days of my canary, met her death at my hands! The thought is horrible—but the cat is dead. "Requiescat in pace."

THE SMALL POX.—Dr. Picton, of New-Orleans, recommends the exclusion of light as a means of preventing the pitting in small-pox. He states that, two years ago, a number of patients were admitted into the charity hospital at New-Orleans, laboring under the small-pox. The room was so constructed, that while air was freely admitted, the light was carefully excluded. Not a patient had a pit in any part of the body.

LONDON PRESS.—The number of new works, exclusive of new editions, pamphlets, and periodicals, published in London last year, was eleven hundred.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDITED BY GEORGE F. MORRIS, THEODORE S. FAY, AND NATHANIEL P. WILLIS.

SATURDAY, JUNE 30, 1832.

Agents, distant subscribers and others indebted to this establishment, will confer a favor by making an immediate settlement of their accounts.

Close of the volume.—We cannot close the present volume without respectfully offering our acknowledgments to correspondents, to our editorial brethren in all parts of the country, and to the public. Of the first, many have contributed their productions to this journal from motives of personal friendship, and many from a laudable wish to assist the work. Several, whose pens betray a ready power, are unknown to us; others, writing in the leisure intervals of professional life, feel a delicacy in publishing their names, although they cheerfully lend their aid. More than one individual, whose names would add much reputation to the paper, are thus in the habit of appearing in these pages incognito. To each and all of these our thanks are due, and we earnestly solicit a continuance of their favors. We wish to render this work a melange, from as many various writers as possible; and we feel assured, that there is about us sufficient literary talent to surprise as well as delight all readers, if properly called into operation.

To our editorial brethren we also owe much for their favors in noticing our labors. The kind encouragements received in this way, have been cheering evidences that amid their various other calls and the din and clash of political warfare, our claims upon our countrymen have not been overlooked. Lastly, to the public we have to offer our warmest thanks; to their indulgence and liberality we owe more than we can express. Our subscription list is ample, and is ever on the increase. It embraces names dear to science and fame; and letters are frequently received, filled with encouragement and proffers of assistance. Whatever may be the intrinsic excellence of any journal, it can never succeed unless it reposes confidence in a steady patronage. In this way, and when it feels that it is treading on firm ground, it develops its resources, and forms new plans of improvement. We wish this to be impressed on the minds of all readers. We have said the same thing before; and the promises then made have never been broken. We appeal to the last volume of the work itself, whether we have not added to its value, as means have been placed in our possession, by the regular increase of subscribers? This we shall continue to do. The progress of a literary periodical to excellence must be, especially in this country, slow, and for a long period uncertain. It must also depend as much on the faithful adherence of old subscribers and the addition of new, as upon the talent, industry, perseverance, and skill of its conductors and contributors. It has been justly said, that a man may discover patriotism as well in cherishing the literature and arts of his country as in defending its rights. We may, with equal propriety, add, that the best journal, without the efficient support of the public, is no better than the best general without the co-operation of his men. We earnestly trust, therefore, that the fickleness which has been charged upon our reading community will not be verified in relation to this work, thereby not only stripping us of the power to improve, but taking from us the harvest of past labors. We respectfully solicit the continued support of friends, and all their influence in extending our circulation, great as it already is. We have enlarged our expenditures in proportion to the increase of our income, and shall continue to do so. Our associate, Mr. Willis, is industriously occupied in collecting materials in various parts of France and Italy; and from his prolific pen we anticipate an abundance of interest and amusement. We are pleased to state, that his "first impressions" are popular even beyond our hope. They are copied and commented on very favorably by the most authentic journals. Arrangements have been effected with Mr. Cox, for occasional communications from Great Britain. This is our old and favorite correspondent C. The musical department has been put altogether on a new footing. It has been assigned to the direct and efficient superintendence of the distinguished amateur to whom the public are indebted for, among others, the valuable operas of the Caliph of Bagdad, Cinderella, and the White Lady. We can, therefore, promise our musical readers numerous choice morceaux, not to be obtained elsewhere this side the water, as well as the rare and sweet airs from new operas.

Every thing promised in the prospectus may be strictly depended on. We conclude these brief remarks by the following extract from it:

From the commencement of this paper, our humble endeavors have been unceasingly exerted to elevate the character of American periodical literature, and we trust we have not been altogether unsuccessful.

Our columns have been, and will continue to be, principally filled with ORIGINAL matter.

Besides the writings of the editors, we are honored with occasional contributions from a list of NEARLY TWO HUNDRED NATIVE AUTHORS, which embraces many of the most distinguished and highly gifted literary men of the land.

In addition to our FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE, important sources are open to us for selections.

The flattering and general testimonials of writers, scholars, and contemporary journals, on both sides of the Atlantic, warrant the assertion that there is no work which gives such valuable equivalents for the amount of subscription, or which possesses more strong and undeniable claims to the efficient support of the American people.

Its steady and marked improvement furnishes a satisfactory pledge that its progress, in every department, will continue to keep pace with the increase of its already extensive circulation. We have received the certain and gratifying evidence that it is read and approved by the most intelligent classes throughout the United States.

ENGRAVINGS.—The EMBELLISHMENTS for the TENTH VOLUME will be of the most COSTLY and BEAUTIFUL kind, consisting of FULL SIZED SUPER-ROYAL QUARTO PLATES, executed expressly for the work, by the best artists. Besides the VIGNETTE, there will be FOUR SUPERB ENGRAVINGS issued during the year, which, if published separately, would alone equal the amount of subscription to the Mirror. As a guarantee for the excellence of this department, it has been placed under the direction of Mr. R. W. Weir.

In addition to the above, there will be published a number of finely executed ENGRAVINGS ON WOOD, also drawn and engraved for the work, and illustrative of curious and interesting subjects.

MUSIC.—Each number of the ensuing volume will contain a popular piece of MUSIC, arranged with accompaniments for the piano-forte, harp, guitar, &c. At the expiration of the year, these form a VALUABLE COLLECTION OF THE MOST CHOICE AND RARE PIECES, which, although occupying little more than one sixteenth part of the work, could not be purchased in any other way, except at a cost far greater than that of the entire journal.

LITERARY CONTENTS.—Among a variety of other subjects, the work is devoted to critical notices of new publications; the arts and sciences; scientific intelligence; the fine arts—music, poetry, and painting; original tales and essays; first impressions of Europe; reminiscences of old times in New-York; the Little Genius—satirical, humorous, and pathetic; American scenery, biography, education and character; strictures on the drama, and other amusements; translations from the German, French and Spanish; occasional selections from late publications; record of passing events; original miscellany; anecdotes—historical, literary, humorous, etc.; varieties, etc. etc.

In short, every thing which can enhance the value of the paper, and render it agreeable, instructive and interesting. By the above enumeration it will be perceived that the plan of the Mirror embraces every subject within the range of the fine arts and the belles-lettres, and no expense will be spared to render it equal to any other publication extant.

Important—but not pleasant.—We must respectfully protest against the course pursued by several individuals at the close of the last year. Before they sent in their notice of discontinuance, they received two or three impressions of the present volume, which were never returned; thereby breaking the files, rendering the sets incomplete, and greatly confusing our books. By sending in their names previously to the publication of the next number, they who mean to discontinue at this period, will, in some degree, mitigate the evil to us. Such as, neglecting this, may receive any superfluous numbers, will please return them as soon and as little injured as possible. This notice is not given merely for the worth of the individual copies thus deficient, (although the first one of the succeeding volume will contain one of the most valuable plates ever published in the work, and also a beautiful vignette title-page) but, during the past twelve months, new applications have been repeatedly made for the back numbers, and, finding them incomplete, the applicants have almost invariably deferred subscribing till the subsequent volume. All the entire sets of the past volume have been sold long since, and every number which has been detained, as above mentioned, actually costs us a year's subscription. This remonstrance is given from our extreme reluctance to hold such as casually receive the first number, answerable for an entire volume. We shall, however, certainly be compelled to do this where it is not immediately returned uninjured.

Achille Murat.—From a personal acquaintance with this amiable and accomplished foreigner, we can testify to his ability to produce a valuable work, and also his kind feelings towards this country. We recommend some of our friends among the publishers to re-print, forthwith, the small volume, entitled "A Moral and Political Sketch of the United States of North America," which he has recently issued in Paris. If we do not mistake greatly, it will present a striking contrast to the malignant and worthless works of other travelers, who have been disappointed in finding that they were as neglected here as at home.

A pleasant companion.—The most agreeable of all companions is a simple, frank man, without any high pretensions to an oppressive greatness; one who loves life, and understands the use of it; obliging; alike at all hours; above all, of a golden temper, and steadfast as an anchor. For such a one we gladly exchange the greatest genius, the most brilliant wit, the profoundest thinker.

Exchange papers.—Notice was some time since given, that a curtailment of our list would be necessary at the close of the present volume; those, therefore, who do not receive our future numbers will please consider the exchange at an end. We sincerely regret the necessity of this step; but we really cannot afford to continue the list as it is at present. Those among our editorial brethren, to whose attentive kindness in publishing the prospectus, and extending towards us other acts of editorial courtesy, (thereby laying us under obligations which we cannot forget,) we are so greatly indebted, will of course receive the paper as usual.

Subscribers can have their volumes handsomely bound, by sending the numbers to the office of publication.

Correspondents must indulge us for a week or two.

CONDITIONS.

The Mirror is published every Saturday, at the corner of Nassau and Ann-streets. It is elegantly printed in the super-royal quarto form, on fine paper, with brevier and nonpareil type. It is embellished, once every three months, with a SPLENDID SUPER-ROYAL QUARTO ENGRAVING, and every week with a popular piece of music, arranged for the piano-forte, harp, guitar, &c. Fifty-two numbers complete a volume of four hundred and sixteen large pages, for which a beautifully ENGRAVED TITLE-PAGE, (painted by Weir, and engraved by Durand), and a copious INDEX, are furnished. The terms are FOUR DOLLARS per annum, PAYABLE, IN ALL CASES, IN ADVANCE. It is forwarded by the earliest mails to subscribers residing out of the city of New-York. Communications, POST PAID, must be addressed to the Editors. No subscriptions received for a less period than one year.
